MR BAYLE'S
Hiſtorical and Critical
DICTIONARY.

THE SECOND EDITION.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

BY

M^R^ DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE FIFTH.

S——Z.

BRITISH MUSEUM

THE

DICTIONARY
Hiſtorical and Critical

OF

Mr PETER BAYLE.

THE SECOND EDITION,

Carefully collated with the ſeveral Editions of the Original; in which many Paſſages are reſtored, and the whole greatly augmented, particularly with a Tranſlation of the Quotations from eminent Writers in various Languages.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

REVISED, CORRECTED, AND ENLARGED,

BY

Mr DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE FIFTH.

S—Z.

LONDON:
Printed for D. Midwinter; J. Brotherton; A. Bettesworth and C. Hitch;
J. and J. Hazard; W. Innys and R. Manby; T. Ward; W. Meadows;
T. Woodward; W. Hinchliffe; J. Walthoe; E. Symon;
T. Cox; A. Ward; J. and P. Knapton; S. Birt; D. Browne; T. Longman;
T. Astley; S. Austen; L. Gilliver; H. Lintot; H. Whitridge;
R. Willock; E. Wicksteed; C. Bathurst, and J. and R. Tonson.

MDCCXXXVIII.

MVSEVM
BRITAN
NICVM

Mr BAYLE's
Hiſtorical and Critical
DICTIONARY.

S.

SABELLICUS (MARK ANTONY COCCIUS) was a learned man, flouriſhed towards the end of the XVth century. He was the ſon of a Farrier, and was born in a little town (a) of Italy upon the Teverone. He applied himſelf ſo early to his ſtudies, that before he had a beard he was found qualified to teach a ſchool at Tivoli. Having got ſome money by that means, he went to Rome in order to improve his learning by the lectures of Pomponius (b), who admitted him into his academy with the uſual ceremonies, and particularly with the impoſition of a new name, it was that of Sabellicus. This new diſciple of Pomponius reformed his ſtyle in that ſchool. He left Rome to go and teach at Udine near Aquileia. Some books that he publiſhed got him ſuch a name that the magiſtrates of Vicenza offered him twice as great a penſion as what he had; and by that means drew him to profeſs Philology in their city. He did not ſtay long there, for he had an invitation from the ſenate of Venice, to accept of two honourable and lucrative employments: the one was to write the Hiſtory of the republic, and the other to teach the Belles Lettres. He diſcharged the ſecond better than the firſt, for his Hiſtorical work was full of flatteries and lies [A]. He undertook afterwards to compoſe an univerſal Hiſtory from the beginning of the world, and applied himſelf to it till he died. This work has been publiſhed, and is not much eſteemed [B]: Sabellicus died of the Pox, being about ſeventy

(a) It is called in Latin, Vicus Varronis, or Vicus Valerius. See Leander Albertus Deſcriptio Ital. pag. m. 224.

(b) Thus Paul Jovius calls him. It is the famous Pomponius Lætus.

[A] He diſcharged the ſecond better than the firſt; for his hiſtorical work was full of flatteries and lies.] He was paid to be ſincere and exact with reſpect to his ſcholars, but not with reſpect to hiſtory; and therefore he diſcharged better the duties of a teacher, than thoſe of a Hiſtoriographer. Nec ibi diu manſit, evocante Senatu Veneto, ea conditione, ut civitatis res geſtas à fine Juſtiniani conſcriberet, & trecentis aureis in gymnaſio profiteretur. In hoc munere perutilem juventuti operam præſtitit, quum in altero adulatione parum ſobria rerum veritatem adumbraſſe videretur (1). Scaliger, the father, ſays, that Sabellicus confeſſed that he publiſhed or ſuppreſſed matters of fact, as he was directed by the money he received from the Venetians. Thus I paraphaſe ſomewhat freely theſe five Latin verſes:

Venalis item penna Sabellii latronis,
Qui dat, adimitque, ut libitum, cuique quod vult.
Falſa qui rogatus, undenam tot eſſet auſus?
Monſtrans Venetum perditus aureum nomiſma,
Te, inquit, quoque lux hæc faceret loqui ſi haberes (2).

Alſo Sabellicus's venal pen,
Who gives, and takes from ev'ry one at pleaſure;
And who, when he was aſk'd the reaſon why
He publiſh'd ſuch a multitude of lies,
The varlet anſwer'd, holding in his hand
A golden coin of Venice, this ſame light
Would make you ſpeak, had you but once receiv'd it.

[B] His univerſal hiſtory is not much eſteemed.] Paul Jovius ſays that things are ſo crowded in that work, that they appear only like points. It is the uſual fault of

(1) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. xlviii, pag. 114, 115.

(2) Jul. Cæſar Scaliger de Regnor. everſionibus, pag. 329. Part. ii, Poëmat. Edit. 1591.

BRITISH MUSEUM

ſeventy years old [C]. Not truſting his baſtard with the care of his burial he himſelf cauſed his epitaph to be engraved upon his tomb-ſtone: it is an inſcription which is not very modeſt (c) [D]. He had been library-keeper to Cardinal Beſſarion (d). His eyes had the ſame faculty with thoſe of Tiberius (e); for when he waked in the night he could plainly ſee his books and his chamber for ſome time (f). All his works were printed at Baſil in the year 1560 [E] in four volumes in folio. When he died he acted like thoſe fathers, who are more fond of their weakeſt children, than of thoſe who are the handſomeſt and the moſt healthful. For he recommended the printing of a manuſcript by which he could get nothing but diſhonour. His colleague Egnatius got it printed, and was blamed for it [F]. You will find a noble encomium upon Sabellicus in (c) Taken from Paul Jovius in Elog. Viror. doctor. cap. xlviii, pag. 114, 115.

(d) Freherus in Theatro, pag. 1434.

(e) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. lxviii.

(f) Pierius Valerianus in Hieroglyph. apud Freherum in Theatro, pag. 1434, ſays that he heard him ſay ſo.

of thoſe, who undertake to include the hiſtory of the whole world in one or two volumes. They murder all the facts, explain nothing thoroughly, every thing they write becomes obſcure. Read theſe words of Paul Jovius. 'Sed in Enneadibus omnium temporum, ab orbe condito memoriam complexus, uti neceſſe fuit, ingenti operis inſtituto feſtinanter indulgenti, res illuſtres præclara cognitione digniſſimas perobſcura brevitate adeò vehementer offuſcavit, ut excitatam uberrimo titulo legentium cupiditatem paſſim eluſerit, quum omnia in acervum anguſtiſſimè coarctata, nequaquam certa effigie, ſed exiguis tantùm punctis, & lineis annotata deſignentur (3). - - - - But in his Enneades, containing the hiſtory of all ages from the beginning of time, he has ſo crowded and obſcured the moſt memorable and illuſtrious tranſactions, (as was unavoidable in ſo large an undertaking haſtily executed) that he hath diſappointed the hopes of thoſe, who by his pompous titles were induced to read him, all things being ſo heaped and huddled in a narrow ſpace together, that they have not their due dimenſions, but ſeem only to be marked with ſmall points and lines.'

(3) Jovius, Elog. cap. xlviii, pag. 115.

[C] Sabellicus died of the Pox, being about ſeventy years old.] Paul Jovius does not ſay in what year he died; but Voſſius ſhews that it was in the year 1506 (4). Pierius Valerianus was more reſerved than Paul Jovius about the nature of his diſeaſe, he does not affirm that he died of a venereal diſtemper, but the deſcription he gives of his illneſs contains ſeveral ſymptoms, that may be accounted for, if we ſuppoſe that it was the pox, as Paul Jovius will have it. Theſe are Valerianus's words: 'Eò plus infortunii, & ærumnarum pertulit Sabellicus, vir ille ſcriptorum copia, & elegantia multò clarior, quàm mea ulla poſſit commendatione creſcere, miſerabilem vitæ finem eum ſortitus eſt, quod putrida, pernicioſaque correptus elephantiaſi per annos aliquot miſerabiliter cruciatus intercluſa vocis via, cæteriſque tam ſpiritus, quàm cibi meatibus computreſcentibus, gutturiſque corruptis omnibus organis, veniſque corroſis, non ſine cruciabili tormento annos aliquot peregit, eaque tabe demum confectus interiit (5). - - So much the more misfortunes and troubles did Sabellicus undergo, being a man more famous for the number and elegancy of his writings, than any encomium of mine can render him. He miſerably ended his life; for being wretchedly infected with a putrid and conſuming leproſy for ſome years, having the channel of his voice obſtructed, and the paſſages for his breath and victuals rotted, all the organs of his throat, and his veins corroded, he lived ſome years in excruciating torments, and at laſt being worn out by this corruption he died.' Paul Jovius does not heſitate ſo much; ſee the margin (6). Voſſius obſerves that it is ſaid, in the liſt of the hiſtorians of Udine, that Sabellicus wrote till the year 1513. This is proved to be falſe by two letters of Bembus, written in the year 1506, wherein he mentions Sabellicus's death. The fifth letter of the fourth book (7) ſays that he died the 17th of April, 1506. The ſame Voſſius tells us that Leander Albertus teſtifies that Sabellicus lived three years after he had made an end of his Enneades, which he had carried to the year 1504. I find in Leander Albertus that thoſe Enneades were brought down to the year 1507, and that the author died in the ſame year. I have conſulted not only the Latin tranſlation (8), printed at Cologne in 1567, but alſo the Italian original folio 149, printed at Venice in 4to, 1561.

(4) Voſſius de Hiſtoricis Latin. pag. 670.

(5) Pier. Valerianus de Litterat. Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. 28.

(6) Ad ſeptuageſimum fere annum pervenit Gallica tabe ex vaga Venere quæſita non obſcure conſumptus. Jovius, ubi ſupra. See alſo the verſes of Latomus, recited by Jovius.

(7) Pag. m. 531.

(8) Pag. 224.

[D] An inſcription that is not very modeſt.] If any body elſe had made it (9), one might excuſe it. Here it is,

Quem non res hominum, non omnis ceperat ætas.
Scribentem capit hæc Coccion urna brevis.

M. Anton. Coccius Sabellicus vivus ſibi F. (10).

He, whom no bounds of hiſtory reſtrain'd,
Is now within this little urn contain'd.

'M. Anthony Coccius Sabellicus made this epitaph upon himſelf before he died.'

(9) Inſigne quidem & meritum elogium ſed certe honeſtius ſi alieni ingenii pietas inſcripſiſſet. Jovius, in Elog. cap. xlviii, pag. 115.

(10) See Freherus in Theatro, pag. 1434.

[E] All his works were printed at Baſil in the year 1560.] Before this edition in four volumes in folio, printed for Hervagius, there had been an edition in two volumes in folio, printed in the year 1538, for the ſame Hervagius; but this contained only the Enneades, and the ten books of his Exempla (11), with an Hiſtorica Synopſis, which carried the Enneades to the year 1538. This continuation was made by Gaſpar Hedion. Cælius Secundus Curio (12) had the direction of the edition printed in 1560, to which he added a continuation of the Enneades to that year. The fourth volume contains moſt of Sabellicus's Opuſcula. I ſay moſt of them; for they did not inſert in it his paraphraſe, with notes, upon Suetonius (13), nor his critical obſervations upon ſeveral authors. They are divided into two books, and have been often printed, and namely at Venice in the year 1508, in folio. Badius inſerted them in a compilation of the like pieces in 1511; Gruterus put them in the firſt volume of his Theſaurus (14). As for the reſt, thoſe who reckon the Enneades of that author among the books printed ſoon after the invention of Printing are groſsly miſtaken. Beughem mentions an edion of that work made at Mentz in the year 1442. Sabellicus. Hiſtoriæ Enneades ſeptem (15). It is true he doubts of it; but he ſhould have poſitively ſaid it is falſe; for Sabellicus, in 1442, was not yet ſeven years old, and when he publiſhed thoſe ſixty-three books of his hiſtory, he dedicated them to the Doge of Venice Auguſtin Barbadigo, who was not promoted to that dignity till the year 1486 (16).

(11) See the remark [F].

(12) And not Carion as Niccolo Toppi calls him in his additions to the Biblioteca Napolitana, pag. 164.

(13) It has been often printed by it ſelf, and inſerted in the editions Variorum, even in that of Paris for Sebaſtian Cramoiſi 1610. in fol.

(14) See Toppi, ubi ſupra.

(15) Beughem, incunab. typogr. pag. 150.

(16) Chevill. Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 21.

[F] He recommended the printing of a manuſcript . . . Egnatius . . . . was blamed for it.] Here is the title of that work (17): MARCI ANTONII COCCII SABELLICI de omnium gentium omniumque ſeculorum inſignibus memoriaque dignis factis & dictis exemplorum libri X. Quæ ad vitæ mores, prudentiam ſapientiamve comparandam conducunt plurimum. Iccirco quum omnibus qui illo libero beatoque literarum ocio perfruuntur, tum vero imprimis qui vel adoleſcentiam in ſcholis, vel populum in concionibus docent utiliſſima ſunt (§ α).

[(§ α)] I do not know whether the Baſil edition in 8vo, 1541, has preſerved the date of Egnatius's preface. In my edition, which is of Straſburg, in 4to, large paper, 1518; this preface is dated on the laſt of December, 1508. The title of the book is: Marci Antonii Coccii Sabellici Exemplorum libri decem, ordine, elegantia, & utilitate præſtantiſſimi. Ad Chriſtianæ pietatis augmentum & decus. REM. CRIT.]

(17) I have it of the Baſil Edition, 1541, in 8vo.

Never did any book deſerve more than this to have the following thought of Pliny applied to it: 'Inſcriptiones propter quas vadimonium deſeri poſſit. At cum intraveris, dii deæque quam nihil in medio invenies (18)! - - - - - Inſcriptions, for the ſake of which one would almoſt forfeit a recognizance: but when once you enter, good God, how will you be ſurprized to find nothing at all in them!' We are told in the title page that it is a book very uſeful to thoſe who ſtudy, but chiefly to thoſe who teach youth, and to preachers. Indeed it may be of ſome uſe to thoſe, whoſe buſineſs it is to preſcribe exerciſes to young boys. Egnatius having publiſhed that book was blamed for it: ſome taxed him with inconſtancy, under pretence that there had been a long enmity between him and the deceaſed. They found fault with him for having reaſſumed the part of a good friend by the care he took of that manuſcript. Others ſaid, that he had publiſhed it only from a hatred he in Jacobus Philippus Bergomas, who was cotemporary with him (g). Moreri has committed ſome faults [G].

(18) Plinius, in Præf. Natur. Hiſtor.

(g) Jacob. Philippus Bergomas in Supplemento Chronicorum, pag. 435, 436. Edit. Venetæ 1506. apud Leonard. Nicodemum Addizioni alla Biblioteca Napoletana, pag. 165.

ſtill bore to Sabellicus, and that he knew well enough that the printing of ſuch a book would tarniſh the glory of the author. Egnatius wrote a preface in his own vindication (19). He maintained, that conſtancy does not require that a mortal man ſhould cheriſh an immortal hatred, and that nothing can be more reaſonable than to free ones ſelf from the ſlavery of paſſions. He added that any body, who had not a heart of ſtone, would have been moved with the entreaties of that dying man, and that he was ſo affected with them that he could not deny him that good office. We ſhall ſee his thought better in his own words. Nos verò cum aliis honeſtiſſimis cauſis adducti, & prius Sabellicum funebri laudatione proſecuti ſumus, & nunc pro virili opus hoc emendavimus. Cujus editionem moriens mihi ad ſe accerſito, & gratam recordationem pietatis in ſe Michaelis Triviſani Nicolai filii, qui ſub eo non parvo tempore meruerat, quique opus hoc lituris plenum exſcribendum curarat, commendavit, ut tam obſtinatum, tam durum, tam denique ferreum eſſe putem neminem, quem ſuprema illa vox moribundi hominis, atque adeò ab omni ſuſpitione immunis non emolliſſet : me certe adeò emolliit, ut nihil pro humanitatis jure negare homini præſertim jam morienti potuerim majorem hoc facto laudem à bonis ſperans, quàm quicquid de me Amaſinii, & Rabirii iſti recentes oblatrent attendens (20).

[G] Moreri has committed ſome faults.] I. The place, where Sabellicus was born, is not a ſmall borough : Leander Albertus (21) ſays that it is a ſtrong place, both by it's ſituation, and by the works that have been made to it (22); and he adds that in 1533, Lewis Gonzaga, General of Clement VII'ths troops, beſieged it, and was killed there by a cannon-ball. II. Moreri's way of refuting thoſe, who ſay that Sabellicus deſcended from the Cocceian family, is a very bad one. He tells us that it is likely enough that Sabellicus was the ſon of a poor Farrier, if one conſiders only the ſirname Coccius, which is only to be found in the epitaphs, and upon the monuments erected to him after his death. What an argument is this? The ſirname Coccius is only to be found in the epitaphs, &c. therefore it is likely enough that Sabellicus's father was a Farrier. Here is another falſe reaſoning. Moreri ſuppoſes that if the ſirname Coccius had belonged to Sabellicus's family, one might very well believe that he was deſcended from the Cocceian family. What an abſurdity. Let us add to this, two errors in fact. It is certain that Sabellicus took the ſirname of Coccius in his life-time, and that the inſcription of his tomb was not made after his death. He himſelf cauſed it to be engraved. III. He did not teach young boys in little boroughs, but at Trivoli, which is an epiſcopal city. IV. Moreri has theſe words; we have his Hiſtoria Enneadum in XI books from the beginning of the world to the year 1504: than which nothing can be more abſurd. He had read in Voſſius, that Sabellicus made himſelf famous chiefly by his hiſtory of eleven Enneades (23), that is, by an hiſtory divided into eleven Enneades, and he fancied that Sabellicus had writ a hiſtory divided into eleven books, which contained the actions of the Enneades. The reader muſt know that Sabellicus, affecting to imitate the Antients, divided his hiſtory not from ten to ten books, or into Decades (24), as Livy did, but from nine to nine, or into Enneades. V. When Moreri ſays that the epitaph, which Sabellicus made for himſelf, is reaſonable enough, but modeſt (25), he perverts the ſenſe of Paul Jovius, and gives a wrong judgment of the thing itſelf.

Note, that many other authors, as well as Moreri, have miſunderſtood the paſſage of Voſſius relating to the Enneades. Zeillerus tells us that Sabellicus wrote the hiſtory of two Enneades : cujus maxime celebratur hiſtoria Enneadum II (26), and Konig ſays that he has left us eleven books of Enneades (27).

(19) It is prefixed to Sabellicus's book.

(20) Egnatius in Præfat. ſub fin.

(21) Leand. Albert. in Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 214.

(22) Caſtellum nunc eſt cum natura loci tum opere munitiſſimum. Id. ibid.

(23) Maxime celebratur hiſtoria Enneadum XI. Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 690. Note, that the laſt Ennead contains only two books.

(24) Note that he divided his Hiſtory of Venice, into Decads. It contains three whole Decads, and three books of the fourth.

(25) Perhaps the Printers have left out ſome words, and Moreri had ſaid, but not very modeſt.

(26) Martinus Zeillerus de Hiſt. Parte i, p. 127.

(27) Konig. Bibl. pag. 712.

SABEUS (FAUSTUS) born in the territory of Breſcia in Italy, was ſo much eſteemed for his learning that Leo X invited him to Rome and made him keeper of the Vatican library. He undertook ſeveral long and painful journeys in order to enlarge that library, which he did to good purpoſe. He was ill rewarded for his pains, and complained loudly of this diſgrace [A], but his complaints made no impreſſion on four other Popes, who kept him in their ſervice. They gave him no preferment, which made him renew his murmuring at this bad ſtate of his affairs. He died at Rome eighty years old, under the pontificate of Paul IV (a). We have ſome books written by him [B]. I have told in another place (b) what ſhare he had in the firſt edition of Arnobius.

(a) Taken from the Libraria Breſciana nuovamente aperta da Leonardo Cozzando, Part. i, p. 108, 109. This book was printed at Breſcia, in 1685. Ghilini ſupplied Cozzando with all this.

(b) In remark [E] of the article ARNOBIUS.

[A] He was ill rewarded for his pains, and complained loudly of this diſgrace.] This I prove by the following paſſage. ‘ Di che egli agramente ſi querela e ‘ duole. Il che pure gli ſucceſſe ſotto quattro altri ‘ Pontefici quali con multa ſua ſiniſtra fortuna infeli- ‘ cemente ſervi (1). - - - - Of which he complains ‘ heavily, and laments his caſe. But ſuch was his ill ‘ fortune, that the ſame thing happened to him under four ‘ other Popes, whom he ſerved without ſucceſs.’

[B] We have ſome books written by him.] Five books of Latin Epigrams, which he publiſhed at Rome in the year 1556, and dedicated to Henry II, king of France. He was pretty well paid in money and cloaths for his Epiſtle Dedicatory : ‘ E ne riporto da ‘ quella Maeſtà una collana d'oro, doicento ſcudi ‘ del ſole, e una giubba di veluto pavonazzo. - - - ‘ For which he received of his majeſty a gold chain, two ‘ hundred crowns of the ſun, and a waſtcoat of purple ‘ velvet.’ He wrote a book of Coſmography, and had a great ſhare in the collection printed at Frankfort, in 1580, with this title, Picta poëſis Ovidiana : theſaurus propemodum omnium fabularum poëticarum Fauſti Sabæi Brixiani aliorumquæ clarorum virorum tam veterum quam recentiorum epigrammatis expoſitarum (2).

(1) Leonardo Cozzando, Libraria Breſciana, Part. i, p. 109.

(2) Taken from Leonardo Cozzando, ubi ſupra. See alſo Ghilini's Theatro, Tom. i, pag. 51.

SACRATUS (PAUL) a canon of Ferrara, where he was born in the XVIth century, was one of thoſe, who applied themſelves to the purity of the Latin ſtyle. He ſucceeded in it, as appears from his letters to Paul Manutius, Riccobonus, Muretus, and ſeveral other learned men, which he publiſhed in the year 1579 [A]. He dedicated them to JAMES SACRATUS, his brother, biſhop of Carpentras. He had ſpent ſeveral years in his ſtudies at Padua, and in travelling (a). There are two ſhort diſcourſes at the end of his letters, wherein he apologizes for two prelates, who, contrary to cuſtom, had writ their mandates in the vulgar tongue; which they did, becauſe the greateſt part of the clergy in their dioceſes did not underſtand Latin. He compoſed ſome other books books (b), and died at ſeventy five years of age [B]. James Sadolet, biſhop of Carpentras and cardinal his uncle by the mother's ſide (c), had the care of his education.

(a) Paullus Sacratus, Epiſt. Dedicator.

[A] The letters . . . . which he publiſhed in the year 1579.] I have not ſeen this edition: that which I make uſe of is of Lyons, 1581, in 16mo. There was another publiſhed at Cologne in 1583. See Morhofius's Polyhiſtor (1). The other works of Sacratus are, ſuper Geneſim liber unus. In Pſalmos Davidis liber unus.

(1) In the 24th chapter of the firſt book, pag. 309, 310.

(b) See the remark [A].

(c) See Sacratus's Letters, lib. i, pag. m. 13, 34; & lib. 6. p. 381.

unus. In Epiſtolam Canonicam B. Jacobi Apoſtoli liber unus. See the Apparato de gli Huomini illuſtri della città di Ferrara, written by Agoſtino Superbi da Ferrara (2).

[B] He died at ſeventy-five years of age.] So ſays (3) the epitaph engraven on his tomb in the cathedral church of Ferrara, by the care of the biſhop of Carpentras, his brother. The year of his death is not mentioned in that epitaph, which is a very extraordinary neglect.

(2) Pag. 16.

(3) Ibid.

SADEUR (JAMES) author of a New Voyage into Terra Auſtralis, printed in the year 1692 (a). His father's name (b) was James Sadeur, and his mother's Guillemette Itin: they were both natives of Chatillon upon Bar, in the juriſdiction of Rethel in Champagne, and had gone with deſign to ſettle in America; but after nine or ten months ſtay at Port-Royal, they took ſhipping the twenty-fifth of April, 1603 to return into France. The wife, fifteen days after they embarked, was delivered of the boy who is the ſubject of this article. Both the father and mother were caſt-away near cape Finiſterre, where their ſhip run a-ground: the child was ſaved as it were by a miracle, and given to an inhabitant of that coaſt; and then having again eſcaped in another ſhipwreck, he went to ſerve a Portugueſe lady (c), and ſtudied with her ſon. He was taken by pirates in the year 1623. He had like to have periſhed in a third ſhipwreck; but he was ſaved by a ſhip that was going into the Indies; and ſuffered a fourth ſhipwreck, which by ſeveral accidents which no body is obliged to believe, occaſioned his landing in Terra Auſtralis. The manner how, as he ſays, this came to paſs, and how he overcame the wild beaſts that were ready to devour him, and at laſt left that country after he had been there thirty two years (d), and arrived at Madagaſcar, is ſo ſtrange that I do not think there are any fictions more ridiculous in either Arioſto or Amadis. Neither do I mention James Sadeur here as a perſon that ever exiſted, or his voyage to Terra Auſtralis; as a true Hiſtory, but only becauſe I ſpoke of him in the article of Adam, and that I may give a ſupplement to the chimerical fancies of Antoinette Bourignon; for you muſt know that James Sadeur, who pretends to be an hermaphrodite, tells us that it was that very thing which preſerved his life, in a country where every body has both ſexes, and where all the men of our continent are treated as ſea monſters, and have no quarter given them (e). All the Auſtralians, ſays he (f), have both ſexes; and whenever a child comes into the world having but one ſex, they ſtifle it as a monſter. He does not clearly explain the manner how they generate [A]; but he gives us very plainly to underſtand (g), that children grow in their bowels as fruits do upon trees (h) [B]; that they live without having any libidinous inclinations one towards another, and cannot ſo much as hear of them without horror; that their love is neither carnal nor brutiſh; that they are wholly ſufficient to themſelves, and want nothing to make them happy and contented. In a word, the arguments he puts in an old Auſtralian's mouth, ſuppoſe that each individual perſon is the ſole and total cauſe of the children he brings into the world. He introduces him (i) raiſing difficulties againſt the generation, which depends upon two perſons, one of which is the father and the other the mother. The old man concludes, that man cannot be a perfect and compleat being without both ſexes, becauſe one ſex is not capable of production without the conjunction of the other. Sadeur comprehended thoſe principles and their conſequences ſo well, that to ſhew that he underſtood them, he uſes theſe words (k): I conſidered the manner in which the ſupreme being acts; I was ſenſible that a creature could not better reſemble him than by acting alone in its productions as he does, and that an action performed by the concourſe

(a) Note, that this book had been printed before at Vannes, in 1676, in 12mo.

(b) Avantures de Jaques Sadeur, pag. 2, Dutch Edit. 1692, in 12.

(c) The counteſs de Villafranca.

(d) Pag. 92.

(e) Pag. 147.

(f) Pag. 59, 62.

(g) Pag. 92.

(h) Pag. 69.

(i) Pag. 71.

(k) Pag. 69.

[A] The manner how they generate.] He ſays that all the time he was amongſt them, he never could learn how generation is performed in that country (1), and that they have ſo great an averſion for whatever concerns the firſt beginning of life, that a year, or thereabouts, after his arrival, two Auſtralians hearing him ſay ſomething about it, went away expreſſing as much horror as if he had committed ſome crime (2).

[B] As fruits grow upon trees.] I have quoted in another place (3) a paſſage of Antoinette Bourignon (4), wherein ſhe ſays that ſin has disfigured the work of GOD in men, and that inſtead of being men, as they ſhould be, they are become monſters in nature divided into two imperfect ſexes, unable to produce their like alone, as trees and plants are produced, which in that reſpect are more perfect than men or women, who cannot produce without the help of another, nor without pain and miſery. If you except the conſequences of ſin, the doctrine of that woman, and that of the Auſtralian Philoſopher, are as like one another as two drops of water. I wonder neither of them perceived that their pretended ſuperiority of plants above man, with reſpect to the faculty of generating, is a falſe ſuppoſition; for it is true indeed that each plant produces it's grain, it's fruit, and it's ſeed, independent on another plant of a different ſex; but it is not true that it produces another plant in itſelf, and by itſelf. What has it then above man? Does not a man produce in himſelf, and without the concourſe of the other ſex, the ſeed, which is like the grain or kernel in plants, from which another individual proceeds? It is true, will ſome ſay; but that other individual will not proceed from the male ſeed without a conjunction with the other ſex. I anſwer, do you think that the ſeed of plants does not want to be received into a womb that it may become a plant? Muſt it not be received into the earth? Is not this as great tho' not ſo pleaſant a dependency upon another Being as you, Mrs Bourignon and James Sadeur, find on the other ſide? It is certain that according to their ſyſtem, the perfect ſtate of man would not be like that of plants in this reſpect; man would produce in himſelf, and by his own power alone, not ſomething wherewith to make another man in another ſubject, but another man. A plant does not do that; it produces in itſelf, ſomething out of which, the earth, produces another plant. I remember to this purpoſe to have read the following verſes.

J'ai veu vif ſans fantſome
Un jeune moyne avoir

Membre

(1) Avantures de Jaques Sadeur, pag. 60, 92.

(2) Pag. 91.

(3) In Remark [G] of the article ADAM.

(4) Preface to the nouveau Ciel.

intercourſe of two perſons could not be ſo perfect as thoſe that are performed by one and the ſame perſon. Thus the inhabitants of Terra Auſtralis are of Mrs Bourignon's opinion; and one would be apt to think that James Sadeur, whoever he was, deſigned to inſinuate that thoſe people are not deſcended from Adam [C], but from an androgyne, who did not fall, as Adam did, from his ſtate of innocence. This might be a pretty good device to impoſe upon the cenſors of books, and remove the difficulties of a licence, if one had a mind to try the ſucceſs of a pre-adamitical ſyſtem [D]. If la Peyrere had made uſe of this device, he would have avoided a great deal of trouble. Cyrano Bergerac did not wholly neglect it in his travels to the ſun and moon. Perhaps the author of the Hiſtory of the Sevarambes (l) has taken advantage of this artifice. I ſhall obſerve by the by that

Membre de femme & d'homme
Et enfant concepvoir
Par luy ſeul en luy meſmes
Engendrer, enfanter
Comme font aultres femmes
Sans oultilz emprunter (5).

I've ſeen a fryar young that had Both ſexes blended ſo, that he Begot, conceiv'd, was brought to bed,
All by himſelf: not as you ſee
The courſe of other women is,
Who needs before they come to this Muſt borrow'd tools employ - - -

They are taken from a Poem of John Molinet, intituled, Recollection des merveilles advenues en noſtre temps. Here is an Hermaphrodite more extraordinary than that mentioned by Mr de Beauval, in his Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans (6). The words applied to the Porcupine, ' Seque jaculo, ſeſe pharetra, ſeſe utitur arcu, - - - he himſelf was his own bow, arrows, and quiver,' might have been applied to it. Iſaac Voſſius's hypotheſis, does not reach ſo far. ' Hermaphroditi ut plurimum veræ ſunt mulieres non diſcrepantes à cæteris niſi exceſſu membri quo viros imitantur, quoque omnia ea quæ viri peragunt non in ſuum tantum, ſed & virilem quoque ſexum prodigioſam frangendo venerem, ut merito Seneca epiſt. 95. de illis dixerit, Dii illas deæque malè perdant, adeo perverſum commentæ genus impudicitiæ, viros ineunt (7). - - - Hermaphrodites for the moſt part are true women, in nothing different from the reſt, but in that prominent member with which they imitate men, and perform all their actions, exerciſing their prodigious luſt, not only upon their own, but likewiſe upon the male ſex: of whom Seneca juſtly ſays, May the gods and godeſſes utterly deſtroy them, for having invented ſuch a monſtrous kind of uncleanneſs, as even to abuſe the bodies of men contrary to nature.'

But this ſtory of Molinet ought not wholly to be credited. That Monk did not get himſelf with child: he himſelf was not both agent and patient at the ſame time. I do not know whether he was puniſhed; I have only read that he was put into the hands of juſtice, and confined till he was delivered. Read this paſſage of the Chronique Scandaleuſe de Louis XI. ' In the ſaid year 1478, it happened in Auvergne, that there was one of the Fryars in a convent of black Monks belonging to Cardinal de Bourbon, who had both ſexes, and made uſe of them in ſuch a manner that he proved with child: whereupon he was ſeized, proſecuted, and confined till he ſhould be delivered, that he might be dealt with afterwards as the Judges ſhould think fit.' Is it not ſtrange negligence to give no account of the conſequences of this impriſonment (8).

[C] That theſe people are not deſcended from Adam.] He aſcribes many things to them, which ſuit only with the ſtate of innocence; as that they are not aſhamed of being naked, they all love one another with a ſincere affection, they never quarrel, they know no diſtinction of property, they have all things in common with an admirable fidelity and diſintereſtedneſs (9); they bring forth without any pain (10), they have no unchaſte inclination, they are ſtrong and vigorous, their health is never affected by any ſickneſs, and they make no great account of life, in compariſon of the eternal reſt that follows it, which they ardently deſire (11). It is true their notion of that eternal reſt is not very orthodox, for in their opinion it does not conſiſt in the beatific viſion, but in the privation of a particular and individual exiſtence. They ſay that after death we exiſt only in general, in an univerſal genius, who communicates himſelf by parts to each particular Being, and has the power, when an animal dies, to preſerve himſelf till he be communicated to another. So that this genius is extinguiſhed by the death of that animal, without being deſtroyed, ſince he waits only for new organs, and a new machine to be revived (12). This is as great nonſenſe as the ſoul of the world of ſome ancient Philoſophers. According to Sadeur's account the Auſtralians are not over-religious. They are contented to worſhip the incomprehenſible Being without ever ſpeaking of him; they fancy nothing can be more offenſive to him, than to make his divine perfections the ſubject of their diſcourſe: ſo that it may be ſaid that the main part of their religion is not to ſpeak of religion (13). This does not ſavour of the ſtate of innocence: man ought to glorify his maker by his words as well as by his thoughts; and it is in vain to ſay, as the old Auſtralian did to Sadeur, that whoever ventures to ſpeak of God, is like to ſpeak of him otherwiſe than he ſhould do; for this would prove too much, and it would follow from it that one ſhould never think of the incomprehenſible Being. I ſhall ſet down what is found on this ſubject in the book of that pretended traveller. He had told the old man (14) that in Europe God is the ſubject of the moſt agreeable and uſeful converſations; and being aſked, whether people had the ſame notions concerning that incomprehenſible Being, he ſincerely confeſſed they differed very much in the concluſions which every one drew often from the ſame principles, and that this occaſioned many ſharp diſputes, frequently attended with a violent hatred, and ſometimes even with bloody wars, and other conſequences no leſs diſmal. The good old man, continues he, replied with great ingenuity, that if I had not anſwered him in that manner, he would not have ſaid a word more, but would have had, me in the utmoſt contempt, being, ſaid he, very ſure that men could not ſpeak of an incomprehenſible thing, without having very different and quite contrary opinions about it. A man, added he, muſt be blind, who can be ignorant that there is a firſt principle; but one muſt be infinite, as he is, to ſpeak of him exactly: for ſince we acknowledge that he is incomprehenſible, it follows that we can ſpeak of him only by gueſs, and that whatever we can ſay of him may indeed ſatisfy the curious, but not rational perſons. And we rather chuſe to be wholly ſilent, than to run the hazard of venting many falſities concerning his nature. There is ſomething ſo ſpecious in theſe words, that a gentleman aſſured me, that having read them to his footman, he aſked him, What do you ſay to it, La Fleur? And he received for anſwer, Zooks, Sir, that old man was no fool, I wiſh I was like him, I ſhould be a very wiſe fellow.

[D] A Pre-adamitical ſyſtem.] Sadeur ſays (15) that the Auſtralians reckon above twelve thouſand revolutions of the ſolſtices from the beginning of their republic, and give out that they derive their original from a Deity, who with one breath produced three men from whom all others are deſcended; that according to their account the Europeans began five thouſand revolutions after them, and that they give them a very ridiculous original; for they ſay that an amphibious ſerpent of a prodigious bigneſs, falling upon a woman in her ſleep, enjoyed her without doing her any harm; that the woman awaked about the end of the action, and was ſtruck with ſuch horror at it, that ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea. The ſerpent carried her to a neighbouring iſland, where ſhe repented of her deſpair, and was delivered of two children, the one a male, and the other a female, who ſhewed ſo many ſigns of malice that their mother

---

(l) See what judgment Morhofius makes upon him, p. 75 of his Polyhiſtor.

(5) Les faictz & dictz de feu de bonne memoire Jehan Molinet, fol. 229. verſo Paris 1540 in 8*vo.* Du Verdier, pag. 728 of his Bibliotheque Françoiſe, quotes thoſe verſes, but not according to the Orthography of the original.

(6) For November 1692, p. 125.

(7) Iſaacus Voſſius, Comment. in Catul. p. 287.

(8) Chronique Scandaleuſe de Louïs XI, pag. m. 386. See alſo Robert Gaguin, in the tenth book of his Hiſtory of France, fol. m. 284 verſo. He ſays this happened in a convent of Iſſoire in Auvergne.

(9) Pag. 60.

(10) Pag. 93.

(11) Pag. 69.

(12) Pag. 90.

(13) Pag. 83.

(14) Pag. 88.

(15) Pag. 117.

that the author of Religio Medici had ſomething of the Auſtralian taſte [E]. I ſhall occaſionally explain here more exactly than I have done in another place (m), what concerns Plato's Androgynes [F].

As ſoon as this article was read at Geneva, a perſon, for whom I have a very great eſteem, was pleaſed to ſend me a memoir, which I ſhall inſert below. It appears from it was extremely afflicted at it. The ſerpent perceiving the trouble ſhe was in, gave her to underſtand by ſigns that he would carry her into her own country, if ſhe deſired it. He did ſo, and then he came back to the little ones, who coupled and multiplied. Would not one think this a wretched alluſion to the fabulous ſtory of ſome Heretics (16), who ſaid that Eve had two children by the ſerpent which tempted her (17)?

[E] The author of Religio Medici had ſomething of the Auſtralian taſte.] I wiſh, ſays he, we could multiply like trees without any conjunction, or that ſome other way of getting children might be found out; for certainly there is nothing more fooliſh and unworthy of a wiſe man, nothing more ſhameful and unbecoming the greatneſs of our ſouls than to think, when the heat is over, how far the impertinence has been carried. Not that I have an averſion for that charming ſex, adds he: on the contrary, I am naturally inclined to love and admire whatever is beautiful: nay, I am extremely pleaſed with the ſight of a fine picture; were it only that of a horſe. Mihi ſatis placeret, ſi nobis etiam arborum more citra conjunctionem procreare liceat, ſive alia quæpiam reperiatur rerum propagandarum ratio, quam coïtionis illa vulgaris, & trivialis: nihil profecto ineptius eſt, aut viro ſapiente indignius; nihil quod mentis celſitudinem turpius dejiciat, quam ſi animo jam defervente reputet, quam inſigniter ineptierit. Nec tamen hæc ita quenquam interpretari velim, quaſi à ſexu illo dulciſſimo alienatiore animo ſim, immo ultro admiror, & amplector, quicquid pulchrum eſt. Summa cum voluptate eleganti cuipiam picturæ inhæreo, etiamſi equi tantum fuerit (18). The author of the notes upon this book of Dr Brown, obſerves that the fooleries the Doctor ſpeaks of being neceſſary to mankind, it was requiſite that men ſhould be very prone to them (19). He quotes ſome paſſages of St Auguſtin, wherein things are carried a little too far; for that Father not only ſays that the ſuperior part of the ſoul is degraded and dethroned by amorous embraces, that a wiſe man is not obliged to marry, and that thoſe who do it, ought rather to be admired than imitated; but alſo that the duty which married people pay to one another without a motive of procreation is a venial ſin. Conjugalis concubitus generandi gratia non habet culpam; concupiſcentiæ verò ſatiandæ, ſed tamen cum conjuge propter fidem thori venialem habet culpam: adulterium verò ſive fornicatio letalem habet culpam: ac propter hoc melior eſt quidem ab omni concubitu continentia, quam vel ipſe matrimonialis concubitus, quæ fit cauſa gignendi. Hæc habet Auguſt. in lib. de bono conjugal. c. 6. in Soliloquiis c. 10. Si, inquit, ad officium pertinet ſapientis (quod nondum comperi) dare operam liberis, quiſquis hujus rei tamen gratia concumbit, mirandus mihi videri poteſt, at verò imitandus nullo modo (20). The ſame commentator alledges St Auguſtin upon theſe words of Dr Brown, ' Nihil ineptius aut viro ſapiente indignius. - - - It is the fooliſheſt act a wiſe man can commit.' ' Hinc Auguſtin. in libro ſoliloquiorum cap. 10. Nihil, inquit, eſſe ſentio, quod magis ex arce dejiciat animum virilem, quam blandimenta fœminea, corporumque ille contactus, ſine quo uxor haberi non poteſt (21). - - - Hence St Auguſtin ſays in his book of Soliloquies, chap 10. I know nothing more apt to degrade the ſoul of a man than female blandiſhments, and that touching of bodies which neceſſarily attends a married ſtate.'

[F] I ſhall . . . explain here more exactly . . . . what concerns Plato's Androgynes.] Plato ſuppoſes that in the beginning of the world, there were three ſorts of human creatures. Some were only male, others female, and others both. Theſe laſt are the Androgynes. Each individual of thoſe three kinds had four arms, and four feet, two faces turned one towards the other and placed upon one neck, four ears, two genital parts, and ſo on. They walked upright; but when they had a mind to go faſter, they were apt to tumble heels over head. They were robuſt and bold, ſo that they attempted to make war with the gods. The celeſtial court held a council on that affair, but were greatly at a loſs what reſolution to take; for had mankind been deſtroyed by thunder, as the giants were, the gods would have been loſers by it. Who then would have offered up incenſe and ſacrifices to them (22)? On the other hand, it was not fit to ſuffer the boldneſs and inſolence of men. Jupiter found out this expedient; he divided them every one into two: but there aroſe a great inconveniency from thence; for each half endeavoured to be re-united to the other, and when they met, they embraced one another ſo tenderly, and with ſo much pleaſure, that they could not reſolve to part, and ſo died of hunger. Jupiter found out a remedy for that diſorder: he tranſpoſed the privy parts, and ſo contrived the matter that the pleaſure of their embraces ceaſed after a certain time, that each of them might have leiſure to mind their own concerns. Plato adds that the males, who are one half of an Androgyne, are very much addicted to women, and that the females, who are one half of an Androgyne are paſſionately fond of men. He pretends that the females, who love other females without minding the males, are one half of the ancient double females; and that the males, who are fond of males, are one half of the ancient double males (23). If any one deſires to ſee ſome reflexions upon what Euſebius (24) ſays, that Plato had this notion of Androgynes from Moſes, he may conſult the commentary of Ludovicus Regius (25). He confeſſes (26) that Mercerus and Quinquarboreus, Royal Profeſſors in Hebrew, have been of great uſe to him in this place. He finds that Marſilius Ficinus is often miſtaken. I ſhould loſe my time, ſaith he (27), ſhould I take notice of all the paſſages of Plato ill tranſlated by him; I ought rather to thank him for the pains he took to ſerve poſterity by mending the old tranſlation as well as he could, and at the ſame time endeavour to ſupply its deficiencies without animoſity. . . . . (28) The good gentleman had no great ſkill in Greek or Latin, and has committed many faults in his tranſlation of that author, particularly in things that require the knowledge of antiquity and nature. I have diſcourſed about it with the biſhop of Montpellier and Turnebus, and Goupil, Royal Profeſſors, and every one of them helped me according to his ability. That biſhop of Montpellier is the ſame whom he praiſes in the fiftieth leaf in theſe words. Being in doubt about the ſenſe of that paſſage, I conſulted Meſſire G. Pelliſſier biſhop of Montpellier, a man of great judgment in the intracies of good authors, as likewiſe in the obſervation and knowledge of natural things, in which he is as much verſed as any man has been ſince the antients. This gentleman has been pleaſed to help me in this paſſage and all others, whenever I deſired his aſſiſtance. To divert the reader he recites a Poem, that is worth reading. After this long and tedious explication of an important paſſage, ſays he (29), before I proceed further, I ſhall inſert a Poem heretofore written upon the Androgyne, by Meſſire Antony Heroet, now biſhop of Digne, which he inſcribed to the late King Francis, the father of good learning. This I ſhall do for the reader's diverſion. I willingly recite that Poem, not only on account of its elegancy, but alſo by reaſon of the friendſhip and familiarity I contracted with the author, whilſt I attended at court upon Chancellor Olivier, a very wiſe and learned man, with whom he uſed to be (30). It is true he does not keep to Plato's notion, as any one may ſee by comparing them, but takes a poetical liberty, leaving out and adding what he thinks fit. This is the beginning of that Poem:

Au premier aage que le monde vivoit
D'herbe, de gland: trois ſortes y avoit
D'hommes, les deux tels qu'ilz ſont maintenant,
Et l'autre double eſtoit, s'entretenant
Enſemblement tant maſle que femelle.
  Il faut penſer, que la façon fut belle:
Car le grand Dieu qui vivre les faiſoit,
Faitz les avoit, & bien s'y congnoiſſoit.
  De quatre bras, quatre pieds, & deux teſtes
Eſtoyent formez ces raiſonnables beſtes.

(m) In the Article of ADAM, remark [F].

(16) Archontici, apud Epiphan. Hæreſ. XL.

(17) See remark [B] in the Article EVE.

(18) Thomas Brown, Religio Medici, Part. ii, §. ix, pag. m. 397.

(19) Et ſi recte ineptias illas ac nugas, quas vir cum muliere agit, quoties fœminea voluptate uti decrevit, conſideremus, nihil ſtultius fingi poſſe reperiemus: Sed ob liberorum procreandorum neceſſitatem, humanique generis conſervationem, Deus proclives nos ad ejuſmodi nugas ac voluptates eſſe voluit. Annotata ad religion. Medici, pag. 403.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Ibid.

(22) Αἱ τιμαὶ γὰρ αὐτοῖς καὶ τὰ ἱερὰ τὰ παρὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἠφανίζετο. Extincto hominum genere humanus deorum cultus venerationque periret. Plato, in Convivio, pag. m. 1185.

(23) Taken from Plato, in Convivio, pag. 1185. 1186.

(24) De Præparat. Evangel. lib. xii, cap. vii.

(25) He was Regius Profeſſor at Paris, and tranſlated ſeveral Dialogues of Plato into French, and among others the Feaſt: to which he added a Commentary.

(26) Fol. 45, Paris Edit. 1559. in 4to.

(27) Fol. 51.

(28) Fol. 52.

(29) Fol. 53.

(30) La Croix du Maine, ſays that Heroet, native of Paris, was related: Chancellor Olivier.

it that a Franciſcan, who forſook his order, is the author of that pretended voyage into Terra Auſtralis [G]. I wonder that Mr Couſin who, with all the gravity that is peculiar to him, has given us an extract of James Sadeur's chimerical adventures, in his Journal des Savans (n), knew nothing of the Vannes edition 1676. He thought that the Paris edition printed by Barbin, 1692, was the firſt.

La reſte vaut mieux, penſée que ditte,
Et ſe verroit pluſtoſt peinte qu'eſcrite.
Chacun eſtoit de ſon corps tant ayſé,
Qu'en ſe tournant il ſe trouvoit baiſé :
En eſtendant ſes bras, on l'embraſſoit :
Voulant penſer, on le contrepenſoit :
En ſoy voyoit tout ce qu'il vouloit veoir,
En ſoy trouvoit ce qu'il falloit avoir.
Jamais en lieu ſes pieds porté ne l'euſſent,
Que quand & luy ſes paſſetemps ne feuſſent.
Si de ſon bien luy plaiſoit mal uſer,
Facile eſtoit envers ſoy s'excuſer.
De luy n'eſtoit fait ne raport, ny compte,
Ne congnoiſſoit honneſteté, ny honte.
Si de ſon cœur ſortoyent ſimples deſirs,
Il y entroit tant de doubles plaiſirs,
Qu'en y penſant chacun eſt incité
A maintenir, que la felicité
Fut de tel temps, & le ſiecle doré.

In the firſt age, while mortals ſtill were good,
And herbs and acorns were their only food,
Three ſorts of men exiſted, two of which
In ev'ry point were altogether ſuch
As they are now: the third a double kind
Had in it both the male and female join'd.
The piece, you may ſuppoſe, was very fine,
And worthy of the maker's ſkill divine.
Two heads, four arms, and juſt as many feet
Did in this rational quadruped meet.
The reſt is better far conceiv'd than ſaid,
Better in pictures than in words diſplay'd.
Each in himſelf was ſo contriv'd and bleſs'd,
That if he turn'd he found that he was kiſs'd.
If he but ſtretch'd his arms, he was embrac'd,
With ev'ry thought a counter-thought was plac'd.
In ſhort all that he wiſh'd or wanted he Did largely in himſelf provided ſee.
He carry'd his amuſements ſtill about him,
Nor could he move a ſingle ſtep without 'em.
If of his goods he made a ſinful uſe,
With eaſe he could unto himſelf excuſe
The fault: for he had no account to give
Of what he did to any man alive.
As for ought elſe, he did not know the name
Of what is conſtru'd modeſty or ſhame.
If his heart's wiſhes pure and ſimple were,
So many double pleaſures enter'd there,
That when we think of theſe, we are inclin'd
To ſay that true felicity confin'd
Her ſhort duration to that narrow ſtage,
That ſpace of time yclep'd the golden age.

[G] A memoir .... whence it appears that a Franciſcan, who forſook his order, is the author of that pretend voyage into Terra Auſtralis.] Here follows what was written to me from Geneva, the 13th of March, 1697. ‘You will not be dipleaſed to know the true author of the relation of Terra Auſtralis, which came out under the name of James Sadeur, of which you take notice. His name was Gabriel Foigni, and he was a Franciſcan in a convent of Lorrain, his native country. He came into theſe parts in the year 1667, and embraced our religion; notwithſtanding which he continually led an irregular life. At firſt he ſettled in the little town of Morges, where he was chanter of the church; but one day going to ſing, after he had been drinking, he did ſome undecent things at church, which occaſioned his being turned out. He came hither, and, to get a livelihood, went from houſe to houſe teaching young boys, Grammar, Geography, &c. and inſtructing Germans in the French tongue. Some time after he married a woman of the dregs of the people, and who was not accounted ſo ſcrupulous as Lucretia. Afterwards he took it in his head to publiſh ſome ſmall books; and among the reſt, an Almanack every year, under the name of the Great Garantus, which was commonly very faulty as to the computation of time; a ſet of cards for Heraldry, and the Pſalms of Marot and Beza, with a prayer of his own compoſing at the end of each Pſalm, containing only ſome inſipid compliments to the Deity. Laſtly, the relations of voyages being very much in vogue at that time, he compleated his works by his Auſtralia, as he calls it; he had it printed here privately about the latter end of the year 1676. Our Clergy, who thought that book contained ſeveral things contrary to the Holy Scripture, and ſeveral obſcenities, ſent for the Printer, who declared that Foigni had given him the manuſcript. Foigni ſtoutly maintained that James Sadeur was the true author of it, and that he had received the copy from Bourdeaux: but at laſt being ſummoned to appear before the magiſtrates, he confeſſed, when he was ſtrictly examined, that he had writ that book to get a little money, and that James Sadeur was a ſuppoſititious name. As a puniſhment, he was ordered to leave the town with his family; but ſome German gentlemen, whom he taught the French tongue, having interceeded for him, he was allowed to ſtay here ſome time longer. But three or four years after, his maid being with child, and himſelf proſecuted upon that account, he went away and retired into Savoy, and got into a monaſtery, where he died five years ago.’

I ſhall recite here what a conſiderable man told me in the year 1699, viz. That the relation, printed under the name of James Sadeur, is the work of a gentleman of Bretagne, a great admirer of Lucretius, whom he had tranſlated into French, deſigning to publiſh his tranſlation. He publiſhed at Vannes, in the year 1676, the relation of James Sadeur. I might reconcile this with the memorial ſent to me from Geneva, by ſuppoſing that the Monk, who forſook his order, took out of that work the materials of the Auſtralia publiſhed by him, or even that he tranſcribed it word for word, and publiſhed it as an original. There are ſome things in that relation ſo nicely managed, that I can hardly believe that Foigni was maſter of ſo much art. I forgot to deſire ſome of my friends to compare Sadeur's relation with the Auſtralia. I am apt to think that there is ſome difference between thoſe two pieces.

(n) Of the fourth of Auguſt 1692, pag. 526, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

SADDUCEES, a ſect, which aroſe among the Jews two hundred years or thereabouts before the birth of the Meſſias [A]. It is thought that Sadok, a diſciple of Antigonus Sochæus was the founder of it. He and Baithus, who was alſo a diſciple of the ſame Antigonus, put a wrong ſenſe on the doctrine which their maſter taught them: they concluded that there is neither paradiſe nor Hell, that there are neither rewards nor puniſhments after this life, from his exhorting them to ſerve GOD, not like mercenaries

[A] A ſect which aroſe among the Jews two hundred years, or thereabouts, before the birth of the Meſſias.] The moſt probable opinion is, that Sadok, a diſciple of Antigonus Sochæus, was the founder of the ſect of the mercenaries, who act only in hopes of getting by it, but like thoſe generous ſervants; who are faithful and obedient to their maſters without expecting any reward. This fine maxim ill interpreted by thoſe two diſciples of Antigonus, ſet them up for heads of a party (a). They founded two pernicious ſects [B], which utterly ſubverted religion; and foreſeeing that they ſhould be put to death, if they ventured to declare publicly all the conſequences ariſing from their principles, they durſt not reject the authority of the Scripture, they only rejected the traditions. Thoſe who embraced the ſect of Sadoc, were called Sadducees (b). They made already a conſiderable figure in the time of Jonathan brother to Judas Maccabeus, that is, about the year of Rome 600; for Joſephus informs us, that there were at that time three ſects among the Jews, viz. That of the Phariſees, that of the Sadducees, and that of the Eſſenes (c). He adds (d) that the Sadducees rejected the doctrine of Predeſtination, and taught that man is the only cauſe of his own proſperity or adverſity, according as he makes a good or an ill uſe of his free-will. He ſays in another place (e) that the Sadducees and Phariſees had many quarrels between them, and that the rich people ſided with the Sadducees, but the vulgar ſtood for the Phariſees. The latter preſcribed many rites as being tranſmitted and handed down to them from their anceſtors, though they were not written in the law of Moſes: on the contrary, the Sadducees rejected all doctrines and ceremonies not contained in the Scripture. We read in the ſame paſſage of Joſephus that the high-prieſt Hircanus (f), who had been a diſciple of the Phariſees, forſook and abuſed them, having declared for the ſect of the Sadducees at the ſuggeſtion of his favourite Jonathan, who was one of them. We are told in another place by the ſame Hiſtorian (g); that the Sadducees did not believe the immortality of the ſoul (h), nor that GOD concerned himſelf with evil either the Sadducees. Now this Antigonus ſuceeded Simon the Juſt in the chair of the Sanhedrim (1). This Simon died in the year of the world 3662, or, according to others, 3690. One may therefore believe that Sadok's innovation began to appear in the year of the world 3700, that is, 248 years before CHRIST. Thus Mr Willemer argues in a theſis maintained under his direction at Wittemberg the 28th of September, 1680. Some learned men are of opinion that the hereſy of the Sadducees is more antient, and that it ſprung from a wrong ſenſe put upon the thirty-ſeventh chapter of Ezekiel, whilſt the prophets Zachariah and Malachi were ſtill living. Dr Lightfoot, who followed that opinion, in his commentary on St Matthew's Goſpel (2), departed from it on the Acts of the Apoſtles, and maintained a very different opinion, viz. that the hereſy of the Sadducees did not appear till a long time after Sadok's death (3). Obſerve that Joſephus the firſt time he mentions that ſect, does not repreſent it as new one, but as a party entirely formed (4). The time his diſcourſe refers to is that of Jonathan, brother to Judas Maccabeus; and therefore it muſt be placed 153 years before CHRIST. He mentions that ſect again about a hundred years after, and repreſents it as a very antient one (5). The Jews, ſays he (6), had long before divided their wiſdom, or Philoſophy into three ſects, viz. the Eſſenes, the Sadducees, and the Phariſees. Lucas Brugenſis has broached a very bold opinion. He ſays that the college of the Scribes, founded by Ezra, was very flouriſhing under the Maccabees, and that thoſe Scribes began then to examine the queſtion about future rewards and puniſhments, becauſe they had learned what the Greeks ſaid about it. That enquiry occaſioned two ſects, that of the Sadducees, and that of the Phariſees: the latter held the affirmative, and the former the negative. He pretends that the Jews believed only temporal rewards and puniſhments, which were the only ones propoſed in the law of Moſes, and that if the Patriarchs and Prophets ſaw farther, they did not however teach the doctrine of a future life as an article of faith. According to this hypotheſis, the Jews muſt have learned of the Greeks the immortality of the ſoul, and future rewards and puniſhments, whereas it is commonly believed that the Pagans had thoſe excellent doctrines from the Scripture. Here follow the words of Lucas Brugenſis: Quum tempore Maccabæorum plures florerent Scribæ quorum collegium ab Eſdra exordium ſumſerat, qui ſapientiæ ſtuderent, & ut jugo Græcorum ſubjacebant, nonnunquam audirent Græcorum de his rebus (animæ humanæ immortalite, corporis reſurrectione, æternis bonorum præmiis, & malorum ſuppliciis) fabulas, factum eſt ut cæperint quæſtiones de his rebus in medium afferre, & inter ſe ventilare, atque à ſe mutuo diſſidere, aliis iſta adſtruentibus, qui vocati fuere Phariſæi, aliis negantibus qui Sadducæi. Ante hæc tempora non videtur populus Iſrael quidquam de his rebus doctus fuiſſe, aut quidquam de iſtis publice prædicatum, eò quod lex harum rerum diſertam mentionem non faceret, terrenas duntaxat ſpes minaſque bonis maliſque ob oculos ponens. Fuit quidem Patriarcharum & Prophetarum non dubia hic fides, quod vel undecimum Caput Epiſtolæ ad Hebræos teſtatum facit, ſed multa à Patriarchis & Prophetis credita prædictaque fuere quæ ut non propoſita atque enarrata, ita nec credenda neceſſario populo fuere, ut virginitas matris Meſſiæ, paupertas, paſſio, mors, reſurrectio Meſſiæ. Videtur clara publicaque hujuſmodi rerum æternarum doctrina Meſſiæ reſervata fuiſſe, interim dum Meſſias expectaretur quo paratiores forent animi ad accipiendam fidem de rebus hujuſmodi inviſibilibus, futuris & eternis, permiſerat DEUS varias de his opiniones oriri & ſapientum ſynagogas inter ſe altercationibus diſcuti (7). Mr Willemer very much diſlikes this opinion, and refers the reader to the Orthodox Divines, who have confuted the Socinians, &c. concerning the belief of the Jews. 'Hactenus Brugenſis mirum in modum cumulans φορτικὰ ἀκȣ́σματα homine Theologo indigna contra fidem fidelium V. & N. Teſt. eſſentialiter eandem (8). - - - 'Thus far Lucas Brugenſis, who at a ſtrange rate loads with invidious reflections, and ſuch as are unworthy of a Divine, the faith of believers in the Old and New Teſtament, which is eſſentially the ſame.'

[B] They founded two pernicious ſects.] Every body does not acknowledge that each of thoſe two diſciples of Antigonus founded a ſect: ſome very learned men pretend that the ſect of the Sadducees and that of the Baithuſees, were but one and the ſame ſect, which went indifferently ſometimes by the name of Sadok, one of it's two founders, and ſometimes by the name of Baithus, the other founder; but becauſe Sadok was more zealous than his colleague, in maintaining the party formed by him, his name was more frequently made uſe of than that of Baithus to denote their followers. Theſe too rather choſe to be called Sadducees than Baithuſees, becauſe Baithus being a baſtard, they were afraid it would bring a blot upon them. This opinion is to be ſeen more at large in a book of Carpzovius (9). It is the more likely becauſe ſome learned men confeſs they could never find out wherein the Sadducees differed from the Baithuſees. 'Ignoſce ignorantiæ noſtræ, they are Dr Lightfoot's words (10), ſi fateamur neſcire nos penitus quid intererat inter Sadducæum, & Baithuſæum, an convenirent in eodem, an diſſentirent in aliquibus? de Baithuſæis apud ſacras paginas altum ſilentium, apud Judaicas mentio frequentiſſima, & videntur in quibuſdam diſtingui à Sadducæis aſt in quibus obſcurius. - - - Excuſe our ignorance, if we confeſs that we do not at all ſee what difference there was between the Sadducees and the Baithuſees, whether they agreed in the ſame thing, or differed in ſome points. The Baithuſees are no where mentioned in the Scriptures, but very frequently in the Jewiſh writings, and in ſome things they ſeem to be diſtinguiſhed from the Sadducees, tho'

(a) Pirke Avoth, cap. i, num. iii, & Maimonides Commentar. in Pirke Avoth, fol. 25. cap. i, apud John Helvicum Willemerum, in Diſſertat. Philologica de Sadducæis, pag. 20, 22.

(b) Maimon. ibid,

(c) Joſeph. Antiquit. Judaic. lib. xiii, cap. ix.

(d) Id. ibid. & lib. ii, de Bello, Judaico, cap. xii, (alias cap. vii.)

(e) Id. Antiq. lib. xiii, cap. xviii, ſub. fin.

(f) He died about the year of Rome 649.

(g) Joſeph, Antiq. lib. xviii, cap. ii.

(h) Idem. de Bello Judaico, lib. ii. cap. xii. (alias cap. vii.)

(1) Hujus Simeonis Juſti diſcipulus ac in cathedra Synedrali ſucceſſor fuit Antigonus Sochæus. Joh. Helvicus Willemerus in Diſſertat. Philologica de Sadducæis, pag. 23. Edit. Wittemb. 1680.

(2) Lightfoot, Hor. Hebraic. in Matth. iii. 7, pag. 236. Edit. Carpz. apud Johan. Helvic. Willemer, ubi ſupra. pag. 24.

(3) Idem. Hor. Hebr. in Actus Apoſt. pag. 123. apud eumd. ibid. pag. 26.

(4) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. ix.

(5) Ἐκ τοῦ πάνυ ἀρχαίȣ τῶν πατρίων· Jam inde à multis retro ſæculis. Joſeph. ib. lib. xviii, cap. ii, pag. 617.

(6) Joſephus, ibid.

(7) Lucas Brugenſis Annotat. in Matth. iii. 7, apud. Willemerum, ubi ſupra, pag. 28.

(8) Willemer, ibid.

(9) Joh. Benedictus Carpzovius, Lipſienſis Profeſſor Linguæ Hebraicæ, in Introduct. ad Raymundi Martini Pugionem Fidei, cap. iii.

(10) Lightfoot, in Horis Hebr. in Act. Apoſtol. pag. 128, apud Willemerum, ubi ſupra, pag. 8.

either to do it, or to take notice of it [C]. He obſerves (i) that the number of the Sadducees was not conſiderable, but that they were generally inveſted with the higheſt dignities; notwithſtanding which they had no great intereſt; for few things were done according to their advice, and thoſe among them who exerciſed the magiſtracy were obliged to comply, tho' againſt their will, with the deciſions of the Phariſees, otherwiſe they would not have been tolerated by the populace. Joſephus makes two obſervations, which, I think, will give a great light into the matter: one of them, is that the Phariſees were not ſevere in inflicting puniſhments (k); the other is, that the Sadducees ſhewed great ſeverity in the functions of judicature (l). Laſtly, he ſays (m) that there was no good underſtanding among them, that they lived like wild beaſts, and that friends were not better uſed in their converſation than if they had been ſtrangers. It is not eaſy to reconcile this with what he ſays in another place, that this ſect was not beloved by the meaner ſort of the people but by the rich; for the latter do not much agree with moroſe and peeviſh humours, but are for introducing the ſweets and conveniencies of life in all places where they have any intercourſe. We ought perhaps to ſuppoſe, that what he ſays concerning the diſcord of the Sadducees, and their clowniſh converſation, ſignifies nothing more than that they accounted it a virtue to take the liberty of diſputing with their maſters (n). It was almoſt an unavoidable conſequence from their principles, ſince they boldly rejected the authority of tradition, and did not care whether the ſeveral texts of the Scripture had been explained by the antients in ſuch a manner or not. This being laid down, a diſciple had as much right to contradict his maſter, as the latter had to contradict his predeceſſor, and ſo on. The Sadducees are often mentioned in the Holy Scripture; but tho' it informs us (o), that they denied the reſurrection of the dead and the exiſtence of angels and ſpirits, and that the Phariſees believed both, yet it gives us a worſe character of the Phariſees than of the Sadducees. I ſhall examine what has been ſaid of the immorality of the latter [D], and will make it appear that no good proofs can ' tho' it does not appear in what.' The learned Maimonides plainly intimates that they were only two names for one and the ſame thing (11). Nevertheleſs ſome Rabbins have found a notable difference between them, for they ſay that the doctrine of the reſurrection was never denied by the Baithuſees (12), and that the Sadducees were much more wicked, and downright infidels (13). Nay, ſome will have it that the Baithuſees were a branch of the Eſſenes (14); but that opinion has been fully confuted (15).

[C] This ſect did not believe . . . . . that GOD concerned himſelf with evil, either to do it, or to take notice of it.] Joſephus charges them with this impious doctrine: theſe are his words; Σαδδουκαῖοι . . . . τὴν μὲν εἱμαρμένην παντάπασιν ἀναιροῦσι, καὶ τὸν Θεὸν ἔξω τοῦ δρᾶν τι κακὸν ἢ ἐφορᾶν τίθενται: Sadducæi . . . . fatum omnino negant, & Deum extra omnem mali patrationem inſpectionemque conſtituunt (16). Joſephus does not ſeem to have either underſtood or truly reported their opinion; for we ſhall ſee hereafter, (17) that they believed that God rewards good men, and puniſhes the wicked in this world. They went to St John the Baptiſt, as well as the Phariſees, to be baptized by him, when they heard that he preached repentance in the deſerts of Judea (18). The Scripture ſays, that they were deſirous to avoid the evils they thought themſelves threatened with (19). How then can it be denied that they believed that the baptiſm of repentance adminiſtred by St John would appeaſe God's anger, or procure them ſome advantage? They did not therefore believe, as Joſephus will have it, that God does not concern himſelf with puniſhing evil. Saldenus is in the wrong to find fault with Voſſius, becauſe he juſtifies them on that head. 'Ex 'philoſophis gentium hanc Saducæorum opinionem '(animam non eſſe immortalem) amplexi ſunt Epicurei; 'imo longe deteriorem. Nam Saducæi agnoſcebant 'Deum curare res humanas, quippe eum bonis bene 'facere in hac vita. Epicurei autem in totum tolle'bant providentiam divinam (20). - - - - Among the 'heathen Philoſophers the Epicureans embraced this opi'nion of the Sadducees, touching the immortality of the 'ſoul, or rather a much worſe. For the Sadducees al'lowed that GOD concerned himſelf with human af'fairs, ſeeing that he rewarded good men in this life. 'But the Epicureans altogether denied the Divine Provi'dence.' I cannot tell, ſays Saldenus (21), what could move the great Voſſius to do that honour to ſuch an infamous ſect; for having conſulted ſeveral authors, who have writ books concerning the ſects of the Hebrews, I find every where that the Sadducees are plainly charged with rejecting the doctrine of Providence. Among ſeveral teſtimonies I ſhall only chuſe that of Joſephus, and then he cites what is to be found in the ninth chapter of the thirteenth book of the Jewiſh Antiquities, concerning the opinion of the Sadducees about Predeſtination and Free-will. He had better have choſen the paſſage I have quoted in the beginning of this remark; for it does not by any means follow becauſe a man rejects the fatality of Predeſtination, and teaches that men are entirely free to do good or evil, that he denies a Providence. The Pelagians, the Socinians, in a word, thoſe who have writ with the greateſt vehemency againſt the neceſſity of human actions, maintain at the ſame time that God governs the world, that he puniſhes vice, and rewards virtue. It is to be obſerved that Grotius thinks that the Greek text of Joſephus, which I have quoted, is not correct.

[D] I ſhall examine what has been ſaid of the immorality of the Sadducees.] Mr Willemer charges them with cruelty (22), and to prove it he ſays, that they induced King John Hircanus (23) to perſecute the Phariſees violently. He refers us to the eighteenth chapter of the thirteenth book of the Jewiſh Antiquities. I have conſulted that paſſage, wherein I find only what follows. Hircanus, a diſciple of the Phariſees, and very well beloved by them, entirely loſt their friendſhip. They conceived a great hatred againſt him, and becauſe, upon a certain occaſion, they gave him great reaſon to be angry with them, he forſook their ſect, and embraced that of the Sadducees at the inſtigation of Jonathan, his favourite. He aboliſhed the ordinances of the Phariſees, and ſeverely puniſhed thoſe who obſerved them. At laſt, he put an end to the ſedition, which thoſe two ſects had raiſed, and ſpent the remaining part of his life in peace and felicity. Mr Willemer adds, that Alexander Janneus, being flattered and inſtigated by the Sadducees, was more cruel than his father Hircanus, and that having extricated himſelf out of a thouſand difficulties in which he had been entangled by the Jews, he cauſed 800 of the chief men among the Phariſees to be crucified, and that before they expired, he ordered their wives and children to be murdered in their ſight. During thoſe executions he gave a grand entertainment to his concubines, and to the chief men among the Sadducees. This author refers us to the twenty-ſecond chapter of the thirteenth book of the Jewiſh Antiquities, where I do not find that the Sadducees are mentioned in the leaſt. As for the author of the Cabbala Hiſtorica quoted by him, I have not been able to conſult him; but tho' he ſhould ſay what Mr Willemer alledges out of his book, can we believe him? Can the teſtimony of a man, who lived at ſo great a diſtance from thoſe times, be valid in oppoſition to

---

(i) Joſ. Antiq. lib. xviii, cap. ii.

(k) Id. Antiq. lib. xiii, cap. xviii.

(l) Id. Antiq. lib. xx, cap. vii. See the remark [D].

(m) Id. de Bello Jud. ibid.

(n) Id. Antiq. lib xviii, cap. ii.

(o) Mat. xxii. 23. Mark xii. 18. Luke xx. 27. Acts xxiii. 8.

(11) Maimonid. Comment. in Pirke Avoth, cap. i, fol. 25. apud Willemer. ibid.

(12) R. Aſarias Idumæus, apud eund. pag. 7.

(13) R. Gedalias Ben Jechaja, apud eund. ibid.

(14) R. Aſarias, R. Manaſſe Ben Iſrael, lib. i. de Reſurrect. Mort. cap. vi, Fullerus, lib. ii. Miſcellan. Sacror. cap. iii, apud eund. ibid.

(15) See Waltherus, Centur. Miſcell. Theol. pag. 479.

(16) Joſeph. de Bello Jud. lib. ii, cap. vii. ſub fin. pag. m. 788.

(17) In the remark [E].

(18) Mat. iii, 7.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Voſſius, de Orig. & Progr. Idolol. lib. i, cap. x, pag. m. 72.

(21) Quid tanto apud Magnum virum favore propudioſum hoc hominum genus dignum fecerit, fateor me ignorare. Salden. Otia Theolog. p. 559.

(22) Willemer. ubi ſupra, p. 44.

(23) So he ſtyles him, Johanni Hyrcano Regi autores fuerunt. But Joſephus, Ant. lib. xiii, cap. xix. ſays, that Ariſtobulus, the ſon of this Hircanus, was the firſt who aſſumed the title of king.

can be given of it. It would be leſs ſurpriſing that they ſhould have been good men than the ſilence of Joſephus. The German author goes on thus. At laſt queen Alexandra, by her huſband's advice, and with the aſſiſtance of the Phariſees, undertook to reſtrain the turbulent ſpirit of the Sadducees by ſeverities, but could not reduce them to reaſon, nor prevent the new broils which they occaſioned in the ſtate between Hircanus and Ariſtobulus; and when Herod had rid himſelf of thoſe two princes, the Sadducees made uſe of their intereſt with him to commit all manner of crimes (24). Joſephus, in the ſeventeenth chapter of the ſixteenth book of the Jewiſh Antiquities, is of opinion that Herod was moved by the counſels of the Sadducees, and their impious doctrine, concerning the fatal neceſſity of all things, to the barbarous cruelty he was guilty of in cauſing his ſons to be ſtrangled, and three hundred captains to be ſtoned to death. This is Mr Willemer's account, and thence he concludes, that it has been truly ſaid that the Sadduces were very immoral men, that they were Epicurean ſwine, and very pernicious heretics. Ex vero igitur dictum eſt, Sadducæos fuiſſe moribus peſſimis, & Epicuri de grege porcos: ita quâ doctrinam pernicioſos omnino hæreticos (25). But it is certain, he draws this conſequence wrong; for, 1. The matters of fact on which he builds are not to be found in Joſephus, the author he alledges to prove them: 2. Tho' they were true, it would not follow from thence that the Sadduces wallowed in ſenſual pleaſures as thoſe do who are called Epicuri de grege porci. All that could be proved from thence, is, that they made an ill uſe of their intereſt with princes to oppreſs the Phariſees, of whom they had great reaſon to be afraid, ſince that ſect was animated with a ſuperſtitious zeal, and ſupported by the populace. I confeſs that ſuch a conduct is unjuſt; but the like is to be ſeen in all parties, or in all factions of ſtate or religion. Thoſe who teach the doctrine of future rewards and puniſhments, have not been leſs careful to take hold of favourable opportunities in order to oppreſs their rivals. They are generally ſevere and cruel in their counſels; and therefore there would be nothing ſingular, nor any character of diſtinction in the proceedings of the Sadducees, tho' the matters of fact mentioned by the German writer were true. What will he ſay then, if I ſhew that they are falſe or uncertain? Which is not difficult to do.

It is certain that the Jewiſh Hiſtorian makes no more mention of the Sadducees than of the Great Mogul, in the chapter, where he tells us how Herod cauſed his ſons and the three hundred captains to be put to death. He would have made himſelf extreamly ridiculous, if he had ſaid that the doctrine of thoſe men, concerning the fatality of all things, moved Herod to ſuch cruelty (26); for it was notorious that they entirely rejected the doctrine of Predeſtination, and whenever he mentions them, he obſerves, that, according to their principles, a man's fate depends wholly upon his free-will. I do not deny that Joſippus ſays, that the Sadducees occaſioned the inſurrection of the Jews againſt Alexander Janneus, and the cruelty of that prince towards that people, becauſe they adviſed him to perſecute the Phariſees and their adherents (27); but the teſtimony of ſuch an author (28) is very inconſiderable, eſpecially when we may oppoſe againſt it the ſilence of ſuch an Hiſtorian as Joſephus, who never ſhews the leaſt partiality to the Sadducees. Rabbi Abraham of Salamanca is too modern a writer to give any weight to facts otherwiſe uncertain; and therefore we are not obliged to believe upon his word, what he ſays of the immorality of thoſe heretics (29). Once more; if they had been in general diſreſpected for their debaucheries and wicked actions, it is ſcarcely poſſible that Joſephus, who ſpeaks of them ſo often, would have been wholly ſilent on that head, and that the only thing mentioned by him concerning their morals ſhould ſtrongly incline us to believe that they did not live a ſenſual life. He ſays that they were men of a clowniſh and rough converſation, who ſhewed no more civility to their friends than to ſtrangers. Σαδδουκαίων δὲ καὶ πρὸς ἀλλήλους τὸ ἦθος ἀγριώτερον, αἵ τε ἐπιμιξίαι πρὸς τοὺς ὁμοίους ἀπηνεῖς ὡς πρὸς ἀλλοτρίους. Sadducæi vero & inter ſe feris moribus diſcrepantes, & converſatio eorum circa exteros inhumana (30). This is not the character of voluptuous men; for, on the contrary, they are very complaiſant one to another, their whole ſtudy is to multiply the ſweets of their converſation, and they baniſh every thing that diminiſheth the pleaſures of it. Mr Willemer (31) lays a great ſtreſs upon St John the Baptiſt's calling the Sadducees a generation of vipers (32). He runs back to the firſt ſerpent, that ſeduced Eve. Let him ſay what he pleaſes: I need only anſwer him, that the Phariſees were called ſo as well as they; and therefore if any thing be concluded from it concerning the immoral lives of thoſe, who denied the immortality of the ſoul, it will no leſs affect thoſe who believed future rewards and puniſhments. The ſame may be ſaid of the leaven, which our Saviour would have his diſciples to beware of (33). The Phariſees are as much concerned in it as the Sadducees.

Obſerve, that it is the opinion of many authors, that the Sadducees called themſelves ſo from a word, which ſignifies juſtice, or righteouſneſs. Ἐπονομάζουσι δὲ οὗτοι ἑαυτοὺς Σαδδουκαίους, δῆθεν ἀπὸ δικαιοσύνης τῆς ἐπικλήσεως ὁρμωμένης. Σεδὲκ γὰρ ἑρμηνεύεται δικαιοσύνη. Sadducæos ſe à juſtitia nominant. Sedek enim juſtitiam ſignificat (34). Thoſe who approve this etymology, obſerve that theſe Heretics were called Sadducees, becauſe they were ambitious of being accounted juſt or upright men, and others beſtowed that encomium upon them (35). Mr Willemer cites (36) for this opinion Iſidorus, Beatus Rhenanus, Bernard de Breitenbach, and Dr Richard Montague. He ſays it is diſputed from what ſort of juſtice thoſe ſectaries were denominated. It was according to St Jerom, inherent juſtice or righteouſneſs; for they pretended to have acquired it perfectly by the obſervation of the law. Several approve this opinion of St Jerom. D. Hieronymus in Matthæum XXII. Tom. VI. Oper. allegat propriam inhærentem juſtitiam, de cujus perfectione, ex lege à ſe obſervata, fuerint gloriati. Sequuntur eum multi Patrum, plurimique Scholaſticorum ut & Mathias Flacius Part I. Clav. Script. pag. 1064. Georgius Fabritius Hiſtor. Sacr. lib. X. num. 432. pag. 584. Atque Gregor. Lex. S. pag. 236 (37). Others will have it to be diſtributive juſtice, and they are again divided; for ſome ſay it is that which conſiſts in rewarding; and others, that which conſiſts in puniſhing. The former pretend, that, according to the Sadducees, juſtice is adminiſtred wholly in this world; good men are rewarded, and wicked men puniſhed here, and nothing remains to be done after this life. The latter ſay, that thoſe Heretics were very ſevere in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and that they were called Sadducees upon that account. Non nemo . . . . . ob remunerativam juſtitiam eos juſtos appellatos ſtatuit, quod exiſtmarint in hac vita omnem compleri juſtitiam, h. e. juſtis bene fieri, malis evenire mala, mortuo autem homine nullam ſupereſſe judicium juſtitiæ. Punitivam vero juſtitiam eligit Nicolaus de Lyra Comment. in Act. V. ita inquiens: Dicuntur Sadducæi à Sadech, quod eſt juſtitia in Hebræo: nam Sadducæi inter alios Judæos erant in judiciis & punitionibus acerrimi, ut dicitur in Scholaſtica Hiſtoria (38), propterea ſibi nomen juſtitiæ uſurpabant (39). If the facts on which this etymology is grounded, be true, there is no room to doubt but that the ſect of the Sadducees valued themſelves on all the outward appearances of good morality, and by conſequence carefully avoided a looſe life. Be it as it will, we have here many authors, who muſt needs believe that they were regular men. There are therefore at worſt authorities againſt authorities: and after what has been ſaid, it will be no difficult matter to judge which of them are beſt. Note, that one may eaſily ſuppoſe that the Sadducees were very ſtrict adminiſtrators of juſtice; for ſince they did not believe that a malefactor would be puniſhed after this life, it was natural for them to think that he was to be condemned to a very ſevere puniſhment in this world.

LLOYD criticiſed.

I muſt take notice of ſome faults of Mr Lloyd. I think he is miſtaken, when he ſays, 1. That what Joſephus tells us of their auſtere humour, ought to be underſtood of the ſevere ſentences which they pronounced in adminiſtring juſtice. 2. That, according to the ſame Hiſtorian, the Jews hated them by reaſon of that ſeverity, and were more inclined to the Phariſees, who were naturally mild in inflicting puniſhments. Erant enim in maleficos acerbiores; in judiciis, & pœnarum mulctis exactores rigidi, quemadmodum ex

(24) Redigere tamen in ordinem & impedi~~re non~~ poterat novas, quas excitabant in Republica turbas inter Hyrcanum & Ariſtobulum fratres. Quibus è medio ſublatis, favore Herodis M. quo potiſſimum nitebantur ad turpia quævis facinora ſunt abuſi. Willemer, ibid.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 45.

(26) Ipſe Herodes M. ad immanem ſævitiam . . . . . peſſimis Sadducæorum conſiliis ac impia doctrina de neceſſitate omnium fatali impulſus creditur Joſepho lib. xvi, A. J. cap. xvii, pag. 465. Id. ib. pag. 44.

(27) See the marginal note of Genebrard upon the twenty-firſt chapter of the thirteenth book of Joſephus, fol. m. 464. verſo.

(28) See in Voſſius de Hiſtor. Græcis, lib. ii, cap. viii. p. 197. what a contemptible writer he is.

(29) Sadducæi fuerunt improbi peſſimiſque moribus præditi. R. Abraham Salmanticenſis apud Willemer. p. 44.

(30) Joſeph. de Bello Jud. lib. ii, cap. vii, ſub fin. p. m. 788, 789.

(31) Willemer, pag. 17.

(32) Mat. iii. 7.

(33) Id. xvi. 6.

(34) Epiphan. Hæreſ. 14. pag. m. 31.

(35) Eo quod juſtitiæ laudem tum ipſi appeterent, tum alii iis tribuerent. Willemerus, pag. 5.

(36) Idem. p. 6.

(37) Id. ibid.

(38) Joſephus ſhould have been quoted. See below citat. (41).

(39) Willemer, ubi ſupra, p. 6.

than that a follower of Epicurus ſhould have been wiſe and virtuous; for that part of religion, which they retained, might influence their lives by the motives of hope and fear [E]. However one may very well wonder that they were not excommunicated [F], and Hiſt. Scholaſtica citat Barradius, non diſſentiente Joſepho. Huc enim referimus illius illud elogium, quo moroſos, difficiles, omnino intractabiles pronunciat : adeo ut ab illorum moribus durioribus abhorreret populus, & ad Phariſæos potius propenderent ; qui φύσει, quod ille dixit, ἐπιεικεις ϖρὸς τὰς κολάσεις eſſent (40). I obſerve on the firſt head, that the deſcription of the auſtere manners of the Sadducees is improperly alledged. Joſephus does not conſider them in that place as judges. He ought to have quoted what he obſerves in the eighth chapter of the twentieth book of the Jewiſh Antiquities (41). From thence Barradius, Nicolas de Lyra, and ſeveral others, ought to have taken their proofs, and not from the Hiſtoria Scholaſtica. As to the ſecond, I ſay, that Mr Lloyd could not be blamed, if he had ſpoken his own thoughts ; but he aſcribes to Joſephus a connexion of matters, a reaſoning, or a propoſition, termed cauſal, which is not to be found in his books. A propoſition of that kind is ſometimes falſe, tho' it's parts, conſidered by themſelves, be true, for this is not ſufficient : the particle whereby they are connected together, ought not to infer a falſity (42). Mr Lloyd did not conſider this. Many authors are guilty of the ſame neglect.

[E] That part of religion which they retained, might influence their lives by the motives of hope and fear.] All things duly conſidered, I do not think that I ought to retract what I have ſaid in another book (43) : 'There was a ſect among the Jews, which openly denied the immortality of the ſoul, viz. the Sadducees. I do not find that notwithſtanding ſo deteſtable an opinion, they were worſe livers than the other Jews ; on the contrary, it is very likely they were more honeſt men than the Phariſees, who valued themſelves ſo much on their punctual obſervation of the law of GOD.' I muſt only add a ſhort obſervation to that paſſage, viz. that the good life of the Sadducees might have proceeded from the doctrine of a Providence ; for it is thought they believed that GOD puniſhes men in this world for their wicked actions, and rewards their virtue. See below the remark [G] (44). This opinion may very probably ſerve for a curb and a ſpur : it may induce men to the practice of virtue, in hopes of worldly happineſs, and deter them from evil through the fear of temporal puniſhments. Nay, it may ſeem to be a more powerful motive than the other doctrine, becauſe good and evil, when preſent, or near at hand, make a much greater impreſſion, tho' they be inconſiderable, than good or evil, tho' ever ſo great, that are viewed only at a great diſtance. This is what may be ſaid by thoſe, who examine the thing ſuperficially ; but thoſe who go to the bottom of it, judge otherwiſe. They believe that, generally ſpeaking, the true and principal power of religion, with reſpect to virtue, conſiſts in the perſuaſion of eternal rewards and puniſhments ; and that thoſe who deny the immortality of the ſoul, break the beſt ſprings of religion. This thought may be confirmed by two remarks : One is, that it is hardly poſſible to perſuade people that they ſhall proſper upon earth if they live a good life, and that they ſhall be unhappy if they live an ill one. Every body thinks he ſees daily a thouſand inſtances of the contrary ; and where are the Divines eloquent enough to perſuade people of a thing, which they fancy is contradicted by continual experience ? They may, indeed, tell us, in anſwer to our objections, that we know but little wherein true proſperity and true adverſity conſiſt (45), and that wicked men are ſufficiently puniſhed by the remorſes of their conſcience in the midſt of their wealth and glory (46), whilſt an honeſt man is ſufficiently rewarded by the ſole poſſeſſion of virtue and the teſtimony of a good conſcience (47). They will tell us a thouſand fine things upon this ſubject, and form in us a kind of perſuaſion; but they will ſtrike no durable impreſſion upon us, it will only be an intermitting faith, and they will always have reaſon to fear that, in our bad intervals, we ſhall be apt to call them falſe Doctors, and reproach them as Brutus did virtue (48). If you object to me that there is a certain impreſſion in the minds of men, which frequently rouſes itſelf, is very active, and perſuades us, contrary to experience, that piety is attended with temporal bleſſings, and that the tranſgreſſion of the law of GOD will be puniſhed in this world : I ſay, if you make this objection, I anſwer, that the Orthodox will feel the activity of that impreſſion as well as the Sadducees, and that being moreover perſuaded of a future ſtate, religion will have a greater influence upon their lives. This is my ſecond obſervation.

To conclude, I ſay it cannot be denied that if a man is fully perſuaded that the divine juſtice diſtributes rewards and puniſhments only in this life, and that our deſtiny is wholly limited to that, he may abſtain from evil, and practiſe virtue out of a religious motive. But then it muſt be ſaid, that there is ſo little probability that ſuch an opinion ſhould overcome the depravation of our nature, that it may well be affirmed that the Sadducees deſtroyed the true foundations of religion, and that the good life of a Sadducee may be looked upon as a kind of inſtance of the conjunction of moral honeſty with impiety. Mr Willemer will grant it, for he ſays that a Sadducee not believing the immortality of the ſoul could not be a good man. 'Qui vero à turpiſſimis quibuſque vitiis graviſſimiſque ſceleribus temperarent ſibi, qui per negatam animæ immortalitatem arctiſſime conjuncta huic dogmata corporum reſurrectionem, omnium dijudicationem, ſempiternam bonorum glorificationem, ac improborum condemnationem affirmare non poterant, ſed pertinaciter inficiabantur (49). - - - But how could they refrain from the moſt abominable vices and the greateſt of crimes, who in denying the immortality of the ſoul, could not affirm, but obſtinately rejected the doctrines which had the ſtricteſt connexion with it, viz. the reſurrection of the body ; a future judgment, the eternal glorification of the good, and the condemnation of the wicked.' The author of theſe Latin words brings for proof of a fact a reaſon of right which will not always hold, becauſe men do not uſe to live according to their principles. In general, when the queſtion is about a matter of fact, experience ought to be conſulted much rather than ſpeculative reaſoning. Obſerve well theſe words of Moreri, which he had from Mr Godeau (50) : It is true that if the Sadducees were more impious than the Phariſees in their doctrine, they were not however ſo vain and ſo great hypocrites in their morals, nor did they appear ſo cruel enemies to JESUS CHRIST. You will find the ſame obſervation in Hofman's Dictionary.

[F] One may very well wonder that they were not excommunicated.] I begin this remark with a paſſage, that contains an obſervation of Lucas Brugenſis. 'Mirum igitur videri queat quî uti ſcribit Lucas Brugenſis annotation. in Matth. iii. ver. 7. quanquam errarent Sadducæi, & quidem graviter ; nunquam tamen à veteri Synagoga declarati ſint hæretici, h. e. deſertores fidei, aut legis à DEO traditæ, vel ut populi ſeductores, Synagogæ communione ejecti quemadmodum Samaritani, Joh. iv. 9. Imo promiſcue verſabantur etiam ipſi Phariſæi & Sacerdotes cum Sadducæis tam in ſacris quam prophanis locis, Acts iv. 1. c. xxiii. 6. & communia non raro inibant conſilia adverſus Chriſtum ejuſque diſcipulos, Matth. xvi. ver. 1. Actor. v. 1. Denique licebat cuivis, utri vellet parti adhærere. Verum id tribuendum corruptiſſimis ſeculi illius moribus (51). - - - It may therefore be wondered, as Lucas Brugenſis obſerves, how it came to paſs that notwithſtanding the Sadducees held erroneous opinions, and theſe too of a very heinous nature, yet they were never by the antient ſynagogue pronounced Heretics, that is deſerters of the Faith, and the law delivered by GOD, nor expelled the ſynagogue, like the Samaritans, as ſeducers of the people. Nay the Phariſees and prieſts themſelves converſed promiſcuouſly with them both in ſacred and profane places, and they often joined in council againſt Chriſt and his diſciples. In ſhort, it was lawful for every one to ſide with which party he pleaſed. But that is to be attributed to the great corruption of thoſe times.' It muſt be owned, that it was an exceſſive toleration ; for the errors of the Sadducees did not conſiſt in indifferent things, but concerned the moſt eſſential doctrines of religion : the modern writers for a toleration, do not deſire and that they made but one body of religion with the reſt of the Jews, as the Janſeniſts and Moliniſts do now with the other Chriſtians of the Romiſh communion. The Sadducees do not appear under that name in the Talmud, but only under the notion of Heretics and Epicureans (p). It is ſaid, but with very little reaſon, that they admitted only the five books of Moſes [G], and that therefore Christ in diſputing with them cited only the Pentateuch (q). Arnobius is the only author who informs us that according to

---

(40) Nicolaus Lloydius, in Diction. Hiſtor. & Poëtico. Voce Sadducæi.

(41) Αἵρεσιν μετήει τὴν Σαδδȣκαίων οἵπέρ εἰσι περὶ τὰς κρίσεις ὠμοὶ παρὰ πάντας τȣ̀ς Ἰȣδαίȣς. Secta Sadducæus, quod hominum genus apud Judæos in judicando eſt ſeveriſſimum. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. xx. ch. viii. p.m. 698.

(42) See l'Art de penſer, Part. ii, ch. ix, p. m. 176.

(43) Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, p. 536.

(44) Citat. (72), (74).

(45) Neque mala vel bona, quæ vulgus putet : multos qui conflictari adverſis videantur, beatos ; ac pleroſque quamquam magnas per opes, miſerrimos : ſi illi gravem fortunam conſtanter tolerent, hi proſpera inconſulte utantur. - - - - Neither are theſe things good or evil which the vulgar thinks ſo : for many that ſeem to be in adverſity are nevertheleſs truly happy, becauſe they bear their ill fortune courageouſly ; and moſt of thoſe that wallow in riches are extremely miſerable, becauſe they make a bad uſe of their proſperity. Tacit. Ann. lib. vi, cap. xxii.

(46) Neque fruſtra præſtantiſſimus ſapientiæ firmare ſolitus eſt, ſi recludantur tyrannorum mentes, poſſe aſpici laniatus & ictus ; quando ut corpora verberibus, ita ſævitia, libidine, malis conſultis, animus dilaceretur. - - - - Neither was it without reaſon that the wiſeſt of the antient Philoſophers uſed to ſay, that if we could ſee into the hearts of tyrants, we might there diſcover incurable wounds and and ſores : for in the ſame manner as bodies are torn with ſtripes, their minds are ſcourged with remorſe for their cruelty, their luſts, and vicious practices. Id. ib. cap. vi.

(47) Ipſa quidem virtus pretium ſibi, ſolaque late &c. - - - - But virtue is alone her own reward, &c. Claudian. de Conſul. Mallii, init.

(48) Citation (5) of the article BRUTUS (Marcus Junius.)

(49) Willemer, ubi ſupra, p. 41.

(50) Godeau, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Tom. i, pag. 126, of the Paris Edition in folio, 1674.

(51) Willemer, ibid. p. 14, 15.

deſire it ſhould be ſo comprehenſive as that of the Jews was at that time; they do not deſire an eccleſiaſtical toleration for all ſects, but are contented with a civil and political one. We have ſeen that Mr Willemer aſcribes the toleration of the ſynagogue in favour of the Sadducees to the corruption of thoſe times. He gives other reaſons for it, and particularly the care thoſe Heretics took to comply in all things with the public worſhip: ‘ Magnopere impediebat ejectionem promeritam favor Magnatum plane ſingularis ‘ erga Sadducæos. Adjuvabat ingens Sadducæorum, ‘ quæ invaluerat, potentia, ac ingenioſa qua abominandam hæreſim tegebant, aſtutia: crebra item ſacrificia, atque reliqua Levitici cultus onera, quæ pro ‘ ſalute populi ſe ſuſcipere gloriabantur (52). - - - - - ‘ What chiefly prevented the deſerved expulſion of the ‘ Sadducees was the extraordinary favour of the great ‘ men towards them. To which may be added, the great ‘ power the Sadducees had gained, and their ſubtilty in ‘ gloſſing over their abominable Hereſy; as alſo their ‘ frequent ſacrifices, and their complying with the other ‘ injunctions of the Levitical law, which they pretended ‘ to do for the good of the people.’ It is certain that the moſt enormous diverſity of opinions as to ſpeculative doctrines of religion, is more tolerated than the leaſt diſpute about the public worſhip. Be careful to practiſe all the outward duties preſcribed by the prevailing religion; and notwithſtanding you may hold capital Hereſies you will be leſs moleſted than if you ſhould oppoſe the outward worſhip without being guilty of thoſe Hereſies.

I muſt obſerve that a Reformed Divine, who is now become a great oppoſer of Toleration (53), had before confuted thoſe, who ſay that Heretics ought to be puniſhed with death, among other reaſons, by alledging our Saviour's conduct towards the Sadducees. He obſerved that Jesus Christ dealt with them with great clemency, and did not blame the magiſtrates who tolerated them. See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes in the 185th article.

[G] It is ſaid, but with very little reaſon, that they admitted only the five books of Moſes.] Tertullian ſays they followed the hereſy of Doſitheus, who rejected the prophets; and that beſides, they were ſo impious as to deny the reſurrection. Taceo . . . . Doſitheum, qui primus auſus eſt prophetas quaſi non in Spiritu Sancto locutos repudiare. Taceo Sadducæos qui ex hujus erroris radice ſurgentes, auſi ſunt ad hanc hæreſim etiam reſurrectionem carnis negare (54). Origen(55), St Jerom (56), and a vaſt number of other writers ſay the ſame; I mean, that the Sadducees acknowledged no other books to be canonical beſides the Pentateuch. I have alſo advanced the ſame opinion in another work (57); but now I confeſs that it does not ſeem to me wellgrounded. There is a negative argument againſt it, which appears to me very good. The Holy Scripture, ſpeaking of the Sadducees, and their errors, never ſays that they rejected the prophets. I confeſs this ſilence is not a convincing reaſon; but what ſhall we ſay of Joſephus, who does not impute to them any ſuch rejection? It is impoſſible to conceive that he would have omitted ſuch a remarkable and important article, even when he obſerves that this ſect rejected traditions. What makes the argument yet ſtronger is, that he not only ſays nothing of their rejecting any part of the Scripture, in a place where he could not have been ſilent about it; but poſitively affirms, that when they denied the authority of unwritten traditions, they gave this reaſon for it, Nothing ought to be accounted lawful but what is written. Ἐκεῖνα δεῖν ἡγεῖσθαι νόμιμα τὰ γεγραμμένα: τὰ δ' ἐκ παραδόσεως τῶν πατέρων μὴ τηρεῖν. Oportere eas tantum ſervari quæ ſcripto continentur (58). Can an Hiſtorian ſpeak thus of a ſect, that rejects the greateſt part of the Scripture, without being a mad-man? I know that a caviller may ſay (59), that Joſephus's words concern only the written laws, and conſequently the Pentateuch; but I know alſo that this Hiſtorian could not have forbore mentioning in that place the contempt, which it is ſaid thoſe Heretics had for the other books of the Scripture. Mr Simon is poſitively againſt thoſe, who affirm that they acknowledged no other books to be canonical beſides the Pentateuch, and alledges the teſtimony of Joſephus. That ſect, ſays he (60), retained the whole body of the Scripture, according to Joſephus, who affirms that the Sadducees received πάντα τὰ γεγραμμένα (61), all the Scripture, and only rejected the traditions; and therefore they are miſtaken, who believe that the Sadducees retained only the five books of Moſes in imitation of the Samaritans. There are many paſſages in the Babylonian Talmud, and in the writings of the Rabbins (62), whereby it appears that the Sadducees acknowledged the Hagiographa, and the prophetical books of the Scripture to be divine, and only deſpiſed the explications of their Doctors. Some think that the Samaritans have been confounded with the Sadducees, and take that to be the reaſon why ſeveral writers fancied that the latter as well as the former rejected all the books of the Scripture beſides the Pentateuch (63). But it is certain that theſe two ſects ought to be diſtinguiſhed; for the Jews had no communication with the Samaritans, and at the ſame time maintained Eccleſiaſtical communion with the Sadducees. Nay, ſometimes a Sadducee was their High-prieſt (64), and it is not improbable that the High-prieſt Caiaphas was of that ſect (65).

It would be a wrong way of reaſoning to urge, that the Sadducees choſe ſuch books of the Scripture as did not formally contradict their errors; that they acknowledged theſe to be canonical, and rejected the reſt, becauſe they found there plainly aſſerted the immortality of the ſoul, and the doctrine of the reſurrection, and that their idleneſs made them pitch upon this ſhort way of diſputing. Sadducæi compendio ſtudentes & otio, immo etiam ut effugerent plurium confutationes abjectis & abolitis omnibus prophetarum libris ſolos quinque Moſis receperunt (66). I ſay that ſuch an argument is fallacious: matters of fact ought to be proved by arguments grounded upon facts, and not by probabilities ſupported by ſpeculative reaſons. Beſides, we do not want ſuch reaſons; for men may ſo eaſily invent ſubterfuges, gloſſes, and diſtinctions, that they need not reject the authenticity of a book, to anſwer the arguments alledged againſt them out of it. Do not the Socinians profeſs to acknowledge all the New Teſtament, and yet it contains more paſſages againſt their errors than the Old Teſtament againſt thoſe of the Sadducees? Nay, what is more ſurpriſing, many Chriſtians, who ſtill acknowledge the truth of the holy Scripture, laugh at Magic, and maintain that the Devils have no power (67). I muſt obſerve that a modern Rabbi queſtions the truth of what is ſaid in the Scripture, that the Sadducees did not believe any ſpirits. It would follow from thence, ſays he, that they rejected the Pentateuch, which makes mention of angels in ſeveral places. De eo quod Sadducæi dicantur (Acts xxiii. 8.) negaſſe ſpiritus, non diſputo. Sane ut multi putant ſic ſequeretur eos negaſſe legem Moſaïcam quæ variis in locis angelorum mentionem facit (68). He argues wrong: The Sadducees made uſe of diſtinctions in order to elude the force of thoſe paſſages. See Willemer (69), and the writers quoted by him, and particularly Grotius (70). Conſult alſo Voſſius (71), whom he does not quote. What is certain is, that they practiſed the rites of the Jews, and profeſſed to hope that therefore God would beſtow upon them, the favours he has promiſed to thoſe who obſerve his law, and that they ſhould avoid the curſes wherewith the trangreſſors were threatened. Promiſſionibus legis inhiabant, eoque nomine DEUM ſibi ſacrificiis, precibus, jejuniis, aliiſque cultus Levitici ceremoniis placare conabantur, ne iratum Numen promiſſiones ampliſſimas à populo tolleret (72). The author of theſe Latin words ſhews againſt Dr Lightfoot, that the paſſage of Malachi (73) cannot be applied to that ſect, ſince they never believed that the law was to be deſpiſed, nor that the obſevation of it was inſignificant. ‘ Neque Sadducæorum doctrinæ & moribus convenit locus ‘ Malach.

(p) Marſham, Chronic. Can. Ægypt. §. ix, pag. m. 159.

(q) Matthew, Mark and Luke, ubi ſupra, citation (o).

(52) Id. ibid. pag. 15.

(53) Jurieu, Apolog. pour la Reformation, Tom. ii, p. 254, Edit. in 4to.

(54) Tertullian. de Preſcript. adverſ. Hæret. cap. xlv.

(55) Origenes, Tractat. xxi, in Matth.

(56) Hieronym. in Matth. cap. xxii.

(57) In the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, p. 580.

(58) Joſeph Antiq. lib. xiii, cap. xviii, pag. 454.

(59) Serarius and Petavius will have it ſo. See Petavius's Notes in Epiphan. ad Hæreſ. 14. pag. 28.

(60) Simon, Hiſt. Critique du Vieux Teſtament, book i, ch. xvi, p. m. 93.

(61) I think Mr Simon would have much ado to find thoſe Greek words in Joſephus.

(62) See the Diſſertation of John Helvicus Willemer, p. 33, 34.

(63) See the ſame Diſſertation, pag. 10, 11.

(64) See Joſephus Antiq. lib. xx, cap. vii.

(65) See the 5th chapter of the Acts of the Apoſtles, ver. 17.

(66) Centur. Magdeburg. Cent. I, lib. i, cap. v.

(67) Mr Becker, a miniſter of Amſterdam maintained this doctrine with great heat in ſome books written in the vulgar tongue. He was depoſed upon that account. He pretended to ſay nothing contrary to the Scripture.

(68) Manaſſeh Ben Iſrael, lib. i. de Reſurrect. mortuor. cap. vi, pag. 43. apud Willemerum, ubi ſupra, p. 38.

(69) Willem. pag. 38, 39.

(70) Grotius in Matth. cap. xxii. ver. 23.

(71) Voſſius, de orig. & prog. Idol. lib. i, cap. vi.

(72) Willemer. pag. 41.

(73) Ye have ſaid, it is vain to ſerve God: and what profit is it, that we have kept his ordinance, and that we have walked mournfully before the Lord of Hoſts? Malachi chap. iii. ver. 14.

to ſome they aſcribed an organized body to God. He relates this in a manner that is ſomewhat liable to cenſure [H].

‘ Malach. III. v. 14. nunquam enim profeſſi ſunt Sadducæi, legem Dei non eſſe obſervandam, aut obſervantiam legis eſſe fruſtraneam. Contrarium docet ipſe Lightfoot Hor. Hebr. in Act. Apoſt. p. 122. quænam, inquiens, religio Sadducæi? Orat, jejunat, ſacrificat, obſervat legem, & tamen non expectat reſurrectionem aut vitam æternam. Quorſum hæc religio? Ut obtineat ſcilicet bona temporalia quorum ſolum promiſſionem obſervat ille factam in lege nihil rimans ultra literam (74). - - - Neither can this paſſage of Malachi be applied to the doctrine and manners of the Sadducees; for they never profeſſed that the law of GOD was not to be obſerved, or that the obſervation thereof was inſignificant; Dr Lightfoot himſelf teaches the contrary, when he ſays, What kind of a religion is that of a Sadducee? He prays, faſts, ſacrifices, obſerves the law, at the ſame time that he does not look for a reſurrection, nor eternal life. Why all this religion? To the end, forſooth, that he may obtain temporal bleſſings, which alone he obſerves to be promiſed in the law; and he ſeeks no farther than the literal ſignification.’ Note, That the paſſage of Malachi might be admirably well applied to ſome Sadducees, who, had they been guided by experience, would have detected the falſity of the maxims which their Doctors taught them.

[H] According to ſome they aſcribed an organized body to GOD. Arnobius relates this in a manner that is ſomewhat liable to cenſure.] Conſider well his words. ‘ Neque quiſquam Judaïcas in hoc loco nobis opponat & Sadducæi generis fabulas tanquam formas tribuant atque os Deo. Hoc enim putatur in eorum literis dici, & ut vel re certa, atque auctoritate firmari: quæ aut nihil ad nos attinent, nec ex aliqua portione quicquam habent commune nobiſcum: aut ſi ſunt, ut creditur, ſociæ, quærendi ſunt vobis altioris intelligentiæ doctores, per quos poſſitis addiſcere, quibus modis conveniat literarum illarum nubes, atque involucra relaxare (75). - - - Let no man oppoſe to us here the fables of the Jews and Sadducees, as if they aſcribed a form and mouth to God. For this is thought to be ſaid in their writings, and to be confirmed as a thing certain by authority. But theſe fables are either nothing at all to us, and are in no reſpect common to us with them; or if they likewiſe affect us, as they are ſuppoſed to do, you muſt conſult Doctors of a deeper penetration, from whom you may learn in what manner it is neceſſary to explain the figurative expreſſions in the Scriptures.’ One of thoſe who have commented upon him, cenſures him in the following manner. ‘ Nimis confuſe Arnobius, ſaith he (76), atque etiam periculoſe. Nam de libris Veteris Teſtamenti tanta temeritate loqui impium plane & horrendum. Hoc igitur ait quia Rabinorum ſcripta infinitis fabulis jam ſcatebant . . . . Summam imperitiam prodit hoc loco Arnobius. Atqui melius Numenius Pythagoreus qui libro de ſummo bono primo Judæos in iis nationibus numeravit quæ Deum incorporeum exiſtimabant, citatis etiam prophetarum teſtimoniis atque troporum enodatione, ſi quando contraria ſententia videbatur effici poſſe adhibita. - - - Arnobius's reaſoning is too confuſed, and even dangerous. For it is both impious and horrible to ſpeak of the books of the Old Teſtament ſo raſhly. He ſays this, becauſe the books of the Rabbins are already ſtuffed with an infinite number of fables. - - - - Arnobius betrays great want of judgment here. Numenius Pythagoreus did much better, who, in his firſt book de Summo Bono, reckoned the Jews firſt among thoſe natious which believed GOD to be an incorporeal being, alledging even the teſtimonies of the Prophets, and explaining thoſe figurative expreſſions which ſeemed to warrant the contrary opinion.’ This cenſure is not altogether groundleſs, but it ſhould have been leſs ſevere; for Arnobius means this. We are not anſwerable for the idle fancies of the Jews; but there is no harm in the things that are common to us with them, if the myſtical ſenſe be underſtood. He could not deny that, according to the literal ſenſe of the Scripture, God has hands and feet, a mouth and eyes. Therefore it was neceſſary for him to inform the heathens that the truth lies concealed under thoſe figurative expreſſions. He ſhewed himſelf to be a dextrous and able Rhetorician by not inſiſting on that objection, and by only telling his adverſaries, in four or five lines, that the Chriſtians do not aſcribe to God any figure or organical compoſition. Had he attempted to enter upon a more exact diſcuſſion of the matter, as Numenius did, he would have enervated his work; for ſince he was writing an invective againſt the Pagans, it was not his buſineſs to loſe any time in anſwering them. It was better for him to act all along the part of an aſſailant; an author ought to be upon the defenſive as little as he can, when he writes books of this nature. For the reſt, we find in Origen what Numenius did in favour of the Jews (77); which ſhews that the Pagans did not neglect the pretended advantages they hoped to draw from thoſe paſſages of the Scripture, that ſeem to aſcribe ſome imperfection to God. The Chriſtians had recourſe to the figurative ſenſe, and alledged againſt ſuch paſſages thoſe, wherein the perfection of God is clearly expreſſed. But Arnobius's work could hardly allow of ſuch a digreſſion, which afforded a pretence to anſwer that the paſſages of the Poets ought alſo to be explained one by another, and that ſome of them were to be underſtood in a figurative ſenſe. It had been improper for Arnobius to revive ſuch a notion: the commentator, who cenſures him, was not aware of this.

(74) Willem. pag. 25.

(75) Arnob. lib. iii, pag. m. 106, 107.

(76) Defid. Heraldus, in Arnobium, pag. m. 134.

(77) Origen. contra Celſum, lib. i. Heraldus quotes the paſſage in Greek.

SAINT-CYRAN (John du Verger de Hauranne, Abbot of) one of the patriarchs of Janſeniſm, was a native of Bayonne. Moreri ſpeaks of him (a). I might add many things to what he ſays of him, but I defer them till another time. He was a very learned man, as appears from his work againſt the Somme Theologique of Father Garaſſe (b), and from the books that he publiſhed againſt the Jeſuits, on which the clergy of France cauſed an encomium to be made in the year 1646 (c). The author did not put his name to the former; he appeared in the latter under the diſguiſe of Petrus Aurelius for reaſons mentioned by his friends (d). Few people know that he is the author of an apology for the biſhops, who take up arms [A]. This paradox is leſs ſurprizing, than that which he maintained in his Caſus Regius

(a) Under the word Verger.

(b) See the article GARASSE, remarks [C] and [D].

(c) By Mr Godeau. See a piece of the Jeſuit Vavaſſeur intituled Antonius Godellus Epiſcopus Graſſenſis an Elogii Aureliani Scriptor idoneus.

(d) In the dialogue of two pariſhioners of St Hilary du Mont, pag. m. 45.

[A] Few people know that he is the author of an apology for the biſhops, who take up arms.] Conſider theſe words of Mr Joly. The canons of Munſter are obliged to prove their nobility by ſixteen deſcents, as they ſay, and they are ſo fond of it, and of their military performances, that I have ſeen an epitaph upon the tomb of a canon, which imports that he was a captain, and died in the war. Hence it is that they uſe to get their pedigrees and coats of arms painted in a cloyſter adjoining to the church, or in ſome public place. This example, in my opinion, does not deſerve to be imitated, any more than thoſe that were collected and inſerted in the book, intituled, l'Apologie de l'Eveſque de Poitiers, in the year 1615, which a learned man of that time called, in a pleaſant manner, and not without reaſon, The Alcoran of the Biſhop of Poitiers; tho' the author of that book, who did not put his name to it, has been ſince much talked of on account of ſome other works concerning Eccleſiaſtical matters and piety, which are much better (1). Mr Joly would ſay no more, tho' he meant our John du Verger. That Biſhop of Poitiers, was the patron of this learned native of Bayonne, and reſigned to him the abbey of Saint-Cyran in 1620 (2). I have read in ſome compiler, that John du Verger being principal of a college in his own country, and hearing that this biſhop wanted a Reader, or a Library-keeper, offered his ſervice to him,

(1) Joly, Voiage de Munſter, pag. 80, 81. See alſo the Mêlanges of Vigneul Marville, Tom. ii, pag. 27. Dutch Edit.

(2) See Moreri.

Regius [B]. He died of an Apoplexy (e) at Paris, the ſecond of October 1643 (f) The aſſembly of the clergy was ſo much diſpleaſed with the encomium beſtowed upon him, in the Gallia Chriſtiana of the brothers Sammarthani, that they ordered it to be ſtruck out [C].

Thoſe, who ſay that he died a priſoner at Bois de Vincennes, are miſtaken, and might have avoided that miſtake if they had taken notice that among his letters [D], there are ſome that are dated at Paris after he had recovered his liberty (g). His friends pretend that he was impriſoned in 1637, for no other reaſon, but becauſe Cardinal de Richelieu had a mind to revenge himſelf on the abbot, for having refuſed to give his vote for the diſſolution of the marriage of the Duke of Orleans and the Princeſs of Lorrain (h). If this was the true reaſon of his confinement, yet other cauſes were alledged for it, and they endeavoured to ruin him as a teacher of errors: his trial began upon that foot (i). But ſome ſay that Cardinal de Richelieu looking upon him as a man very well qualified to write him, which the biſhop accepted (3). Voëtius did not forget this warlike adventure of the Biſhop of Poitiers, in his liſt of ſome Eccleſiaſtics who took up arms. That prelate appears at the end of that catalogue. ‘Henricus Ludovicus Rupipoſæus Epiſcopus Pictavienſis non ſolum arma tractavit, & armato populo armatus præivit, ut Pictavio nonnullos ex Patritiis quibus diffidebat ejiceret: ſed etiam Apologiam edidit anno 1615, adverſus eos qui dicebant, non licere Eccleſiaſticis in caſu neceſſitatis ad arma recurrere: ſub cujus finem Catalogum bene longum texuit Cardinalium & Epiſcoporum qui tempore neceſſitatis arma tractarunt, Joannis Columnæ Legati Gregorii IX contra Fridericum, Arnoldi Pelgrue Vaſconis contra Venetos, Ægidii Albornos Cardinalis Toletani, cum Rege Caſtiliæ contra Mauros, & contra Ludovicum Bavarum & aliorum complurium, quorum nomina ibidem legi poſſunt, ſimulque videri nullam coëgiſſe neceſſitatem ut viri Eccleſiaſtici ad id negotium admoverentur; quando laicorum ducum ſatis larga copia ſuppeteret (4). - - - Henry Lewis de la Rochepozay, biſhop of Poitiers, did not only take up arms, and put himſelf at the head of the armed populace, in order to drive out of Poitiers certain noblemen, whom he diſtruſted, but likewiſe publiſhed an apology, in the year 1615, againſt thoſe who ſaid that it was not lawful for Eccleſiaſtics to take up arms in any caſe; near the end of which he has inſerted a long catalogue of cardinals and biſhops, who took up arms in a caſe of neceſſity, as did John Colonna, the Legate of Gregory IX againſt Frederic, Arnoldus Pelgrue of Gaſcony againſt the Venetians, Ægidius Albornos, cardinal of Toledo with the king of Caſtile againſt the Moors, and againſt Lewis of Bavaria; beſides ſeveral others, whoſe names may likewiſe be ſeen there. At the ſame time it plainly appears, that it was not a caſe of neceſſity which had required Eccleſiaſtics to be employed in ſuch affairs, there being no want of Lay-generals.’

[B] The paradox which he maintained in his Caſus Regius.] I have not read that book, but it is ſaid that he maintained in it that there are thirty-four caſes, wherein a man may kill himſelf innocently. Paulo ante (obitum) compoſuerat librum inſcriptum Caſus Regius, ubi attulerat 34 caſus in quibus quilibet poterat libere ſe ipſum interficere. Unde unus ex diſcipulis ejus nomine Meſter arripuit nuper occaſionem ſe ipſum interficiendi, cum Metis eſſet (5). See below, the remark [I]. Father Paul approved the principles of the Stoics in this reſpect; for when he was told that the Pope deſigned to have him carried away, he anſwered, among other things, ‘That in caſe he was taken alive, in order to be carried to Rome, the Pope could not but know, that after he had done all he could, a man had a greater power over his own life than all other men put together, and that conſequently he might deprive himſelf of life, before the Pope could have the ſatisfaction to take it from him in public (6).’ I do not know whether many people have taken notice of this maxim of Fra-Paolo.

This doctrine of our Abbot was ſometimes taken notice of in the firſt anſwers to the Lettres Provinciales, written by Mr Paſcal. ‘(7) You ſhould rather think of correcting the miſchievous doctrine of Saint-Cyran, who was ſo bold as to ſay that we may kill our neighbours when we are moved to it by an inward inſpiration, tho' it be forbidden by the outward law. You may ſee the proof and the practice of it in the ſecond page of the information, drawn up againſt him by order of the late king, in the year 1638. The original is in Clermont-college at Paris (8). There are ſome opinions in it concerning this matter (9), which are plainly contrary to the Chriſtian faith. . . . . (10) Some are repugnant to morality, which we call ſcandalous, as thoſe of the Abbot of Saint-Cyran *, who ſaid that we are bound to kill a man, when moved to it by inſpiration, tho' it be contrary to the outward law, which forbids it. Some are againſt common ſenſe, which we call extravagant and raſh, as that of the ſame Abbot, who goes about to prove in his Caſus Regius, which you acknowledge to be his principal work, that men are often bound to kill themſelves; and that this obligation being one of the moſt difficult and important, the performance of it requires an extraordinary courage and firmneſs. . . . . (11) Can thoſe, who teach, that it is lawful to kill one's ſelf †, and that a man is often bound to do it, have a right to determine when it is lawful to kill one's neighbour? And can thoſe, who ſay, that we ought to obey the inward motion ‡, which prompts us to kill a man, tho' it be forbidden by the outward law, declare at what time the outward law allows of it, and gives us a full power to do it?’ I do not think that Mr Paſcal made any anſwer to this point, tho' he was in a manner forced to it by ſuch frequent repetitions, nor do I know whether his ſilence was ever objected to him.

[C] The aſſembly of the Clergy . . . . ordered the encomium on him to be ſtruck out.] St Romuald relates it thus; ‘The ſon of one of the twin-brothers of Scævola Sammarthanus, who is lately dead, publiſhed in their name four great volumes in folio, intituled, Gallia Chriſtiana, and mentioning that Abbot, beſtowed on him a great encomium, as if he had been the moſt orthodox, and the moſt holy man, that lived in our days; but the general aſſembly of the Clergy of France ordered it to be ſtruck out by a formal decree (12).’ See the remark [K].

It is to be obſerved, that the prelates, who, in their aſſembly, cauſed that encomium to be ſuppreſſed, would not buy any copy of the Gallia Chriſtiana which had it not (13).

[D] His letters.] It is a work very much cried up by the Janſeniſts. Mr Arnauld d'Andilly publiſhed it in 1648, and dedicated it to the Clergy of France. The letters are full of devotion and maxims of piety, as we are told; I ſpeak thus becauſe I have not ſeen them. Mr Leydecker has given us ſome extracts of them, whereby the reader may have a good opinion of theſe letters (14). On the contrary, Father Bouhours quotes ſome fragments of them, written in a frightful ſtyle (15). He makes uſe of the edition of the Sieur de Preville, 1655. It is ſaid, in Moreri's Dictionary, that the Lyons edition is one of the fineſt; I do not know whether he means that of 1679. Note, that we are told in the book, intituled, la Morale pratique des Jeſuites, pag. 413 of the 8th volume, that Father Pintereau, a Jeſuit, has only printed ſome ſcraps under the name of a chimerical gentleman, whom he calls the Sieur de Preville. You may ſee in the following pages how the original letters of Janſenius and the Abbot of Saint-Cyran came into the hands of the Jeſuits.

[E] Car-

(e) St Romuald, Abr. du Threſor. Chronol. Tom. iii, pag. 452.

(f) Labbe, Chronol. Tom. v, pag. 877.

(g) See Leydecker, Hiſtor. Janſeniſmi, pag. 497. & Epiſtolam Chriſtiani Philireni ad Janum Palæologum, pag. 29.

(h) See the eighth volume of la Morale pratique, pag. 383. See alſo pag. 415.

(i) See l'Eſprit de Mr Arnaud, Tom. i, pag. 228. & ſeq.

(3) Scholarcha Baïonenſis . . . . qui audiens quod Epiſcopus Pictavienſis Lectore vel Bibliothecario opus haberet adiit eum, & ejus ſervitio prorſus ſe tradidit, à quo paulo poſt parvam Abbatiam S. Cyrani accepit. Petrus à Sto. Romualdo in continuatione Chronici Ademari, p. 453. ad ann. 1638.

(4) Giſbertus Voëtius, in Deſperata cauſa Papatus, lib. iii, §. ii, pag. 689.

(5) Petrus à Sto. Romualdo, ubi ſupra, pag. 472. ad ann. 1643.

(6) Vie du Pere Paul, pag. 194, 195. Leyden 1661, in 12*mo.*

(7) Reſponſes aux Lettres Provinciales, pag. 170, 171. Liege 1658.

(8) Ibid. p. 341.

(9) That is concerning Homicide.

(10) Reſponſes aux Lettres Provinciales, p. 342.

* It is a piece of his trial, which is to be ſeen in Clermont-College.

(11) Ibid. p. 360.

† The Abbot of St Cyran in his Caſus Regius.

‡ A maxim of the Abbot of St Cyran according to the depoſition of the witneſſes in his proceſs kept in Clermont-College.

(12) St Romuald Abregé du Threſor. Chronol. Tom. iii, pag. 452, 453. ad ann. 1643.

(13) Vigneul Marville, Mêlanges, Tom. ii, pag. 23. Dutch Edit.

(14) Leydecker, in Hiſtor. Janſeniſmi, p. 470, & ſeq.

(15) Bouhours, Maniere de bien penſer, pag. 345, & ſeq. Dutch Edition. See alſo the anſwers to the Lettres Provinciales, pag. 234, 235, & ſeq. Edit. of Liege 1658.

write againſt the Proteſtants [E], exhorted him to go about it in priſon, and offered to ſupply him with books and all neceſſary helps. We ſhall ſee below (k) the Abbot de Saint-Cyran's anſwer to that propoſal. He was not much eſteemed by the famous Grotius [F], which is not very ſurpriſing; for Grotius, following the doctrine of the Arminians, was not very well diſpoſed to admire ſuch a rigid follower of St Auguſtin. I have ſaid in another place (l) that the opinion of this abbot concerning the council of Trent was diſcovered to the public by Mr Abelly in the Life of Vincent de Paul, and that the diſcovery of this ſecret was acceptable to many people. This muſt not be ſo underſtood as if the public had not known before that ſuch a thought was aſcribed to that abbot. I only meant that many were glad to know that the teſtimony of Vincent de Paul appeared in print; but before that work of Mr Abelly came out, it might have been found in ſome other books that the Abbot of Saint Cyran did not very well approve the council of Trent [G]. He was very ill treated in a book of Mr de Raconis, Biſhop of Lavaur. His friends accuſe that prelate of having done that out of complaiſance to Father Joſeph (m). He accuſes them in his turn, for already canonizing that abbot, as if they were Popes, and as if he had already done a great many miracles as true, as the forged ones they had publiſhed were ridiculous (n).

Here follow ſome more additions. The praiſes beſtowed on him by Mr de Balzac are doubtleſs hyperbolical; nevertheleſs, we find there one of the talents of the man whom he is commending, viz. that he underſtood how to ſupport his opinions in the beſt manner [H]. I have received a very curious memoir concerning the paradox in the remark B [I]. I ſhall give the very words of that memoir, in which there is alſo ſomething

(k) In the remark [E].

(l) In the remark [C], of the article ABELLY.

(m) Raconis, de la Primaute de Saint Pierre, pag. 10, Paris edition 1645, in 4to.

(n) Id. ibid.

[E] Cardinal de Richelieu looking upon him as a man very well qualified to write againſt the Proteſtants.] It is ſaid that this Abbot was reſolved to anſwer the Miniſters, who had writ againſt Cardinal du Perron about the Pope's ſupremacy, and the Real Preſence. His confinement put a ſtop to his deſign: Cardinal de Richelieu encouraged him to go on with it; but the Abbot made anſwer, that it was not becoming the dignity of the Church, that her head and her greateſt myſtery ſhould be defended by a priſoner. Communis opinio eſt Abbatem Sancyranum, antequam in arce Vincenna detineretur, meditatum, & aggreſſum etiam vindicias Cardinalis Perronii adverſus heterodoxorum plures, qui in virum jam mortuum inſurrexerant, ulturi quas vivus ſibi plagas inflixerat, & ſuſcepiſſe defendenda quæ Cardinalis immortalitate dignus ſcripſerat de Euchariſtia, & de primatu Petri ab hæreticis maxime laceſſita. Id cum obaudiſſet Cardinalis Richelius, fertur ad id opus, quem currentem putabat, incitaſſe, & pollicitus ſi inchoatam apologiam vellet proſequi, curaturum, ne quidquam librorum, & ſubſidiorum deeſſet, quæ ad abſolvendam vellet, aut forent neceſſaria; ſed excelſo animo reſponſum à Sancyrano non convenire Eccleſiæ dignitati, illius caput, & myſteriorum maximum ab homine accuſato, qui ſui juris non eſſet, defendi (16). Mr Arnauld ſays only, it is well known that his confinement was the only thing that prevented his anſwering the miniſters, who had writ againſt the doctrine of the Catholic church concerning the Euchariſt (17).

[F] He was not much eſteemed by the famous Grotius.] In order to prove this, I ſhall only ſet down a paſſage out of a letter of Balzac to the Jeſuit Leonard Allemai. ' Quam æquo utantur Grotio etiam alieni videre poteris ex his quæ ſubjungo verbis Epiſtolæ, non ita pridem ab eo ſcriptæ, ad optimum & humaniſſimum virum Joannem Cordeſium. " Et mihi Aurelius interdum ſufflaminis egere videtur. Nam quorſum tantus Suarezii contemptus; hominis, ſi quid rectè judico, in Philoſophiâ, cui hoc tempore connexa eſt Scholaſtica Theologia, tantæ ſubtilitatis, ut vix quenquam habeat parem? Quid attinet Moliniſtarum nomen Societati toties objicere, cum ſi quid Molinæ exciderit periculoſius, id poſterioribus Jeſuitarum, præcipuè Leſſii, ſcriptis ſit caſtigatum. Neque verò non nihil etiam ab illâ ſententia periculi eſt, quæ cum concilio Valentino, laudante Aurelio, ſtatuit quorundam ſalutem Deum nolle, ſi illi quidem nudè ut homines ſpectentur (18). - - - How equitable Grotius is, even to people that differ from him in their principles, will appear to you from the following words, which I take out of a letter written by him not long ago, to that worthy and good natured man John Cordeſius. " Aurelius ſeems to me to want a check now and then. For why ſhould he diſcover ſo great contempt for Suarez, a man who, if I judge aright, has ſuch refined notions in Philoſophy, with which at this time ſcholaſtic Divinity is ſtrongly connected, that he has ſcarce any equal? To what purpoſe does he ſo often upbraid the Jeſuits with the name of Moliniſts, ſince if there was any thing dangerous in Molina's doctrine, it has been ſince mended in the writings of the Jeſuits, and particularly in thoſe of Leſſius. For neither is that opinion entirely free from danger which, eſtabliſhed by the council of Valentia, and approved by Aurelius, declares, that GOD wills not the ſalvation of ſome, if we conſider them barely as men."

[G] It might have been found in ſome other books, that he did not very well approve the council of Trent.] It will be ſufficient for me to quote one of them, that is, the Triumphus Catholicæ veritatis adverſus Novatores, printed in 1651. Father Labbe, who is juſtly accounted the author of it, inſerted a memorial in it containing the dying words of Octavius de Bellegarde, Archbiſhop of Sens. It is ſaid that this archbiſhop ſent to the Pope's Nuncio by the Baron de Renti this laſt declaration of his opinions, that the Pope might be informed of it. One article of that piece runs thus: ' That the Archbiſhop of Sens . . . . is bound to believe that this whole party is rightly ſuſpected by the Church, knowing that it began with an illuſion, which produced, among other effects, a falſe devotion called, le Chapelet ſecret du S. Sacrament (19), condemned as ſuch by eight Doctors of the Sorbonne; and being informed by credible perſons *, that the Abbot of Saint-Cyran ſpoke of the council of Trent as of a political aſſembly, which was not in the leaſt a true council (20).'

[H] The praiſes beſtowed on him by Balzac . . . we find there one of the talents . . . . that of ſupporting his opinions in the beſt manner.] ' It muſt be owned, Sir, that you are the greateſt tyrant alive, and that your authority begins to be terrible to every body; when you ſpeak, there is no poſſibility of retaining one's opinion, if it be not agreeable to your's. You have often reduced me to that extremity, that parting from you without knowing how to anſwer you, I could ſcarce refrain from crying out in an extaſy, Reſtore me my opinion, which you have taken from me by force, and do not take away that liberty of conſcience which the king has allowed us (21).' This is what Mr Balzac wrote to him on the 12th of January, 1626. See alſo the thirty-firſt Letter of the Supplement to his works at pag. 186 of the 10th edition.

[I] I have received a very curious memoir concerning the paradox mentioned in the remark B.] We have ſeen in the remark [B] what Peter de St Romuald ſays on that ſubject: but what follows was communicated to me by a perſon much better informed than that monk. ' The Abbot de St Cyran did not write any ſuch book as the Caſus Regius in the latter part of his life. The book which occaſioned this miſtake of the good Father was printed in the year 1609: and as there is no reaſon againſt aſcribing it to the Abbot de St Cyran, the apology for the Biſhop of Poitiers muſt not be counted his firſt, but his ſecond work. The book in queſtion is intituled, Queſtion Roiale & ſa Deciſion, at Paris, by Touſſaint de Bray, in 1609, ' in (16) Vincentius, Baronius Apolog. Ordinis Prædicatorum, Tom. i, pag. 163.

(17) Morale pratique des Jeſuites, Tom. viii, pag. 376, 377.

(18) Balzac, Epiſtolar. Select. pag. m. 172.

(19) Concerning which, ſee Meſnier, Port-Roial d'intelligence avec Geneve, pag. 5.

* See upon this point, and ſeveral others, what is obſerved in the book intituled: Les Reliques de l'Abbé de S. Cyran.

(20) Triumphus Catholicæ veritatis, pag. 159, 160.

(21) Balzac, Lettre à l'Abbé de S. Cyran. It is the viith in the ſecond part of his works in the Paris edition 1638.

ſomething touching the ſuppreſſion which the Sammarthani were obliged to make [K]. They aſcribed to our John de Verger a piece which was cenſured by the Sorbonne, and which was written by a ſiſter of Mr Arnauld. It is intituled Le Chappelet ſecret du Saint Sacrement de l'Autel. I ſhall ſpeak of it below [L].

‘ in 8vo. This is the title, and it is no otherwiſe expreſſed in the privilege, but in the firſt page we find a more circumſtantial one : Queſtion Roiale, &c. The royal queſtion, wherein is ſhewn in what extremity, eſpecially in times of peace, a ſubject may be obliged to preſerve the life of his prince at the expence of his own. This book contains fifty-ſix leaves, or 112 pages. It is true, the author in ſeveral places, parcularly fol. 46, & ſeq. mentions ſeveral particular occaſions in which a man may kill himſelf without being guilty of ſelf-murder. He alledges them to prove, that much more a ſubject ought to preſerve the life of his prince at the expence of his own. What occaſioned that piece is curious enough to be related. It is to be found in the book, intituled, L'Innocence, &c. Innocence and Truth defended, part 2. art. 8. p. 155, and 156. and is this.’ King Henry the Great having aſked ſome Lords what he ſhould have done, if, at the battel of Arques, inſtead of gaining the victory, he had been forced to fly, and had embarked in the neighbouring ſea without any proviſions, and had been driven by a ſtorm into ſome remote deſart or iſland; and one of the lords anſwering, that he would ſooner have given himſelf for food to him by taking away his own life, which he muſt quickly have loſt however, than have ſuffered his king to die with hunger. The king queſtioned whether that might be done. The late Count de Cramail, who was preſent at this diſcourſe, paying a viſit ſoon after to Mr de St Cyran, his particular friend, propoſed this queſtion to him, and deſired his anſwer in writing. Mr de St Cyran, who was then in the vigour of his youth, and might poſſibly be affected with that generous reſolution, exerciſed himſelf upon that queſtion purely Metaphyſical, in the ſame manner as he would have done upon the clemency of Phalaris, the moſt cruel tyrant that ever was; and having delivered his ſolution of it in two ſhapes to the Count de Cramail, that lord ſuppreſſed of the two pieces that which was the better grounded in reaſon and authority, and cauſed the other to be printed without the author's name, and even without his knowledge, under the title of Queſtion Royale, becauſe the king had propoſed it, and becauſe it only concerned that Metaphyſical caſe relating to the king's perſon and life, as appears from the very title. But the Abbot of St Cyran has ever ſince declared to his friends, that the ſaid little piece did not contain his true ſentiments, but a paradox which that lord had engaged him to maintain in his youth, juſt as we ſee Iſocrates did formerly write an encomium upon Helena, and another upon Buſiris, &c (22).

[K] The ſuppreſſion which the Sammarthani were obliged to make.] The Clergy obliged them to ſuppreſs the encomium which they had made upon John du Verger de Hauranne in the 4th volume of their Gallia Chriſtiana, pag. 830, ſpeaking of the Abbots of Saint-Cyran (23). ‘ They cauſed to be ſubſtituted there the encomium upon Mr de la Rochepozay, Biſhop of Poitiers, ſuch as it had been publiſhed before in the third volume, pag. 903. They likewiſe cauſed to be added in the magin of the ſubſtituted leaf, the following words over-againſt the Abbot de Hauranne's name.’ ‘ Cautum eſt decreto Cleri Gallicani quod ſi in quibuſdam exemplaribus elogium huic diverſum reperiatur, id cenſeatur inſertum ſine ejus cognitione & approbatione ; illæſâ tamen fama Sammarthanorum & Hiſtoricâ fide qui ſuis operibus de Eccleſia Gallicana bene meriti ſunt (24). - - - - ‘ It is provided by a decree of the Clergy of the Gallican Church, that in caſe any of the copies ſhould contain an encomium different from this, it ought to be looked upon as inſerted without their knowledge and approbation ; without any prejudice however to the fame and fidelity of the Sammarthani, who have done great ſervice to the Gallican Church by their works.’ in the print, to the words (25) il eſt vray que je excluſively. Father Meynier obſerves (26), that the Port-Royal condemns the Sorbonne for having cenſured this Chappelet ; but he ſays it was not without reaſon that the Sorbonne affirmed that beſides the extravagances, impertinences, errors, blaſphemies, and impieties, which this Chappelet contains, it introduces beſides opinions . . .

[L] It is intituled, le Chappelet ſecret, &c. . . . I ſhall ſpeak of it below.] It is one of the pieces by which Father Meynier endeavours to prove upon the Meſſieurs de Port-Royal that they have a ſecret intelligence with Geneva, he takes ſome propoſitions out of it, and compares them with thoſe of the miniſters ; but before he comes that length, he makes the following preamble ; ‘ Notwithſtanding that he who wrote the Apology for Saint-Cyran, and that the other Janſeniſts’ . . . .

. . . .

in the print, to the words (27) Il eſt excluſively.

(22) A manuſcript Memoir communicated by Mr Lancelot.

(23) See above remark [C].

(24) Taken from a manuſcript Memoir of Mr Lancelot.

(25) Meynier, le Port-Royal, & Geneve d'intelligence contre le très Sainct Sacrement de l'Autel, pag. 5, 6.

(26) Ibid. p. 6.

(27) Ibid. p. 14.

SAINT-CYRE was one of the brave men of the Proteſtant party under the reign of Charles IX. His name was Tanneguy Bouchet de Puy-Greffier [A]. He was one of the heads of what is called the conſpiracy of Amboiſe (a) ; and after the battle of Dreux he was appointed governor of Orleans, upon advice that the royal army deſigned to beſiege it (b). He brought the troops of Guienne to the Prince of Condé after the battle of St Denys (c), and was killed in that of Moncontour, being one of the oldeſt and braveſt ſoldiers in France (d). We find a more particular account of his valour in d'Aubigné's Hiſtory. ‘ The conſternation of the Reformed, ſays he (e), was not ſo great, but that they rallied in large bodies and often charged thoſe who preſſed them hard, tho' they were cloſely purſued by the companies of the Marſhals de Camp, which had not fought. The chief glory of that running fight ought to be aſcribed to the Reiſters ; but Saint-Cyre Puy-Greffier ought to have a ſhare in it. That old man having rallied three troops of horſe in the wood of Mairé, and perceiving that by one charge he might

(a) D' Aubigné, Tom. i, pag. 125.

(b) Idem. p. 238.

(c) Caſtelnau, Memoir, livr. vi, chap. viii.

(d) They are la Popeliniere's words.

(e) Hiſtoire, livr. v, chap. xvii, pag. 437. ad ann. 1569.

[A] Tanneguy Bouchet de Puy-Greffier.] ‘ He was deſcended from John Bouchet, counſellor in the parliament of Paris in the year 1372, and afterwards admitted preſident into the grand chamber the 29th of April, 1389, originally of Auvergne, who was the father of John Sieur de Puy-Greffier in Poitou, paternal anceſtor of the Sieurs du Puy-Greffier de Sainte Gemme, and de Villiers-Charlemagne, and of this Tanneguy Bouchet (1),’ whom la Popeliniere by miſtake calls Du Bouchet (2). The eldeſt branch of that family ended in Frances Bouchet, lady de Puy Greffier, who married Artus de Coſſé Seigneur de Gonnor, Marſhal of France, and in another Frances Bouchet half ſiſter of the former, who married firſt Andrew de Foix lord d'Aſparoth, and then Francis de la Trimouille count Benaon (3). I ſhall mention, by the by, a ſmall adventure of Frances de Bouchet the wife of Artus de Coſſé. Her huſband was deprived, on her account of the office of Superintendant of the Finances, whereby he got the firſt year enough to pay all his debts, and as much money again as he owed (4) (§ α). He carried his wife to court to wait upon Catherine de Medicis. She was a country lady, who had never ſeen the court, and who was ſo ſimple as to thank her majeſty for the ſuperintendancy, as a favour whereby they had been enabled to pay their debts, and to get wealth. The marſhal, who heard this compliment, was provoked at his wife's folly ; but the queen was wonderfully pleaſed with ſo ingenuous a confeſſion, and that the lady had revealed enough to ruin her huſband (5), if he ſhould fall under the diſpleaſure of that princeſs.

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, p. 795.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 794.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Varillas, Charles IX, lib. vii, ad ann. 1567.

[(§ α) Brantome does not ſay that, for it was from him that Varillas borrowed the main of the ſtory. See his Homm. Ill. Fr. Tom. ii, in the Life of the Marſhal de Briſſac. REM. CRIT.]

(5) Varillas, ubi ſupra.

‘ might ſave the lives of a thouſand men, his miniſter, who contributed to this reſolution of his, adviſed him to harangue his ſoldiers. To brave men few words, ſaid Saint-Cyre: brethren and friends it is thus you muſt do: with that, armed as he was after the old French manner in armour, ſilvered over from head to foot, bare-faced, with a beard as white as ſnow, and aged eighty-five years, he advanced twenty paces before his troop, drove all the Marſhals de Camp before him, and ſaved many lives by his death.’ He was not leſs virtuous than valiant [B], as he ſhewed by his puniſhing adultery.

[B] He was not leſs virtuous . . . . . as he ſhewed by his puniſhing adultery.] The ſtory is very remarkable, Beza relates it in the following manner. On the 26th of March 1563, the Sieur de Saint-Cyre, otherwiſe called Puy-Greffier, who had been appointed governor of Orleans from the time that the Prince left that town, a good man and a great enemy to vice, cauſed a new and remarkable execution to be made in the perſons of Deſlandes Sieur du Moulin, formerly ſecretary to the king, and of Godard (§β) the wife of John Godin, lieutenant to the Provoſt-marſhal of Blois. Whilſt this Godin was in the army, du Moulin debauched his wife at Orleans, for which crime he was hanged with her in the ſquare du Martroy: which being told at court appeared ſo ſtrange, that many were not aſhamed to ſay, that if there was nothing elſe in the Reformed Religion, they would be ſure not to embrace it (6). The reflexion is very ingenious: and indeed how can a man be ſafe in a religion, which does not refer to GOD the puniſhment of adulterers, but delivers them up to the ſecular power to be puniſhed with death? This is ſufficient to put a great many people out of conceit with a religion; it is worſe than the condemnation of Polygamy, which kept ſome infidels from embracing Chriſtianity. Leſt any one ſhould ſuſpect the author I have quoted, I ſhall cite another, who was not a Proteſtant, and who relates the thing in a very pompous manner. ‘ Pridie judicium non hujus ſæculi nec tunc ſecundum Franciæ mores, ubi adulterium non puniri magni nominis Juriſconſultus Joan. Faber olim dixit, Aureliani latum eſt contra Landam Molinum, qui Godardam Jo. Godini uxorem dum vir in caſtris eſſet corrupiſſe convictus, ad mortem damnatus eſt, amboque Landa & Godarda in publica platea laqueo ſuſpenſi ſunt, Pigreferio priſci moris ac ſeveritatis viro qui à Condæo urbi præpoſitus fuerat judicium urgente, & graſſantibus vitiis exemplo opus eſſe dictitante; quod tamen in aula adeo male acceptum eſt, ut plerique ſumma impudentia palam teſtarentur ſe à Proteſtantibus ſemper alienos futuros, & vel ob eam cauſſam nunquam in eorum verba juraturos eſſe, qui adulteriis hucuſque impunitis nova & apud nos inaudita ſeveritate pœnam capitis ſtatuerent (7). - - - On the day before, a ſentence not ſuitable to the cuſtoms of the preſent age, nor at that time to thoſe of France, where, according to the great Civilian Faber, adultery is not puniſhed, was paſſed at Orleans upon du Moulin; who being convicted of having debauched Godarde the wife of John Godin, during her huſband's abſence in the army, was condemned to death; and both he and ſhe were publickly hanged; Puy-Greffier, a man of primitive manners and ſeverity, who had been appointed governor of the city by the Prince of Condé, inſiſting upon it, and affirming that the raging vices of the time required ſuch an example to be made. It was nevertheleſs ſo ill taken at court, that moſt people openly declared with the higheſt impudence, that they would always hate the Proteſtants, and never would embrace their religion, if it were for no other reaſon but this that they made a capital crime of adultery, which before that time had not been ſo much as puniſhed.’ Thoſe courtiers were in the right to ſay that Puy-Greffier's ſeverity was out of faſhion; nay, the Civilian Faber, quoted by Thuanus, expreſsly ſays (8), that it was never heard that any body had been puniſhed for adultery in France. Few people were able to refrain ſaying in that reſpect, let us beware of innovations (9). It muſt alſo be granted that this ſeverity was not of long continuance among the Proteſtants, according to the maxim, nullum violentum durabile. It laſted longer at Geneva (10); but at laſt it vaniſhed away: and it may be ſaid in general to the ſhame of Chriſtians, that they have ſuffered the penal laws, which many Pagan nations had enacted againſt adultery, to be aboliſhed time out of mind. There is hardly any crime which oftner eſcapes with impunity than that: whoever proſecutes any perſon for it, muſt rather expect to be the talk of the town, and to be laughed at by every body, than to have a good iſſue in his cauſe. I do not pretend to approve in every thing the penal laws of the Heathens on this head; for what could be more horrid than the cuſtom, which Theodoſius ſuppreſſed at Rome? Women guilty of adultery were condemned to live in little cells, and to proſtitute themſelves to all comers; and to make every one ſenſible that the puniſhment was executed, little bells were rung during the time of the execution (11).

Any one, who compares Thuanus's words with the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Briſſonius's book, ad legem Juliam de adulteriis, will wonder that this great Hiſtorian ſhould ſpeak of the impunity of adultery, as he does; for it will appear that Briſſonius, dedicating his book the 29th of November 1557, to Chriſtopher de Thou, preſident in the parliament of Paris, and the Hiſtorian's Father, praiſes him for having cauſed ſome perſons guilty of that ſin to be puniſhed; and adds, that this public example was applauded by all good men, which put the author upon writing a commentary on the law which that magiſtrate had revived. His words deſerve to be recited: ‘ (12) Superioribus temporibus hac Satyrici poëtæ querella aures noſtræ perſonavere, Ubi nunc lex Julia dormis (13)? Inſederat videlicet imperitorum animis ridicula quidem, ſed tamen quæ maximam ad nequitiam feneſtram patefecerat opinio, adulterorum in Gallia impunita eſſe peccata, qua paſſim corruptis moribus laudi jam duci, & in pretio haberi id vitii cœperat. Hanc tu Reipub. pernicioſam opinionem editis non ita dudum de aliquot adulteris exemplis eripuiſti, perfeciſtique, ut non tam puniendi voluntatem, quàm accuſatores majoribus noſtris antehac defuiſſe judicemus. Quod ſpectaculum cùm maximus bonorum omnium plauſus conſecutus eſſet, hinc me laudum tuarum, ad quas hunc cumulum acceſſiſſe valde gaudebam, recordatione incenſum res ipſa admonuit, ut antiquam de adulteriis coërcendis ab Auguſto latam legem, quæ quaſi poſtliminio in uſum rediret, in ordinem digererem, & interpretatione adhibita illuſtrarem. - - - - In former times our ears rung with this complaint of the ſatirical Poet, Why ſleeps the Julian Law? For ignorant minds were poſſeſſed with an opinion that adultery was not puniſhed in France; which opinion, ridiculous as it was, opened a wide door for all ſort of wickedneſs; and an univerſal corruption of manners being thereby introduced, the ſaid vice begun to be highly eſteemed and praiſed. But you, Sir, have put an end to this pernicious opinion by making an example of ſome adulterers not long ago, and you have convinced us that it was not a will to puniſh but accuſers that were wanting to our forefathers. This public example was greatly extolled by all good men, and being excited by the praiſes given you, (to which I rejoiced to ſee ſuch a noble addition made) I was induced to digeſt into order, and comment upon, that old law of Auguſtus for the puniſhment of adulterers, which is now in a manner revived by you.’ It is very probable that notwithſtanding all the applauſes of good men, Chriſtopher de Thou relaxed, and that perceiving he could not put a ſtop to the corruption, he was obliged to let things take their uſual courſe. Hence it is that his ſon took no notice of that ſhort interruption of impunity. Briſſonius intimates, that if there had been accuſers in former times, the Judges of France would have made it appear that they were not unwilling to puniſh adulterers. Indeed I believe that the accuſers for this crime have been few; but the difficulty of proving ſuch an accuſation, and the ſhame that attends thoſe who carry the cauſe, are more than ſufficient to prevent moſt ſuits of that kind (14). Montagne has been quoted on this ſubject elſewhere (15). It muſt be confeſſed that it is not ſo much the connivance of the Magiſtrates, or the ſilence of Preachers, as the greatneſs of the evil, that prevents the execution of the laws. A Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Groningen publiſhed in 1663, a collection of Diſſertations, wherein he ſays, that the Divines of Straſ-

---

[(β§) Mr Bayle has not obſerved that Godard being a Maſculin name, we ought to read here Godarde, agreeable to the Latin Godardam, of Thuanus who had conſulted the Errata of Beza's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. REM. CRIT.]

(6) Beza, Hiſtoire Eccleſ. livr. vi, towards the end, pag. 336.

(7) Thuanus, lib. xxxv. init ad ann 1563.

(8) In § ex non ſcripto Inſt. de jur. nat.

(9) See the advertiſement prefixed to the Catechiſm of the Jeſuits (§ γ).

[(§ γ) It muſt be the ſecond edition of this Catechiſm, in 16mo, printed in Holland in the year 1678. For the firſt edition in 8vo, ſaid to be printed at Villefranche 1602, does not contain this Advertiſement. As to what concerns the ſaying mentioned in remark [B], it is in the Confeſſion of Sanci, lib. i, ch. viii. where d'Aubigné puts it in the mouth of a Subprior of St Antony. REM CRIT.]

(10) See the Critique generale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme, againſt Maimbourg, Letter ix.

(11) Socrates, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. v, cap. xviii, See the article BABELOT. remark [C].

(12) Barn. Briſſon. Epiſt. Dedicat. ſingularis Libri ad legem Juliam de adulteriis.

(13 Juven. Sat. II, ver. 37.

(14) See the new Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, pag. 588. & ſeq.

(15) Ibid. p. 539.

bourg prevailed about thirty years before with the magiſtrates, to inflict a capital puniſhment on adulterers; and he wiſhes the Reformed Divines of the Low-Countries would not expreſs ſo much zeal againſt dancing, as againſt the too great indulgence for adultery. He fancies that if they had thundered to purpoſe againſt that abuſe, they would, with God's bleſſing upon their endeavours, have engaged the magiſtrates to inflict a more ſevere puniſhment than a fine. (16) Qui (Theologi) ſi æque fervide à pluribus jam annis detonuiſſent in adulterium, (quod, pro dolor! per totum Belgium pecuniaria duntaxat mulcta expiatur) ex Dei benedictione, dubio procul, jam diu à ſuis Superioribus conſecuti fuiſſent, quod ex voto obtigit, ante annos ferme triginta, Theologis Auguſtanæ Confeſſionis, Argentinæ Evangelicam doctrinam annunciantibus: qui, licet non ſubduxerunt Auditoribus ſuis temperatis in nuptiis choreas, à Magiſtratu tamen impetrarunt gladium adulterii vindicem. Had he been a miniſter, he would have found the difficulty of that advice.

(16) Mart. Schoockius Exercitat. xvi. pag. 321.

SAINTE-ALDEGONDE (Philip de Marnix Lord du Mont) born at Bruſſels [A], in the year 1538, made himſelf famous by his employments and writings. He fled into Germany when liberty of conſcience was ſuppreſſed by the Spaniards in the Netherlands, and at Heidelberg he had the office of counſellor in the Eccleſiaſtical council conferred upon him. He returned into his own country in the year 1572 to employ his talents for the ſupport of liberty and the intereſt of the Reformed Religion [B]. He was very much eſteemed by the Prince of Orange, to whom he did ſeveral important ſervices, not ſo much by his ſword as by his words [C]. He was one of the deputies, ſent by the States into England in 1575, to deſire Queen Elizabeth's protection. Three years after he was ſent by the Arch-duke Matthias to the diet of Worms, where he made a very

[A] Born at Bruſſels.] I would not affirm it, if Melchior Adam was the only author that ſays ſo; for I find he adds to it a falſity, whereby one might be apt to think that he was not rightly informed. He ſays that the father and mother of Philip de Marnix were natives of Burgundy, and retired to Bruſſels (1). This is not true: Sainte-Aldegonde anſwering a writer, who called him a foreigner of Burgundy, ſays, Not one of my anceſtors was a native of Burgundy, that I know of; and it is notorious that I was born, educated, and allied, in this country. And likewiſe my father was born, brought up, and allied in it; ſo that except my grand-father and his predeceſſors, who were natives of Savoy, all my paternal and maternal anceſtors were born in the Low-Countries (2). The reaſon therefore why I affirm that he was born at Bruſſels, is becauſe Verheiden ſays ſo (3), without adding any of the falſities that are found in Melchior Adam. Note, that Moreri in copying theſe falſities has rather increaſed them, for he is more particular, and ſays that the parents of our Philip were natives of the county of Burgundy. It ſeems that Swertius and Valerius Andreas knew not that Philip de Marnix was born in the Netherlands: their ignorance of this is ſurpriſing, ſince they knew this author by his controverſial books (4). Had they known his native country, they would have placed him in the catalogue of the writers of the Netherlands: they do not uſe to leave out the Proteſtant authors.

[B] He returned into his country in the year 1572, to employ his talents . . . . . for the intereſt of the Reformed Religion.] Since Verheiden and Melchior Adam knew nothing of the circumſtances of his return, it will not be improper for me to ſupply what they have omitted. Sainte-Aldegonde ſoon after he left the Low-Countries on account of religion, was admitted into the ſervice of the Elector Palatine; but William Prince of Orange, who looked upon him as a man well qualified for his deſigns, deſired him of the Elector: which was granted him firſt for two months, and then for two more, and at laſt for ſo long as he ſhould want him; only the ſaid Elector reſerved to himſelf the liberty of recalling him, when he ſhould think fit (5). Sainte-Aldegonde gives this account to ſhew that he followed the Prince of Orange only as his private miniſter and ſervant, and not as a member of the States, or to intrude into the adminiſtration of public affairs. And therefore, ſays he, if I have been employed in public affairs, either in the name, and by order of the States, or otherwiſe, it was always at his deſire, and to pay him a due obedience as I was ordered by my firſt maſter. I will alſo mention what has been omitted concerning the perſecutions he went through, before he fled into Germany. I was, ſays he (6), outlawed, baniſhed, deprived of my eſtate, and expoſed to the hatred and abuſes of my friends and relations; and at laſt I lay in priſon a year under the Duke of Alva and the commander Requeſenes; and during that confinement I prayed to GOD every night at leaſt for the ſpace of three months, as if it had been the laſt night of my life, knowing that the ſaid Duke of Alva had twice ordered that I ſhould be put to death in priſon. Obſerve that it had been objected to him, that he had been in the ſervice of the Ducheſs of Parma: but he anſwered (7) that he never had any thoughts of going into the ſervice of that lady, nor ever frequented her court, ſeeing that during the ſpace of ſix years, ſince his return from Geneva till the beginning of the troubles, he had concealed himſelf, as it were, under the croſs of the perſecutions, which were at that time very violent.

[C] . . . . Not ſo much by his ſword as by his words.] Melchior Adam, from whom I have taken the greateſt part of the text of this article, is my author for this. Quo in loco, ſaith he (8), non tam fortiter gerendo, quam imitatione Cyneæ cordatè loquendo, non poſtremum patriæ libertatis propugnatorem ſe declaravit. He could write and ſpeak well, and was a ſcholar and a man of parts: his ſervices were particularly memorable on account of thoſe qualifications. It was he who drew up the formulary of the famous confederacy in the year 1566, by which ſeveral great men of the Low-Countries engaged to oppoſe the Inquiſition (9). Brederode, who was the head of that league, made him treaſurer of it (10). Sainte-Aldegonde ſpoke in the name of the Prince of Orange in the aſſembly of Dort, compoſed of the deputies of all the towns, in the year 1572 He made a lively deſcription of the calamities of the country, and prevailed with that aſſembly to come to a reſolution of oppoſing the tyrants. Ibidem ejus orator Dominus de Sancta Aldegonde effuſam de principis pio affectu, patriæ neceſſitate, Hiſpanorum tyrannide declamationem pronunciat, ac civitates novo bello contra Regem, regis tamen nomine uſurpato illaqueat (11). The Spaniards dreaded that Orator and Negotiator ſo much, that the Duke of Parma gave expreſs orders to obſerve him narrowly in the conferences held at Cologn in the year 1579. Monens interim ut Coloniam adventantem Philippum Marnixium . . . . ſedulo obſervaret, ab eoque uti ab homine impie callido ſibi præcaveret (12). The Proteſtant readers knowing the character of the man, who abuſes Sainte-Aldegonde in this laſt paſſage, will never have a worſe opinion of him. He aſſiſted at the pacification of Ghent, in the name of the Prince of Orange and of the nobility of Holland and Zealand in the year 1576 (13). He was ſent to Bruſſels the year following; but we ought not to credit what is ſaid by the Hiſtorians of the contrary party, that it was to attempt upon the liberty of Don Juan of Auſtria (14). He was taken by the Spaniards, at the Hague in the year 1573 (15), and it being feared that ſuch a priſoner, who was very prejudicial to them, would meet with very ill uſage, the Prince of Orange ſent them word that he would in the ſtricteſt manner uſe repriſals againſt the Count de Boſſu (16). The year following Mondragon being forced to capitulate at Middelburg, offered to ſet Sainte-Aldegonde and three other priſoners at liberty, provided the capitulation he demanded, ſhould be granted him. Se apud Requeſenium effecturum ut captivus Aldegundius (quod avebat Orangius) treſque inſuper alii Aldegundii arbitratu remitterentur in Zelandiam intra ſex menſes (17). That agreement was accepted and executed: which I obſerve, to ſhew how much our Philip de Marnix was conſidered. He was to have the choice of three priſoners, who were to be ſet a very fine ſpeech, and boldly deſcribed the Spaniſh tyranny [D]. He was one of the plenipotentiaries, whom the States ſent into France in the year 1580, to offer the ſovereignty of their provinces to the Duke of Alençon [E]. He was conſul to Antwerp in 1584, when that town was beſieged by the Duke of Parma. In the year 1593 he conducted into the Palatinate the Princeſs Louiſa Juliana (a), who had been betrothed to the Elector Frederic IV (b). The books he publiſhed [F] were not the leaſt ſervice he did: ſome of them were on Politics, and others on Controverſy; ſome were ſerious, and others comical: the latter proved moſt uſeful [G]: his very ſongs procured a great advantage

---

(1) Bruxellis . . . è parentibus Burgundicis qui eo conceſſerant. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Juriſc. pag. 333.

(2) Sainte-Aldegonde, Reſponſe apologetique au Libelle intitulé Antidote, fol. A. 5. verſo.

(3) Verheiden, in Elog. preſtantium aliquot Theolog. pag. 141.

(4) They mention them ſpeaking of Michael Baïus, and the Jeſuit John David, who wrote againſt Sainte-Aldegonde.

(5) Sainte-Aldegonde, Reſponſe apologetique, fol. D 3.

(6) Id. ibid. in the next leaf to B 5.

(7) Id. ibid. fol. D 5.

(8) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Juriſc. pag. 333.

(9) Strada de Bello Belgico, Decad. I, lib. v, pag. m. 205.

(10) Brederodius coactores nominat & Philippum Marnixium . . . ærarium Queſtorem creat. Id. ib. pag. 291, ad ann. 1566.

(11) De ortu & progreſſu Calvin. Reformat. lib. ii, §. iv, pag. 47.

(12) Strada. ubi ſupra, Dec. II, lib. ii, pag. 127.

(13) Thuan. lib. lxii, pag. m. 163.

(14) Strada, ubi ſupra, lib. ix, pag. 527, 530. ad ann. 1577.

(15) Id. ibid. lib. vii, pag. 451.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 452.

(17) Id. ibid. lib. viii, pag. 460, ad ann. 1574.

ſet at liberty with him. The States deſigned in 1587 to ſend him to the conferences about a peace with Spain (18); but having reſolved to continue the war, his deputation proved a meer project.

[D] He made a very fine ſpeech, and boldly deſcribed the Spaniſh tyranny.] Thuanus ſays it was printed and anſwered. ‘ Eo à Matthia miſſus Phil. Marnixius
‘ Santaldegondanus orationem mire liberam ad VII
‘ viros & imperii principes, qui aderant, Nonis Maii
‘ habuit, qua deplorato miſerabili Belgii ſtatu, & Al-
‘ bani Auſtriique tyrannide acerbis verbis exagitata
‘ Imperii opem imploravit; quippe commune Belgii
‘ cum Imperio periculum eſſe, prædixitque fore, ut
‘ belli incendium, niſi ſiſtatur, ſe latius ſpargat, &
‘ Coloniam, Monaſterium, Emdam, aliaſque vicinas
‘ civitates, quas ex Albani conſilio Hiſpani ſub jugum
‘ mittere jampridem decreverint, olim complectatur,
‘ proinde rogat . . . . . ad eam orationem publicatam
‘ poſtea contraria oratione Calidii Chryſopolytani no-
‘ mine Lucemburgi edita reſponſum eſt, quæ tota in ‘ exagitanda Belgarum in Deum ac principem ſuum ‘ rebellione occupatur (19). - - Phil. Marnix of Sainte- ‘ Aldegonde, who was ſent thither by Matthias on the ‘ 7th of May, made an exceeding bold ſpeech to the Electors
‘ and the Princes of the empire, who were preſent, in ‘ which having deplored the miſerable condition of the ‘ Netherlands, and inveighed againſt the tyranny of the ‘ Duke of Alva and the houſe of Auſtria, he implored
‘ their aſſiſtance, as the empire lay equally expoſed with
‘ the Netherlands to the danger, and foretold that the ‘ fire of the war, unleſs it was ſtopped, would ſpread
‘ wider and include Cologn, Munſter, Embden, and other ‘ neighbouring cities, which the Spaniards, by the advice
‘ of Alva, had long ago reſolved to bring under ſubjection.
‘ He therefore aſked . . . . . This ſpeech being publiſhed,
‘ it was anſwered by one printed at Luxemburgh under
‘ the name of Claudius Chryſopolitanus; which is entire- ‘ ly taken up in expoſing the rebellion of the Netherlanders
‘ againſt GOD and their ſovereign.’ Note that this ſpeech was tranſlated into Dutch verſe by Baptiſt Hovart (20), and that Cornelius Looſe, a native of Tergow, was the perſon who anſwered it (21).

[E] To offer the ſovereignty of their provinces to the Duke of Alençon.] Melchior Adam has forgot to tell us that Sainte-Aldegonde followed that prince into England in the year 1581, and wrote to the States the falſe news of his marriage with Queen Elizabeth. It is an example, which Mr de Wicquefort ſets before the eyes of ambaſſadors, in order to ſhew how cautious they ought to be in writing news. ‘ Sometimes, ſays
‘ he (22), one cannot believe his own eyes. Vidit
‘ aut vidiſſe putat. - - - i. e. he ſaw or imagines that ‘ he ſaw. The Sieur de Sainte-Aldegonde, who was ‘ agent for the ſtates of the Low-Countries at the court
‘ of England in the year 1581, being one evening in ‘ the queen's chamber, ſaw her diſcourſing with the ‘ Duke of Alençon. The lords and ladies were at ſo
‘ great a diſtance from them that they could have no ‘ ſhare in their converſation; but every body was ‘ witneſs to a thing, from which one might draw a ‘ very great conſequence. The queen taking a ring
‘ from her finger, put it on the duke's, who quickly ‘ went out with great chearfulneſs and ſatisfaction, as ‘ having obtained an earneſt and a pledge of his mar‘ riage. Sainte-Aldegonde, who looked upon this ‘ action as a thing of the greateſt importance to his ‘ maſters, gave them notice of it by an expreſs he ‘ diſpatched that very ſame night. All the towns of ‘ the Low-Countries expreſſed their joy for a piece of ‘ news, that proved falſe, by the ringing of bells, the ‘ firing of guns, and the lighting of bonefires. The ‘ queen blamed Sainte-Aldegonde for being ſo haſty
‘ in giving notice of a thing, the truth of which he ‘ might have known in a few hours.’

[F] The books he publiſhed.] Meurſius gives a catalogue of them: it contains Theſes aliquot de Eccleſiæ atque Eccleſiaſticarum traditionum κειτηρίῳ ſeu certa norma. Item de ſacramento cœnæ dominicæ. Reſponſio ad Michaelis Baii regii Profeſſoris Lovanienſis apologiam. Epiſtola conſolatoria ad fratres exules Brabantos, Flandros, Hannones, Arteſios, alioſque Belgas peregrinis in regionibus ob puram Evangelii doctrinam diſperſos. Tractatus de cœna Domini ad Galliarum Regis ſororem Lotharingiæ Duci nuptam. Contra libertinos. Apologetica reſponſio contra anonymum quendam libertinum (23). To theſe may be added, ſays Meurſius, ſeveral pieces publiſhed at different times, admonitiones, declarationes, tractatus, conſilia, diſputationes, conſolationes, interpretationes, and ſeveral anonymous writings. His deſign was to refute the Romiſh controverſiſts, and to raiſe enemies to the King of Spain. I leave you to judge whether having the talent of writing with great facility, he did not diſperſe many pamphlets about the tranſactions of the time. He did then what Baron Liſola has done ſince. Note that it has been ſaid he was lucky in gueſſing the deſigns of the Spaniards, and that therefore the alarms he raiſed againſt their ambitious projects were not without ground. ‘ Prudentiæ ‘ & hiſtoriæ cognitio quanta in eo fuerit, ſcriptum il-
‘ lud declarat, in quo agit de Hiſpanorum ſcopo, ad
‘ quem ſua ipſi tela dirigunt; qui Monarchiam ſibi
‘ præfigentes, nihil non auſint. In eodem tanquam
‘ vates prognoſticis politicis multa prædixit: quæ eve-
‘ niſſe Britannia, Polonia, Gallia, aliæque regiones
‘ teſtantur (24). - - - His great knowledge in Politics
‘ and Hiſtory appears from that treatiſe, wherein he con-
‘ ſiders the chief aim which the Spaniards have in view:
‘ who in order to bring about their ſcheme of univerſal
‘ monarchy leave nothing unattempted. In the ſame trea-
‘ tiſe, like a prophet or political Prognoſticator, he fore- ‘ told many things which have actually come to paſs, as ‘ Great Britain, Poland, France, and other countries
‘ can teſtify.’

[G] . . . . . His comical books were moſt uſeful.] He publiſhed in Dutch the Romiſh Hive, Alvearium Romanum, in the year 1571, and dedicated it to Francis Sonnius Biſhop of Boiſleduc, one of the chief Inquiſitors of the Low-Countries (25). That book, full of comical ſtories, was wonderfully applauded by the people, and proved more prejudicial to the church of Rome, than a ſerious and learned work would have been. Nay, it is ſaid to have put many people upon examining more ſtrictly the controverted points of religion, and detecting the errors of the church of Rome: Eraſmus's colloquies had produced the ſame effect:
‘ Hoc ſcriptum . . . . eſt varietate hiſtoriarum, & acu-
‘ mine ſententiarum refertiſſimum: jocis facetiiſque in ‘ Papiſtarum theatrales nugas & fabulas mire condi-
‘ tum: adeò ut lectoribus iſtorum temporum præci-
‘ puè, ſingularem attulerit voluptatem: & occaſionem
‘ multis præbuerit, de religione Chriſtiana ſeriò co-
‘ gitandi. Et hic liber ut populari applauſu acceptus, ‘ ſic non ſine fructu plurimorum lectus, plus rei Bel-
‘ gicæ illa tempeſtate in religionis negocio profuit;
‘ quàm eruditi aliquot commentarii (26). - - - This ‘ book . . . . is full of ſtories and witty ſayings: it is ‘ wonderfully ſeaſoned with jokes and facetious remarks
‘ upon the theatrical tales and trifles of the Roman ‘ Catholics: ſo that to the readers of thoſe times eſpe- ‘ cially, it gave an extraordinary pleaſure, and put ‘ many upon thinking ſeriouſly of the Chriſtian Re- ‘ ligion. As this book was received with general ap- ‘ plauſe, ſo the reading of it produced good effects,
‘ and it did more ſervice to the Low-Countries in the ‘ buſineſs of religion than ſome learned commentaries.’
He wrote a book of the ſame nature in French, which was printed ſoon after he died, with this title, ‘ Ta-
‘ bleau des differens de la religion. - - - - A picture
‘ of religious differences.’ He is very merry in it, and brings in a poſſe of jokes and quibbles; and yet alledges very pertinent reaſons. This work proved as ſucceſsful as the Alvearium. The greateſt part

---

(a) Daughter to the Prince of Orange William the firſt of that name.

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam. in Vitis Juriſconſ. pag. 333, & ſeq.

(18) Idem. Dec. II, lib. ix, pag. 627.

(19) Thuan. lib. lxvi, pag. 239. ad ann. 1578.

(20) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 336.

(21) Placcius, de Pſeudonymis, pag. 172.

(22) Wicquefort, Traité de l'Ambaſſadeur, book ii, pag. m. 228, 229. See alſo Strada, ubi ſupra, Dec. II, lib. iv. pag. 248. ad ann. 1581.

(23) Meurſius, Athenæ Batavæ, pag. 180.

(24) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 335.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 336.

(26) Id. ibid.

advantage to the new republic [H].. He tranſlated the Pſalms of David out of Hebrew into Dutch verſe; but that tranſlation was not made uſe of in churches [I]. He was employed about a Dutch tranſlation of the Scripture, when he died at Leyden the fifteenth of December 1598 (c). He had a little before made a journey into France about the prince's affairs (d). He did not eſcape ſlander [K], and it it ſaid that his retreat was the life of the ſtories are the ſame in both. Vaſt numbers of people diverted themſelves with examining this picture, and were more confirmed in their belief thereby than if they had read the beſt work of Calvin. Thuanus did not approve this way of handling controverſy. I have ſeen, ſaid he (27), Philip de Marnix de Sainte-Aldegonde at the ſiege of Paris, and I lodged three months in the ſame houſe with him . . . . . he was a polite man, but there was no great matter in him. He was chancellor of Gelderland (28). He treats of religion in the ſtile of Rabelais, which is very ill done. John David a Jeſuit publiſhed another Alvearium in Dutch to confute that of Sainte-Aldegonde, which he called a moſt pernicious book (29). He knew well enough that the moſt dangerous way of writing againſt a doctrine is to turn it into ridicule.

[H] His very ſongs procured a great advantage to the new Republic.] I might have cited, above, Verheiden inſtead of Melchior Adam, who only tranſcribes him; but I thought it an indifferent thing, provided I ſhould once point out the original. I take another way here, and ſet down the words of Verheiden. ‘Ab hoc Viro, ſaith he (30), etiam profecta dicitur decantata illa CANTILENA compoſita in laudem PRINCIPIS GUILIELMI Naſſavii, Ad Belgas Tyrannide Albani oppreſſos edita. Quæ quidem Cantilena ita ſcite facta, ita concinnis rhythmis moduliſque ſuis eſt attemperata, ut plebis animos mire ad Principis, Libertatiſque Patriæ amorem excitaverit. In hoc igitur SANCT-ALDEGONDIUS ſe alterum quaſi TYRTÆUM, toties à Platone laudatum, oſtendit. Nam cum PRINCIPIS Fortiſſimi laudes, hortamenta virtutis, damnorum ſolatia, ſalutariaque conſilia contineat; magnum ardorem defendendi PRINCIPIS PATRIÆQUE LIBERTATIS populo injecit: adeo ut nihil illis temporibus convenientius prodiiſſe judicare liceat. - - - To the ſame author is aſcribed that famous ballad, which contains a panegyric upon William Prince of Orange, and was publiſhed in Holland while that country was oppreſſed by the tyranny of the Duke of Alva. That ſong was ſo artfully contrived, and ſo well compoſed in its rhimes and notes, that it ſtirred up in the minds of the people a wonderful affection for the prince and the liberty of their native country. By this therefore Sainte-Aldegonde proved himſelf to be, as it were, another Tyrtæus, whom Plato ſo often commends. For by celebrating the praiſes of ſo heroic a prince, by exhorting the people to behave valiantly, by comforting them for the loſſes they had ſuſtained, and by intermixing wholſome advices, he inſpired them with a great zeal for the defence of the Prince and the liberty of their country. So that we may juſtly affirm that nothing could be publiſhed more ſuitable to the circumſtances of thoſe times.’ He is in the right to ſay, that nothing could better fit the circumſtances of the time, than a pretty ſong full of invectives againſt the Duke of Alva, and of encomiums on the Prince of Orange. The deſign of erecting ſome provinces of the King of Spain into a common-wealth required many things, and particularly a continual application to prevent the ſuggeſtions of thoſe, who might have repreſented that it was almoſt impoſſible to hold out againſt ſo potent a monarch, that the charges neceſſary to carry on the war againſt him would very much exceed what he exacted from them, and that therefore it was a great piece of folly to ſpend one's All rather than bear an impoſt (31). This might have been confuted by a thouſand good reaſons, and it was of great moment to make the people ſenſible of it both from the pulpit and in books: but nothing was more proper for ſuch a deſign than a ſong; for it is a thing that remains imprinted in the mind, and every body, even the peaſants and ſervant-maids, daily repeat it with great joy and ſatisfaction. We have here therefore one of the moſt important ſervices of Philip de Marnix. This puts me in mind of the ſong about the Scalado, which the Genevois ſing in their houſes on the anniverſary day, as a thing almoſt eſſential to that ceremony. I am ſure that at firſt the impreſſions made by this ſong in the minds of the people, ſurpaſſed all others (§ α).

[(§ α) Mr Bayle does not tell us that it was Theodore Beza who, in his very old age, made the ſong upon the Scalado of Geneva. REM. CRIT.]

[I] That tranſlation of the Pſalms was not made uſe of in churches.] He affected to uſe none but Dutch words, and acted quite contrary to the other Poets of his nation, who inſerted in their pieces a vaſt many words taken from the French. His tranſlation was better than that which was ſung in churches; nevertheleſs it was not admitted. Thus in France the old verſion of Marot and Beza was preferred to that of Mr Conrart, which ſome had a mind to introduce. I ſhall ſet down a paſſage of Melchior Adam (32): ‘Id opus hactenus aliquoties typis publicatum, ſed nunquam communi concionatorum conſenſu eſt receptum: cum contrà verſio alterius à tot millibus ediſcatur. Nimirum

Pro captu lectoris habent ſua fata libelli.

‘That work has been printed ſeveral times, but was never yet received by the common approbation of the miniſters: whereas the other tranſlation is conned over by ſo many thouſands. The reaſon is becauſe,

Books have their fate, ſucceeding well or ill
Juſt in proportion to the reader's ſkill.

Here follows another paſſage, whereby it appears that Philip de Marnix, the better to introduce his verſion, made it, as much as ever he could, like that which was already uſed. Mr Conrart had the ſame precaution, but to no purpoſe (33): people were too much uſed to the common tranſlations. ‘Ante complures annos diſplicuit nonnullis apud Belgas nimius ille à textu Scripturæ per laxiores paraphraſes metricas receſſus: præſertim Pſalmorum Datheni, qui ex Pſalmis Gallicis Maroti & Bezæ expreſſi erant. Verſavit hæc cura inter alios nobiliſſ. Marnixium montis Sanct-Aldegondis Dominum; qui propterea novam paraphraſin rhythmo-metricam compoſuit, ſtrophis, lineis, ſyllabis, cum Datheni Pſalmis, pari paſſu euntem, ut cum illis in templis cantari, aut facile iis ſubſtitui poſſet. Sed cum Datheni Pſalmi jam memoriâ à pleriſque tenerentur, non viderunt Eccleſiæ, quomodo commodè & abſque aliquâ commotione plebis eccleſiaſticæ in publicis ſacris hic quicquam loco moveri poſſet (34). - - - A good many years ago ſome people in Holland were diſpleaſed with theſe looſe poetical paraphraſes, which varied too much from the text of Scripture; eſpecially with reſpect to the Pſalms of Dathenus, which had been formed upon the French Pſalms of Marot and Beza. Among others Philip de Marnix lord of Mount Sainte-Aldegonde employed himſelf this way, and compoſed a new paraphraſe in metre, exactly agreeing with the Pſalms of Dathenus in the ſtanza's, lines, and ſyllables, for this reaſon that it might be ſung along with them in the churches, or eaſily ſubſtituted in their room. But whereas moſt people had already got the Pſalms of Dathenus by heart, the churches did not ſee how they could conveniently and without giving ſome offence to the common people introduce any alteration in the public worſhip.’

[K] He did not eſcape ſlander.] Some inſtances of it may be ſeen in the words I have quoted out of Strada. But here is a more cutting ſtroke: that Jeſuit having ſaid that Sainte-Aldegonde was one of thoſe, who had been ordered to ſeize upon Don Juan of Auſtria by ſtratagem or by main force, adds: ‘Quod ſanè facinus etſi non abhorrebat à reliqua vita aut Aldegundii hominis ignominioſiſſimè nequam, qui Calvinum puer docentem audierat, ſenex jam alios ipſe docebat: aut Heſii . . . . tamen an illi re ipſa moliti hoc ſint, ut Auſtriacus multis authoribus exiſtimavit . . . . . affirmare non auſim (35). - - - - - Which wicked attempt, although it was no ways inconſiſtent with the reſt of the life either of Sainte-Aldegonde, a man of an infamous character, who in his youth had been Calvin's diſciple, and taught others in ‘his

(c) Melch Adam. ibid. pag. 334.

(d) See his Apologetical anſwer to the German gentleman. init.

(27) Thuana, pag. m. 39.

(28) I think Thuanus is miſtaken in this.

(29) Librum peſtilentiſſimum. Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 490.

(30) Verheiden, in Elogiis aliquot Theologor. pag. 145.

(31) Omnia dabant ne decimam darent.

(32) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 335.

(33) Note, that the church of Geneva and ſeveral others have at laſt laid aſide the old verſion of the Pſalms; but the Walloon churches have reſolved to keep it. See the remark [P], of the article MAROT.

(34) Giſbertus Voëtius de Politia Eccleſiaſt. Tom. i, p. 529.

(35) Strada de Bello Belg. Dec. I, lib. ix, pag. m. 527, 528, ad ann. 1577.

life of a man in diſgrace. He was ſtrangely perplexed when complaints were made that he exhorted

‘ his old age ; or of Heſius . . . . yet whether or no they ‘ did actually attempt ſuch a thing, as Don Juan of ‘ Auſtria, relying upon the authorities of many, believed, ‘ . . . . . I dare not poſitively affirm.’ I have a book printed at Cologn in 1673, with this title, De ortu & proceſſu Calvinianæ reformationis in Belgio: in quo exhibentur pacta & fœdera ibidem inita, & demonſtratur nullam eorum à Reformatoribus habitam eſſe rationem, Authore C. L. S. V. V. Sainte-Aldegonde is very ill uſed in it, and the author ſays, among other things, that whilſt he was endeavouring to undo the Catholics of the Netherlands in the diet of Worms, he made it his buſineſs to perſuade the ambaſſadors of the Emperor and of the Electors, that the Arch-duke Matthias had been invited by the inhabitants of that country to be the protector of the Romiſh religion, which was very much endangered by the Civil war. Belgas Archiducem Matthiam pro tuenda Catholica Romana religione ad Provinciarum regimen evocaſſe, præſertim cum illa inter civiles hoſce tumultus magnis motibus percelleretur (36). I ſhall obſerve by the by, that the author of that book was diſcovered, though he had taken all poſſible care to conceal himſelf. He was baniſhed upon that account, and his eſtate was confiſcated. He lived at Cologn under the protection of the Pope's Nuncio in 1678. I only ſay this upon the credit of the Italian Journaliſt (37). If what is ſaid of Sainte-Aldegonde in that book were true, it would be a trick of an ambaſſador, which he did not invent, and which is common enough (38). I have another book intituled, Antidote ou contrepoiſon contre les conſeils ſanguinaires & envenimez de Philippe de Marnix Sr. de Ste. Aldegonde, &c. - - - An antidote or counterpoiſon againſt the bloody and pernicious counſels of Philip de Marnix Sieur de Sainte-Aldegonde, contained in a book publiſhed by him againſt the ſpiritual zealots, whom he calls in his language Geeſtdryvers. Written in the form of a reſponſory letter by a German gentleman, a lover of peace and of the Belgic liberty. The time and place of the impreſſion and the Printer's name do not appear in it ; but one may know that it came out about the year 1598. The author of that book abuſes Sainte-Aldegonde in the following manner. ‘ (39) That ‘ advice puts me upon ſcanning your former actions, ‘ when I call to mind that it was not without cauſe ‘ that the States of Holland and Zealand would not ‘ permit you to come into their territories. You was ‘ then in deſpair by reaſon of the unfortunate murther ‘ of the late Prince of Orange of Glorious Memory, ‘ and becauſe the deſign at the dike of Cauweſtein ‘ miſcarried. Your conſcience was very much troubled, as miſtruſting GOD's power, till ſuch time ‘ as you had contrived that pretty ſurrender of Antwerp, and the pacification then concluded in the ‘ year 1584, and not contented with that great piece ‘ of ſervice done to the Duke of Parma, you made ‘ it your buſineſs in common diſcourſe to praiſe that ‘ prince, adviſing ſome to make a general peace, ‘ the better to conceal your own fault by the ruin ‘ and deſolation of a hundred thouſand poor afflicted ‘ people ; for you preſumed ſo much upon your ability as to pretend that you knew a way to make ‘ the ſaid duke revolt againſt his maſter, and by ‘ that means to procure a re-union of the ſeventeen ‘ Provinces. You boaſted that you had opened the ‘ matter to him in the time of the parliament of ‘ Beveren, when you had ſo many private diſcourſes ‘ with him in the preſence of all your colleagues, who ‘ are venerable men and ſome of the moſt illuſtrious ‘ in the ſaid town : which was too great an undertaking for ſuch a man as you are. I ſhall ſay nothing of your ill conduct in the government of that ‘ town, ſince you might have ſupplied it with ſufficient proviſions and ammunition for a ſiege of ſome ‘ years, conſidering the abſolute power you uſurped ‘ in it, and upon this not only the preſervation of ‘ that town, but, in a manner, that of the whole State, ‘ depended, witneſs the confuſion the Provinces were ‘ in when . . . . . . (40) This wiſe Prince of Orange, ‘ of Glorious Memory, was ſenſible, ſome years before he died, of your turbulent ſpirit, when he removed you by degrees from his council and perſon, leſt he ſhould ſome time or other find himſelf ‘ in a plunge, from the effects of this deteſtable advice of your's.’

Equity requires that we ſhould hear what Philip de Marnix anſwered to that German gentleman. ‘ Since ‘ the States-General, ſays he (41), who would not permit me to come into their territories, have not continued in their reſolution, but, on the contrary, have ‘ been willing that I ſhould be nearer them, have ‘ converſed with me above twelve years, and imparted to me many deſigns and ſecrets, and even conferred upon me honourable employments, ordering ‘ that I ſhould be well uſed, to give me thereby ‘ ſome marks of their affection ; do not you ſee that ‘ they have by that means cleared me of the calumnies, which ſlandering men, like you, had invented againſt me, though they durſt not open their ‘ mouths in my preſence? . . . . How dare you put a ‘ conſtruction upon what the States have done, quite ‘ contrary to their intention ? How dare you blame ‘ me, becauſe, in ſuch a critical time, they thought fit, ‘ for ſome particular reaſons, that I ſhould be abſent ‘ for ſome time, by reaſon of the ill reports that were ‘ ſpread againſt me ; it being impoſſible that a man ‘ in ſuch a poſt as I had, ſhould pleaſe every body. ‘ Eſpecially if it be conſidered, that, as they very well ‘ know, a falſe report went about, that I had prevented the reading of the Queen of England's letters at ‘ Antwerp ; at which ſome Engliſh ſoldiers were ſo ‘ exaſperated, that they ſwore they would kill me : ‘ but afterwards being informed of the truth of the ‘ matter, and even that I was going to the queen in ‘ order to clear my ſelf, they changed their mind. ‘ If therefore the States, for this, or ſome other conſideration, thought fit that I ſhould be abſent for ‘ ſome time, (for the letters of the States of Zealand ‘ alledged no other reaſon but the reports that went ‘ about me) how can you be ſo impudent as to defame me for a thing which redounds to my glory ‘ and honour ?’ Afterwards he gives a long liſt of the courageous actions performed by his order or counſels ſince the death of Prince William ; which ſhews that this aſſaſſination, which made him very uneaſy, did not throw him into deſpair, and deprive him of the uſe of his reaſon. He gives a particular account of his conduct during the ſiege of Antwerp ; he proteſts that he oppoſed, as long as he could, thoſe who were for capitulating, and that he and his twenty-one colleagues had all their inſtructions in writing (42), when they went out of the town to ſettle the conditions upon which it ſhould be ſurrendered. He ſays, that he made the enemies believe, that they had ſtill proviſions enough for ſeven or eight months, ſo that Mr Richardot, the ſecond day after he entered into the town, ſaid, when he ſaw what a condition it was in, that he had never been ſo much impoſed upon (43). He is very long in juſtifying himſelf as to the praiſes he had beſtowed upon the Duke of Parma. He ſays (44), that making a report to the great council of what had paſſed during the capitulation, he was obliged to ſet forth the reaſons alledged by the deputies of the Duke of Parma, to remove the miſtruſt that prevailed among the people. They had enlarged upon the virtues of that duke, and made an abridgment of his life, to ſhew that on all occaſions he had faithfully kept his treaties. Sainte-Aldegonde related what they had ſaid. Here follows an inſtance of popular injuſtice, and of the wrong conſtruction that is put upon things. ‘ This diſcourſe ‘ made in ſuch an aſſembly, and ſpread all over the ‘ town, was conſtrued by many, as if what I had related to have been ſpoken by the deputies of the ‘ Duke of Parma, had been my own opinion ; ſo ‘ that every body was ſaying that I had extolled the ‘ ſaid duke to the ſky : whereupon ſome miniſters ‘ (even ſome of thoſe, whom I took care to conſult before I did any thing) made me a ſharp remonſtrance, as if I had renounced my religion and my ‘ party. I confeſs that by an effect of human infirmity, I was more nettled at it than I ſhould have ‘ been ; ſo that my anſwer was attended with ſome ‘ marks of indignation. . . . . And becauſe I perceived, that, tho' I had ſatisfied them, the ſame report prevailed ſtill all over the town, and that many ‘ of thoſe, who envied and hated me, and who retired ‘ into Holland in crouds, triumphed over me upon ‘ that account, to the prejudice of my reputation ; I ‘ confeſs I was ſo moved with it, that, in my Apology, without remembring that I had related thoſe

‘ things,

(36) De ortu & proceſſu Calvin. Reform. in Belgio, lib. ii, §. ix, p. 78. He quotes Uytenbogartius Hiſtor. Eccleſ. Part. iii.

(37) See the VI Journal de Letterati 1678. in the extract of the book intituled, De ortu & proceſſu, &c.

(38) See the remark [B], in the article BELLAI (WILLIAM DU)

(39) Antidote, pag. 13, 14.

(40) Ibid. p. 15.

(41) Sainte Aldegonde, Reſponſe apologetique à un Libelle fameux qui a eſté publié par un certain libertin s'attiltrant Gentilhomme Allemand, &c. fol. B 3.

(42) Id. ibid. fol. C 2, verſo.

(43) Ibid. fol. C 3. verſo.

(44) Ibid. fol. C 4.

exhorted the States to perſecute the ſects [L]. I have read a book, wherein it is obſerved that things, as they were ſpoken by our enemies, (as I have ſaid already), I plainly and abſolutely maintained that there was no harm in praiſing our enemies, for ſuch things as are really commendable, and I mentioned ſeveral good qualities of the Duke of Parma. To which I was induced, not only by reaſon of the ſaid calumnies, but alſo by the neceſſity of the time, and becauſe I was in his power, together with the whole town; tho' I may truly ſay that I had ſtill other views (45).' I ſhall mention this new reaſon, becauſe it diſcovers to us a weakneſs, an artifice, and a corruption, which prevail in all places, and in all ages. ‘ I have always been of opinion, ſays Sainte-Aldegonde (46), that nothing can be more dangerous for the preſervation of a ſtate in hard and difficult times, than to deſpiſe one's enemy. For as Orators tell their ſcholars, that they ought never to fancy that their adverſaries want wit; ſo in point of war, it is very dangerous to think that our enemies are fooliſh and careleſs people. And yet many were apt to entertain ſuch thoughts, endeavouring to make every body believe that the Duke of Parma was a man of no prudence and ability in military affairs. An opinion, gentlemen, which might have proved very prejudicial to your ſtate, if your prudence had not prevented the ill effects of it, by looking for aſſiſtance every where. Since my return into Zealand, I have ſeldom ſaid any thing of the Duke of Parma, either to his advantage or diſadvantage, except when I was required to do it, by thoſe who had the power to command me; and then I told them what I truly thought of him. Thus much for the praiſes beſtowed on the duke, which have been laid to my charge by ſo many people. Wherein I believe I have done nothing but what I was obliged to do by the neceſſity of the times, and by my concern for the preſervation of the town, and of the churches that were in it.'

Here you ſee a great difference between thoſe, who are altogether for countenancing popular prejudices, and thoſe who reaſon equitably and ſolidly. The latter think themſelves obliged in juſtice and good policy not to give a wrong account of the forces, valour, and good conduct, of the enemy: the former are for telling impudent lies about thoſe things. Not but that they are ſenſible that ſuch lies may be prejudicial in ſome reſpects; but they rather chuſe to indulge by ſuch means their own paſſions and thoſe of the people; and becauſe they take them to be more advantageous than detrimental, conſidering the humour of the populace, they do not approve of ſincerity, and if any one practiſes it, they impudently charge him with treaſon.

I omit the apology relating to the letter written by Sainte-Aldegonde to the Lord de Meetkercke, concerning a general peace. He vindicates himſelf by laying the fact open, and ſhewing the drift of his deſign, and he confeſſes that ſome falſe and fooliſh reports went about it. I likewiſe omit what concerns his being accuſed of neglecting to ſupply Antwerp with proviſions, &c. I think he fully juſtifies himſelf as to theſe articles. Let us ſee what concerns his being told in a reproachful manner that he had been excluded from affairs, and had made himſelf ſuſpected by Prince William. We ſhall ſee in his anſwer ſeveral particulars belonging to his hiſtory (47). ‘ After the death of the ſaid elector, and even after the departure of the king's brother (48), having earneſtly deſired to be diſmiſſed, in order to live a private life, his excellency (49) was pleaſed to grant my requeſt, but on condition, that whenever he ſhould ſend for me, I ſhould be ready to ſerve him in what place he ſhould order, which I promiſed to do. Upon this promiſe he had a mind to diſpatch me to Bruges, giving me the government of that town, and what depended upon it (which was prevented by my ſickneſs, and the ſecret practices of thoſe, who invited thither the preſent Duke of Arſchot). Afterwards he ſent me to Antwerp, having little hopes of preſerving that town, by reaſon of the different inclinations of the people, and the animoſity they expreſſed againſt him, under pretence that he favoured the French. He got me admitted there into the council of Brabant, and ſoon after I was by his means appointed the head of the town, under the title of the firſt burgomaſter, ſeeing that I had abſolutely refuſed that of Margrave.' He ſays afterwards, that this prince, a month or ſix weeks before he died (50), ſent for him to Antwerp, on account of the reſolution that was taken to ſend into France for ſuccours. ‘ (51) Ever ſince God was pleaſed to call him to himſelf, after the ſiege of Antwerp, which laſted thirteen months, during which time I uſed my utmoſt endeavours to keep it for the States and the United Provinces, tho' God was not pleaſed to proſper my labours, I willingly laid aſide the adminiſtration of affairs, and no body can ſay I ſued for any other employment directly or indirectly. Much leſs can it be ſaid that I was turned out, ſince I always loved to live a retired and frugal life in the country, till the ſaid States were pleaſed to call me to Leyden, in order to ſpend my time in a ſacred ſtudy, on which all my friends knew that my mind was altogether bent. Which is ſo true that this man, through a kind of contradiction, ſends me into Zealand to cultivate my garden and improve my lands, as I had formerly done for a conſiderable time.'

I ſhall add ſomething out of Strada. That Jeſuit acknowledges that Sainte-Aldegonde uſed his utmoſt efforts for the defence of Antwerp. He repreſents him as a man well ſtocked with methods of leading the mob (52). His adherents, ſaid he, gave out that they knew the Duke of Parma would offer very reaſonable terms, but that he had privately promiſed the ſoldiers that they ſhould have the plunder of the town. Addebant aliqui civium, nempè ex Aldegundii coborte, ſibi exploratum eſſe, Parmenſem Principem oblaturum quidem conditiones haud ſpernendas, clam tamen ſtipendiorum loco cum Hiſpanis pactum eſſe populationem urbis (53). The magiſtrates ſent out emiſſaries, who declared all over the town, that ſome letters had been received from France, importing that the troops deſigned for their relief were at laſt upon their march (54). That Hiſtorian obſerves that the greateſt part of the citizens ſuſpected thoſe letters to have been forged in Sainte-Aldegonde's cloſet (55). Is not this to repreſent him as a man, who uſed his beſt endeavours to preſerve that place? He adds, that Sainte-Aldegonde having loſt all hopes, and being willing to take care of his own particular intereſt, forwarded the ſending of ſome deputies to the Duke of Parma (56). He mentions the diſcourſe he made to the duke; he ſays (57), that he had a conference of four hours with that prince, at which the other deputies were not preſent, and that he particularly inſiſted on the article of liberty of conſcience, giving hopes that upon ſuch a condition Holland, Zealand, and the reſt of the Low-Countries, might ſubmit again to the King of Spain, and that he took it upon himſelf. He pretends that the Duke of Parma, who rejected that condition, made uſe of ſuch a wonderful eloquence, that Marnix owned he had never ſeen a prince, who ſpoke better. Laſtly, Strada ſays, that he ſeemed to have altered his mind ſince that conference, and to be more inclined to conclude a capitulation, and that he publiſhed a book, wherein he not only beſtowed great encomiums upon that duke, but alſo declared that one could not bear arms againſt Philip II with a good conſcience. This confeſſion, continues Strada, of a man, who had ſo great an intereſt in his party, was prejudicial to the confederates, and they began to ſuſpect Sainte-Aldegonde to ſuch a degree that he was laid aſide. Let us ſee this as it is told in elegant Latin. Quinetiam edito poſtea libello, quum res ab Alexandro patratas, clementiam ejus in victos, in ſervanda fide ſanctimoniam, ceteraſque Imperatorias virtutes, liberali præconio celebraſſet; adjecit inter alia, Sumi adverſus Philippum Regem arma à ſubditis populis, integra conſcientia, nequaquam poſſe. Quæ ſanè confeſſio non temerè inter loquendum prompta, ſed litteris ad memoriam conteſtata, ut erat hominis authoritate inter ſuos, & Calvinianâ ſapientiâ longe clariſſimi, Fœderatorum cauſæ momenti plurimum abrogavit, ipſe ſuis offenſus inviſuſque, regendam ad Rempublicam poſtea non acceſſit (58).

[L] Complaints were made, that he exhorted the States to perſecute the ſects.] I have ſaid more than once, when there was occaſion for it, that it was a hard caſe for the Proteſtant writers of the XVIth century, to think themſelves obliged to exhort the magiſtrates to (45) Id. ibid. verſo & ſeq.

(46) Id. ibid. C 5. verſo.

(47) Sainte-Aldegonde, ubi ſupra, fol. D 3. verſo.

(48) That is, the Duke of Alençon.

(49) That is, William, Prince of Orange.

(50) Sainte-Aldegonde, ubi ſupra, fol. D 4.

(51) Id. ibid. verſo.

(52) Aldegundius non conſumptis adhuc quas apprime callebat artibus tractandæ multitudinis, ſpargit in vulgus ſcripturum ſe Parmenſi principi. Strada, lib. vii, Dec. II, p. 423.

(53) Id. ibid. pag. 424.

(54) Id. ibid.

(55) Plerique Gallicas literas Antverpiæ natas in Aldegundiano conclavi ſuſpectabant. Id. ibid. pag. 425.

(56) Conſul Aldegundius ubi rem deſperatam publicam vidit, ſibi privatim conſulturus legationem . . . . feſtinavit. Id. ibid. pag. 427.

(57) Id. ibid. pag. 432.

(58) Id. ibid. pag. 433.

that he loved dancing, and that this is ſufficient to anſwer the ſcruples of the Preciſiſts [M]. It to puniſh Heretics, whilſt they thought it ſtrange that the Catholic princes ſhould perſecute the Proteſtants. Indeed their own arguments were retorted againſt them, and they could hardly come off but by ſuppoſing, as all parties do, that their doctrine was true. Sainte-Aldegonde muſt needs have been more perplexed than many others, ſince he had taken ſo many journies, made ſo many diſcourſes, and writ ſo many books, for a ſtate, which had taken up arms againſt the Spaniards, to free themſelves from the yoke of the Inquiſition. How many things might have been ſaid againſt him, when he exhorted the ſovereigns of that ſame ſtate to exterminate ſome ſects? Here is an inſtance of the perplexity he was in. He ſuppoſes, 1. That theſe words were only objected to him (59). It is high time, noble and venerable lords, that you ſhould go about to maintain the honour of GOD in this world, if you deſire that he ſhould protect and defend your country. 2. That the antidote which was oppoſed to that exhortation, conſiſts in this: ‘ Men ought to live quietly ‘ one with another, and every body ought to have the ‘ liberty of believing what he thinks to be right, and we ‘ ſhould not concern our ſelves with it. Permitte Divis ‘ cætera, - - - - - With all things elſe, truſt the gods.’ He quotes the ninth and forty-firſt pages of the Antidote; but there is in the ninth page a clauſe omitted by him. He is blamed for uſing theſe words, to ſuppreſs and entirely annihilate that mortal poiſon. It is further ſaid (60), that he thinks it very ſtrange, that there ſhould be ſtill ſome men ſo tender-hearted, as to queſtion whether the magiſtrates ought to inflict corporal puniſhments, and lay a fine upon thoſe who are guilty of inſolence in the ſervice of GOD and religion. What he leaves out, pretending to know nothing of it, alters the ſtate of the queſtion, and removes the difficult part of it. Can ſuch a proceeding be conſiſtent with ſincerity? Is it not an unfair thing to reduce the Antidote to a ſingle propoſition of the forty-firſt page, without conſidering ſeveral ſolid arguments that go before it? It is true, that in another place of his anſwer (61), he examines what he had left out in the beginning. That examination ſhews the perplexity he was in.

Note, That he bore an ill-will to the Enthuſiaſts long before. See his letter to Beza written the tenth of January 1566 (62).

[M] It is obſerved that he loved dancing, and that this is ſufficient to anſwer the ſcruples of the Preciſiſts.] See Schoockius (63), who has inſerted in one of his books, a letter written by Sainte-Aldegonde, in 1577, to Caſpar Verheiden, a famous Dutch miniſter (64). That letter ſeems to me very judicious. I ſhall take two or three curious things out of it. The author affirms, that many people were ſo offended, becauſe dancing was forbidden in the Reformed churches, that it made them unwilling to join with them, and that ſeveral laid aſide their averſion to the church of Rome, when they came to know the practice and opinion of the Proteſtants about it. From thence he infers, that too rigid a morality, touching this bodily exerciſe, was ſo far from being edifying, that it was ſcandalous (65). He ſays that the prince (66) himſelf was very much offended when he heard that one could not dance at a wedding, without incurring the cenſure of the church. He thinks that dancing is a good and commendable thing in the Netherlands, becauſe it keeps people from drinking or gaming after meals (67). He is not much concerned becauſe the zealots have not the ſame eſteem for him as they had before; for, ſays he, I take reputation to conſiſt in the real nature, and not in the ſuperficial outſide of things. Exiſtimationis certe (quam tu mihi apud pios omnes amiſſam hoc facto eſſe autumas) rationem, ego nunquam in rerum externarum umbris, ſed in ipſis rebus poſitam eſſe ſtatui (68). However he approves the conduct of the church of Geneva, which, by forbidding dancing, had ſuppreſſed many unbecoming things that were practiſed every day. It was an uſual thing in thoſe parts to carry young maids to balls up and down in the night-time, and to vex them with leud poſtures. He does not think that one can be preſent at ſuch a ſpectacle without a ſin, and much leſs an actor in it. His expreſſions being much ſtronger and more expreſſive than mine, I ſhall ſet them down here, in favour of thoſe who underſtand Latin. This I do in a thouſand other places for the ſame reaſon. Ut ego Genevates merito laudandos cenſeam, qui turpiſſima dedecora, quæ quotidie ſine fronte committebantur, hoc uno interdicto, quaſi Tenedia bipenni, reſecuerint. Sed illis erat uſitatiſſimum, quod & hodie eſt multo frequentiſſimum, apud Burgundos, Sabaudos, atque omnes Allobroges, & multos etiam Gallos, puellas virgines intempeſtiva nocte, ſine ullo cuſtode, ad choreas, quocunque vellent abducere, & quamdiu vellent in fœdiſſimis atque obſcœniſſimis geſticulationibus, quovis anni tempore, ſine ulla prope intermiſſione, prætextu chorearum, uſque ad nauſeam fatigare. Quos ego mores vel inſpectare, nedum exemplo comprobare, nefas eſſe duxerim (69).

The Reformed churches, which forbad dancing, cannot be ſufficiently praiſed for it; and it were an abſurd thing to fancy that the miniſters blamed it, only as it is an art of moving according to the time and cadence of Muſic. It is a very lawful exerciſe under that notion, it is neither good nor bad, morally ſpeaking. But the manner of it occaſioned a thouſand diſorders, and in the very room wherein the ball was kept, it made dangerous impreſſions upon a woman's chaſtity. The proverb concerning convents, As dangerous as the return from matins (70), might have produced another, with a ſmall alteration, As dangerous as the return from a ball.

A DESCRIPTION of the ill conſequences of dancing.

To confirm what I have ſaid, that the Proteſtant churches of France did very wiſely forbid dancing, I ſhall quote a paſſage out of a book written by Lambert Daneau, if I am not miſtaken. The author maintains (71), that the Devil never invented a more effectual way than dancing to fill the world with whoredom: ‘ For if the bare meeting of a man and a woman can ‘ have this effect, if leud words, or wanton ſongs ‘ alone, if bare touches are ſufficient to kindle luſt, ‘ as we have but too many inſtances of it every day; ‘ one may judge of the great inconveniencies that will ‘ ariſe from the concourſe of all thoſe things in one ‘ and the ſame place, and in the ſame perſons, who ‘ beſides meet there only for the ſake of pleaſure. ‘ But all thoſe things are to be found in dancing; ſo ‘ that it may be ſaid that dancing is a compoſition of ‘ all ſorts of poiſons invented by the Devil, to ſtrike ‘ the heart more powerfully, to ſtifle the fear of GOD, ‘ and to kindle all manner of filthy luſts; that it is ‘ a bait for the eyes and ears, and, in general, for all ‘ the ſenſes to ſeduce them, and convey the poiſon into ‘ the ſoul through their channel. There, more than ‘ in any other place, the heart gives an unbounded ‘ looſe to it's deſires and wanton inclinations. . . . . . ‘ (72) Upon ſuch an occaſion every body may chuſe, ‘ even in the arms of huſbands and mothers, ſuch ‘ women as they like, that is to ſay, ſuch as their ‘ luſts direct them to; and then they take them ‘ by the hand, and, as if they were already enjoying ‘ their deſires, they kiſs, embrace, and carry them ‘ up and down: young men making it their buſineſs ‘ to appear nimble and merry, and to pleaſe women ‘ with a thouſand motions; and women, on their ‘ part, uſing their endeavours to do the like. The ‘ men know how to make them friſk and cut ſuch ‘ high capers, that the company may ſee their legs ‘ up to their very thighs, without ſhame. A ball ‘ will have it's croſs motions, ſettings, and nearer ‘ approaches; and when the parties meet, there will ‘ be glances, capers, and redoubled frolicks, on purpoſe to ſhew that the heart, in a manner, flies with ‘ joy upon ſeeing itſelf ſo near the object of it's deſires; each ſort of dance affords new ways of pleaſing, ‘ ſeeing, and touching more familiarly: all thoſe ‘ things are performed with great ſhoutings, with ‘ ſmiling countenances, that ſeem tranſported with ‘ joy, and with all the ſymptoms of hearts that are ‘ intoxicating with full draughts of pleaſure (73). . . . ‘ The dancers are not the only perſons liable to thoſe ‘ inconveniencies, but alſo thoſe who are mere ſpectators, ſince women have a full ſight of young ‘ men, whilſt they play their nimble and merry ‘ tricks; and likewiſe the men a full ſight of the ‘ women and maids, whilſt they ſhew their wantonneſs. How great a power have the eyes and ears ‘ (or rather the Devil, who makes uſe of thoſe organs) upon idle people, well fed, and greedy of ‘ pleaſures? . . . But let us ſuppoſe that ſome ‘ will dance without having any ill deſires; can it be ‘ ſaid that they will not excite them in others? For ‘ they (59) Sainte-Aldegonde, Reſponſe apologetique, fol. A 4.

---

(60) Antidote, pag. 10.

(61) Aldeg. Reſponſe apolog. fol. G 5, & ſeq.

(62) It is the ſixth letter among thoſe of Beza.

(63) Schoockius, Exercit. xxiii, pag. 317, Edit. in 4to.

(64) It is the LIſt of the IId Tome of the Epiſtolæ illuſtrium Belgarum.

(65) Plane cenſeo non modo nullam eſſe in hac importuna moroſitate, & revocata ad humanæ opinionis placitum cenſura, ædificationem, ſed incredibile etiam ſcandalum. Schoock. pag. 318.

(66) I think he means the Prince of Orange.

(67) Imo vero his locis ſanctas duxerim choreas quæ poſt epulas ad ſiſtenda ebrioſorum pocula inhibendoſve aleatorum ludos, agitantur cum fructu. Schoock. ibid.

(68) Ibid. pag. 319.

(69) Ibid. pag. 320.

(70) See Paſquier, Recherch. de la France, book viii, ch. xxxiii, pag. m. 729.

(71) Traité des Danſes, ch. x, pag. 37, of the third edition which is that of 1583.

(72) Ibid. p. 38, 39.

(73) Ibid. p. 41.

It cannot be denied, without doing him injuſtice, that he was one of the illuſtrious men of

‘ they do every thing that may kindle luſt, and, as St Jerom ſays in a like caſe, they preſent the poiſon to any that will take and ſwallow it. Now there will be but too many in theſe exceſſive fits of pleaſure, and after the provocatives of a full repaſt, that will be diſpoſed to drink it. A maid is pitched upon to dance; which is ſufficient to make her fear that ſhe has excited a fooliſh deſire in the perſon, who pitches upon her. But when he kiſſes her very tenderly, and careſſes her, and whilſt ſhe is dancing, redoubles his efforts; what can ſhe think but that he does it upon her account, and that the fire of love, which kindles his luſt, makes him ſo nimble? Beſides, that maid goes up and down with a bold and merry countenance, and without any vail or mark of ſhame, as it were, to ſhew herſelf to every body. But how can ſhe be ſure, that none of thoſe, who look upon her, will feel an unlawful deſire? And if you ſuſpect that you have occaſioned an ill thought in a man, what is become of your conſcience, if you are not ſorry for it, and do not avoid ſuch meetings? The ſame may be ſaid of young men with reſpect to women (74).’ I ſhould tranſcribe the greateſt part of that book, if I was willing to mention all the reaſons alledged in it as ſtrong as theſe. That treatiſe was dedicated to the King of Navarre, by the miniſters of the Holy Goſpel of the French Reformed churches. His court wanted very much to be reformed in that reſpect, for it was not like that of the virtuous Joan d'Albret. Her example was alledged to that prince (75): Thanks be to GOD, there is no body who does not aſſure himſelf, that your majeſty, beſides the great parts and excellent judgment which GOD has beſtowed upon you, having ſo good and ſo holy an education from your infancy by ſuch an excellent queen and mother, that ſhe was deſervedly called the wonder of her age, and remembering the good example ſhe gave you, (for ſhe always kept her houſe free from ſuch filthy things, ever ſince ſhe was called to the knowledge of the Goſpel, and had the command of herſelf) it is impoſſible that the corruption of this age ſhould prevail upon you more than holy precepts, the ill examples of other courts, more than the remembrance of that wherein you have been bred up, and the allurements of the world more than the piety, which you have ſucked in with your mother's milk.

Ludovicus Vives, a Roman Catholic, had followed the ſame maxims which Lambert Daneau has ſet forth. I ſhall quote him according to the French tranſlation of Peter de Changy. ‘ In the cities of Chriſtendom we have dancing-ſchools permitted as ſtews for wantonneſs: a thing which the Infidels themſelves would by no means ſuffer, on account of the leud touches and immoderate kiſſes that are cuſtomary there. To what purpoſe is ſo much kiſſing, unleſs it be to imitate the amorous doves? In old times virgins were not allowed to be kiſſed by any but their near relations; now every body aſſumes that privilege. We are brothers and ſiſters by baptiſm, but friendſhip and charity may very well ſubſiſt among us without ſuch familiarities. What pleaſure or advantage can there be in leaping higher than a girl's ſtrength can bear her, in being raiſed between two men and hoiſted up by the arms, or in dancing a whole night without being tired of it (76). . . . . . From ſuch nocturnal meetings proceed (as is ſaid before) leud kiſſes, afterwards unchaſte looks and touches, together with obſcene diſcourſe. They disfigure themſelves at a ſtrange rate. One has her coif pulled off, another is ſeen bare-headed, joined between two doors, or ſollicited by ſqueezing of the hand and other ſigns; for ſo treacherous a buſineſs it is that there is no way of eſcaping unhurt. The body is heated; deſire inflamed; the heart beats; the will wavers; and then, if a convenient place preſents, it is odds but they carry the point ſtill farther. In ſhort it can never bear a good conſtruction among women and girls that have a tender regard to their honour, and therefore it is prudent to avoid the danger, for fear they ſhould not be able to reſiſt it (77).’ The tranſlation of Antony Tiron printed for Plantin at Antwerp in the year 1579 doth not entirely agree with the other (78). His words are as follows: Dancing is the laſt companion which makes extravagant entertainments the ſcene of mirth and high diverſion; ſo that we may juſtly ſay that dancing is in a manner the height of all vices. Notwithſtanding this we have dancing-ſchools in Chriſtendom; upon which account the Heathens out-do us in point of modeſty: for they are utter ſtrangers to that new way of dancing which prevails among us, and which is a bait to uncleanneſs, as being full of unchaſte touches and kiſſes. What means ſo much kiſſing? Formerly men were allowed to kiſs no women but ſuch as were their relations; but now it is the cuſtom all over Burgundy and England to kiſs whomſoever one pleaſes. Baptiſm, it is true, gives occaſion to this, to the end forſooth it may appear that we are all brethren. For my part I would gladly know what is the uſe of ſo much billing, as if we could not keep up our love and friendſhip with the women by any other means: but it is the beginning of an uncleanneſs which I will not name. To ſpeak my mind freely, I am of opinion that it is a moſt ſhameful and barbarous cuſtom. But to purſue my diſcourſe upon dancing; what is the good of ſo many leaps which the girls take, ſupported under the arms by their partners, to the end that they may be able to kick up their heels higher? What pleaſure do theſe locuſts take in tormenting themſelves thus, and in ſpending the greateſt part of the nights in dancing without being either weary or ſatisfied (79)? All the reſt of the chapter is full of moral reflexions, and laſhes maſquerades at a terrible rate.

It is plain that when dancing is attended with ſo many irregularities, it deſerves to be blamed by all thoſe, who write moral books. Sainte-Aldegonde would not have approved of it. The Count de Buſſi Rabutin condemned the uſe of balls as a very dangerous thing: reaſon and his own experience convinced him of it (80). All the Caſuiſts ought to be Preciſiſts or Rigoriſts upon this head. The Philoſopher, who wrote againſt the Preciſiſts, declared (81) that he blamed dancing under this notion; but he ſaid he did not believe it was of the ſame nature among the Proteſtants of Germany; and that the Preciſiſts, who are offended at a cuſtom, that prevails in that country, where both ſexes dance together, ſhould conſider that they do not diſapprove certain cuſtoms, at which the Germans have more reaſon to be offended. ‘ Si mixti ſaltantium chori, nos ratione Germanorum offendant, næ eos multo magis offenderint promiſcui juvenum & virginum accubitus in nuptiis, maxime oſcula ex more gentis Belgicæ, præ cæteris Hollandicæ, frequentari ſolita. Obteſtor eos, quorum zelus contra choreas forte improbari non poſſet, ſi à ſcientia convenienter dirigeretur, an non multo majus ſcandalum promiſcua & quotidiana hæc oſcula (ita loquitur Sueton. lib. iii. cap. 34.) præbeant Sarmatis, Cimbris, & Germanis, quam nobis (ſi gentilitios mores diſtinguere noluerimus) præberi poſſint à nuptialibus eorundem tripudiis (82)? - - - If we are ſcandalized at the promiſcuous dancing which is in faſhion among the Germans, truly they have more reaſon to be offended at the promiſcuous lolling of young men and girls at a wedding, and more eſpecially at the kiſſes which are ſo cuſtomary in the Low-Countries, and particularly in Holland. I appeal to them, whoſe zeal againſt balls would perhaps not deſerve to be cenſured, if it was guided by knowledge as it ought to be, whether theſe promiſcuous and daily kiſſes (to make uſe of Suetonius's words) do not give much greater offence to the Poles, Holſteiners, and Germans, than we (if ſo be that we will not diſtinguiſh between the cuſtoms that are peculiar to different nations) can poſſibly take at their nuptial dances.’ He draws up a parallel between the cuſtom of kiſſing and that of dancing, and maintains that foreigners will be more offended at the firſt, than the Preciſiſts are at the laſt. ‘ Quam πρόφασιν pro ſuis Batavis excogitaverit hic rigidus Theologus, idemque juratus adverſarius non minus omnigenarum chorearum, quam votorum innoxiorum propinato poculo additorum? Maxime, ſi Cimber, aut Sarmata viderit uxorem illius, convivas ſuos ad oſtium oſculo excipientem & dimittentem. Næ, peregrinus hic conviva, cum Clemente Alexand. lib. 3. Pædag. ejuſmodi oſculum, à graviſſimi licet Paſtoris uxore ex uſu gentis frequentatum, vocaverit oſculum inceſtum, veneno plenum, ſanctitatem ſimulans, & oſculum impudicitiæ: ex Ambroſio vero in cap. ult. 2. ad Corinth. affectus libidinoſi indicium. Nec eſt, quod adverſarius dicat hoc judicium, ſeu Cimbri, ſeu Sarmatæ, charitatis expers eſſe, quum ipſe longe inclementius

---

(74) Ibid. p. 43.

(75) Ibid. in the Epiſtle Dedicatory, fol. A 3.

(76) Vives, on the education of a Chriſtian woman, chap. xiii, fol. 33. Edit. of Paris 1543.

(77) Ibid. fol. 34.

(78) Plantin affirms in his preface that the firſt tranſlator had followed the Latin no further than he thought fit, and that the ſaid book, in the form he had put it, was rather an abridgement, collection, or alteration; than a tranſlation of the ſaid Latin of Ludovicus Vives.

(79) Idem, as tranſlated by Antony Tiron, pag. 128, 129.

(80) See in the ſecond part of the Retour des Pieces choiſies, his letter to the Biſhop of Autun, concerning balls and dancing.

(81) Nulla ratione tamen patrocinari volo tripudiis modernis, à Bathylli modis non abhorrentibus, atque convenientibus magis Pathico, ſive cinædo, quam homini Chriſtiano. Mart. Schoockius, ubi ſupra, p. 327.

(82) Id. ibid.

of the XVIth century; for he was very zealous for his religion, and had a great deal of wit and learning: beſides he was well ſkilled in the Civil Law, Politics, Negotiations, Divinity, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and ſeveral living languages (e).

(e) See Verheiden, in Elog. aliquot Theolog. p. 141, & ſeq.

‘inclementius judicet de ſaltationibus, quas proclamat eſſe proxima incentiva libidinis, interim non cogitando, per oſcula multo expeditius ingredi libidinem; atque Cimbro, ſeu Sarmatæ, videri proſtitutæ famæ, & pudicitiæ, fœminas eſſe, quæ præſumpſerint hoſpites oſculo excipere (83). - - - What excuſe could this rigid Divine, this ſworn enemy to all kinds of dancing, as well as to the innocent cuſtom of drinking healths, find out for his countrymen the Dutch: eſpecially if an Holſteiner or Pole ſhould ſee his wife receiving and diſmiſſing her gueſts at the door with a kiſs. Truly that foreign gueſt would with Clemens Alexandrinus call a kiſs of that nature, though given by a grave Parſon's wife, and warranted by the cuſtom of the country, an impure kiſs, full of venom, and which under the pretence of being holy was in truth the kiſs of unchaſtity; or with St Ambroſe he would conſtrue it for the mark of a libidinous inclination. Nor could his adverſary ſay that this cenſure of the Holſteiners or Poles was void of charity, ſince he himſelf paſſes a far more unmerciful judgment upon dancing, which he avers to be the higheſt incentive to luſt, not conſidering that luſt is much ſooner raiſed by kiſſes; and that the Holſteiner, Cimbrian, or Pole, believes all theſe to be looſe and abandoned women who preſume to welcome their gueſts with a kiſs.’ He concludes that nations ought to excuſe one another, and to conſider, above all things, that an antient and long cuſtom may make a thing innocent in one country, that is indecent in another. He inſtances upon Engliſh women walking with other men than their huſbands. ‘(84) Quæ ratione oſculi dicta ſunt, applicari poſſunt deambulationibus, quas uxores Anglorum, cum alienis viris inſtituere ſolent (85), quæ & inter primariæ dignitatis Belgas hoc tempore frequentari incipiunt. Certe offenderint hæ matronas Chriſtianas ad Septentrionem degentes; quæ mirabuntur admodum, hæc & ſimilia citra cenſuram tolerari poſſe ab illis Theologis, quorum zelus quotidie occupari ſolet circa ſaltationes & pocula votiva. Nos vero, citra pulveris jactum, ex omnibus hiſce difficultatibus expedire conſtanter poſſumus, quando docemus, in talibus gentium mores & conſuetudines ante omnia inſpici debere quorum ratione, ut rigidiores quoque Præciſiſtæ Hollando ſua concedunt ſuavia, Anglicanis matronis prodeambulationes cum maritis non ſuis; ita aliis gentibus mox invidere non deberent ſuas ſaltationes, modo ab iis abſit mollities, & illud τεχνικὸν, ad accendendum libidinem ab otioſis nepotibus excogitatum. - - - What has been ſaid with reſpect to kiſſes may be applied to the cuſtom that Engliſh women have of walking with other men than their own huſbands, which likewiſe begins to be the faſhion among Dutch ladies of the firſt quality. This muſt certainly give offence to the Chriſtian women that live farther North, and they will wonder very much how theſe and the like things can eſcape the cenſure of thoſe Divines, whoſe zeal is daily employed againſt the cuſtom of dancing and that of drinking healths. But as for us, we can eaſily extricate ourſelves out of all theſe difficulties, by ſaying that in ſuch things the manners and cuſtoms of nations ought chiefly to be conſidered, and that ſince out of regard to thoſe, the rigid Preciſiſts allow the Dutchman his kiſſes, and the Engliſh women their walks with huſbands not their own, they ought as little to envy other nations their dances, provided they be free from effeminacy, and have none of thoſe artificial geſtures which profligate men have contrived as incentives to luſt.’

It may be obſerved that this Philoſopher had not the ſame reaſons that Sainte-Aldegonde had, to write an apology for dancing. He proteſts that he never had a mind to dance; and that if the magiſtrates ſhould forbid dancing, it would not make him uneaſy in the leaſt (86). Sainte-Aldegonde could not have ſaid ſo with any ſincerity.

(83) Mart. Schoockius, Exercit. xxiii, pag. 328.

(84) Id. ibid. pag. 329.

(85) Henry Stephens mentions that cuſtom in his Latin Apology for Herodotus.

(86) Proteſtationi hoc unum amplius adjicio, mihi, circa choreas, ne quicquam ſive ſeri ſive meti; quum de earum exercitio ne per ſomnium quidem cogitaverim tota vita, quam exemplo agni illius curionis apud Plautum, ex Dei mei voluntate, in qua libenter acquieſco, tranſigo inter catenatas moleſtias & curas: unde & ferre poſſum Magiſtratuum Edicta, chorearum abolitionem perpetuam urgentia. Id. ibid. p. 321.

SANCTA-CLARA (FRANCIS OF) an Engliſhman, and a Franciſcan Monk, lived in the XVII century. He was chief lecturer in Divinity at Douay, in the convent of St Bonaventure, and provincial miniſter of the province of England, and Almoner to the Queen of Great Britain, wife to Charles I. He publiſhed ſome books [A], where he ſhewed himſelf favourable to thoſe of the Epiſcopal perſuaſion in England; for he endeavoured to prove that the XXXIX articles of their church might be more eaſily reconciled with the council of Trent, than is commonly imagined. He was beſides very favourable to thoſe who err with a good intention. We need only ſee his problem upon invincible ignorance (a). He does not appear to have any other learning or eloquence beſides what may be got by a diligent reading of the School-men and Canoniſts.

(a) It is the xvth of his book, intituled Deus, Natura, Gratia. Mr Allix has quoted it twice, (pag. 117, 203) in his Reflexions Critiques & Theologiques ſur la Controverſe de l'Egliſe, printed in the year 1686.

It has likewiſe been quoted in the Commentaire Philoſop. ſur contrain-les d'entrer, pag. 524, of Part. II.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books.] I ſhall give the entire title of that which he dedicated to Charles I, king of England, and which was printed at Lyons in the year 1635 in 8vo. ‘Deus, Natura, Gratia, ſive Tractatus de Prædeſtinatione, de Meritis & peccatorum remiſſione, ſeu de Juſtificatione, & denique de Sanctorum Invocatione, Reliquiarum & Imaginum veneratione, de Indulgentiis, & Purgatorio, & ſub finem, de Excommunicatione. Ubi ad trutinam Fidei Catholicæ examinatur Confeſſio Anglicana, & ad ſingula puncta, quid teneat, qualiter differat, excutitur. Doctrina etiam Doctoris Subtilis, D. Auguſtini ſequacis acutiſſimi, olim Oxoniæ & Cantabrigiæ, & ſolemniter approbata, & honorifice prælecta, exponitur & propugnatur. Acceſſit paraphraſtica Expoſitio reliquorum Articulorum Confeſſionis Anglicæ. Tertia editio multo auctior, pluribus materiis Theologicis illuſtrior, & in articulorum diſcuſſione clarior, & fuſior. Præmittitur Epiſtolium Apologeticum lectori Catholico, in quo ratio totius operis exhibetur. - - - God, Nature, Grace; or a treatiſe on Predeſtination, on Merits and the forgiveneſs of ſins, or on Juſtification; as alſo on the invocation of ſaints, the worſhip of relicks and images, on indulgences, and purgatory, and laſtly on excommunication. Wherein the confeſſion of the Church of England is examined by the ſcale of the Catholic Faith, and diſcuſſed in every point, both as to what it contains, and in what manner it differs from the ſaid faith. The doctrine alſo of Duns Scotus, the ſubtile follower of St Auguſtin, which formerly was ſolemnly approved of and honourably taught at Oxford and Cambridge, is explained and defended. To this is added, a paraphraſtical expoſition of the other articles of the Engliſh confeſſion. The third edition conſiderably enlarged, improved by the addition of ſeveral points of Divinity, and more diſtinct and copious in the diſcuſſion of the articles: to which is prefixed, a ſhort apologetical epiſtle to the Catholic reader, giving an account of the whole work.’ His Apologia Epiſcoporum, ſeu ſacri Magiſtratus Propugnatio: Præmittuntur Anarcharum politiciſmi, was printed at Cologn in the year 1640 in 8vo.

SANTA-CROCE (PROSPER) in French Sainte-Croix, made a cardinal by Pius IV, had been advocate-conſiſtorial and auditor of the Rota. He was Nuncio in Germany, Portugal, Spain, and France. Catherine de Medicis procured him the archbiſhopric of Arles, where he prevented with an extreme ſeverity the eſtabliſhment of the Proteſtant religion. He died at Rome the fourth of October 1589, being ſeventy-ſix years old. I ſhall ſpeak of his books [A]. At his return from his nunciature in Portugal, he made Tobacco known in Italy [B]; which is the reaſon why that herb was called Santa-Croce (a).

(a) Ex Proſpero Mandoſio, Bibliothec. Romana; & Oldoino Athen. Roman.

[A] I ſhall ſpeak of his books.] His books are, Deciſiones Rotæ Romanæ. Gallicarum rerum Commentaria. Epiſtolæ ad Federicum Nauſeam alioſque. Several Orations. Conſtitutiones laneæ artis à Sixto V. in Urbe erectæ. The Jeſuits of the Roman college have his treatiſe, De Officio Legati, and one volume of his letters in manuſcript (1).

(1) Ex Proſpero Mandoſio, Bibl. Romana; & Oldoino Athen. Roman.

[B] He made Tobacco known in Italy.] This appears from ſome verſes of Caſtor Duranti, quoted by Mandoſio, wherein that herb is celebrated, as if forſooth it was an univerſal remedy.

Nomine quæ Sanctæ Crucis herba vocatur, ocellis
Subvenit, & ſanat plagas, & vulnera jungit,
Diſcutit & ſtrumas, cancrum, cancroſaque ſanat
Ulcera, & ambuſtis prodeſt, ſcabiemque repellit;
Diſcutit & morbum cui ceſſit ab impete nomen,
Calefacit & ſiccat, ſtringit, mundatque, reſolvit,
Et dentum & ventris mulcet capitiſque dolores;
Subvenit antiquæ tuſſi, ſtomacoque rigenti
Renibus & ſpleni confert, ultroque, venena
Dira ſagittarum domat, ictibus omnibus atris
Hæc eadem prodeſt: gingivis proficit atque
Conciliat ſomnum: nuda oſſaque carne reveſtit:
Thoracis vitiis prodeſt, pulmonis itemque,
Quæ duo ſic præſtat non ulla potentior herba.
Hanc Sanctacrucius Proſper quum Nuncius eſſet
Sedis Apoſtolicæ Luſitanas miſſus in oras
Huc adportavit Romanæ ad commoda gentis,
Ut proavi Sanctæ lignum Crucis ante tulere
Omnis Chriſtiadum quo nunc reſpublica gaudet,
Et Sanctæ Crucis illuſtris Domus ipſa vocatur
Corporis atque animæ noſtræ ſtudioſa ſalutis.

The herb which borrows Santa Croce's name;
Sore eyes relieves, and healeth wounds. The ſame
Diſcuſſes the King's Evil, and removes Cancers and Boils: a remedy it proves
For burns and ſcalds, repels the nauſeous itch,
And ſtrait recovers from Convulſion fits.
It cleanſes, dries, binds up, and maketh warm:
The Head-ach, Tooth-ach, Cholic, like a charm,
It eaſes ſoon; an antient cough relieves,
And to the reins, the milt, and ſtomach gives
Quick riddance from the pain that each endures;
Next the dire wounds of poiſon'd arrows cures,
All bruiſes heals, and when the gums are ſore,
It makes them ſound and healthy as before.
Sleep it procures, our anxious ſorrow lays,
And with new fleſh the naked bone arrays.
No herb has greater pow'r to rectify
All the diſorders in the breaſt that lie
Or in the lungs. Herb of immortal fame!
Which hither firſt with Santa Croce came,
When he, his time of nunciature expir'd,
Back from the court of Portugal retir'd;
Ev'n as his predeceſſors great and good
Brought home the Croſs, whoſe conſecrated wood
All Chriſtendom now with its preſence bleſſes:
And ſtill th' illuſtrious family poſſeſſes
The name of Santa Croce, rightly given,
Since they, in all reſpects reſembling Heaven,
Procure, as much as mortal men can do
The welfare of our ſouls and bodies too.

A parallel between Tobacco and the wood of the true Croſs, is a very high ſtrained panegyric.

SANCTA-MAURA, an iſland formerly called Leucas (a), nine miles from that of Cephalonia (b). The Greeks call it ſtill Leucada (c), for properly ſpeaking they call Sancta-Maura the fortreſs, where there was formerly a monaſtery of that name. That fortreſs is three miles diſtant from the ruins of the town of Leucas [A], in a place where the canal between the iſle and the continent is one league broad. Nevertheleſs it has conſtant communication with the continent by the bridge, and by means of ſeveral little iſlands joined together by bridges (d). It has alſo an aqueduct [B] a mile long, which ſerves for a bridge to thoſe, who go on foot (e). There are about thirty villages in the iſland: the Greeks have a biſhop in it. It abounds with corn, wine, oil, and ſeveral ſorts of fruit, and is about twelve or fifteen leagues round (f). The Turks made themſelves maſters of it in 1479 [C]. The Venetians took it from them under the conduct of the Captain-general Peſaro in 1502, and reſtored it to them ſoon after by a treaty of peace. They retook it under the General Moroſini the twenty-third of July 1684. The Pirates of

(a) See the article LEUCAS.

(b) Coronelli, Memoires Hiſt. & Geogr. Printed at Amſterdam 1686.

(c) Spon. Voiag. Tom. I, p. 102. Dutch Edit.

(d) Coronelli, ubi ſupra.

(e) Spon, ubi ſupra, p. 104.

(f) Father Coronelli ſays it is ſeventy miles in circumference.

[A] Three miles diſtant from the ruins of the town of Leucas.] Spon (1) cenſures Ortelius and Ferrarius for believing as other Geographers do, that Sancta-Maura is ſtill in the ſame place with the town of Leucas, the ruins of which are to be ſeen three miles from Sancta-Maura. I do not find in Ortelius's Theſaurus Geographicus that the town of Sancta-Maura, and that of Leucas are in the ſame ſituation; but only that the iſle of Leucas is now called Sancta-Maura. Now is there any thing in this that deſerves to be cenſured? Spon adds, that the town of Leucas was built upon a riſing ground a mile from the ſea, at the narroweſt part of the canal that was made when the iſthmus was cut, and that this part is not above fifty paces broad. I confeſs I cannot apprehend that a town ſhould be built upon a canal fifty paces broad, and yet be a mile diſtant from the ſea; for is not that canal in the ſame place where the iſthmus was? Now can a town built upon an iſthmus fifty paces broad be above fifty paces diſtant from the ſea? Suppoſing the Engliſh channel to be only thirty toiſes broad, will it follow from thence that Dover and Calais are not upon the ſea-ſhore.

(1) Spon, Voiag. Tom. I, p. 103.

[B] It has alſo an aqueduct.] Spon (2) who ſaw that aqueduct ſays, that it ſerves for a bridge to thoſe who go on foot, though it be hardly above three foot broad, and has no breaſt-height. He adds, though a man be never ſo fearleſs, he trembles when he goes over it, eſpecially if he meets any body that comes from the place he goes to; for two men have much ado to go over it a-breaſt. But Father Coronelli ſays (3) it is a ſtately aqueduct, built with ſtone, and ſupported by three hundred and ſixty arches. The ſupplement of Moreri's Dictionary calls it a magnificent aqueduct of ſtone .... ſupported by three hundred and ſixty arches which croſs the great pond.

(2) Spon, ubi ſupra, pag. 104.

(3) Coronelli, Memoires Hiſt. & Geographiques.

[C] The Turks made themſelves maſters of it in the year 1479.] It was under Mahomet II. See the particulars of it in that Sultan's life written by Mr Guillet (4); they are curious enough. Leonard Tocco, Deſpotes or Dynaſta of Acarnania, was then poſſeſſed of Sancta-Maura.

(4) In Tom. ii, pag. 329.

of Sancta Maura have been much talked of: They were the firſt that made uſe of galliots. The Baſhaw of the Morea went on purpoſe into that iſland in 1675, to burn their ſmall veſſels (g). Durag Bey, a famous corſair of Lepanto, had ſeven or eight corſairs of Sancta-Maura under his command.

(g) Spon, ibid.

SANCTESIUS (a) (Claudius), in French de Sainctes, one of the chief controverſiſts of the XVIth century, was a native of Perche [A]. He took the habit of canon regular in the year 1540 (b), in the monaſtery of St Cheron near Chartres (c), and was ſent to Paris ſome time after, where he ſtudied claſſical learning, Philoſophy and Divinity in the college of Navarre (d). He took his degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1555, and then applied himſelf very much to controverſy, and was admitted into the houſe of the Cardinal de Lorrain (e). In the year 1561, he was one of the diſputants for the Romiſh party in the conference of Poiſſi, and afterwards one of the twelve Divines, whom Charles IX ſent to the council of Trent. He and Simon Vigor diſputed with two miniſters in the houſe of the Duke of Nevers in 1566 (f). I ſpeak of this in another place (g). He preached a conſiderable time in Paris, and was made Biſhop of Evreux in the year 1575. He was ſo incenſed againſt the Proteſtants, that he maintained that thoſe, whom they had baptized, were to be baptized again [B]. He left nothing unattempted to turn them out of his dioceſe, and to get all the canons of the council of Trent admitted into the kingdom without any reſtriction [C]. He did not ſcruple to ſay that Calvin and Beza taught Atheiſtical doctrines (h). He joined in the League with ſuch a fury, that he maintained that Henry III had been juſtly aſſaſſinated, and that Henry IV deſerved the ſame puniſhment [D]. The manuſcript, wherein he aſſerted that doctrine, was found in his cloſet, when Biron made himſelf maſter of Louviers, and ſeized upon that unhappy prelate. He was not treated like a priſoner of war, but he was ſent to Caen (i) to be tried; and becauſe he obſtinately continued to maintain that pernicious doctrine, he would have been put to death, had not the Cardinal de Bourbon, and ſome other Eccleſiaſtics who were with the king, prevailed with him to remit that puniſhment, which they thought he juſtly deſerved, and to condemn him to a perpetual impriſonment. He died ſoon after in his confinement (k): it was in the year 1591. It is to be obſerved that long before, out of ſpite to the Proteſtants, he had ſaid in a book, that ſubjects ought never to oppoſe the ordinances

(a) Thuanus calls him Sanctius.

(b) Moreri at the word Claude de Sainctes, letter C.

(c) In Cœnobio Sancti Carauni ad Carnutum. Jo. Launoius Hiſt. Gymnaſii Navarr. p. 769.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) And not 1556, as Launoi will have it. ibid.

(g) See the article ROSIER.

(h) See the book which he intituled, Declaration d'aucuns Atheïſmes de la Doctrine de Calvin & de Beze.

(i) The parliament of Normandy had been removed thither.

(k) Taken from Thuanus. See his words in the remark [D].

[A] He was a native of Perche.] I know that according to La Croix du Maine and Moreri, he was a native of Chartres: but I rather believe John de Launoi, who has theſe words: Claudius Sanctesius ortum habuit in ea Galliæ regione cujus populi nunc Perticenſes, Gregorio Turonenſi Pertenſes; antiquioribus Aulerci Diablintes dicti fuere (1).

[B] He maintained, that thoſe whom the Proteſtants had baptized, were to be baptized again.] He himſelf tells us that Pius V having decided, that thoſe who had been baptized by the innovators, ought neither ſimply, nor yet with any addition, to be baptized again, ordered his Nuncio to command him, and the other preachers of Paris, to teach no longer the contrary. That brief of Pius V is very ſcarce. I ſhall ſet down the words of Dr de Launoi. Ad annum MDLXXII Lutetiæ concionabatur, cum Pius V Pontifex ſtatuit, neque ſimpliciter, neque cum adjectione repetendum eſſe baptiſmum, quem Novatores dediſſent. Id teſtatur in Synodo, quam cum Epiſcopus fuit, anno MDLXXVII habuit. Quam, inquit, definitionem Pius Pontifex ante quinque vel ſex annos per Breve, ac per Internuntium Apoſtolicum dignatus fuit nobis atque aliis, qui tum Lutetiæ Pariſiorum fungebantur concionatorum officio, ſignificare atque inhibere, ne aliter doceremus. Breve illud vix invenitur (2).

[C] He left nothing unattempted . . . . to get all the canons of the council of Trent admitted into the kingdom, without any reſtriction.] This I ſhall prove by the words of the ſaid doctor. Porro autem, ſays he (3), in Epiſcopali munere nulli non pepercit labori ac diligentiæ, ſive ut hæreſim à finibus ſuis exterminaret, ſive ut Tridentini Concilii decreta penitus admitterentur ac ſervarentur.

[D] He maintained that Henry III had been juſtly aſſaſſinated, and that Henry IV deſerved the ſame puniſhment.] Let us tranſcribe the whole account Thuanus gives of this. 'Captus in oppido (4) Claudius Sanctius 'Ebroicenſium Epiſcopus famoſus Theologus regiis 'partibus infeſtiſſimus cum libris & chartis, inter quas 'ſcriptum repertum eſt, quo parricidium Regis tan'quam juſte factum tuebatur, & idem licere in Regem 'hodiernum defendebat. Itaque non lege belli cum 'eo actum, ſed Cadomum ſub cuſtodia miſſus, ut in 'eum Senatus inquireret, & tanquam de perduelli ſupplicium ſumeretur. Nec enim ſacri ordinis prærogativæ in crimine læſæ Majeſtatis apud nos ratio 'habetur, ſed in convictos, ſive ſacerdotes ſive epiſ'copi ſint, tanquam ſolutos ac profanos legum ſeve'ritas exercetur, parumque res ab executione abſuit: 'Sanctio jam peracto reo, ut erat pervicaci ingenio 'errorem præfracte propugnante. Sed interceſſerunt 'poſtea Cardinalis Borbonius aliique è ſacro ordine, 'qui cum Rege erant, tenueruntque, ut pro mortis 'pœna, quam legibus noſtris, ut ipſi fatebantur, me'ruerat, carceri perpetuo manciparetur, in quo paulo 'poſt deceſſit (5). - - - Claudius Sanctesius, Biſhop of 'Evreux, a famous Divine, and a bitter enemy to the 'king's party, was taken in the town, with his books 'and papers, among which was found a piece, wherein 'he juſtified the murder of the late king, and maintained 'that the ſame thing might lawfully be done to his preſent 'majeſty. For this reaſon he was not treated like a 'priſoner of war, but was ſent under a guard to Caen, 'that he might be tried before the parliament, and 'puniſhed as a traytor. For with us no regard is 'had to the privileges of the holy order in crimes of high 'treaſon; but the rigour of the law takes place upon all 'ſuch as are convicted, upon prieſts and biſhops, as well 'as lay men; and it was very near being executed 'here; Sanctesius, even after he was found guilty, con'tinuing obſtinately to defend this error. But afterwards, 'the Cardinal de Bourbon, and ſome other Eccleſiaſtics that 'were with the king, interceded for him, and obtained 'that inſtead of being puniſhed with death, which they 'confeſſed he deſerved by our laws, he ſhould be con'demned to a perpetual impriſonment, in which he died 'ſoon after.' Henry IV acted, without doubt, upon this occaſion according to the clemency and generoſity that were natural to him; but there was likewiſe ſome ſmall mixture of that timorous prudence, which frequently ſhook his great courage, when he came to obſerve that the monſter of the league he was to overcome, more fierce and dangerous than Hercules's Hydra, would grow more furious and terrible by the effuſion of his blood. Wherefore that prince thought himſelf obliged to uſe mildneſs in order to tame and pacify that wild beaſt. Clemency, on the one hand, and policy on the other, ſpared Sanctesius the ſhame of loſing his life upon a ſcaffold, as he deſerved.

[E] He

(1) Jo. Launoius, in Hiſtor. Gymnaſii Navar. pag. 769.

(2) Launoius, ibid. pag. 770.

(3) Ibid. p. 772.

(4) That is, Lupariæ, at Louviers in Normandy.

(5) Thuanus, lib. ci, pag. 418.

ordinances of their ſovereigns [E]. He publiſhed a ſmall piece in 1561, to ſhew that Heretics ought not to be tolerated [F]. It is a very ancient opinion, and very common to [E] He had ſaid in a book, that ſubjects ought never to oppoſe the ordinances of their ſovereigns (6).] The book, wherein he advances this opinion, was printed at Paris, in 1561, with this title, Confeſſion de Foi Catholique, contenant en bref la Reformation de celle que les Miniſtres de Calvin preſenterent au Roi en l'Aſſemblée de Poiſſi. The fifty-ſeventh article of that Confeſſion contains theſe words: ‘ We hold that ſubjects ought to obey their laws and ordinances, to pay tributes, impoſts, and other duties, and bear the yoke of ſubjection with a ready will, tho' princes were infidels, and the empire of GOD ſhould not be preſerved entire. And therefore we deteſt thoſe, who would reject ſuperior powers, ſet up communities at their pleaſure, introduce a confuſion of goods, and overthrow the order of juſtice. We alſo reject all murderers and aſſaſſins, hired and ſworn to follow and ſupport ſects, and thoſe who declare all thoſe to be worthy of death, without form of trial, who diſpleaſe or reſiſt them, and who get kings, lords, churches, and towns, attacked under pretence of the word of GOD.' The author undertook to ſhew that the Catholics went farther than the Proteſtants; for the latter added a clauſe to the article, wherein they declared their opinion about the obedience of ſubjects; provided, ſay they, the empire of GOD be preſerved entire (7). Tho' this clauſe has been often reflected upon, as being too general and captious, it is very juſt and orthodox, if it be rightly underſtood, tho' it may be wreſted to a pernicious ſenſe againſt the intention of the authors. But it is certain that Sanctesius left it out of his Confeſſion from a motive of mere oſtentation, and out of hatred to Geneva; and no man did ever contradict himſelf more impudently than he did: which is the uſual fate of thoſe who argue without principles, and embrace an opinion only to differ from their enemies, that they may have a pretence to inſult them, and render them ſuſpected. When that paſſion is over, or when the intereſt and exigencies of their party require another thing, they renounce their firſt opinions, and eſpouſe quite contrary ones. We have ſome late inſtances of it.

[F] He publiſhed a ſmall piece . . . . . to ſhew that Heretics ought not to be tolerated.] His book is intituled, Ad edicta veterum Principum de licentia ſectarum in Chriſtiana religione. Item methodus contra ſectas quam ſequuti ſunt primi Catholici Imperatores. He approves that Heretics ſhould be put to death, and declares that if the fires, which had been lighted in France to deſtroy Calviniſm, had not been extinguiſhed, that ſect would have made no progreſs. ‘ Audivi Severum Sulpitium de Priſcilliani hiſtoria, quaſi tabulam abſolutionis per domos judicum aliquorum circumlatum, cum adhuc in Gallia exercerentur judicia de capite pro religione ex Chriſtianiſſimorum regum edictis, atque ex ea hiſtoria plus damni noſtræ fidei, quàm à Calvino libris & emiſſariis illatum. Non enim ultro citroque intrepide commeaſſent, & ad factionem tot homines ſollicitaſſent, ſi conflagratio non fuiſſet temere reſtincta, & à nonnullis quaſi fides publica data Religionis & Reipub. perturbatoribus (8). - - I have heard that Sulpitius Severus's hiſtory of Priſcillianus, was carried round to the houſes of ſome of the Judges, as if it had been a decree of abſolution, during the time that capital puniſhments were ſtill inflicted on a religious account in France, according to the edicts of the moſt Chriſtian kings; and that this hiſtory did more damage to our faith than the books and emiſſaries of Calvin. For they could not have gone up and down ſo without any fear, and ſtirred up ſuch a number of men to ſedition, if the fires had not been imprudently extinguiſhed, and if ſome few had not preſumed to give a kind of public ſecurity to theſe enemies of religion and the ſtate.' The whole ſtrength of this book is grounded upon cuſtom and practice; for he alledges few reaſons, and thoſe he offers are not good. Whoever impartially compares the arguments for or againſt Toleration, muſt needs confeſs that he could not have alledged any good reaſon for perſecution, tho' he had been a man of much greater abilities than he was. The reaſons for a Toleration have been ſet forth with the utmoſt evidence by ſome late writers. See the prefaces to the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes; the book (9) intituled, Traité de la Liberté de Conſcience, ou de l'Autorité des Souverains ſur la Religion des Peuples, oppoſée aux Maximes de Hobbes & de Spinoſa, adoptées par le Sieur Jurieu dans ſon Hiſtoire du Papiſme, & dans ſon Syſtéme de l'Egliſe; the Philoſophical Commentary upon theſe words, Compel them to come in; and the Latin letter printed at Tergow, in 1689, Mr de Beauval (10) aſcribed it to Mr Bernard, a French miniſter, very well known by his works, and very well qualified to write a book that contains ſuch cloſe reaſoning; but it is certain he is not the author of it, and it is thought to be written by an Engliſh gentleman (11), whoſe books on Metaphyſics, Morality, &c. appear frequently in the Journals. But without undertaking to read a long-winded work, one needs only read a ſmall piece written at London, in 1685, by an illuſtrious magiſtrate of a town in Holland (12). It is intituled, *H. V. P. ad B * * * de nuperis Angliæ motibus Epiſtola, in qua de diverſorum à publica religione, circa divina ſentientium diſſeritur tolerentia.* That letter was printed at Rotterdam, in 1685, in Latin, French, and Dutch.

The reaſons alledged for Toleration muſt needs be very cogent, ſince all thoſe, who have done their utmoſt endeavours to anſwer them, have been obliged to have recourſe to unfair means, and to acknowledge that Heretics ought not however to be puniſhed with death (13). Their malice and unfairneſs appear by their endeavouring to create a belief, that thoſe who are for Toleration favour the Socinians; that they are ill affected towards the government, and deprive the ſupreme powers of one of the moſt conſiderable rights that GOD has given them. This is a baſe and unjuſt proceeding: at this rate one muſt not find fault with the cruel decrees, by virtue of which ſo many Proteſtants have been burnt in France, the Netherlands, Spain, and Italy; for the Socinians do mightily exclaim againſt thoſe cruelties. They inveigh no leſs againſt the Papiſts, who have put to death thoſe, that are mentioned in the Proteſtant Martyrology, and againſt thoſe, who put to death Servetus, Gentilis, &c. In a word, one muſt not write againſt the Pope, the Jews and the Turks; for it is manifeſt, that Socinus and his followers do not ſpare them, but confute them with all their might. If they who ſhew that no penal laws ought to be eſtabliſhed againſt thoſe who err in matters of faith, are wanting in the reſpect due to ſovereigns; if they diveſt the ſupreme powers of one of their moſt conſiderable prerogatives; our late apologiſts for perſecution will be found guilty of that crime, ſince they maintain that no blood ought to be ſhed upon account of religion. Does not this take away from ſovereigns the brighteſt gem in their crown? Have they not the power of life and death over malefactors? Beſides, can it be ſaid that GOD has put the ſword into the hands of the magiſtrates of Holland, to puniſh thoſe who tranſgreſs againſt the firſt table of the Law, as well as thoſe who tranſgreſs againſt the ſecond, without reflecting upon them, and expoſing them to the hatred of their ſubjects? If this be true, is not their toleration of idolatry as great a crime, as if they tolerated murderers and highway-men? Further, could there be any thing more ridiculous than to inflict no other puniſhment than baniſhment upon notorious aſſaſſins and poiſoners, without diſtinction of age or ſex (14). See the diſpute of Meſſieurs de Wallemburch (15) about this queſtion, Whether ſuppoſing that the magiſtrates have a right to puniſh Heretics, they may put them to death. They reduce their diſpute with the Lutherans to this point; for they alledge the famous Gherard, who was for enacting penal laws againſt ſectaries, but did not approve that they ſhould be puniſhed with death. They clearly ſhew him that it is a frivolous exception. But in order to ſee the confuſion of thoſe, who are againſt Toleration, we need only obſerve that they unwarily ſay, that the ſovereigns, who oppoſe the introduction of a true doctrine, are very commendable. ‘ I cannot blame the Swiſs, ſays one of them (16) who will not permit by any means the growth of any new ſect amongſt them. Holland abounds with different religions. It were to be wiſhed that thoſe diſorders had been prevented from the beginning.' The author of theſe words being a miniſter, two abſurdities contained in them were objected to him.

---

(6) It was the doctrine of the Roman Catholics before the League; but they ſung to another tune ſoon after, as one of them told the Leaguers in a reproachful manner in a book printed at Caen, 1590, and intituled, Deploration de la mort du Roy Henry III, & du ſcandale qu'en a l'Egliſe. They themſelves, ſays he, pag. 54, in the beginning of the troubles made uſe of this argument againſt the Huguenots, They are Heretics, for they take up arms againſt the magiſtrates, they will not obey them, but are for planting their religion with the ſword, which is only given to the magiſtrates.

(7) Confeſſion of Geneva, Art. xl.

(8) Frater Claudius de Sainctes, in Methodi quam ſequuti ſunt Principes, cap. xiii, fol. 112. verſo.

(9) Printed at Amſterdam, 1687. in 12mo.

(10) Hiſtoire des Savans, for September 1689, Art. ii.

(11) Mr Locke.

(12) Mr PAETS. See a ſhort encomium upon him in the Nouvelles de la Republiq. des Lettres, for October 1685. Art. ii, p. 1093, 1094, of the ſecond edition. That great man died the eighth of October 1686.

(13) See the eighth letter of the Tableau du Socinianiſme.

(14) Note, that this may ſerve to confute that author of the eighth letter of the Tableau du Socinianiſme, by his own aſſertions. See them above in citat. (105), of the article LOYOLA.

(15) See their book De unitate Eccleſiæ, lib. vi, Part. i, cap. ii, & ſequent. pag. 222, & ſequent, Edit. Colon. 1656, in 4to.

(16) Eſprit de Mr Arnaud, Tom. ii, pag. m. 335.

to this very day, tho' no doctrine was ever confuted with more ſolid arguments (l). The titles of his other books may be ſeen in the hiſtory of the college of Navarre. Moreri and du Sauſſai have committed unpardonable miſtakes [G]. It is to obſerved likewiſe that Sancteſius confeſſed he was ſuſpected for ſome time of being inclined to Calviniſm [H], and that he repreſented Cardinal de Lorrain as a ſaint under perſecution [I].

He

him. Neither the Catholic nor the Reformed Cantons, was he told (17), ‘ will tolerate new ſects : Is it then upon this account that you cannot blame them ? How little is your zeal for the propagation of your religion ! Is it not your duty to wiſh earneſtly that the Catholic Cantons would tolerate the Reformed amongſt them, and ought you not to blame them exceedingly for refuſing to hear Jeſus and his prophets ? Truly you are no good Apoſtle of Chriſt.' He had been told before : ‘ (18) If your opinion had been followed in theſe happy provinces . . . . the Proteſtant religion had never prevailed in them . . . And if Spain had been always uppermoſt, and had prevented thoſe diſorders from the beginning, you would not live ſo comfortably in the habit you wear ; for the Proteſtant religion would be ſo far from prevailing in this country, that one would hardly have a notion of it. Truly the Reformed are very much beholden to you.'

[G] Moreri and du Sauſſai have committed unpardonable faults.] I only ſay this of ſome of them : I. I have already obſerved (19) Moreri's miſtake about Sancteſius's country. II. He could not be at the conference of Poiſſi after his return from the council, ſince he did not go to that council till after that conference was held. III. How could Charles IX, who died the 30th of May 1574, name him to the biſhopric of Evreux, in the year 1575 ? I do not queſtion that our doctor ſued for that dignity before that prince died, and had a promiſe of it; but it is certain he did not obtain it till the reign of Henry III. He himſelf ſays ſo ; nor does he diſſemble that his patron (20) told him, in a reproachful manner (21), that he ſued for biſhoprics in remote provinces, to free himſelf from the ſlavery of the court. ‘ Quoniam Chriſtianiſſimi Regis Caroli mors interceſſit, ne qua factione vel gratia mutaretur, quod ſemel Principi placuerat. Quibus potuit precibus apud Reginam matrem, novum Regem, Regiſque fratrem, optimos maximos Principes, & Sanctitatem veſtram, ac fratrum Cardinalium claſſem egit, ut is mihi maneret Epiſcopatus ; nec prius quievit, quam accepit promotionis meæ diploma ad te perferri. Quod accidit illis diebus, quibus Avenione, non annis, ſed curis Eccleſiæ ac reipublicæ confectus, agebat animam (22) : quaſi moriens hanc mihi cum Epiſcopatu tradit & commendavit (23). - - - - Becauſe the death of the moſt Chriſtian King Charles fell out in the mean time ; leſt what had been the will and pleaſure of that prince ſhould be rendered of no effect by any faction or favour, he employed his utmoſt intereſt with the queen-mother, the new king, and the king's brother, theſe great and good princes, as likewiſe with your Holineſs, and the college of cardinals, to get me confirmed in that biſhopric : nor did he reſt until he had procured my nomination to be ſent to you. This happened during the time that he lived at Avignon, worn out not with years, but with the cares of the church and ſtate ; ſo that dying, he, in a manner, gave up, and recommended his ſoul to me at the ſame time with the biſhopric.' This ſhews that his nomination was drawn up at the court of France, and ſent to the court of Rome in December 1574 ; but becauſe he did not receive his bulls before the year 1575, Dr de Launoi was in the right to ſay that he was preferred to a biſhopric in 1575. Here follow the groſs miſtakes. IV. The innovators mentioned by Moreri had ſo little intereſt at the court of France, before Sancteſius turned rebel, that if they had undertaken to vent any calumny againſt him, they would rather have done him good than harm. Perhaps they repreſented to Henry III, who was no leſs perſecuted by the league than they, the exceſſes of that factious biſhop ; but this was no calumny. V. What an abſurdity, to pretend that they poiſoned him ? He was no longer in a capacity to do them any prejudice ; for tho', by the king's favour, he had eſcaped capital puniſhment, he was to be confined in a priſon the remaining part of his life. VI. To ſay nothing of his trial, and of the reaſon why he was thought to deſerve death, is an unpardonable omiſſion. Spondanus, before him, was guilty of the ſame omiſſion : the Muſe, who preſides over Hiſtory, muſt needs look upon ſuch writers as great prevaricators. Dr de Launoi has not committed the ſame fault ; for he names the author who mentions the puniſhment of that biſhop, and he thinks he deſerved it. ‘ Anno MDXCI deceſſit perpetuo mancipatus carceri propter ea, quæ Jacobus Auguſtus Thuanus memoriæ tradidit in Hiſtoriarum libro CI. Sic virum tantum, & de Eccleſia olim tam bene meritum periiſſe valde dolendum, niſi pereundi cauſa id juſte poſtulaſſet (24). - - - He died in the year 1591, being condemned to perpetual impriſonment, for the reaſons which Thuanus has related in the 101ſt book of his hiſtory. The loſs of ſo great a man, who had formerly done ſuch good ſervice to the church, would have been very much to have been lamented, if he had not given juſt cauſe for his own deſtruction.' I wonder that the miniſters of ſtate, in France, ſhould ſuffer ſo many writers to ſuppreſs the infamy of rebel biſhops. It is giving ſuch as ſhall think fit to imitate their example, ſtrong reaſon to hope that Hiſtorians will take no notice of it.

Here follow the miſtakes of Andrew du Sauſſai. I. He ſays that Sancteſius was Profeſſor in the year 1533, in a monaſtery of regular canons (25). II. He tells us that Sancteſius went to the council of Trent before the conference of Poiſſi was held. III. That he aſſiſted at a provincial council of Rouen in the year 1576 ; but that council was not held before the year 1581, as Dr de Launoi informs us (26), who adds that Sancteſius publiſhed the year following a French tranſlation of the acts of that aſſembly, which he had promoted and directed (27). IV. That invincible hero of the Gallican church did not confine himſelf within thoſe bounds, if we believe du Sauſſai : he and Simon Vigor diſputed with Spina and du Roſier, two of the chief miniſters, and got a compleat victory. That is, the biſhop of Evreux was not contented to aſſiſt at a provincial ſynod in the year 1576 (28), and to put in order and publiſh the ſynodal decrees of his dioceſe, but engaged alſo in a regular diſputation with thoſe two miniſters. What an anachroniſm is here ! that conference was held eight or nine years before Sancteſius came to be a biſhop. V. He died in 1591, and not in the foregoing year. VI. It is an inexcuſable prevarication in mentioning the death of that Prelate, to call him eximius, - - - excellent, without ſaying any thing of his rebellion, and abominable doctrine, and of the infamous puniſhment he had like to have undergone. What du Sauſſai ſays of him is contained in fifteen lines. How many faults would he have committed, if he had made an encomium of fifteen pages ?

[H] He confeſſed that he was ſuſpected of being inclined to Calviniſm.] He ſays thoſe ſupicions were grounded on his appearing much more moderate, when he engaged in a diſpute in the Hôtel de Nevers, than he had been at the conference of Poiſſi. ‘ Ego qui Piſſiaci habebar acrior, & tantum non ſeditioſus, anno ſuperiore in collatione facta cum Spina & Roſeo Miniſtris, credebar mutatus, ac paulo momento ad Calviniſmum poſſe impelli, quoniam de priſtina vehementia tantum remiſeram, quantum in domino Vigoreo Calviniſtis infeſtiſſimo Doctore magis ac magis cernebam inflammari & exardeſcere (29). - - - I who at Poiſſi was eſteemed too fiery, and not far diſtant from ſedition, in the conference held the year before with the miniſters Spina and Roſier ; was now thought to be changed and very much inclined to Calviniſm ; becauſe I had abated of my former violence, in proportion as I ſaw it flame out with more and more heat in that bitter enemy to the Calviniſts, Simon Vigor.'

[I] He repreſented the Cardinal de Lorrain as a ſaint under perſecution.] If we may believe Sancteſius, that cardinal was very ſick of the bruiſe of Joſeph ; he daily afflicted his righteous ſoul, like another Lot, ſeeing the evils of the church. He was a-dying every day in the midſt of the tribulations and anguiſhes he endured for the cauſe of GOD, and was continually preparing himſelf for martyrdom, being told every day that there was a deſign upon his life ; and he would ſay ſometimes, (l) See the remark [F].

(17) Lettre à Monſieur J.... ſur ſon Livre intitulé l'Eſprit de Monſieur Arnaud, pag. 11. That letter, according to the title, was printed at Deventer by the heirs of John Colombius in the year 1684.

(18) Ibid. p. 8, 9.

(19) In the remark [A].

(20) Ante omnia me ut fugitivum ſervum increpavit, quem non ignoraret CAPTASSE remotiores Epiſcopatus, ut me in libertatem à ſervitute aulica, atque ejus comitatu aſſererem. Claud. Sancteſius, Epiſt. Dedicator. Libri de Euchariſtia, ad Gregorium XIII.

(21) That is the Cardinal de Lorrain.

(22) The Cardinal de Lorrain died at Avignon, the 26th of December 1574.

(23) Sancteſius, Epiſt. Dedicator. Libri de Euchariſtia.

(24) Launoius, ubi ſupra, pag. 773.

(25) Ordinis Sancti Auguſtini Canonicorum Regularium . . . . anno 1533 Profeſſor. Andr. du Sauſſai, de Script. Eccleſiaſt. Continuat. pag. 38. Edit. Colon. 1684, in 4*to*.

(26) Launoius, ubi ſupra, pag. 772.

(27) Synodum provincialem . . . promovit, rexit, compoſuit. Id. ibid.

(28) According to du Sauſſai's computation.

(29) Sancteſius, in Reſponſione ad Apolog. Bezæ, apud Launoium, ubi ſupra, pag. 769, 770.

He was one of thoſe Divines, who found it a difficult thing to anſwer the paſſages of St Auguſtin alledged by the Proteſtants againſt Free-will. Wherefore he leſſened the authority of that holy doctor as much as he could in his controverſial writings about the doctrine of Grace [K].

times, Let us go and die with him. ‘ Per annos fere ‘ ſexdecim à comitatu illuſtriſſimi Principis, ac maximi ‘ Cardinalis Caroli Lotharingi, niſi alicujus officii ‘ publici cauſa, non receſſi, nec ille me ſtudiorum tantum, ſed ad exteros omnium profectionum, colloquiorum & negotiorum multorum, quæ difficillimis Galliæ temporibus ipſi contra hæreticos inciderunt, me ‘ participem fecit, ut tentationum & paſſionum, quibus per tot annos quotidie moriebatur, & omni hora ‘ de vita periclitabatur, cui quoties nunciabatur, paratas eſſe inſidias, tam parum timidus, quam nimium eſſe putabatur, ſolebat ad me converſus dicere: ‘ Sequeris Sacerdotem Levita; aliquando vero: Eamus, & moriamur cum illo. Cum deſereretur ab ‘ intimis, addebat: Socii paſſionum erunt & conſolationis (30). - - - For almoſt ſixteen years I cloſely attended that illuſtrious Prince and great Cardinal Charles ‘ de Lorrain, unleſs when ſome public buſineſs required ‘ my abſence. He not only made me a partaker in his ‘ ſtudies, but likewiſe in all his travels, conferences, and ‘ the many weighty affairs which he tranſacted againſt ‘ the Heretics during the troubles of France. I was beſides a witneſs to the temptations and ſufferings in which ‘ for ſo many years he was dying daily, and was every ‘ hour in danger of his life. As often as he was told ‘ that there was a plot againſt him, being as little fearful as he was thought to be much ſo, he uſed to ſay, ‘ Turning towards me: You follow a Prieſt being yourſelf a Levite; and ſometimes, Let us go and die with ‘ him. When he was deſerted by his intimate friends, ‘ he added: They ſhall be the companions of my ſufferings ‘ and conſolation.’ Thoſe, who have read in Mezerai and other Catholic writers, that this cardinal was a worldly, proud, and voluptuous, man, that he had a great power and intereſt (31), and violently proſecuted the Proteſtants, will not read this deſcription of his pious ſufferings without laughing. In another book Sancteſius begs of GOD that he would ſtrengthen the cardinal his ſervant, perſecuted for a good cauſe. Beza ridiculed him upon this head. ‘ Omittam vero ‘ libens tum pleraſque illius libelli ineptias, veluti ‘ quòd invitum ſeſe à ſuis ſodalibus huc pertractum ‘ dicit, ac tandem etiam ſuo Cardinali virtutem & ‘ conſtantiam in perſecutionibus precatur, quæ quidem ‘ non ſine riſu legi poſſunt (32). - - - I will gladly ‘ paſs over moſt of the fooliſh things in that book, as for ‘ example, his ſaying that he was drawn ſuch a length ‘ by his friends contrary to his own inclination, and his ‘ praying for reſolution and conſtancy to the cardinal ‘ under his perſecutions: all which it is impoſſible to ‘ read without laughing.’ I have long thought of a thing, that would very much perplex the Aſiatics, if they had a mind to take notice of that part of our Hiſtories of the XVIth and XVIIth centuries, relating to the troubles of religion. Each church complains that ſhe is under ſufferings, and looks upon her victories as a means, in GOD's hands, to free her from the ſlavery and ſlaughter ſhe was threatned with. I need not ſhew that the Proteſtants expreſs themſelves in that manner with reſpect to the conqueſts of Guſtavus Adolphus; but I ſhall make it appear that the Jeſuits did the ſame when they conſidered the great ſucceſs of the emperor. In order to it I ſhall ſet down an extract of a letter written to James Reihing by a Jeſuit, who was chaplain to the famous Count de Tilly. ‘ Rem ‘ noſtram, id eſt Catholicorum . . . . . bene ſe habere ‘ hoc doceret bellum, in quo jam quarto anno verſor ‘ cum Illuſtriſſimo Comite de Tilli, &c. Erant mira ‘ Conſilia noſtrorum Adverſariorum: ſed quam mirabilis in altis Dominus! moliebantur nobis internecionem, inciderunt in foveam, quam fecerunt: & ‘ ut libenter noſtri hoſtes confitentur, nunquam dediſſent, quod acceperunt, beneficium Vitæ. Ut vel ‘ inde pateat, quæ pars furorem, quæ ſequatur æquitatem (33). - - - Our affairs, that is of the Catholics, ‘ . . . . . would ſeem to be in a thriving way by this ‘ war, in which it is now the fourth year that I am ‘ preſent with the moſt illuſtrious Count de Tilly, &c. The ‘ deſigns of our adverſaries were amazing: but how ‘ wonderful is GOD in the higheſt? They were meditating our utter deſtruction, but they have fallen into the ‘ pit which they themſelves have digged: and, our enemies make no ſcruple of confeſſing, they would never ‘ have given the quarter which they received: ſo that ‘ from this very thing it may appear which ſide is directed by fury and which by equity.’

[K] He leſſened the authority of St Auguſtin as much as he could . . . . .] The Janſeniſt, who publiſhed in 1689, ſome letters written by the Prince of Conti to Father de Champs, added to them among other things a diſſertation intituled, ‘ S. Auguſtin juſtifié du ſoupçon ou des apparences de Calviniſme. ‘ - - - St Auguſtin juſtified from the ſuſpicion or the appearance of Calviniſm.’ I find the following paſſage in it concerning Sanctesius. ‘ He was one of thoſe, ‘ who thought it neceſſary always to take the oppoſite ‘ ſide of the queſtion with the Heretics, in order to get ‘ the more advantage over them, and who, conſidering the frightful part of St Auguſtin's doctrine concerning Predeſtination, more than the ſolid foundation ‘ of the ſcripture and tradition, on which it is grounded, were too eaſily frighted at that doctrine. That ‘ author made bold to ſay, That St Auguſtin writing ‘ againſt the Pelagians with too much heat, did too haſtily deſpiſe the unanimous opinion of all thoſe, who lived before him. A man who ſpeaks of St Auguſtin in ‘ this manner, and charges him with having changed ‘ his opinion three times, does certainly deſerve to be ‘ delivered up to Father de Champs, that he may deal ‘ with him, as he thinks fit. Father John Martinon, ‘ likewiſe a Jeſuit, who wrote under the diſguiſe of ‘ Antoninus Moraines, was aſhamed of it. That author, ſays he, will give me leave to obſerve that he ‘ would have acted a much better part, and more becoming the reſpect that is due to ſo great a Doctor, if ‘ he had conſtantly followed him, giving ſometimes a favourable ſenſe to his words, inſtead of imputing to him ‘ ſuch an inconſtancy in his opinions (34).’ We may compare the opinion of this biſhop of Evreux, with that of the Jeſuit John Adam (35).

SALISBERI (JOHN OF) Biſhop of Chartres in the XIIth century. See SARISBERI.

SALMACIS, a fountain at Halicarnaſſus, which was ſaid to effeminate thoſe who drank of it, or went into it [A]. The Poets being willing to account for this ill quality, ſuppoſed

[A] A fountain . . . . which was ſaid to effeminate thoſe who drank of it, or went into it.] Strabo having ſaid that the fountain Salmacis was in Halicarnaſſus, adds that it had an ill name, as having the power of making thoſe, who drank of it, voluptuous and effeminate. Διαβεβλημένη ἐκ οἶδ' ὁπόθεν, ὡς μαλακίζουσα τοὺς πιόντας ἀπ' αὐτῆς, neſcio qua de cauſa infamis quod ex eo bibentes molliciem contraherent (1). But, according to Ovid, none could experience this unhappy change without going into it.

Unde ſit infamis, quare male fortibus undis
Salmacis enervet, tactoſque remolliat artus, Diſcite (2).

. . . .

Quiſquis in hos fontes vir venerit, exeat inde
Semivir, & tactis ſubito molleſcat in undis (3).

How Salmacis, with weak infeebling ſtreams
Softens the body and unnerves the limbs,
And

---

(30) Sanctesius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Librorum de Euchariſtia, ad Gregorium XIII, apud Launoium, ubi ſupra. pag. 771.

(31) See his article, and particularly the paſſage quoted out of Brantome.

(32) Beza, ad Claud. de Xaintes, Apolog. I, init. Oper. Tom. II, pag. 288.

(33) Johan. Agricola, in Epiſt. ad Jacobum Reihingum, apud Henning. Witte, Memoriæ Theologor. in Orat. funebri Reihingi, pag. 912, 913.

(34) Lettres du Prince de Conti, ou l'Accord du Libre arbitre avec la Grace de J. Chriſt. pag. 190, 191.

(35) See above the remark [D] of the article ADAM. (JOHN).

(1) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 451.

(2) Ovid. Metam. lib. iv, fab. ix, ver. 285.

(3) Ibid. ver. 385. He ſays in book xv, ver. 319.
Cui non audita eſt obſcœnæ Salmacis undæ?
Who has not heard of Salmacis obſcene.
DRYDEN.

ſuppoſed that a nymph, who was paſſionately in love with Hermaphroditus, the ſon of Venus and Mercury, threw herſelf into that fountain, whilſt he was bathing himſelf, and cloſely embraced him; and that her careſſes and entreaties not being able to move the heart of that inſenſible youth [B], ſhe begged of the gods that ſhe might remain for ever

And what the ſecret cauſe, ſhall here be ſhown.

. . . .

Oh grant, that whomſoe'er theſe ſtreams contain,
If man he enter'd, he may riſe again
Supple, unſinew'd, and but half a man!

ADDISON.

Strabo makes a judicious reflexion upon this. Voluptuous men, ſays he, in order to clear themſelves aſcribe to the elements what proceeds only from the ill uſe they make of their wealth. Good cheer makes them leud, and they find fault with the air and water; which is a great illuſion. Ἔοικε δ' ἡ τρυφὴ τῶν ἀνθρώπων αἰτιᾶσθαι τοὺς ἀέρας ἢ τὰ ὕδατα. τρυφῆς δ' αἰτία οὐ ταῦτα, ἀλλὰ πλοῦτος, καὶ ἡ περὶ τὰς διαίτας ἀκολασία. Enimvero luxuria hominum videtur in aëris & aquæ temperiem culpam referre: atqui non hæc cauſam luxuriæ præbent, ſed divitiæ & victus intemperans ratio (4). According to Vitruvius the fountain Salmacis was reported to have that ill quality, not becauſe thoſe, who drank of it, became leud and voluptuous, but becauſe it afforded the Barbarians an opportunity of growing civil and tractable, and leaving off their fierceneſs: for being expelled by the colony, which the Argivi ſettled in Halicarnaſſus, they were obliged to return to that fountain for want of water, and ſo they converſed with the Grecians, and grew polite. Deſcendebant aquatum ad notum ſibi fontem, atque ibi in Græcorum conſuetudinem & ſuavitatem ſua voluntate reducebantur. Hinc aqua illa, non impudico morbi vitio, ſed humanitatis dulcedine mollitis animis barbarorum eam famam eſt adepta (5).

(4) Strabo, ubi ſupra.

(5) Vitruvius, lib. ii, cap. viii.

[B] Her intreaties not being able to move the heart of that inſenſible youth.] Hermaphroditus began to travel through the world at fifteen years of age. He was a very handſome boy; the nymph Salmacis did no ſooner perceive him on the banks of her fountain but ſhe fell in love with him. Though her amorous paſſion made her very impatient, ſhe nevertheleſs put on her beſt apparel and painted her face before ſhe went to him.

Nec tamen ante adiit, etſi properabat adire,
Quam ſe compoſuit, quam circumſpexit amictus,
Et finxit vultum, & meruit formoſa videri (6).

(6) Ovid. Met. lib. iv, ver. 317.

Fain would ſhe meet the youth with haſty feet,
She fain would meet him, but refus'd to meet;
Before her looks were ſet with niceſt care,
And well deſerv'd to be reputed fair.

ADDISON.

Her compliment contained few needleſs things: If you are not a god, ſaid ſhe to him, you look like one: happy is your father, happy are your mother, your ſiſter and your nurſe, but happier ſtill ſhe, who is, or ſhall have the honour to be your wife. If you are a married man, be unfaithful to your wife for my ſake; and if you are not married, I deſire to become your wife immediately.

Sed longè cunctis longeque beatior illa eſt,
Si qua tibi ſponſa eſt, ſi quam dignabere tædâ.
Nunc tibi ſive aliqua eſt, mea ſit furtiva voluptas:
Seu nulla eſt, ego ſim, thalamumque ineamus eundem (7).

(7) Id. ibid. ver. 325.

But oh how bleſt! how more than bleſt thy bride,
Ally'd in bliſs, if any yet ally'd.
If ſo, let mine the ſtolen enjoyments be;
If not, behold a willing bride in me.

ADDISON.

Theſe words made the young man bluſh; but his modeſty and his ſilence did not put a ſtop to her violent paſſion: ſhe aſked him many kiſſes, at leaſt ſuch as are given to a ſiſter: and at laſt ſhe was ready to take him about the neck, when he plainly told her that he would run away, if ſhe would not be quiet.

Poſcenti Nymphæ ſine fine ſororia ſaltem
Oſcula, jamque manus ad eburnea colla ferenti,
Deſinis? aut fugio, tecumque ait, iſta relinquo (8).

(8) Ovid. ibid. ver. 334.

The nymph ſtill begs, if not a nobler bliſs,
A cold ſalute at leaſt, a ſiſter's kiſs:
And now prepares to take the lovely boy
Between her arms. He innocently coy,
Replies, or leave me to myſelf alone,
You rude uncivil nymph, or I'll be gone.

ADDISON.

Being thunder-ſtruck with this ſpeech, ſhe withdrew, but did not loſe all hopes: ſhe hid herſelf in a thicket, and perceiving Hermaphroditus in the water, ſhe was ſo inflamed with love that ſhe threw herſelf into it ſtark naked. She took hold of him, kiſſed him in ſpite of all that he could do, pawed him, and hugged him ſo cloſely that he was not able to extricate himſelf: but that was all ſhe could get of him; he perſiſted in his indifferency.

Veſte procul jacta, mediis immittitur undis,
Pugnantemque tenet, luctantiaque oſcula carpit;
Subjectatque manus, invitaque pectora tangit:
Et nunc hac juveni, nunc circumfunditur illac.
Denique nitentem contrà, elabique volentem
Implicat ut ſerpens, quam regia ſuſtinet ales.

. . . .

Perſtat Atlantiades, ſperataque gaudia Nymphæ
Denegat: illa premit, demiſſaque corpore toto
Sicut inhærebat, Pugnes licèt, improbe, dixit,
Non tamen effugies. Ita dii jubeatis, & iſtum
Nulla dies à me, nec me deducat ab iſto!
Vota ſuos habuêre deos (9).

(9) Id. ibid. ver. 357.

He's mine, he's all my own, the Naïd cries,
And flings off all and after him ſhe flies.
And now ſhe faſtens on him as he ſwims,
And holds him cloſe, and wraps about his limbs.
The more the boy reſiſted, and was coy,
The more ſhe clipt and kiſt the ſtruggling boy.
So when the wrigling ſnake is ſnatch'd on high
In eagles claws . . . . . .

. . . .

The reſtleſs boy ſtill obſtinately ſtrove
To free himſelf, and ſtill refus'd her love.
Amidſt his limbs ſhe kept her limbs intwin'd,
And why, coy youth, ſhe cries, why thus unkind!
Oh may the gods thus keep us ever join'd!
Oh may we never, never part again!
So pray'd the nymph, nor did ſhe pray in vain.

ADDISON.

It was then that the nymph begged of the gods that ſhe might never be parted from the beloved object ſhe held between her arms. What ſhe aſked was granted her; and this was the origin of Hermaphrodites.

Every body knows the moral reflexions grounded upon that fable; but every body does not know the myſtery that ſome have found in it. They pretend that the Antients did thereby inſinuate, that the fair ſex ought not to begin the attack, but leave it to men, and ſtand upon the defenſive. If the parts were changed, ſay they, there would be a great decay in the empire of love. It is true that women would make vigorous and furious attacks; but men would make a better defence ſtill, and all this would end in nothing but monſters and prodigies. See Mr de Fontenelle in his dialogue between Sappho and Laura; ever in the poſture ſhe was in. Her requeſt was granted: her body and that of Hermaphroditus made but one perſon with the diſtinguiſhing marks of both ſexes. Hermaphroditus perceiving that change, obtained from Venus and Mercury by his entreaties that the water of that fountain ſhould have the virtue of making people effeminate. Strabo and Vitruvius deny that it had that virtue, and alledge ſome other reaſons for the ill report that was made of it (a). It is a miſtake to ſay that this ſon of Venus and Mercury was born with the parts of both ſexes, and that, according to Peter Gregory, it was Mercury who ſhewed ſo much indifference for the nymph Salmacis [C].

(a) See the remark [A].

the reſult of which is as follows. ‘ Men would defend themſelves too well. When it is required that a ſex ſhould reſiſt, it is required that it ſhould carry this reſiſtance juſt ſo far as is neceſſary to make the other ſex reliſh the victory, but not far enough to obtain the victory itſelf. A ſex ought not to be ſo weak as to ſurrender immediately, nor ſo ſtrong as never to ſurrender. This is our character, and perhaps it would not be that of the men. Believe me, after many reaſonings about love or any other matter whatſoever, it will be found at laſt that things are very well as they are, and that a reformation would ſpoil all (10).’ It were a difficult thing to foreſee what would happen, if the ſex that reſiſts ſhould become the aggreſſor, and if the ſex which attacks ſhould ſtand upon the defenſive. The conjectures, that may be made upon ſome few haſty advances of the fair ſex, which have proved unſucceſsful, cannot be depended upon. It is likely that ſuch advances have oftner ſucceeded. What is certain is that men upon a thouſand occaſions wherein they ſtand upon the defenſive, betray a great weakneſs, make but little reſiſtance, and are baſely overcome. Though they are convinced that they have been deceived and betrayed, though they are reſolved to revenge themſelves, though they threaten, and ſwear they will never ſee that unfaithful woman; yet ſome flattering words, ſome ſighs, and one or two tears will quickly pacify them.

(10) Fontenelle, Dialogues des Morts anciens avèc les modernes, pag. 47. Dutch Edit.

Et quod nunc tute tecum iratus cogitas:
Egone illam? quæ illum? quæ me? quæ non? ſine modo?
Mori me malim: ſentiet qui vir ſiem.
Hæc verba me hercule una falſa lacrumula,
Quam oculos terendo miſere vix vi expreſſerit,
Reſtinguet: & te ultro accuſabis, & ei dabis
Ultro ſupplicium (11).

(11) Terent. Eunuch. Act. I, Scena I.

Being ſenſible that what is required of them is unjuſt and ſhameful, they are reſolved not to grant it; but can they refuſe it, if it be begged of them with great importunity, and if they mind the craftineſs and fawning of a cocquet? It is a great miſtake to depend upon their reſiſtance: if nature had put them upon the defenſive, they would be quickly overcome. It is better that the reſiſting part ſhould be allotted to women. Let us remember Moliere's weakneſs (12).

(12) See the article POQUELIN, remark [C].

As for thoſe, who in order to prove that reſiſtance has not been rightly allotted to women, maintain that they defend themſelves only by an ill principle; they ought to be rejected as moroſe, capricious, and unjuſt cenſurers: and though they ſhould repeat a hundred times over and over that women make a reſiſtance only to kindle a greater fire, and ſet a higher price upon themſelves, without pretending to a final perſeverance; though they ſhould ſay as many times that the reaſon why they diſpute the ground, is becauſe they are afraid of giving a quick diſguſt, and that therefore their long delay is not very meritorious, they would not deſerve to be heard. Neither they, nor their verſes ought to be minded (13). Grant them only that nice men are willing to meet with ſome difficulties, and do not congratulate themſelves upon their meeting with none, as did the perſon upon whom the following epigram was made.

(13) See Chevreau's Oeuvres diverſes, p. 531.

Hoc te nomine prædicas beatum,
Gilli, quòd facili fruare amica
Et benigna adeò, ut rogata nondum,
Mox ſupina cadat, pedeſque tollat.
Sed erras nimiùm, miſelle Gilli:
Nam quæ nil penitus negare neſcit,
Opus, non homines, amat puella:
Et quæcunque nimis cadit libenter,
Surgit iſta nimis quoque illibenter (14).

(14) Beza, in Juvenilibus, fol. m. 56.

You glory, Gillius, in this
That you an eaſy miſtreſs kiſs,
So kind, ſo coming, and ſo free
That, long before you aſk her, ſhe
Will proſtrate fall, ſubmiſſive lie,
And toſs her wanton leg on high.
Alas, poor man, how ill you chuſe!
Since one that nothing can refuſe,
Does not the man but work affect:
And as you'll find, if you reflect,
She who ſo readily doth fall
Is loth to riſe again at all.

I repeat the words of Mr de Fontenelle, Things are very well as they are. If the queſtion was about bodily ſtrength, they ſhould want to be reformed; the reſiſting part had not been rightly allotted: but ſince the queſtion is about attacks upon the heart, it belongs in juſtice to the ſex, which exceeds the other in beauty, good air, and addreſs.

[C] It is a miſtake to ſay, that he was born with the parts of both ſexes, and that . . . . it was Mercury, who ſhewed ſo much indifference for Salmacis.] A modern author ſays, that Venus being got with child by Mercury, was delivered of an infant, which had both ſexes. ‘ Venerem à Mercurio compreſſam autumant (poëtæ) talem prolem genuiſſe, quæ ſexum utrumque participarit, ſicuti apud Ovidium, lib. iv. Metamorph. videre eſt, dum ſcribit.

Mercurio puerum & divâ Cithereide natum
Naïades Ideis enutrivere ſub antris,
Cujus erat ſpecies, in quâ materque paterque
Cognoſci poſſent, nomenque traxit ab iſtis.

Item;

Nec duo ſunt, ſed forma duplex, nec fœmina dici,
Nec puer ut poſſit, neutrumque & utrumque videtur.

‘ Tametſi eundem ex Mercurio & Salmacide, unâ Nympharum Naïadum genitum dicat Petrus Gregorius in Syntagm. Jur. univ. lib. vii. cap. 2. num. 8. (15). --- The Poets affirm that Venus, being impregnated by Mercury, was delivered of a child, which had both ſexes; as we find in the 4th book of Ovid's Metamorphoſis, where he ſays,

(15) Jacob. Mollerus, Cameræ Elector. Brandeb. & Regiminis Neo-Marchici Advocatus, patriæque Franco-Viadrinæ Juris Practicus, in Diſcurſu Juridico-Philologico de Hermaphroditis, eorumque jure, cap. i, pag. 145. That book was printed in 1692.

The Naïds nurs'd an infant heretofore,
That Cytherea once to Hermes bore:
From both th' illuſtrious authors of his race
The child was nam'd: nor was it hard to trace
Both the bright parents thro' the infant's face.

Likewiſe;

Both bodies in a ſingle body mix,
A ſingle body with a double ſex.

ADDISON.

‘ Altho' Gregorius Toloſanus ſays that this ſame child was begotten of Mercury and Salmacis, one of the Naïds.

There are two things in theſe words which want to be rectified. The two laſt verſes do not concern the ſtate that the ſon of Venus was in, before Salmacis embraced him; for he had then only the maſculine ſex: they concern the ſtate he found himſelf in, when the prayers of Salmacis were heard. There is a vaſt number of ſuch proofs in authors. Here are the the words of Gregorius Toloſanus. Non ſecus quam & illi nugantur qui cum fabula Ovidii, lib. (16). Metamorph. fab. 10 (17). narrant Androgynem factum ex Salmacide una Nympharum Naïadam, & filio Mercurii. - - - - No otherwiſe than thoſe authors fancy, who, according to the 10*th fable in the* 4*th book of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, tell us, that an Androgyne, or Hermaphrodite, was made out of Salmacis, one of the Naïds, and the ſon of Mercury.* That Civilian had been ſaying, that, according to Plato, all men were at firſt Androgynes, but being divided into two, nothing remained of them but the name, which even became a ſhameful one. This is partly true, and partly falſe. Plato does not ſay that all men were Androgynes (18), but he obſerves that this name was opprobrious (19). He is in the right to ſay ſo; for beſides that it is queſtioned whether Hermaphrodites are not monſters, that name is beſtowed upon the moſt infamous debauchees. Licet etiam Hermaphroditus is dicatur, qui turpiter & facit & patitur adverſus & averſus impudicus, uti docet Suidas in voce ἑρμαφρόδιτος (20). There is a book intituled, L'Iſle des Hermaphrodites nouvellement deſcouverte, avec les mœurs, loix, couſtumes, & ordonnances des habitans d'icelle. It is an ingenious ſatire upon the court of Henry III.

(16) The number 4 ſhould have been inſerted here.

(17) It is the eleventh in the good editions.

(18) See in the article SADEUR, a true account of Plato's Androgynes. Mollerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 147, relates the thing as Gregorius Toloſanus does.

(19) Ἐν ὀνείδει ὄνομα κείμενον. Nomen infame relictum. Plato, in Convivio, pag. m. 1185.

(20) Jacob Mollerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 145.

SAMBLANÇAI (JAMES DE BEAUNE, BARON DE) ſuperintendant of the finances in the reign of Francis I, was condemned to be hanged for imbezzling the king's treaſure. That ſentence, which happened to be too ſevere, was executed the twelfth of Auguſt 1527 (a); but he was declared innocent ſome time after his death (b). He was a native of Touraine (c). I ſhall ſet down ſomewhat at large the circumſtances of his trial, as they are to be found in a book of Varillas [A].

(a) Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitaine, fol. 232, where you will find the ſentence.

(b) Varillas, Hiſt. de François I, livr. iii, pag. m. 216.

(c) Bouchet, ubi ſupra, fol. 232, verſo.

[A] I ſhall ſet down . . . . the circumſtances of his trial, as they are to be found in . . . . Varillas (1)]. The king being informed that Lautrec had not received the money deſigned for him, ſent for Samblançai: ‘ And inſtead of calling him his father, as he uſed to do, looked upon him with an ill eye, and aſked him why he had not remitted to Lautrec the three hundred thouſand crowns, which had been promiſed ſo poſitively. Samblançai not being yet ſenſible of the danger he was in, anſwered, with his uſual ingenuity, that upon the ſame day that aſſignments for the Milaneſe had been drawn up, his majeſty's mother came to the treaſury, and demanded the whole payment of what was due to her, as well in penſions and gratifications, as for the duchies of Valois, Touraine, and Anjou, that were ſettled upon her: that he repreſented to her, that if he ſhould give her ſuch a great ſum all at once, the king's treaſure would be drained, and the fund deſigned for the duchy of Milan diverted contrary to what had been ordered by the king that morning in her preſence, and which ſhe had agreed to: but that this princeſs perſiſted in her demand, and threatened to undo him, if he refuſed to give her all that ſhe aſked: and upon his repreſenting to her that his life would be in danger, if Lautrec found no money upon his arrival at Milan, ſhe replied, that her intereſt with the king was ſufficient to prevent his being proſecuted, and that if he ſhould be called to an account for miſapplying the money deſigned for Italy, it was * but ſaying he had done it by her order. The king, to be better informed of the matter, ſent for his mother, and Samblançai repeated the whole ſtory in her preſence; upon which ſhe fell into ſuch a paſſion, that, notwithſtanding the reſpect ſhe owed to her ſon, ſhe gave the lie to Samblançai, and deſired to be revenged of that raſh man, who pretended that ſhe was guilty of high-treaſon. But becauſe it would have appeared by the dates of the receipts, ſhe had left in the king's treaſure, that ſhe had received the money deſigned for Lautrec, ſhe confeſſed that ſhe had demanded the payment of her penſions; but ſhe maintained that Samblançai had paid her the money, without telling her that it was the ſame which was to have been ſent to Milan. She denied what Samblançai had further ſaid, and ſo earneſtly deſired he ſhould be impriſoned, proteſting, however, that it was only the better to clear herſelf of the crime laid to her charge, that the king was obliged to give orders for his being arreſted in the anti-chamber. . . . . (2) Samblançai was no ſooner a priſoner, but commiſſioners were appointed for his trial (3). . . . The imbezzling of the king's treaſure was the only crime he was tried for; and he was condemned to death, whether becauſe the judges were afraid of exaſperating the king's mother if they ſhould vote for a leſſer puniſhment; or becauſe they were prepoſſeſſed with an opinion, that a man cannot have for a long time the management of the king's money with clean hands. The execution was public. . . . . . All authors do not agree about the circumſtances I have mentioned, and ſome will have it that Samblançai was undone by another court-intrigue. They ſay † that the king's mother gave him her receipts written and ſigned with her own hand for the money ſhe took of him; but that the chief deputy ⸸ of that treaſurer fell paſſionately in love with a lady belonging to the king's mother, who perſuaded him to ſteal the receipts of that princeſs; which was done; that the king's mother being thereby enabled to undo Samblançai, when ſhe pleaſed, without any riſk to her ſelf, denied that ſhe had received any money of him, and that Samblançai not finding the receipts to convict her, was apprehended and condemned; that he was publickly executed; but that the truth did not come out till the king's mother, being a-dying, revealed it to the king, and begged his pardon for it. Laſtly, ſome manuſcripts affirm, that the way they took to ruin Samblançai was, by demanding a vaſt ſum of him for the preſſing neceſſities of the ſtate; that he excuſed himſelf not only becauſe the king's treaſure was empty, but alſo becauſe the king owed him above three hundred thouſand livres; and that this afforded a pretence to make him give an exact account of his adminiſtration; that he gave it in form, and becauſe his papers were in good order, he made it appear that his majeſty owed him the ſum mentioned by him; that the thing had gone no farther, if he had been as great a Politician as he was a great Financier; but that he unſeaſonably gave way to the itch of proſecuting thoſe who had unjuſtly accuſed him, being not contented with his glorious defence, and that beſides he perſiſted in requiring immediate payment of the money the king owed him, tho' no body knew better than he that his majeſty was not able to pay him; that Samblançai came ill off in the affair, becauſe the miniſters not knowing any other way to get rid of his importunity, bribed a man of Tours, called Prevoſt, his deputy, who ſtole from him the private receipts; that when they had in their hands what had been hitherto wanting in order to his being convicted of imbezzling the king's money, he was arreſted, and commiſſioners out of the parliaments of Paris and Bourdeaux were appointed to try him; that he deſired to be tried by his ordinary, who was the Archbiſhop of Tours, by virtue of his letters of Tonſure, which he ſhewed; but that the archbiſhop, who was his ſon, happened to die at that time; that Samblançai was ‡ condemned to be hanged; and was executed on the 14th of Auguſt, 1523, being ſixty-two years of age; that he was carried to the gallows at Monſaucon at one of the clock in the afternoon, and that he got his execution put off till ſeven a-clock in the evening, in hopes that the king would ſend him his pardon upon the ladder, as he had ſent it to Saint Vallier upon the ſcaffold; but that the perſon who attended on him, having at laſt told him that there was no pardoned to be hoped for *, he put himſelf into the hands of the executioner, ſaying, that he knew too late that it was better to ſerve the King of Heaven than the kings of the earth, and that if he had done for GOD what he had done for the king, he had been better rewarded. Neverthele ſs it appears by the epigrams of the famous Poet Clement Marot, which contains ſeveral particulars of the life of

(1) Varillas, Hiſt. de François I. livr. iii, pag. 214. ad ann. 1522. Dutch Edit.

* In the trial of James de Beaulnes, Seigneur de Samblançay, Treaſurer of the king's exchequer.

(2) Varillas, ibid. pag. 215.

(3) Viz. Chancellor du Prat, who was beholden for his fortune to the king's mother, Preſident Gentil, and ſome other counſellors who were the chancellor's friends. Varillas, ibid. pag. 216. Belcarius ſeems to me more worthy of credit, who does not ſay that Chancellor du Prat, bipedum omnium nequiſſimus. - - - The greateſt of all villains, was one of the commiſſioners but that he choſe them. Belcarius, lib. xvii, numb. 12.

† Towards the latter end of the old chronicle of Angers.

⸸ Viz. Gentil. who was made afterwards preſident.

‡ In Bochel's Pratique criminelle.

* In the Annales d'Aquitaine.

‘ Francis I, not to be found any where elſe, that Samblançai died bravely, and that the timorouſneſs of ‘ the perſon, who conducted him to the place of ‘ execution, gave a greater luſtre to his courage.’

The firſt account of this author is a paraphraſe upon Belcarius, who obſerves that Lautrec fell under the indignation of the king's mother, becauſe he ſpoke too freely of her amorous intrigues (4). Note, that Gentil, who, according to Varillas, had been one of Samblançai's Judges, was hanged (5) ſome years after (6).

(4) Eam (curam) ad matrem Lautrecio infeſtam, quod de ejus impudicitia liberius loquutus fuiſſet, rejecerit. Belcarius, Comment. Rerum Gallicar. lib. xvii, num. xii, pag. 509.

(5) See his epitaph in Beza's Juvenilia, fol. m. 30. verſo.

(6) Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitaine, pag. 281, ſays it was about the year 1538, and that he was preſident in the court of Inqueſts in the Parliament of Paris, and a native of Italy, and that he was guilty of ſtealing the receipts of Treaſurer Poncher, who had been hanged at Paris for want of them.

SAMBLANÇAI (William de Beaune, Baron de) the ſon of the foregoing, was the father of four ſons and one daughter, who made a great figure in the court of France. I. James de Beaune, Baron de Samblançai, viſcount of Tours, &c. was the eldeſt. He was knight of the order of St Michael, and Gentleman of the king's bed-chamber in ordinary; and left behind him but one daughter, who was very much talked of by reaſon of her beauty and galantry under the name of Madam de Sauve (a). The third ſon of William de Beaune was known by the name of Monſieur la Tour d'Argi, and was the Father of Mary de Beaune, the wife of Annæus de Montmorency Marquis de Turi. The fourth was Chancellor to Catherine de Medicis, Biſhop of Puy (b), and Abbot of Royaumont (c). He died in the year 1565. I have paſſed over the ſecond becauſe I have ſo many things to ſay of him that I deſign to beſtow a paragraph upon him. The daughter was married firſt to Lewis Burgenſis, firſt Phyſician to the King, and Sieur de Montgauguier (d), and then ſhe was the fourth wife of Claudius Gouffier, Marquis de Boiſi, Duke of Rouanez, and maſter of horſe to the king. She died without iſſue. Brantome (e) ſays, that before ſhe was called Madam de Rouanez, ſhe went by the name of Madam de Chateaubrion. He adds, that ſhe was a great favourite of Queen Catherine de Medicis, her miſtreſs. He is in the right to ſay ſo; Thuanus ſays the ſame [A].

Renaud de Beaune, the ſecond ſon of William, was Archbiſhop of Bourges and then of Sens in the reign of Henry IV, and one of the moſt eloquent and learned prelates of that time. But what makes him more illuſtrious, is, that he did not depart, as ſo many other Eccleſiaſtics did, from the laws of the kingdom concerning the ſucceſſion to the crown. He maintained to the laſt that though the King of Navarre was a heretic, the crown of France did lawfully belong to him after the deceaſe of Henry III. In order to maintain this aſſertion he ſet forth in the conferences of Surene (f) the moſt ſpecious reaſons that the Law and the Scripture can afford: but his wit, eloquence, and learning, did not perſuade the deputies of the League; for beſides their being reſolved not to yield, whether they could anſwer the reaſons of the royaliſts or not, they were headed by Peter d'Epinac Archbiſhop of Lyons, who was not inferior to Renaud de Beaune in wit, eloquence, and learning, and who alledged, as well as he, divine and human laws [B]; ſo that after ſeveral fine diſcourſes they were obliged to think

(a) See the Memoirs of Queen Margaret, and Mezerai, Hiſtoire de France, Tom. iii, in fol. p. 361.

(b) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. i, pag. 513.

(c) Moreri, at the word Beaune, a family.

(d) Le Laboureur, ubi ſupra, pag. 322.

(e) Eloge de Catherine de Medicis, pag. 97.

(f) In 1593.

[A] Thuanus ſays the ſame.] He ſays (1) that Margaret (2) de Beaune, the wife of Claudius Gouffier, Marquis de Boiſi, ſiſter to Renaud de Beaune, Archbiſhop of Bourges, procured very noble employments to her brother, becauſe ſhe had a great intereſt at court; ſo far that Rouanez was erected into a duchy in conſideration of her marriage with the Marquis de Boiſi. Commendatione ſororis Margaritæ gratioſæ in aula fæminæ, quæ ſub id Claudio Guſerio Boſſii marchioni & Rodamnæ ob id creato duci magno Franciæ ſcutifero nupſit, maximis jam tum negotiis adhibitus, etiam Franſciſci Alenconii Ducis Cancellarius fuit (3). This is one of the things daughters are good for in a family: they are ſometimes the only cauſe of the fortune of their brothers and relations. Perhaps Renaud de Beaune, notwithſtanding all his fine qualities, would have remained all his life-time in a mean condition, had not his ſiſter's intereſt put him in the way of raiſing himſelf, and given him the opportunities of diſcovering his merit, and of being rewarded for his firſt ſervices by more conſiderable employments. That Hiſtorian adds, that the family of Beaune, and that of Thou, had contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip long before; and that after the ſad death of James de Beaune ſuperintendant of the finances, his children, forſaken by every body at court, and in the city, as it happens on like occaſions, found a ſanctuary among the de Thou's; that Renaud de Beaune lodged for ſome time in the houſe of Auguſtin de Thou, grandfather to the Hiſtorian Thuanus, and that from that very time there was a talk of marrying Chriſtopher de Thou, Auguſtin's ſon, to Margaret de Beaune, Renaud's ſiſter; that tho' this project had no effect, that lady had always been a hearty friend to Chriſtopher de Thou, and uſed her intereſt for him, when ſhe was in favour, more than for any body elſe, except her brothers; that ſhe intruſted him, as being her particular friend, with her laſt will, many years before ſhe died. Beſides ſhe made him executor of her will (4).

[B] Who alledged, as well as he, divine and human laws.] Thuanus has inſerted, in the 106th book of his hiſtory what was alledged on both ſides. Cayet (5) relates it more at large, and ſays, (6) among other things, that the Archbiſhop of Bourges, who could not deny that each party alledged ſeveral examples, and made uſe of the authority of the Scripture to prove their opinions, and retorted it in a different ſenſe, confined himſelf to this maxim, that one might have the right underſtanding of the Scripture, ‘ by invoking the holy Spirit of ‘ God, who gives it to thoſe that aſk for it, and imprints the knowledge of truth in their minds, intellectum bonum dat petentibus eum.’ He added, ‘ that ‘ the voice of Christ and his Apoſtles was evident, ‘ and that Chriſtians were continually told that they ‘ ought to fear God, honour the king, and render to ‘ God what is due to him, and to Cæſar what belongs to him; that every ſoul was to obey the powers ordained by God . . . but that he would no ‘ longer ſpend time in confuting the paſſages, and ‘ examples, that had been alledged, which could not ‘ hinder our ſubmitting to what is expreſly commanded in the word of God.’ This ſeems to be his meaning: when the Scripture is made uſe of to maintain contrary opinions, the beſt way to extricate one's ſelf from the difficulties that confound our reaſon, is humbly to implore the direction of the holy Spirit. By the help of this direction we may be able to ſee what ſide we ought to chuſe, as knowing that the expreſs orders of God ought to be our rule, and not ſome particular examples, which ſeem to be exceptions to thoſe orders. This maxim ſeems to be reaſonable, but I do not ſee how it can compoſe differences; for

(1) Thuan. de Vita ſua, lib. iii, pag. m. 1194.

(2) Mr le Laboureur, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. i, pag. 322. and Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers de la Couronne, pag. 469, call him Claudius.

(3) Thuan. ibid.

(4) Ante mortem diu condito teſtamento illud apud ſingularem amicum, ſic eum vocabat, depoſuit, ejuſque executorem ipſum nominavit. Id. ibid.

(5) In the fifth book of the Chronologie Novenaire.

(6) Ibid. fol. 170, verſo.

think of another expedient [C], viz. that the King of Navarre ſhould change his religion. This was the only thing which cut the Gordian knot. The pleadings of Renaud de Beaune do at this day more honour to the Clergy of France [D], than they did good at that time to Henry IV. Thuanus ſays a pretty remarkable thing of this prelate, which is, that he was a prodigious eater [E]. I add that he was at firſt counſellor in the parliament of Paris, afterwards preſident of the court of Inqueſts, and then maſter of the Requeſts; after that Biſhop of Mande, and Chancellor to the Duke of Alençon, ſon of Henry II (g). He had an admirable memory; for forty years after he had ſtudied the Claſſics under James Tuſanus and James Stracel, he remembred the fine paſſages which they had taught him in good Greek and Latin authors, and applied them with a good grace, and very judiciouſly, though the great affairs that paſſed thro' his hands might have blotted out of his memory thoſe old ideas which he had no leiſure to refreſh (h).

The

for each party will boaſt that they have implored the direction of the holy Spirit, and will maintain, if the intereſt of their cauſe requires it, that commands ought to be explained by examples, that is, that their caſe requires that the example of the Maccabees, &c. ſhould be imitated, inſtead of conforming to St Paul's precept, Let every ſoul be ſubject to the higher powers. We muſt therefore allow, that whilſt ſovereigns have no better ſupport than the doctrines of Divines, they rely upon weather-cocks, that turn with every wind, and uſe the word of GOD as a noſe of wax, to the great ſcandal of good and pious ſouls, and the great ſatisfaction of prophane men, and free-thinkers, who are charmed with having an opportunity to ſay of the Spirit that inſpired the Prophets and Apoſtles, the ſame thing which the Proteſtants ſay of the Spirit that makes the Pope ſpeak ex Cathedra, and the councils; viz. that he believes like a common father between the Thomiſts and the Scotiſts (7), that he qualifies his expreſſions in ſuch a manner as to favour both parties alike, that he will neither diſarm thoſe who revolt, nor ſhelter them from the attacks of thoſe who perſiſt in their obedience; in a word, that he follows the example of neutral cities, where they ſell arms to both ſides.

[C] They were forced to think of another expedient.] Maimbourg does agreeably and neatly relate what he took out of Victor Cajet. 'The two heads of the 'deputation on both ſides, ſays he (8), two of the moſt 'dexterous and eloquent men of their age, were men 'of too great abilites, and maintained their opinions 'with too much wit and ſtrength, to come to an 'agreement in their diſpute. The Archbiſhop of Bourges, in the three ſpeeches he made to prove his aſ'ſertion, and to confirm it by confuting the anſwer 'made to it, alledged the ſtrongeſt arguments to per'ſuade the Leaguers of theſe three things, which he 'conſtantly maintained to the laſt as ſo many unde'niable truths. 1. That men are obliged to acknow'ledge and honour as their king the perſon, to whom 'the kingdom belongs, by the inviolable right of a 'lawful ſucceſſion, without any regard to the religion 'he profeſſes, or to his morals.' 2. That King Henry IV was neither a Heathen nor an Arian, nor a perſecutor of the Catholic Church, and was reſolved to renounce his errors, as ſoon as he ſhould be inſtructed in the truth. 3. That all the French ought to acknowledge him, and then unanimouſly endeavour to inſtruct him. The Archbiſhop of Lyons anſwered (9), thoſe three points one after another, and declared that ſo long as the King of Navarre remained an Heretic they would have no commerce with him. The Archbiſhop of Bourges replied with great force; but ſeeing the Leaguers were not to be ſhaken, he told them the king was thoroughly reſolved to be converted (10). Here is a ſovereign prince indeed: he cannot ſo much as prevail upon his ſubjects, that they would be ſo good as to let him ſerve GOD according to the light of his conſcience. It is a ſhame to Chriſtianity to have introduced into the world ſo great a diſorder. It is the part of ſubjects to beg liberty of conſcience of their ſovereign; but here are ſubjects who refuſe it to him.

[D] His pleadings do at this day more honour to the Clergy of France.] The League has furniſhed the Proteſtants with abundance of unanſwerable arguments againſt the ſeditious maxims of the court of Rome, adopted by an infinity of Laymen and Eccleſiaſtics. Theſe objections would have been ſtronger, if all the Clergy of France had followed the rebellion; but ſince one of the principal prelates, ſpeaking for a conſiderable part of the Catholics, maintained ſo ſolemnly the doctrine of obedience, people fancy there is nothing to be feared for the future, and that the acts of the conference of Surene can afford both defenſive and offenſive arms.

[E] He was a prodigious eater.] Scarce had he ſlept four hours, but hunger forced him to riſe and eat his breakfaſt; which he did regularly at one of the clock in the morning, or rather ſooner, he repoſed till four a-clock, and then he went to eat: he did the ſame at eight: he dined at the uſual hours: he eat a collation four hours after: he ſupped plentifully at the uſual hour, and took another collation before he went to bed. He did not eat after the French faſhion; for in winter he was at leaſt an hour at table, and an hour and a quarter in ſummer. For this reaſon he cared not to dine abroad, and when a great prince, who had often invited him, and found him always armed with excuſes, aſked him the reaſon of his refuſal, he gave him this anſwer, You do not eat like a man, but like a dog; that is, you make too much haſte. That prince promiſed to remedy this inconvenience, and was as good as his word, for he ordered his ſteward, that when this prelate ſhould be there, he ſhould put a pretty diſtance of time between each courſe (11). Cibum autem ita per otium ſumebat, ut ſumendo horam integram impenderet hieme, æſtate, in qua tardior orexis, horæ etiam quadrantem adderet, & ambulantibus, quales in aula noſtra, cœnis ſummopere offendebatur; adeo ut cum ſæpius à principe primario ad prandium invitaretur, & toties ſe excuſaret, rogatus quî id faceret, facete reſponderit, illum non humano ſed canino more prandium uſurpare, feſtinatus nimis epulas intelligens. Quo intellecto ille eum ſe non ſolum laute quod ſemper faciebat, ſed prolixe accepturum promiſit, & eo invitato ſemper ſtructorem monebat, ut miſſibus adponendis legitimum tempus interponeret (12). Another thing in him was very ſingular; this prodigious quantity of meat did not make him heavy nor drowzy, nor full of vapours: he was always well diſpoſed for the exerciſes of the mind (13); as for thoſe of the body he took care to uſe none; he durſt not walk for fear of exciting his appetite. 'In 'tanta ciborum, quibus alebatur copia, cum nec mem'brorum agitatione, nec deambulationibus, ne exupe'rantem appetitum proritaret, corpus exerceret, na'turam ſucco nimio turgentem medicamentis purgan'tibus crebro adjuvabat, quæ medicæ rei non ignarus 'domi per homines peritos ſibi parabat. Itaque raro 'ægrotabat, & quamvis in ſumma corporis pigritia 'mens ſemper laboraret, nunquam fatigabatur (14). '- - - After ſuch quantities of victuals which he eat, 'as he uſed no ſort of exerciſe, nor walking, for fear of 'exciting his voracious appetite; he eaſed nature, over'burthened with too much nouriſhment, by frequent pur'gatives; which, as he had ſome notion of Phyſic, he 'took care to have made up at home by ſkillful perſons. 'Thus he was ſeldom ſick, and, notwithſtanaing his 'great bodily indolence, his mind, tho' conſtantly at work, 'was never tired.' What Thuanus ſays of this method of eating at the court of France in haſte, and as it were walking, which did not pleaſe our René de Beaune, puts me in mind of a ſtory I have heard more than once. It is well known that Marſhal de Turenne commanded armies where were ſeveral foreign officers. They praiſed the good chear of his table, but could not endure that the meals ſhould be ſo ſhort, and eſpecially when they obſerved that the French officers were ſcarce riſen from table, but they began to aſk one another, what ſhall we do? Alas! ſaid the ſtrangers,

---

(g) Thuan. de Vita propria, lib. iii, pag. m. 1194.

(h) Id. ibid.

(7) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Feb. 1686, pag. 127.

(8) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, livr. iv, pag. 465.

(9) Ibid. p. 468.

(10) Ibid. p. 472.

(11) Thuan. de Vita, propria, lib. iii, circa init. pag. 1194.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Nunquam commotior aut ſomnolentior viſus, nulla gravedine aut dolore capitis tenebatur, ſemper æque ſui compos & ad omnia paratus, extra negotia quietem & confabulationes ſectabatur. Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

The fables he uttered out of the pulpit, I mean in the funeral oration of Catherine de Medicis, are ſo ridiculous [F] that they would ſcarce be pardonable in thoſe writers of romances, who have publiſhed the Hiſtory of the fair Maguelona and of Peter of Provence, of the four ſons of Aimon, and of Palmerin of Oliva, &c. Henry IV acknowledged ſeveral ways his fidelity and ſervices, but above all by the conſtancy with which he applied himſelf to ſurmount the long difficulties he met with at the court of Rome [G], about his tranſlation from the archbiſhopric of Bourges to the archbiſhopric of Sens.

gers, we were ſo well at table ; you ſeemed ſo impatient that one would have thought you had ſome great buſineſs to diſpatch, and now you know not what to do. Why did not you keep where you were, and let others do ſo too, ſince you do not know how to ſpend the time ?

[F] The fables he uttered . . . . in the funeral oration of Catherine de Medicis are ſo ridiculous.] Here is a ſpecimen of them. ‘ At the time that the great Captain Brennus led his army through all Italy and Greece, there were with him two French gentlemen, the one called Felonius, and the other Bono, who ſeeing the ill deſign that Brennus conceived after his great conqueſts, to go and ſeize upon the temple of Delphos, to pollute himſelf and his army with the ſacrilege of that temple, they both retired and went into Aſia, with their ſhips and men, where they penetrated ſo far that they came into the country of the Medes, which is near Lydia and Perſia, where having made ſeveral conqueſts, and obtained great victories, they retreated, paſſing through Italy, hoping to come back again to France. Felonius ſtopped at a place where Florence is now ſituated along the river Arno : the ſituation ſeemed very pleaſant and delightful to him, it being like one that before had pleaſed him in the country of the Medes, and he built there a city which is now called Florence. His companion Bono built the city of Bononia, not far from it : and from that time, by reaſon of the conqueſts and victories that Felonius had got in the country of the Medes, he was called Medicus among his people, the ſirname remaining in his family ; as we read of Paulus who was called Macedonicus, becauſe he had conquered Macedonia, and taken priſoner King Perſeus ; and of Scipio, who was called Africanus, for having done the ſame thing to Africa (15).’ Brantome, from whom I have this paſſage, adds ; I do not know from whence Mr de Beaune had this ſtory ; but it is very probable that before the king, and ſo great an aſſembly as was there at the queen's funeral, he would not have alledged it without ſome good authority (16). He had obſerved before he mentioned this fabulous genealogy, that this Archbiſhop of Bourges was as learned and as worthy a prelate as any in Chriſtendom, but that ſome ſaid of him that he was too credulous, and not fit to be weighed in the ſcales of St Michael, who weighs all good Chriſtians at the day of judgment, as they ſay (17). The Leaguers gave out that he was an Atheiſt (18).

Since I have mentioned his funeral oration of Catherine de Medicis, I ſhall obſerve that he alſo made that of the Duke of Alençon, in 1584 ; ‘ and becauſe in pronouncing the ſaid oration, which was very indifferent, he put his hand often to his beard, the following diſtich was made upon him (19)’ :

> Quod timet & patulo promiſſam pectore barbam
> Demulcet Biturix, hoc Ciceronis habet (20).

> In that he pants, and ſtrokes, and ſtrokes again
> His long large beard, this native of Touraine
> Reſembles Cicero . . . . . .

[G] The conſtancy with which he applied himſelf, to ſurmount the long difficulties he met with at the court of Rome.] I do not pretend to ſay that he withſtood thoſe difficulties without ever yielding : I only mean that having expected a more favourable time, he renewed his application till ſuch time as the thing was done. You will find the particulars of all this in the following account of Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie (21). ‘ In 1596, ſays he, the king had writ to the Pope in favour of Renaud de Beaune, Archbiſhop of Bourges, to have him tranſlated to the Biſhopric of Sens, and to obtain it for him gratis *. But the abſolution which this prelate had given the king in the abbey-church of St Dennis, and the motion he had made to the clergy in the aſſembly of Mantes, for creating a patriarch in France, had made him ſo odious to the court of Rome, that the Pope would not hear of him. Our cardinal (only then Biſhop of Rennes) in vain repreſented to the Pope and Cardinal Aldobrandino, that ſuch a refuſal or delay might, at the long run, be interpreted as done, becauſe this archbiſhop had taken the king's part, which would not only give offence to the king, but alſo to all the princes, prelates, lords, and gentlemen, who had followed him ; and it would be thought that there remained in the ſoul of his Holineſs ſome memory of the paſt offences and rancours : that the ill reports that were made of him to his Holineſs, were only grounded upon this, viz. That this prelate had found out a ſhorter way to ſerve the Catholic religion, and the authority of the holy See, than thoſe had done, who thinking to preſerve them, would have ruined them both, if their advice had been taken. All this did not move them, and the Pope excuſed his rigour, by ſaying that this affair would never paſs in the conſiſtory, and that the cardinals would oppoſe it, and from thence take occaſion to think ill of the king himſelf †. The affair remained thus till the promotion of Mr d'Oſſat, who in obedience to the king's orders, in the firſt days of his cardinalſhip began afreſh to ſollicit for this prelate's tranſlation. ⸸ But the Pope anſwered him again in the ſame ſtrain, and ſaid, That if he propoſed the affair to the conſiſtory he would receive an affront, being certainly informed that there were ſome cardinals who would oppoſe it. And the Cardinal Nephew added, That it was not even for that prelate's intereſt, that his affair ſhould be propoſed in the conſiſtory ‡‡ : by which he gave to underſtand, that there would be ſome things ript up there which would be to his confuſion. . . . . The king ſeeing the extream repugnancy the Pope had to the matter, and perceiving that his Holineſs would make him pay dearer for the favour than the thing was worth, reſolved at laſt to follow the prudent counſel of the Cardinal of Florence . . . (22) and he ordered our new cardinal (23) to tell the Pope, that tho' he had many reaſons to deſire the expedition of the Archbiſhopric of Sens in the perſon of the Archbiſhop of Bourges ; nevertheleſs, to comply with the will of his Holineſs, he would ceaſe to importune him any more.  And ſo the Pope was delivered from this purſuit, which infinitely diſpleaſed him, for the reaſons I have given ; till the beginning of the embaſſy of the Count de Bethune, who had orders to renew it three years after. And Cardinal d'Oſſat laboured ſo hard with him about it, that they obtained at laſt the tranſlation of the Archbiſhop of Bourges to the Archbiſhopric of Sens, which was expedited in the conſiſtory of the 29th of April, 1602 ⸸⸸.’

(15) Brantome, Mémoires des Dames illuſtres, pag. 32, & ſeq.

(16) Id. ib. p. 34.

(17) Id. ib. p. 32.

(18) See the notes upon the Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci, p. 87. & ſeq. Edit. 1699.

(19) Journal d'Henry III, ad 26 Junii 1584, pag. m. 80.

(20) See Martial, Epigramm. lxxxix. lib. ii.

(21) Amelot de la Houſſaie, Vie du Cardinal d'Oſſat, pag. 25, 26.

* Letter 76, 95.

† Letter 95.

⸸ In his audience the nineteenth of March.

‡‡ Letter 178.

(22) Amelot, ib. pag. 27.

(23) That is, d'Oſſat.

 Letter 183.

⸸⸸ Letters 310, 312.

SAMSON,

SAMSON, a judge of God's people. I ſhall not relate his Hiſtory, it is known to every body; you may read it in Moreri, and more at large in the Dictionary of the Bible (a). I will only obſerve one thing, which ſeems to me very ſingular. Some would have it, that by the words of the Scripture which tell us that the Philiſtines made him grind, is to be underſtood that they made him lye with their wives [A], that they might have a race from ſo brave a man. The allegory which La Mothe le Vayer found in the actions of this hero is more ingenious than true. He ſays they repreſent the Sceptic Philoſopher (b).

(a) Compoſed by Mr Simon, Doctor of Divinity, and printed at Lyons, 1693.

(b) See his Sceptical Treatiſe on the ſaying, n'avoir pas le ſens commun, in the ninth volume of his works, pag. 286, & ſeq.

[A] That they made him lie with their wives.] According to this we might find a new conformity between his hiſtory and that of Hercules. Be it as it will, it is certain that the Hebrew word, which ſignifies to grind, is ſometimes taken in an obſcene ſenſe. What is tranſlated in the book of Job, Let my wiſe grind unto another (1), ſignifies according to the vulgar, May my wiſe become the concubine of another, ſcortum alterius ſit uxor mea. But ſome would aſk, would Job ſay the ſame thing twice together? For it is clear that the following words, let others bow down upon her, ſuper illam incurventur alii, ſignify proſtitution. It is clear that incurvari ſignifies the ſame thing here as inclinare ſe in Plautus (2). This difficulty is nothing; for all antient writers, both ſacred and profane, afford us a thouſand examples of ſuch repetitions. Theſe words of the Lamentations of Jeremiah (3), They took the young men to grind, ſignify, according to the vulgar tranſlation, they have leudly abuſed the youth, adoleſcentibus impudice uſi ſunt. But here is a paſſage of St Jerom, quoted by Bruſius, which will afford me the proof I want. 'In tertio decimo commentariorum ſuper Jeſaiam, cap. 47. ad locum, Tolle molam, mole farinam, ita ſcribit, (Hieronymus) quia ſequitur denuda turpitudinem tuam, etiam mola ab Ebræis figuraliter intelligitur: quod ſcilicet in morem ſcorti victorum libidini pateat. Illudque quod in Judicum libro de Samſon ſcribitur, ad molam eum à Philiſtim eſſe damnatum, hoc ſignificare volunt, quòd pro ſobole robuſtiſſimorum virorum hoc in Allophylas mulieres facere ſit compulſus (4). - - - In the 13th book of commentaries upon the Prophet Iſaiah, chap. xlvii, at the words, Take the mill and grind meal, St Jerom writes thus: The word mill being followed by theſe words, uncover thy nakedneſs, is alſo underſtood in a figurative ſenſe, by the Hebrews, viz. becauſe like a harlot it lies open to the luſt of the conqueror. In the ſame manner, what we read in the book of Judges, of Samſon's being condemned by the Philiſtines, to grind in a mill, is thought to ſignify that he was compelled to lie with foreign women, in order to beget a race of very ſtrong men.' Druſius obſerves (5), that molere, to grind, in this obſcene ſenſe, ſignifies the action of the male; for which reaſon he makes a gloſs upon the words of Job. Molere in hoc ſenſu viris tribui ſolet. De lingua Latina loquor, in qua notiſſimum illud, alienas permolere uxores (6). Forſan apud Jobum paſſivè ſumendum, molatur alteri, ab altero, hoc eſt, ut ſenſus ſit, molat alter uxorem meam. I think they are in the right who can ſcarce perſuade themſelves that the Philiſtines, who were his great enemies, would have condemned him to a puniſhment ſo agreeable; for Samſon loved women, and he would have been well kept to perform the office of a ſtallion, there had been nothing to fear but compulſion.

Nulla eſt tam facilis res, quin difficilis fiet,
 Quam invitus facias (7).

There is nothing ſo eaſy, but becomes hard, when done by compulſion.

(1) Job xxxi, 10.

(2) Pol iſtuc quidem omne jam ego uſurpabo domi;
Nam jam inclinabo me cum liberta tua, Plaut. in Perſa, Act. IV, Scene viii.

(3) Chap v. ver. 13.

(4) Druſius, Quæſt. Ebraicar. lib. ii, num. 38. pag. m. 97. See Petri Petiti Miſcellan. Obſervationes, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. 152, & ſeq.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

(6) They are Horace's words, Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 33.

(7) Terent. Heautontim. Act. IV, Scene vi, init.

SANCHEZ (FRANCIS) profeſſor of Phyſic at Toulouſe, born at Braga in Portugal, was carried over in his infancy to Bourdeaux by his father, who was a very ſkillful Phyſician. He travelled into Italy, and ſtaid ſome time at Rome, from whence he returned into France, and ſtudied at Montpellier, where he took his degree of Doctor of Phyſic at the age of twenty-four. The wars about religion having forced him to leave that city, he went to Toulouſe, where he taught Philoſophy twenty-five years, and Phyſic eleven. He died aged ſomething more than ſeventy years. His life is prefixed to his works (a) [A]. He was a great Sceptic, as I take notice in the remark. He is very much praiſed in the Patiniana (b), where we read that he was born of Jewiſh parents, and that he died at Toulouſe, being threeſcore and ten years old, in the year 1632.

(a) Taken from Don Nicolas Antonio, Biblioth. Scriptor. Hiſpan. Tom. i, p. 362, 363.

(b) Pag. 72, 73. Edit. of Paris 1701.

[A] His life is prefixed to his works.] The author of this life, called Raimond Delaſſus, had been his ſcholar. The greateſt part of the writings of Sanchez are about Phyſic; they were printed at Toulouſe, in 4to, 1636. There were added to them four treatiſes of Philoſophy, which were re-printed in 12mo, at Rotterdam, in the year 1649. Here are the titles of them: Quod nihil ſcitur. De divinatione per ſomnum ad Ariſtotelem. In librum Ariſtotelis Phyſiognomicon Commentarius. De longitudine & brevitate vitæ. The treatiſe quod nihil ſcitur, - - - that we know nothing (1), repreſents ingeniouſly and ſubtilly the vanity of what we call ſcience, ſtudy, compoſition of books, &c. It was publiſhed before the edition of all the works of the author; for I find in Barthius that two diſſertations were re-printed in Germany, in the year 1618; one of Maturinus Simonius, an Italian doctor, de Litteris pereuntibus; the other of Francis Sanchez, a Spaniſh doctor, Quod nihil ſciatur (2). Sanchez underſtood Geometry, and made ſome objections againſt Clavius, which he pretended that Jeſuit had not well anſwered (3).

(1) John Uldric Wildius confuted it in ſome theſes, intituled, Quod aliquid ſcitur, maintained at Leipſic in 1664.

(2) Barthius in Statium, Tom. i, pag. 447.

(3) Delaſſus in ejus Vita, apud Nicol. Antonium, Biblioth. Script. Hiſpan. Tom. i, pag. 363.

SANCHEZ (THOMAS) a Spaniſh Jeſuit, born at Corduba in the year 1551, entred into the ſociety in the year 1567. The auſterity of his life, his ſobriety, his mortifications, his application to ſtudy, his chaſtity, are prodigies, if what Alegambe (a) and Southwell (b) ſay of him be true. He died at Granada, the ninteenth of May, 1610, and was buried there (c) magnificently (d). He was certainly a learned man; he has given public proofs of it in the great volume that was printed at Genoa, in the year 1592 [A], and in the four volumes in folio that were printed after his death. It were (a) In Biblioth. Scriptor. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 436.

(b) In ead. Bibl. pag. 767.

(c) See the remark [C], citation (11).

(d) Alegambe & Sotuel, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 436, 767.

[A] In the great volume printed at Genoa, in the year 1592.] It treats fully of what concerns marriage. It is pretended that Clement VIII declared that no man had examined with more diligence, nor cleared with more exactneſs the controverſies that concern this ſacrament. 'Vehementer admiratus eſt ſubtile hominis acumen, peracre judicium, raram perſpicuitatem, ſingularem & exquiſitam in rebus indagandis ſolertiam, in tradendis facillimam methodum, in evolvendis citandiſque Auctoribus exactiſſimum & planè indefeſſum were to be wiſhed that the work printed at Genoa, and afterwards in ſeveral other towns, had given as great proofs of his judgment (e) as of his wit and learning; for the temerity he had to explain an incredible number of filthy and horrible queſtions in that work may produce great diſorders. Bitter complaints are made of it [B], and ‘ indefeſſum ſtudium; ſerioque pronunciavit, nullum unquam Scriptorem extitiſſe, qui dubias de Matrimonio controverſias uberiùs & accuratiùs enodaſſet (1). - - - He greatly admired the ſubtile genius of the man, his penetration, his rare perſpicuity, his ſingular and exquiſite dexterity in finding things out, his eaſy method in explaining them, his accurate and unwearied pains in turning over authors, and taking quotations out of them; and he declared ſeriouſly that no man, &c.’ Among all thoſe elogies, there is hardly any that does him more honour than what relates to the exactneſs of his quotations. It is a talent much more rare than people think, and I am very glad that Nicolas Antonio is of that opinion: Celebratur (ne id taceam quod minime vulgare eſt) inter alias dotes Thomæ diligentia quædam ſingularis in allegandis fideliter ſcriptoribus quorum teſtimoniis utitur (2). Several perſons have abridged this great volume de Matrimonio; ſome diſpoſing the matter according to an alphabetical order (3), others obſerving the method of the author. The other volumes of Sanchez contain either an explication of the precepts of the decalogue, or of monaſtic vows, or of ſeveral queſtions in law matters.

[B] Bitter complaints are made of it.] Here is a paſſage of the Abbot of St Cyran: ‘ Si de urberrima & ſubtiliſſima ſpurcitiarum omnigenarum ventilatione agitur, nemo unquam eam laudem Thomæ Sanchez eripiet, quin omnium primus Sacramentum matrimonii cum tanta cogitationum ſermoniſque licentia, imaginatione potius quam judicio duce, verſarit, quantam ante ipſum Eccleſia ab initio Chriſtiani nominis nec viderat, nec audierat (4). - - - If we talk of a copious and ſubtile enquiry into all manner of filthineſs, no man will ever be able to deprive Thomas Sanchez of this praiſe, that he was the firſt who, guided rather by his imagination than judgment, handled the ſacrament of marriage with ſuch a freedom of thought and ſpeech, as the church from the beginning of Chriſtianity had never ſeen nor heard of.’ Let us cite, after this, the words of a miniſter. ‘ It may be, ſays he, you have heard of a great volume compoſed by Thomas Sanchez, de Matrimonio. You cannot come to any Bookſeller's ſhop at Antwerp or Liege, but you may ſee the title of it in great letters. This book is the work of a Jeſuit, who treats of all the caſes of conſcience concerning marriage. It contains more impurity than all the moſt infamous Italian books together. See how the Clergy of France ſpeak of it by the mouth of one of their members. That prodigious * volume contains a moſt ſubtile examination of all imaginable impurities; it is a common-ſhore that includes moſt horrible things not fit to be ſpoken. It may be called juſtly a ſhameful work, compoſed with an enormous curioſity, horrible and odious for it's diligent exactneſs, penetrating into moſt monſtrous, filthy, infamous, and diabolical matters. It is impoſſible to apprehend how an author could be ſo ſhameleſs, to compoſe ſuch a book, ſeeing a man now that has not quite diveſted himſelf of all modeſty, ſuffers terribly in reading it. The reſt of the cenſure is ſtronger, but I ſuffer too much in tranſlating it: it is not an old cenſure, it was only made in 1632 (5).’ I believe it is a miſtake to attribute this cenſure to the Clergy of France; for that aſſembly gave no orders to Petrus Aurelius to examine this work, and to give his judgment of it in the name of the Clergy. I confeſs that they approved the writings of Petrus Aurelius; but, notwithſtanding, it is not to ſpeak exactly, to maintain that this aſſembly ſaid, by one of their members, all that is found in thoſe writings. Mr Rivet is contented to aſcribe this cenſure to the Sorbonne, and even that is not exact; for under pretence that this body of Divines give their approbation to a book wherein a certain author is ill treated, it cannot be ſaid that the Sorbonne has cenſured that author. That is never ſaid but when the Faculty proceeds in due form againſt a book, and qualifies the propoſitions of it. I do not think that ever the Sorbonniſts proceeded in this manner againſt Sanchez's book; and if they had done it, I cannot believe that Theophilus Raynaud would have dared to deny it, as he does in the following words, (6) ‘ Volo per hanc occaſionem non ſilere, quàm iniquè ac malignè . . . . Thomas Sanches, laceratus ſit à quibuſdam fori rabulis (7), quorum vitæ ſpurcitias, & fidem heteroclitam, alii jam pridem prodiderunt. Sed & hæretici . . . magno hîc zelo concitantur, quod recens admodum petulanter fecit Ludimagiſter Bernenſis Chriſtophorus Luthardus, ad parallelum Calvini cum priſcis hæreticis Simonianis: ſpurciloquia ſua in Sanchem, MENDACITER affingens Academiæ Pariſienſi. - - - I will not omit this opportunity of taking notice how unjuſtly and maliciouſly . . . . . Thomas Sanchez has been abuſed by certain petty-foggers, whoſe leud lives and unſound faith have been long ago detected by others. The Heretics alſo . . . . . ſhew great zeal upon this head, as Chriſtopher Luthardus, a School-maſter of Bern, has done lately in a very inſolent manner, upon occaſion of the parallel drawn between Calvin and the old Simoniac Heretics; falſly aſcribing his own dirty invectives againſt Sanchez, to the Faculty of the Sorbonne.’ Be it as will, let us cite the miniſter who is not very exact (8). ‘ Hîc omittere non debeo & lectori meo invidere, laude digniſſimam Sorbonæ Pariſienſis Cenſuram in Librum Thomæ Sanchez, prout ea habetur in invidiciis Cenſuræ à doctoribus Sorbonicis approbatis, & à Petro Aurelio editis, pag. 517. & ſeq. De illo opere Matrimoniali, inquiunt, dicere ſpeciatim poſſumus, eſſe opus non gloriandum, ſed pudendum; tàm immani curioſitate, tàm inviſâ in rebus ſpurciſſimis & infandis ſagacitate horrendum, ut mirum ſit pudoris alicujus hominem, ea ſinè rubore ſcripſiſſe, quæ quivis modeſtioris ingenii vix ſinè rubore legat. Portenta iſta ſunt, non ſcripta; animorum inſidiæ, non mentium ſubſidia, incentiva libidinum, ſchola flagitiorum, non honeſtæ diſciplinæ, non ſcientiæ Chriſtianæ inſtrumenta. Infœlix ſcientia, quæ omnes perdere, paucos juvare nata eſt. Quæ circà ſordes & ſterquilinia volvenda & revolvenda volutatur, ut ejus doctorem jure cum ſcarabæo conferas, vel cum iis qui latrinariam factitant (§ α). - - - I ought not here to omit nor conceal from the reader that praiſe-worthy cenſure which the Sorbonne paſſed upon the book of Thomas Sanchez, as it is to be found in the Vindication of that Cenſure, approved of by the Sorbonniſts, and publiſhed by Petrus Aurelius. As to that book de Matrimonio, ſay they, we can particularly affirm, that it is a work of which one has more reaſon to be aſhamed than proud: for ſuch a monſtrous curioſity does this horrid piece diſcover, and ſuch an odious exactneſs in dwelling upon filthy ſubjects, that are not even fit to be mentioned, that it may be juſtly wondered how a man of any ſhame could write without bluſhing at ſuch things, as a perſon of a modeſt diſpoſition can ſcarcely read without bluſhing. Theſe are monſters, and not writings, ſnares for the mind, not helps, incentives to luſt, and a ſchool for wickedneſs, not the inſtruments of honeſt inſtruction, or Chriſtian knowledge. An unhappy ſcience it is, contrived to to ruin all, and to do good to few. It wallows in filth, and is conſtantly employed in turning over dunghils; ſo that the teacher of it may rightly be compared to a black beetle, or to ſuch perſons whoſe buſineſs lies in raking filth and naſtineſs.’

[§ (α) Before the Abbot of St Cyran others had complained of the book of Sanchez. Here follows, upon this head a very curious paſſage of an author not much known. ‘ He that would know the maſterſhip and degree to which whoredom is arrived, let him read Sanchez in his treatiſe de Matrimonio; where he has endeavoured not ſo much to comment upon as to ſurpaſs, not ſo much to reprove as to ſhew the leacherous ſtupidity of Aretin, notwithſtanding that he was one of the moſt experienced, and, in a manner, the ſenior wit of this Faculty. But he had not gone ſo far, nor entered into ſo many dialogues upon the ſtrange and prodigious things that are revealed in confeſſion, as Sanchez, who, in this reſpect, ſurpaſſes all others. He teaches all the poſtures fit for ſtallions to uſe in the haunt of iniquity; which is horrible to think of. The ladies often quit the amours of Ronſard, and Amadis, for the Summa of Benedicti

‘ the

(e) See the paſſage of Petrus Aurelius at the beginning of the remark [B].

(1) Nat. Sotuel, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societat. pag. 767.

(2) Nicol. Antonius, Biblioth. Scriptor. Hiſpan. Tom. ii, p. 252.

(3) I have an abridgment of it in an alphabetical order made by Emanuel Laurence Soares, a prieſt of Liſbon, in the year 1621. in 12mo.

(4) Petrus Aurelius, in Vindiciis Cenſuræ.

* Petrus Aurel. Vindic. Cenſuræ Facult.

(5) Jurieu, Apologie pour les Reformateurs, ch. ix, pag. 150. Edit. in 4to.

(6) Theophil. Raynaudus, de malis & bonis libris, num. 85, pag. 53.

(7) In his Hoplotheca, pag. 362. he ſpeaks thus: Thomas Sanchez à pleriſque fori rabulis ſpurcus audivit, quod in Opere de Matrimonio, librum nonum qui eſt de debito conjugali infecerit ſpurcitiis, & multa chartis commiſerit quæ àbſque fœdo ſenſu & verecundiæ contrucidatione, vix legi poſſint. - - - - Thomas Sanchez has been called a filthy writer by ſeveral petty-foggers, becauſe in his work de Matrimonio, he has filled the ninth book, which treats of conjugal duties, with much filth, and wrote ſeveral things which can ſcarcely be read without a leud imagination, and the ruin of modeſty.

(8) Andr. Rivetus, Explicat. Decalogi, Oper. Tom. i, p. 1400. col. 2.

and all that has been ſaid for his juſtification is weak [C]; and yet there are ſome Caſuiſts, who

‘ the Franciſcan †: and indeed we find the extravagances of leachery better deſcribed in ſuch authors than in Rabelais, or any where elſe. What an odd appearance it has, that theſe men, who would have it believed that they are mines of chaſtity and inexhauſtible ſprings of continence, ſhould nevertheleſs caſt up ſuch ill humours, and publiſh an iliad of ſo many impurities? But to ſpeak truly, what have prieſts to do to thruſt their noſes within the curtains of wedlock, or to ſet up for ſecretaries to the ſtews? They bend their utmoſt thought upon theſe things, with ſuch an unbounded extravagance of imagination that nothing can be more ſubtile: they feign caſes that have rather a metaphyſical than a moral poſſibility. The moſt inſatiable and burning luſt cannot by any means riſe ſo high. You will find there ſuch leacherous inventions as all the pillars of the ſtews could never have hit upon. Thoſe who have a mind to ſet up ſhop with them, will find enough there both to gain a livelihood, and to ruin their ſouls. Pagan authors never penetrated ſo licentiouſly into this abomination as theſe fine architects and chief miniſters of luxury: they have enlarged the dimenſions of it at a furious rate, and acquired a great many novices to ſtudy under them. They have ſweetened the practice of it, chalked out new poſtures, and enriched the whole with deſcriptions Cynically invented, and moſt ſinfully publiſhed. In ſhort, Venus never received more homage from any than from their ſcience. The treatiſe of Sanchez is a true library of Venus: ſuch books have made, and will make, more proſelytes to fornication, than all the Penitentiary of Rome has made, or ever will make, to chaſtity. They are much more proper to teach than to diſſuade ſin: and tho’ all the other books upon whoredom were deſtroyed and ſunk, theſe would be more than ſufficient to revive it. They contain forms, formalities, materialities, categories, and tranſcendencies, that are ſpick and ſpan new. Carnality and unnatural luſt are deſcribed there in their full extent. If Horace or Martial were to return, they would make fine odes and epigrams upon thoſe operators that wanted to caſtrate them. In five hundred Martial’s or Horace’s there is not ſo much room for clipping off, and caſtrating as in one page of this laſt author ‡.’

† See the laſt quotation of the text of this article.

‡ Franc Archer de la vraie Egliſe, pag. 266, 267, 268.

As for the reſt, if ſuch a dangerous book was neither cenſured by the aſſembly of the French Clergy, as Mr Jurieu ſays, nor by the Faculty of Divines at Paris, as Mr Rivet pretends; it has at leaſt been prohibited by a famous magiſtrate; a thing which redounds very much to his honour. This appears by the following words: Thomas Sanchez has not been wanting in this, (viz. in repleniſhing the caſes of conſcience with an infinite number of vile impurities); for he has ſo ſtuffed his book de Matrimonio with theſe, that he is remarkable upon ſuch a carnival ſubject, beyond all that ever handled the ſame before. . . . . One of the worthy actions of Preſident le Jay, when he was lieutenant of the Policy at Paris, was, to have made ſtrict ſearch after this book, and to have forbid the Bookſellers of Paris to ſell it under pain of death ††. Theſe words, as well as the long paſſage that precedes them, are taken from a very ſcarce book, intituled, Le Franc-Archer de la vraye Egliſe contre les Abus & Enormitez de la fauſſe, written by Antony Fuſi, and printed in the year 1619, in 8vo. REM. CRIT.]

†† Ibid. pag. 867, 868.

[C] What has been ſaid for his juſtification is weak.] The cenſurers of this author may pretend two things: the firſt is, that he could not poſſibly write ſo many particular impurities, without being unchaſte himſelf: ‘ Extant inter alia nonnullorum Jeſuitarum de his argumentis ſcripta, in quibus explicantur talia, quæ vix diabolus ipſe, ſtudium omne adhibendo, ſuggerere poſſet: ubi non ſolùm genera, ſpecies, ſed & modos omnes, objecta, ſubjecta, circumſtantias, ita minutatim examinant, ut nemo ſanus ea profecta fuiſſe judicet à mente purâ & caſtâ. Inter quos eminet Thomas Sanchez Hiſpanus Jeſuita, in prolixo tractatu de Matrimonio (9). - - - - There are extant, among others, the writings of ſome Jeſuits upon theſe ſubjects; where ſuch things are explained, as the Devil himſelf, with his utmoſt thought, could hardly ſuggeſt: where not only the kinds, ſpecies, but likewiſe all the different ways, objects, ſubjects, circumſtances, are ſo minutely conſidered, that no man in his ſenſes can ſuppoſe this to proceed from a pure and chaſte mind. Among theſe authors the moſt remarkable is, Thomas Sanchez, a Spaniſh Jeſuit, in his large book de Matrimonio.’ The ſecond is, That he could not communicate to the public the knowledge of ſo many monſtrous irregularities, without doing a prejudice to good morals. It being certain that ſeveral perſons are inclined to commit theſe abominations when they know they are practiſed. Therefore a man that is wiſe and zealous for the ſalvation of his neighbours, ought carefully to avoid letting them know the impurities that are diſcovered to him in the tribunal of confeſſion; for we may be aſſured that thoſe who know nothing of the matter, will more eaſily abſtain from it, than thoſe who know the enormity and filthineſs thereof.

(9) Rivetus, ubi ſupra.

As to the firſt of theſe two accuſations, the friends of Sanchez anſwer, That he was a man of an admirable virtue and perfect chaſtity. His immaculate virginity accompanied him to his grave, ſay they, and the day he was buried all people thronged in, either to kiſs, or to touch with their beads his body covered with flowers, and ſhining with a virginal beauty (10). Ad communis parentis funus (ſic eum vocabant) advenit Illuſtriſſimus Archiepiſcopus, graviſſimuſque Senatus Regius: confluxere ſacrorum Ordinum viri Religioſi; urbis univerſa Nobilitas, & promiſcuæ plebis innumera multitudo, qui defuncti corpus floribus conſperſum, & eximiâ quadâm ſpecie ac virginali nitore micans certatim conabantur vel roſariis contingere, vel oſculis ſuppliciter venerari (11). They refer us to ſome authors, who have praiſed the purity of his life. Ejus innocentiam & vitam puriſſimam exhibent Crombetius l. 2. de ſtudio perfect. cap. 12. & Joannes Bourgheſius l. cui titulus eſt Societas JESU, Deiaparæ ſacra cap. 20 (12). This implies, that his mind and imagination were filled with thoſe filthy matters, but his heart and body were free from that contagion. Many people think this as hard, as to be like the Hebrew children in the Babylonian furnace without being burnt. But after all, it is not impoſſible but that the horror that might be conceived for thoſe execrable abuſes of matrimony, and the deſire of correcting them, might preſerve the innocence of an author who ſhould wallow in thoſe ordures; of an author, I ſay, whoſe, age, temper, and education, might be powerful preſervatives againſt the pollutions of the fleſh. There is ſome reaſon to think that authors who dwell too much upon the explication of the Priapeïa, and the obſcene paſſages of Catullus and Martial, are not very chaſte; and it is but too certain that there have been ſome commentators who dwelt upon thoſe matters too long, and made a deep ſcrutiny into them, only becauſe they were unchaſte. But that is not to be taken for a general rule; for the ſole deſire of ſhewing a great deal of reading, and an uncommon learning, is very capable of engaging an humaniſt to comment largely upon the Poets I have mentioned. The firſt reading of thoſe poems does ſtrongly attack virtue, eſpecially that of young men: by degrees one grows harder; and there are Critics, who, after having read ſeveral times Catullus and Martial, either to clear up ſome old cuſtom, or to comment on them, are no more moved with their impure expreſſions, than if they read an aphoriſm of Hippocrates. It happens to thoſe Critics as it happens to Phyſicians and Chirurgeons, who being uſed to handle filthy ulcers, after ſome time, find no offence from the ſtink. I pray GOD it may happen ſo to Confeſſors, and Caſuiſts, whoſe ears are the common-ſhores of all the filth of human life. There are but too many of them, doubtleſs, who never riſe to ſuch a pitch, and whoſe virtue is overcome, when they hear the impurities of their penitent: no conſequence can be drawn from hence againſt this or that man in particular; ſo that we ſhould be very raſh, ſhould we aſſert that Sanchez was not poſſeſſed of this inſenſibility, and that he was infected with the ſtinking ordures he ſtirred with ſo much application: and after all, he has an excuſe, which the moſt chaſte commentators upon the Catalecta cannot have; for he may ſay he only put his hand to this filth with a deſign to purge the world of it. It is by this, that they endeavour to anſwer the ſecond accuſation, which is a great deal more perplexing than the firſt.

(10) Homo vitæ puriſſimæ innocentiſſimeque actæ, & nulla unquam graviori labe contaminatæ. . . . Caſtimoniæ tantum decus, ut virginitatis florem in tumulum intulerit. Sotuel, ubi ſupra. Sanchem, hominem ſanctiſſimæ vitæ & perpetuo virginitatis candore nitentem, ut graves ſcriptores prodiderunt. Th. Raynaud, ubi ſupra.

(11) Sotuel. ibid.

(12) Theoph. Raynaud. Hoplotheca, §. ii, Serie III, cap. x. pag. 362.

I have ſaid elſewhere (13) what is alledged to juſtify Albertus Magnus in the ſame caſe. His friends pretend who continue every day to publiſh ſuch like impurities (f). They have done ſo a long time, tend that there ought to be books, wherein Confeſſors may meet with neceſſary inſtructions againſt the diſorders imparted to them; and therefore that a great doctor like him ought to write upon that ſubject. The ſame anſwer is alſo given for Sanchez. The filthy queſtions, ſay they, and the enormous obſcenities which he examines ſo exactly, are very ſerviceable to the directors of conſcience. We have therefore no reaſon to be ſcandalized at them. Do we blame a Phyſician for ſtirring filthy excrements, in order to procure his patient's health? This conſideration hindered the Jeſuits from curtailing Sanchez. One of them ſays, among other things, that being to judge of one of the moſt impure matters that are contained in it, he could never have reſolved the inſurmountable difficulties which offered themſelves, without the ſolutions of this author. Fuiſſe autem eam de Matrimonio ſcriptionem neceſſariam, audire memini ex homine & probatorum morum ſeveritate, & eruditione clariſſimo, P. Valerio Reginaldo. Is cùm in quadam Provinciali Congregatione, à nonnullis meticuloſis propoſitum eſſet ut opus Patris Thomæ Sanchez de Matrimonio truncaretur ea tractatione cujus fœtor toties pro tribunalibus à malevolis Cauſidicis extra cauſam ingeſtus erat; graviter conteſtatus eſt, nihil eſſe in eo opere conſcientiarum duntaxat arbitris conſcripto, quod offenſionem meritò moveret. Cùm non modò apud Juriſperitos, (Tiraquellum præſertim in legibus Connubialibus,) tetriora abſque neceſſitate ad merum curioſitatis pabulum legantur, ſed etiam apud alios de Matrimonio Scriptores, nec non apud Summiſtas eadem occurrant; quæ omnia Lybitinæ addicere, & impoſſibile & damnoſum foret. Apud Sanchem certè, quod maximè ſpurcum ac vel lectu fœdum videri poterat, ſibi aliquando ad dijudicandum fuiſſe propoſitum; & niſi ex eo Autore enodationem habuiſſet, ſalebras ſibi inexpedibiles fuiſſe futuras. Itaque non plus offendi quemquam debere, ea fœtidorum dubiorum tractatione ad directionem pœnitentium neceſſaria, quàm ſuccenſeamus, cum Medici olida ejectamenta in ægri bonum & curationem emovent (14). The Abbot of St Cyran, under the name of Petrus Aurelius, had refuted beforehand this bad reaſon. He maintained that this work might do a great deal of harm, but little good. By ſetting before the eyes of the public an infinity of infamous impurities that are committed in the nuptial-bed, good ſouls are ſcandalized, the curioſity of ſome is excited, and the laſciviouſneſs of others, &c. But if the directors of conſciences are to paſs their verdict in ſuch caſes, it is much better that they ſhould have recourſe to the living voice of doctors, than to a public work, where it is hard to find the caſe in queſtion with all it's circumſtances. It muſt be granted, this remark is very ſolid: the Roman Catholics are in the wrong not to imitate ſects of the antient Philoſophy, where the whole ſyſtem was never put in writing: a part being reſerved to be taught by word of mouth to the favourite diſciples: this was only preſerved by tradition. The Pope ſhould have forbid the Caſuiſts to print any thing about the caſes of luxury; he ſhould have ordered the matter ſo, that the inſtruction of the confeſſors, either with reſpect to the queſtions, or to the penances upon this head, might be communicated from the one to the other in private, or at moſt in manuſcript under the ſeal of ſecrecy. Let us quote Petrus Aurelius. Modeſtiores fuerunt ſemper Eccleſiaſtici tractatores. . . . Nec tanti fecerunt ancipitem iſtam & periculoſam conjugalium arcanorum, flagitiorum, piaculorumque ſcientiam. Maluerunt iſta neſciri à paucis, quorum fortè intereſſet, quàm ſciri à plurimis ad peſtilentiſſimæ curioſitatis illecebram, ad cupiditatum fomitem, ad publicum dedecus, dùm promiſcuè, maximis voluminibus, ante ora omnium propoſitis, explicantur. Nam & raròuſu venit ut talium nefandorum cognitione ſit opus; & cùm uſum venit, tutius viri probi, Eccleſiaſticarum rerum peritiores conſuluntur, qui iſta ex æquo & bono, & ex Eccleſiaſticæ diſciplinæ comparatione dijudicent, quàm ex libro quopiam publicè noxio aut periculoſo, ubi aliquid generatim tantùm, aut obſcurè, aut à præſenti negotio remotè, ut ferè accidit, ſcriptum ſit, quæſtionis fortaſſè diverſiſſimæ expoſitio privato cujuſque judicio repetatur. Atque ita hactenus obſervarat Eccleſia, donec Thomas Sanchez ſuperiorum ſeculorum caſtiorem modeſtioremque conſuetudinem ſpernens, prodigioſo volumine, velut CLOACA ingenti, fanda infandaque convolvit (15).

(13) See the article ALBERTUS, remark [D].

(f) See the cenſure upon a book of Amadeus Guimenius made by the Faculty of Divinity at Paris, the third of February 1665. They condemn ſeveral propoſitions, that are only denoted by the firſt words, and cannot be modeſtly tranſlated into French.

The other reaſons of Theophilus Raynaud are not better. He cites (16) long paſſages out of St Chryſoſtom, which prove that this Father of the Church has repreſented to the life, and, in plain terms, the infamous impurities of his time. He ſhews (17) that St Epiphanius has deſcribed in the ſame manner the impurities of the Gnoſtics, and that St Cyril made uſe of the ſame liberty to deſcribe thoſe of the Manichees. He maintains that Hincmarus, in his book about the divorce of Lotharius and Telberga, ſpoke more obſcenely than Sanchez (18). He ſays that the excuſes which St Chryſoſtom, St Epiphanius, St Cyril, and Hincmarus, made to their auditors or readers, may ſerve as an apology for his fellow-Jeſuit. He mentions what Radulphus Flavicenſis obſerved, againſt the falſe niceneſs of thoſe who blamed the obſcene terms which Moſes made uſe of in Leviticus (19). But it is ſo eaſy to perceive the difference between thoſe examples and the conduct of the Spaniſh writer, that I ſhall not ſtand upon the proofs of the weakneſs or inſignificancy of that parallel. Every body eaſily perceives, that the ſame things which are permitted to thoſe who know a fact, which the enquiries of Hiſtorians, or juridical proceedings have manifeſted, ought not to be allowed to thoſe who only knew it by way of auricular confeſſion. The antient Fathers had a right to make known the execrable deportments of the Heretics. Hincmarus might compoſe a relation upon the moſt impure conduct of a divorced queen; and when once vice is atteſted either by hiſtory, or by a verbal proceſs, authors have a right to mention it, if it be to the purpoſe: but as to vices that are only revealed to the confeſſors, another method ought to be taken with them. I paſs by what a great many people would not have omitted; that now a-days no famous preacher would be ſo bold as to take the ſame liberty in this reſpect that St Chryſoſtom and St Cyril took, and that if any writer of the antient Church is to be imitated on that ſcore, it is Salvian, of whom Theophilus Raynaud cites theſe fine words. ‘ Quæ quidem ‘ omnia tam flagitioſa ſunt, ut etiam explicare ea ‘ quiſpiam atque eloqui ſalvo pudore non valeat. Quis ‘ enim integro verecundiæ ſtatu, dicere queat illas vo‘ cum ac verborum obſcœnitates, illas motuum tur‘ pitudines, illas geſtuum fœditates? quæ quanti ſint ‘ criminis, vel hinc intelligi poteſt, quod & rela‘ tionem ſui interdicunt. Nonnulla quippe etiam ma‘ xima ſcelera, incolumi honeſtate referentis, & no‘ minari & argui poſſunt, ut homicidium, latroci‘ nium, adulterium, ſacrilegium, ceteraque in hunc ‘ modum; ſolæ theatrorum impuritates ſunt, quæ ‘ honeſtè non poſſunt vel accuſari: ita nova in coar‘ guendâ earum turpitudinum probroſitate res evenit ‘ arguenti: ut cùm abſque dubio honeſtus ſit qui accu‘ ſare ea velit, honeſtate tamen integra, ea loqui & ac‘ cuſare non poſſit (20). - - - All which things are ſo ‘ ſcandalous that one cannot even modeſtly deſcribe and ‘ expreſs them. For who, without offence to modeſty, ‘ can explain ſuch obſcene words and ſpeeches, ſuch filthy ‘ motions, and ſuch leud geſtures? From this very thing ‘ it may be underſtood, how criminal they are, ſince they ‘ will not allow us to deſcribe them. Some, even of ‘ the worſt of crimes, may be named, and proved, with‘ out any ſhame to the teller, as murder, robbery, adul‘ tery, ſacrilege, and others of the like nature: only theſe ‘ theatrical impurities cannot decently be expoſed and cen‘ ſured. This, a new and extraordinary thing, hap‘ pens to ſuch as would attempt to ſhew the infamy of thoſe ‘ vile practices: for whereas he muſt undoubtedly be a ‘ virtuous and modeſt man whoever is willing to expoſe ‘ them; ſo, without caſting a blemiſh upon his virtue, it ‘ is impoſſible for him to deſcribe and expoſe them.’ Obſerve here the opinion of Salvian touching the impurities of the ſtage: it was neceſſary to have honour and modeſty to condemn them, but one muſt have had impudence to deſcribe them (21). This is the model which Sanchez, and many other Caſuiſts, ought to have followed. I ſay many others; for he is neither the firſt, nor the laſt that has writ in that manner (22).

See

(14) Theoph. Raynaud. Hoploth. Ibid. pag. 362.

(15) Petrus Aurelius, in Vindiciis Cenſuræ, apud Andr. Rivetum Oper. Tom. iii, p. 1400. col. i.

(16) Theophil. Raynaud. Hoplotheca, ubi ſupra, pag. 362, 363.

(17) Ibid. pag. 364.

(18) Coactus eſt ſtylum demittere in ſpurcitias longe fœdiores quam uſpiam apud Sanchem legantur. Theophil. Raynaud. de malis & bonis Libris, pag. 53. See alſo his Hoplotheca, pag. 363.

(19) Idem, Hoplotheca, p. 364. & de malis Libris, pag. 56.

(20) Salvianus de Providentia, lib. vi, pag. m. 199, 200.

(21) The words of Cicero, Philip. II, againſt Marc Antony may be applied to this ſubject, Tu eo liberior quod ea in te admiſiſti quæ à verecundo inimico audire non poſſes. - - - You are the more free upon this account, becauſe you have committed ſuch crimes as your modeſt adverſary cannot mention. See the uſe that has been made of theſe words in the Cabale Chimerique, pag. 194, of the ſecond Edition.

(22) Ita factum videmus ante Sanchem, ac poſt eum à quamplurimis, ut mirum ſit hunc æſtum efferbuiſſe in unum Sanchem. Raynaud. Hoplotheca, pag 364.

time, and it is a deplorable thing to ſee that courtiers, who had their memories ſtuffed with all manner of ſuch filthy accounts, did cite as a common-place-book the ‘ Summa ‘ Benedicti, who is a Franciſcan Doctor, who has written very well of all ſorts of ‘ ſins, and ſhews that he has both ſeen and read a great deal (g).’ This book of Benedictus is tranſlated into French: It was publiſhed in that language at Lyons in 1584 (h), and at Paris in the year 1602, which might well have been let alone.

(g) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. i, pag. m. 51. See alſo pag. 185.

(h) Du Verdier, Bibl. pag. 651.

See Mr Jurieu in the Apology for the Reformers in the chapter I have cited. Let us conclude, that it is a thing very blameable and deplorable that there ſhould be ſo many books of that nature; but it is infinitely more deplorable that the impurities they contain ſhould be ſo many real crimes. The ſchool-men ſpin things ſo fine, that, even in matters of morality, they have debated very needleſs queſtions and things that never happen; and you ſee continually the Caſuiſts diſtinguiſh between the practice and the theory, and propoſe Metaphyſical and imaginary caſes. This, probably, was one of the reaſons which made Mr Rivet judge that the infamies that are read in Sanchez had been invented by that author; and therefore being at Aix-la-Chapelle with a Jeſuit, he told him he could not ſufficiently wonder that a man who had made a vow of chaſtity, ſhould ſuppoſe ſuch abominations as were not practiſed. I ſee, replied the Jeſuit, you have never been a confeſſor. We hear often more impure caſes than thoſe; ſo that it is neceſſary that confeſſors ſhould be provided with directions, according to which they may be enabled to impoſe due penances. Mr Rivet replied, ſmiling, It is ſtrange that you ſhould boaſt ſo much of the holineſs of your church, ſince, according to your confeſſion, ſuch things are practiſed in it, of which the very Heathens knew not the name. Hæc ego cum ante aliquot annos objicerem Jeſuitæ cuidam Aquiſgrani, adderemque me non exiſtimare reperiri exempla talium abominationum, meque valdè mirari ab homine caſtitatem profeſſo fuiſſe excogitatas: Regerebat, me nunquam fuiſſe admotum audiendis confeſſionibus, atrociora multò & ſpurciora ſæpiſſimè audiri ab ore confitentium, ut neceſſariò opus ſit confeſſarios inſtitui ſuper iſtis, ni velint hærere talibus occurrentibus peccatis, juxta quæ eſt injungenda pœnitentia. Subridens dicebam, mirum igitur eſſe quod tantopere gloriarentur de ſanctitate Eccleſiæ ſuæ, in quâ, & ſæpe, ut ille fatebatur, ea perpetrarentur, quæ apud Ethnicos ne nominata quidem fuerant (23). We do not know the domeſtic privacy of the antient Pagans, as we know thoſe of the countries where auricular confeſſion is practiſed; and therefore we cannot tell whether marriage was ſo brutiſhly diſhonoured among the Pagans as it is among the Chriſtians: but at leaſt it is probable that the Infidels did not ſurpaſs, in this reſpect, many perſons who believe all the doctrines of the Goſpel. Thoſe for whom the book of Sanchez is writ, are ſuch as go to confeſſion, and ſubmit to the penances enjoined them by their confeſſors. They therefore believe what the Scripture teaches us of Heaven and Hell, they believe purgatory, and the other doctrines of the Romiſh communion; and yet, in the midſt of this perſuaſion, you ſee them plunged into abominable impurities, which are not fit to be named, and which draw down ſevere reproaches upon the head of ſuch authors as dare to mention them. I obſerve this againſt thoſe who perſuade themſelves that the corruption of manners proceeds from mens doubting, or being ignorant that there is another life after this.

(23) Rivet, in Decalog. ad ver. 13. Oper. Tom. i. pag. 1400, col. 2.

SANDERS or SAUNDERS (NICHOLAS) an Engliſh Prieſt, but not a Jeſuit as ſome have ſaid [A], ſhewed great zeal for the Pope's intereſt, and miſerably ended his days in a kind of military miſſion in Ireland, where he was gone to encourage the Roman Catholics who had taken up arms againſt Queen Elizabeth [B]. I forbear to give his article, becauſe it is to be found, not only in Moreri's Dictionary, but alſo in other Books which are every where to be met with (a). I ſhall only ſay ſomething of his Hiſtory of the Engliſh Schiſm [C]. It is a book where there is a great deal of paſſion and very little exactneſs, two qualities which generally go together. In the (a) In the Hiſtoire du Divorce de Henri VIII, par Mr le Grand, Tom. ii, pag. 7, & ſeq. and in the Anti of Mr Baillet, article 159.

[A] He was a . . . . Prieſt, but not a Jeſuit, as ſome have ſaid.] Of this number was the author of the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (1); but that error, into which he had been drawn by guides whom he had reaſon to think creditable, was corrected ſoon after (2). That author had obſerved that du Moulin gives Sanders the title of Jeſuit (3), and had read the following words in a book of Mr Daillé: Richard Crackenthorp, one of the learned Engliſh writers, ſays that Sanders the Jeſuit was not aſhamed to be the firſt who publiſhed this ſtory (4); that is to ſay that Queen Elizabeth was created head of the Church. He had ſeen that Schoockius, for an inſtance of the Jeſuitical impoſtures, alledges what Sanders the Jeſuit wrote upon the birth of Queen Elizabeth (5).

[B] He miſerably ended his days in a kind of military miſſion in Ireland, where he was gone to encourage the Roman Catholics . . . againſt Queen Elizabeth.] His countryman Edward Riſhton, when he publiſhed the Hiſtory of the Engliſh Schiſm, prefixed to it a ſhort preface wherein he ſays what follows: As the ſaid Sanders, being very zealous for the ſalvation of his countrymen the Engliſh, had retired from Spain into Ireland, to comfort the diſtreſſed Catholics who had taken up arms in defence of Religion (in which holy work he ſoon after gave up his bleſſed ſoul to his Creator; his continual labours and ſufferings, the indiſpoſition of the air and place, the want of neceſſaries, and other difficulties and miſeries having occaſioned his death) he left this work of the Engliſh Schiſm. They put in the margin that he died in the year 1581. I have made uſe of the old French tranſlation, and not that of Mr Maucroix. We find in Camden, that the ill ſucceſs of the rebellion made Sanders loſe his ſenſes, and that ſeeing himſelf forſaken by all, he wandered up and down in the woods and mountains, and died of hunger in the year 1583. Upon this Camden makes the following reflexion; that the Divine Juſtice, if we may be allowed to judge of it, made uſe of hunger to ſtop a mouth which had been always ready to preach, revolt, and publiſh calumnies. Inter quos (Sacerdotes) facile primus erat Nicholaus Sanderus Anglus, qui fame eodem fere momento miſerrimè periit, cum derelictus, & ex adverſo rebellionis ſucceſſu mente motus, per ſylvas, ſaltus, & montes errabundus nullum reperiret ſolatium. In ejus pera deprehenſæ erant Orationes quædam & Epiſtolæ ad rebelles confirmandos conſcriptæ, amplis à Pontifice Rom. & Hiſpano promiſſis refertæ. Ita divina Juſtitia, (ſi fas ſit judicare) os illud ad rebelliones concitandas, & calumnias cum mendaciis eructandas ſemper apertum, fame obſtruxit. Ille enim primus omnium horrendum illud (ut alia taceam) contra matris Elizabethæ natales mendacium conflavit, quod nemo temporibus illis, recenti in eam Pontificiorum odio novit, Anglia totis XL poſtea annis non audivit, temporum ratio falſitatis & vanitatis liquidiſſimè convincit, & ipſe ſui immemor quod mendacem non oportuit, plane coarguit (6). Conſult Mr Burnet (7), who will tell you the different accounts that were given of this perſon's death.

[C] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his Hiſtory of the Engliſh Schiſm.] He compleated it in Spain; but he had not as yet put the laſt hand to it, being almoſt continually hindered by other affairs, and likewiſe by other compoſitions (8). Nevertheleſs there were ſome copies of it in Spain and Italy, and it was no difficult matter for Riſhton to get one of them, when, being prevailed upon by the importunity of one of his friends (9), he reſolved to publiſh this Hiſtory (10). I have read over,

(1) For the month of Nov. 1685, Art. VI, pag. 1238, of the firſt edition.

(2) In the ſecond edition, p. 1250.

(3) Du Moulin, Defenſe du Roi de la Grand' Bretagne, pag. 45, Edit. of Geneva 1631.

(4) Daillé, Replique à Adam & à Cottibi, Part. ii, pag. 78.

(5) Schoock, de Fabula Hamel. pag. m. 222.

(6) Camdenus, Hiſt. Reginæ Elizabethæ, Part. iii, pag. m. 372.

(7) Burnet, his Criticiſm on the ninth book of Varillas, pag. 35, & 131.

(8) Edward Riſhton, preface to the Hiſtory of the Engliſh Schiſm.

(9) He was at Cologn, and was called Jodocus Skarnbert.

(10) Riſhton, ibid.

the confutation (b) of the ſeventh book of his viſible monarchy of the Church, that author is upbraided not with having invented what he wrote but with truſting ſomewhat too raſhly to common reports in matters of importance (c). It is the general fault of thoſe who ſuffer perſecution for their religion. This was the caſe of Sanders. He embraced the ſentiments of the Spaniards and Italians touching the Pope's authority, and ſtrongly defended them in his book de viſibili Monarchia Eccleſiæ, printed for the firſt time in the year 1571 (d) at Louvain in folio (e), and in another work intitled de Clave David, which was one of his laſt productions (f)

(b) This confutation is intituled Fidelis ſervi infideli ſubdito Reſponſio, and was printed in the year 1573.

(c) Le Grand, Hiſt. du Divorce de Henri VIII, pag. 9, 10.

(d) Ibid. pag. 8.

(e) Epit. Biblioth. Geſneri.

(f) Nicolaus Sanderus cygnæa ſua cantione in Libris de Clave David egregie ſedis hujus (pontificiæ) dignitatem extulit. Schultingius, Epiſt. Dedic. Tom. i. Bibliothecæ Catholicæ, over, ſaid he, from beginning to end the ſaid work, and have corrected ſome paſſages, which had been either corrupted by the fault of the tranſcribers, or not ſufficiently explained by the author; through the haſte he was in: and to the end that the thread and order of the Hiſtory might be the better kept up, I have curtailed ſome things, which ſeemed to be intangled with too long diſputes. I have likewiſe added many that were wanting, particularly ſuch as happened after the death of Mr Sanders: and whereas the bulk and ſize of the work did not appear to be very large, I have comprehended the whole under the title of one ſingle book. Laſt of all I have delivered it, thus corrected, to my ſaid friend M. Joſſe, together with this epiſtle, to the end that he might ſend it to his Printer, who deſired it ſo earneſtly (11). In this manner did they publiſh the firſt edition, which was that of Cologn 1585. Riſhton had no hand in the following editions where many things were added (12); for he died the ſame year at St Menehou (13). This book of Sanders had ſuch a prodigious ſale, that being reprinted at Rome in the year 1586, a Bookſeller of Ingolſtad (14) immediately counterfeited that edition. He dates his Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Archbiſhop of Saltzburg on the 5th of November 1586: which makes me conclude that his edition came out that year, and that the copy which I make uſe of, and which has the year 1588 marked in the title, is of a ſecond edition at Ingolſtad. Note, that in the edition of Rome the work contains three books, according to the diviſion of Sanders with the paſſages which Riſhton had curtailed. Mr le Grand obſerves (15) that the editions of Rome and Ingolſtad are ſo different from the firſt that one may ſay it is a new work; and he pretends (16) that no edition has yet appeared which is better than the firſt. Others were publiſhed at Cologn in the year 1610, and the year 1628. The latter is the fulleſt of all; for it contains ſeveral additions taken from a book of Ribadeneira upon the ſame ſubject.

A man who marked his name only by the initial letters J. T. A. C. tranſlated this book of Sanders into French the ſame year that it was publiſhed at Cologn, I mean in 1585; but afterwards, adds he, this Hiſtory having been augmented at Rome with licences in the year 1586, and ſent to me ſome months ago, I have mended and tranſlated it into our French tongue. The advertiſement where he ſpeaks in this manner is dated the 9th of July 1587. This tranſlation was printed in the year 1587 in 8vo. We are not told in what place; but the title informs us that it was printed by the command of the moſt illuſtrious and reverend Cardinal de Vaudemont, at the requeſt of certain Engliſh gentlemen who had been obliged to fly their country for the Catholic Faith. I have ſeen another French tranſlation printed in the year 1587 in 8vo. It is very different from the former: I do not paſs this judgment upon it, becauſe the words that are in the title of the one are not in the title of the other, or becauſe the Preface ſigned J. T. A. C. and dated the 9th of July 1587, is in the one and not in the other. Theſe are not proofs of a different edition. The Bookſellers ſometimes change all the firſt pages without reprinting the body of the book. But here are my proofs: it is impoſſible to give more convincing ones. The tranſlation printed by the command of the Cardinal de Vaudemont, contains 281 leaves, the other contains 296, although it be printed in ſmaller characters. I have found in the latter ſeveral paſſages otherwiſe tranſlated than they are in the former. I ſhall give an example of it. We read in the 187th leaf of that tranſlation which wants the Preface ſigned J. T. A. C. that Millon Coverdale being gone to Oxford, got up into the pulpit to diſcourſe upon the Euchariſt, and becauſe people rallied him on account of his bringing with him 'Sororem quamdam ſuam, - - - a certain ſiſter of his,' he ſharply replied 'qui in eum ſtomachati fuiſſent quod vas commoditatis haberet (ita enim ſuam meretriculam appellabat) - - - thoſe who had rallied him for his having always with him his veſſel of conveniency (for ſo he called his whore).' Here follow the terms of the other tranſlation in the 166th leaf (17). 'Milon Coverdal . . . having heard that the Univerſity of Oxford was wonderfully addicted to the Catholic Faith, and for no conſideration in the world could be prevailed upon to abandon it, in order to embrace Hereſy; and that, beſides this, there were ſome who girded at him on account of his carrying every where along with him a certain ſiſter of his, imagining that he ſhould find a great many copies of himſelf, and being perſuaded that he ſhould be able to ſeduce a vaſt number of people, he came to Oxford, got up into the pulpit, every body was very attentive. . . . . . For this reaſon after he had firſt of all ſharply reproved thoſe who were offended at his having the Veſſel of Conveniency (for ſo he called his little whore) he added, that, &c.'

The ſtile of theſe two tranſlations is extremely barbarous and unpoliſhed, even for that time: the author who marks his name by the initial letters J. T. A. C. does juſtice to himſelf when he owns that he has had more regard to the ſenſe and meaning, or corruption of Sanders, than to a ſhew and orderly placing of quaint words, contenting himſelf with being underſtood by thoſe who conſider rather the marrow and truth of Hiſtory, than the ornaments and figures of Rhetoric. We muſt nevertheleſs own that his tranſlation is not ſo barbarous as the others, and contains fewer paſſages miſunderſtood, for example, he has not blundered in this, as the other has done. 'The river Thames which waters the city of London, on the 17th of December 1550, in leſs than nine hours, ebbed and flowed three times contrary to cuſtom. The ſame year a certain ſweating diſeaſe, peſtilential and mortal, and before that time unknown to Phyſicians, ſpread all over England, and killed an almoſt infinite number of people, ſo that in leſs than ſeven days there died in the city of London alone eight hundred perſons: ſeveral thouſands more being ſuffocated with the ſame diſtemper in other places: it had nevertheleſs nothing of the nature and quality of the Plague: but it was a kind of miracle and prodigy, by which the almighty and merciful God thought fit to warn the Engliſh of the enormous ſin which they had committed againſt him: it has done no ſervice however to a wicked and reprobate generation (18).' In the other tranſlation the Latin words Sudatorius quidam peſtifer morbus nunquam antea Medicis cognitus (19), have been rendred a certain diſeaſe called the Pox formerly unknown to Phyſicians. Here are two errors fit for a ſchool-boy: the Pox, which was not the thing in queſtion, had already been the ſubject of ſeveral printed volumes. My reaſon for quoting this paſſage of the Hiſtorian ſomewhat at length, is to ſhew the turn of his mind, and becauſe he has publiſhed a groſs falſity not to be excuſed in an Engliſhman. He ſays that the Engliſh ſweating diſeaſe which was felt at London in the year 1550 had never before that time been known to the Phyſicians (20). He was then ignorant it ſeems that it began to be known in the year 1486 (21), and that afterwards it frequently made great havock. Do not fancy that the leaſt bad tranſlation of the two was written by a man that underſtood the Latin well. You are going to ſee a miſtake which will be pretty ſufficient to convince you that he ſometimes miſunderſtood the ſenſe of the original. 'The Printers made every where ſtrict ſearch after the works of Mr Nicholas Sanders . . . . . and eſpecially thoſe which had not yet been printed, but which he had either depoſited with his particular

(11) Ibid.

(12) Le Grand, Hiſt. du Divorce de Henri VIII, Tom. ii, pag. 6.

(13) A French town in Champaign.

(14) Named Wolfgangus Ederus.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Ibid. p. 7.

(17) Note that I have not cited word for word the whole paſſage of the other tranſlation, as I do of this, It is ſufficient that in ſome words we ſee the difference.

(18) Sanderus, du Schiſme d'Anglet. livr. ii, fol 168 of an old French tranſlation.

(19) Sanderus, de Schiſmate Anglican. lib. ii, pag. 233, Edition of Ingolſtat. 1588.

(20) Nunquam antea Medicis cognitus. Id. ibid.

(21) See the remark [D], of the articie AMMONIUS (ANDREW) & Sethus Calviſius, ad ann. 1486, who obſerves that the Scurvy likewiſe began this year in Low-Germany.

‘ particular friends, before his death, or left to his ‘ adverſaries.’ It is in this manner that he tranſlates theſe Latin words of Riſhton : D. Nicolai Sanderi . . . . Opera . . . . à Typographis undique conquiri ad prælum, maximè verò ea quæ nondum impreſſa, ſed ab illo . . . . vel apud amicos depoſita, vel in adverſariis relicta. You ſee how by a groſs ignorance he imagined that in adverſariis, that is to ſay, among his papers, ſignified to his enemies. Mr Maucroix gave a new French tranſlation of this book of Sanders in the year 1677. It is very polite : we have three editions of it (22).

(22) Two of Paris, and one in Holland: this laſt was printed in the year 1683.

To know whether this Hiſtory of the Schiſm be impartial and of any weight, we muſt conſult the criticiſm which Biſhop Burnet has given of it (23), and what Mr le Grand has anſwered in behalf of Sanders (24). How paſſionate this author is has been ſaid in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres at the ſixth article for the month of November 1685. An anonymous writer had already criticized upon that Hiſtorian in the year 1593. His book was printed at Cambridge, and is intituled, Anti-Sanderus, duobus Dialogis Venetiis habitis in quibus Sanderi & aliorum calumniæ in Elizabetham Reginam refelluntur. See likewiſe Schoockius in the fifth chapter of the third part of the Fabula Hamelenſis (25).

(23) He has obſerved at the end of the firſt part of the Hiſtory of the Reformation of the Church of England, 123 errors in Sanders, and at the end of the ſecond part 83 errors in the ſame, and 12 in the continuator. The edition he goes by is that of Cologn 1628.

(24) In the ſecond volume of his Hiſtory of the Engliſh Schiſm. Some pieces have been written pro and con ſince the firſt. Theſe too may be conſulted.

(25) Pag. 222. Edit. ſecunda.

SANSON (JAMES) a bare-footed Carmelite, known in his order by the name of Ignatius-Joſeph de Jeſus Maria, was born at Abbeville on the tenth of February 1595. He took the habit of this order at Paris on the thirtieth of November 1618, and was ſent to the convent where the Noviciate of the province was, and where . . . . . Father Clement de Sainte Marie, a native of Geneva, and nephew to Calvin (a), was Prior, and . . . . Father Alexander, nephew to Pope Leo XI, miniſter of the Novices . . . . . A year after his profeſſion he was ſent to ſtudy Divinity, at which time he continued the exerciſes of the Noviciate . . . . . ‘ He took holy orders, and . . . . . about three ‘ months after his ordination, he was employed by his ſuperiors in hearing confeſſions and ‘ preaching ; afterwards he was ſent to Limoges to begin that foundation, where he had ‘ the happineſs to converſe familiarly with the venerable mother Iſabelle des Anges, one of ‘ the firſt ſix Carmelite Nuns that came from Spain, to eſtabliſh the order in France. ‘ At his return from Limoges he was choſen ſub-prior of the convent at Paris, then ‘ maſter of the Novices at Charenton . . . . . He was afterwards appointed maſter of ‘ the Novices in the convent of Toulouſe.’ He was choſen ſome time after that to be confeſſor to the Ducheſs of Savoy, and to govern the Carmelites newly eſtabliſhed at Turin. It was he that perſuaded Madame la Peſtrie to found a convent of Urſuline-Nuns in Canada, by giving a hundred thouſand livres for ſo good a work. This happened at his return from Turin, while he was at Paris ; he applied himſelf at the ſame time to found a covent of bare-footed Carmelites in Abbeville, and ſucceeded therein beyond his expectation [A]. He died in the convent of Charenton on the nineteenth of Auguſt 1664 (b). Strange things are ſaid of his devotion [B]. He has written ſome books [C]. He had two brothers, the one a Capuchin and the other a Carthuſian Fryar [D]. He was of the ſame family with the

(a) See the remark [DD], of the article CALVIN.

(b) Taken from a book intituled, Les Fleurs du Carmel cueillies du Parterre des Carmes Dechauſſez de France, - - - - - - par le R. P. Pierre de la Mere de Dieu Carme Dechauſſé, pag. 292, & ſeq. Edit. of Antwerp 1670. in 4to.

[A] He applied himſelf . . . . to found a Convent of barefooted Carmelites in Abbeville, and ſucceeded therein beyond his expectation.] I ſhall quote what one of his brethren ſays : ‘ He obtained more than he had aſked, ‘ ſince he not only ſaw the foundation of our Fathers ‘ in Abbeville, but likewiſe in the city of Amiens, ‘ where I had the happineſs to accompany him : and ‘ I am obliged to declare this truth, that the people ‘ held him in ſuch veneration that they did not call ‘ him otherwiſe than the Holy Father : notwithſtanding that ſome Fryars turned this into ridicule, it ‘ did not hinder his reputation from increaſing daily, ‘ nor parents from preſenting their ſick children to ‘ him, in order to receive his bleſſing, as being perſuaded that this would contribute towards their recovery (1).’ To know what hand he had in eſtabliſhing the Monks of his order at Abbeville, we muſt conſult the Annals of the barefooted Carmelites (2) written by Father Lewis de Saint Thereſa.

(1) Les Fleurs du Carmel, pag. 299.

(2) Ad ann. 1640 : I have been informed of this by Mr Lancelot, one of thoſe who take care of the books in the Mazarin library.

[B] Strange things are ſaid of his devotion.] During the exerciſes of the Noviciate, ‘ He was ſometimes ‘ ſo powerfully drawn and tranſported out of himſelf ‘ that he rather ſuffered than acted, and the ſweetneſs ‘ of Heaven was ſuch, that, as he himſelf writes, it ‘ was difficult for him to bear it. Theſe infuſed lights ‘ and inward riches of virtue made him ſenſible that ‘ ſupernatural prayer cannot be acquired by any human means : how a ſoul ought to behave when, according to St Dionyſius the Areopagite, it ſuffers divine things paſſively (3) : . . . . Several believed that ‘ he converſed familiarly with, and that he even ſaw, ‘ his good angel, to whom he paid a ſingular devotion : ‘ as he was one day with the reverend Father Euſtace ‘ de S. Marie upon the moving ſand, haſtening towards ‘ the little town of Crottoy, the ſea had like to have ‘ buried them in its waves, had not a child, as beautiful as an angel, appeared to ſhew them the way, ‘ and obliged them to double their pace, who after ‘ having conducted them into a place of ſafety, diſappeared. His companion was firmly perſuaded that ‘ this child was an angel who had taken that viſible ‘ form in order to reſcue them both from the manifeſt ‘ danger of loſing their lives. Our venerable Father ‘ confeſſes that he never was in ſuch an extremity ; ‘ and indeed he was very thankful upon that account, ‘ ſince he prepared himſelf for a happy death with ‘ more application than before. . . . . . He gave directions in writing how he would have every thing ‘ done at this laſt hour ; among other things he deſired to have a halter about his neck ; to die upon ‘ the flat ground ; to do amande honorable to the ‘ whole ſociety for the ill example which he fancied ‘ he had given from the time that he had the happineſs to wear the holy habit of the Holy Virgin, ‘ and to be received into our holy order. I confeſs ‘ that having read all that he writes upon this head, ‘ the ardent ejaculations he makes to his GOD, and ‘ the heroic acts he brings forth from the bottom of ‘ his heart, I have been very much edified, eſpecially ‘ by his profound humility (4).’

(3) Fleurs du Carmel, p. 297.

(4) Ibid. pag. 299, 300.

[C] He has written ſome books.] In the year 1646 he cauſed his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the city of Abbeville, and of the Archdeaconry of Ponthieu, to be printed at Paris in 4to. Eleven years after he publiſhed at the ſame place in folio the Hiſtory of the Earls of Ponthieu, which I have cited in the article of Abbeville. In this laſt book (5) he frequently refers to the former. For the reſt, Mr de la Roque, in the 153d page of his Traitté de la Nobleſſe, ſhould not have called him Ignatius Sanſon, but James Sanſon (6). This was joining his family name and his religious name together. After this Carmelite's death there was found written with his own hand a piece, intituled, Preparation for Death, wherein he ſpeaks of himſelf without mentioning his name. He dedicated it to his good guardian angel. That Epiſtle Dedicatory is ſingular : you will find it in the 290th and 291ſt pages of the Fleurs du Carmel de France.

(5) See particularly pag. 825.

(6) He tells us in pag. 830, of his Hiſtoire des Comtes de Ponthieu, that in the world he was called James Sanſon. Mr Lancelot communicated theſe remarks to me.

[D] He had two brothers, the one a Capuchin, and the other a Carthuſian Fryar.] I am going to cite a paſſage which contains ſomething that ought not to be believed. ‘ When he was about fourteen years of age he the famous Geographer Nicholas Sanſon (c).

(c) He was ſecond couſin to that Geographers father. I was informed of it by Mr Lancelot.

'he made a trip to Paris, where he had the happineſs 'to ſee his eldeſt brother, the Capuchin named Peter 'Matthew d'Abbeville, who died in the convent of 'St Honoré, having been poiſoned by the Heretics 'who could not endure the great converſions which 'God wrought by him, in the city of Alençon where 'he was the guardian. The poiſon having not im'mediately killed him made him ſuffer a long martyr'dom and pains for ſeveral years. He led ſuch an 'exemplary life, and died ſuch a holy death, that his 'name has deſerved to be inſerted in the Gallican 'Martyrology. He ſaw him but once lying upon a 'poor bed in his cloaths, and overwhelmed with ſick'neſs: he was ſo ſenſibly touched with the example 'of this good brother's humility, and with the words 'he ſaid to him, that the tears guſhed from his eyes 'for joy and grief: for joy to ſee him, and for grief 'to find him ſo emaciated. He had another brother, 'a Carthuſian, named Dom John Sanſon, who did not 'live long in his order: his life however was ſo ex'emplary that it deſerved to be written, that it 'might ſerve poſterity by way of an incentive to 'virtue (7).'

(7) Fleurs du Carmel, p. 294.

SAPORTA (Antony) royal profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Montpellier, and chancellor of the ſame univerſity, lived in the XVIth century. His treatiſe de Tumoribus præter naturam was publiſhed at Lyons in the year 1624 in 12mo by the care of Henry Gras (a), Phyſician of the faculty of Montpellier, and fellow of the college of Phyſicians at Lyons. It had been for a conſiderable time depoſited among the papers of Francis Ranchin to whom it was dedicated. I cannot tell whether or not our Saporta was the ſon of Lewis Saporta a famous Phyſician [A]; but I know that he was father to John Saporta author of a treatiſe de Lue venerea, which was printed with that de Tumoribus præter naturam.

(a) And not by the care of the author himſelf, as Mr Konig affirms.

[A] Lewis Saporta a famous Phyſician.] 'He was Doctor and Profeſſor in the Univerſity of 'Lerida, where he had taught Phyſic for the ſpace of 'nine years (1).' After this he retired to Avignon; but before he could ſettle there, he was obliged to go through all the neceſſary forms in order to be made a Doctor of that Univerſity. From thence having an inclination to retire to Montpellier, he was obliged to go through the ſame degrees again, in order to be made a Doctor of the Univerſity there, as Laurence Joubert informs us; ſo that he was thrice created Doctor (2).

(1) Riolan, Recherches ſur les Eſcholes en Medecine, pag. 165.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 166.

SAPPHO was one of the moſt famous women of all antiquity for her verſes and her amours: ſhe was a native of Mitylene in the iſle of Leſbos (a), and lived in the time of Alcæus her countryman, and in the time of Steſichorus, that is to ſay, in the XLIId Olympiad, ſix hundred and ten years before Jesus Christ. She compoſed a great number of odes, epigrams, elegies (b), epithalamiums, &c (c). All her verſes run upon love [B], and had ſuch natural and moving charms that one ought not to be ſurprized if ſhe

(a) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 425. Suidas, in Σαπφώ.

(b) Suidas, ibid.

(c) Servius in Virgil. Dionyſ. Halicarn.

[A] She lived . . . . in the XLIId Olympiad.] This fully confutes the ſtory of the amours of Anacreon and Sappho; for though we ought not to place between them an interval of 100 or 120 years, as Mrs le Fevre does (1), yet it is true, that their ages do not well enough agree for a commerce of gallantry. We may very well ſuppoſe that in the LIId Olympiad Anacreon was capable of love; but ſince the Chronologers place Sappho in the XLIId Olympiad, we muſt conclude that ſhe was then in her greateſt reputation, and that ſhe might be about thirty years old. Now when ſhe threw herſelf headlong from the rock, ſhe was in love with a young man ſhe had hoped to regain: therefore there is no probability that ſhe lived till the time when Anacreon was born, and we may be well aſſured he never ſaw her, nor ever was in love with her. It was only to give his fancy a full ſcope that Hermeſianax ſuppoſed ſhe was beloved by Anacreon. Ἐν τούτοις ὁ Ερμησιάναξ σφάλλεται συγχρονεῖν οἰόμενος Σαπφὼ καὶ Ἀνακρέοντα, τὸν μὲν κατὰ Κῦρον καὶ Πολυκράτην γενόμενον, τὴν δὲ κατ' Ἀλυάττην τὸν Κροίσου πατέρα. . . . ., Ἡγοῦμαι παίζειν τὸν Ἑρμησιάνακτα περὶ τούτου τοῦ ἔρωτος. In his fallitur Hermeſianax qui Sappho coævam Anacreonti fuiſſe putat, cum ea ſub Alyatte Crœſi patre vixerit, Anacreon verò ſub Cyro & Polycrate. . . . . Hermeſianactem per luſum de Anacreontis amore id ſcripſiſſe arbitror (2). - - - In this Hermeſianax is miſtaken, who fancies that Sappho and Anacreon were cotemporaries; whereas ſhe lived in the time of Alyattes, the father of Crœſus, and he in the time of Cyrus and Polycrates. . . . . For my part I imagine that Hermeſianax only writ of this intrigue to give his fancy a full ſcope. Others (3) by the ſame poetical liberty handed about ſome verſes, wherein Anacreon played the gallant to Sappho, and ſhe anſwered him. Diphilus (4) a comic Poet introduced Archilochus and Hipponax courting Sappho in one of his Plays. This is a witty conceit of the ſame kind. Madam Scuderi has not therefore made uſe of this anachroniſm without examples, when ſhe ſuppoſes (5) that Anacreon courted Sappho. If Sappho had been ſuch an one as ſhe is characterized in the Grand Cyrus, ſhe had been the moſt accompliſhed perſon of her age. The lady, who made her ſo great a model of perfection, went a long time by the name of Sappho in the ingenious writings wherein ſhe was ſpoken of. This was to do a great deal of honour to the antient Sappho, ſince they gave her name to a lady who writ perfectly well in verſe and in proſe, and whoſe virtue was admired. Of whom one might have ſaid, Caſtior hæc & non doctior illa fuit (6).

In learning equal, ſhe ſurpaſt
The other by her manners chaſt.

For the reſt, there is reaſon to think that if Anacreon and Sappho had ſeen one another in their youth, they would have made love to one another, and that we ſhould have had a more certain account of the gallant's good ſucceſs than we have of that of Alcæus (7). Nay perhaps they would have married together, but I do not know whether they would have long agreed; each of them loved too much his like. I do not know where Tanaquillus Faber (8) found that Diphilus made mention of their amours; it ſhould be in Athæneus, but he ſays nothing of it. I have already ſaid that Mrs le Fevre puts between them the ſpace of a hundred or ſixſcore years; but I add that this does not agree with what ſhe aſſerts, that Anacreon was cotemporary with Solon, Æſop, Cyrus, Crœſus, and Piſiſtratus. Theſe two laſt remarks are equally againſt the father (9) and the daughter.

[B] All her verſes run upon love.] Pauſanias obſerves that Anacreon was the firſt, who, after Sappho, writ ſcarce any thing but love verſes (10), and that Sappho writ a great many things upon this ſubject which did not agree well together (11). The meaning of it is that ſhe turned this ſubject ſo many ways, that

(1) Preface to Anacreon.

(2) Athenæus, lib. xiii, p. 599.

(3) Chamæleon, apud Athen. lib. xiii, p. 599.

(4) Apud eundem, ibid.

(5) In the Grand Cyrus.

(6) Martial. Epigr. lxviii, lib. vii.

(7) See the article ALCÆUS.

(8) Vie des Poëtes Grecs, pag. m. 49. Mrs le Fevre ſays ſo too in the Life of Anacreon.

(9) Mr le Fevre, Vie des Poëtes Grecs, places Anacreon in the LXXIId Olympiad; and in his Latin notes upon Anacreon he makes him cotemporary with Solon, Æſop, Crœſus, and Piſiſtratus, &c.

(10) Pauſanias, lib. i. pag. 23.

(11) Pauſanias, lib. ix, 302.

ſhe was called the tenth Muſe (d). Strabo looked upon her as a wonder (e), and ſaid that never any woman could come near her in Poetry. There remains nothing of ſo many Poems ſhe made but ſome ſmall fragments which the ancient Scholiaſts have cited, and a Hymn to Venus, and an Ode to one of her miſtreſſes [C]; for you muſt know that her amorous paſſion extended even to the perſons of her own ſex [D], and this is that for which ſhe was moſt cried down. Suidas has preſerved the names of three of her miſtreſſes (f), who ruined her reputation and diſgraced themſelves by a ſtrange ſingularity which was imputed to their commerce. He has alſo preſerved the names of three of her female diſciples whom ſhe did, in all probability, initiate into her myſteries. Since Lucian (g) does not obſerve that the women of the iſle of Leſbos, who he ſays were very ſubject to this paſſion, learned it of Sappho, it is better to believe that ſhe found it already eſtabliſhed in her country than to aſcribe to her the invention of it.

(d) Antholog. lib. i, cap. lxvii. Auſonius, Epig. xxxii.

(e) Θαυμαστὸν τι χρῆμα, admirandum quid. Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 424.

(f) Ovid names two more, Epiſt. Sapph. ad Phaon. See the remark [D].

(g) Dialog. Meretric. Tom. ii, pag. 714.

that ſhe ſpoke of it ſometimes in one manner and ſometimes in another. The ſport pleaſed her. Among other things ſhe had made a calculation of the ſigns by which one might know an amorous perſon; and ſhe had ſo good ſucceſs in it that the Phyſician Eraſiſtratus knew by thoſe ſigns the diſtemper of Antiochus (12). Every body knows that this young prince was deſperately in love with Stratonice, his mother in-law, and that not daring to diſcover it he pretended to be ſick, and the cauſe of his illneſs being known, his father parted with her to him: but as often as this adventure is ſpoken of, people do not think, as it is fit they ſhould, of Sappho who afforded the Phyſician the neceſſary expedients. Thoſe, who intended to denote the Poems of this woman by their true character, called them her fires and her amours.

(12) Plutarch. in Demetrio, pag. 907.

Spirat adhuc amor
Vivuntque commiſſi calores
Æoliæ fidibus puellæ (13).

And Sappho's charming lyre
Preſerves her ſoft deſire,
And tunes our raviſh'd ſouls to love.

Creech.

(13) Horat. Od. IX, lib. iv.

Plutarch compares her to Cacus the ſon of Vulcan, of whom the Romans writ that he caſt out of his mouth fire and flame: what ſhe ſings is a compoſition of fire, ſays he, her verſes are the expulſion of the flame ſhe has in her heart. Αὐτὴ δὲ ἀληθῶς μεμιγμένα πυρὶ φθέγγεται καὶ διὰ τῶν μελῶν ἀναφέρει τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς καρδίας θερμότητα. Ipſa autem vere igni mixta loquitur, & per carmina calorem corde conceptum emittit (14).

(14) Plutarchus de Amore, p. 762.

[C] There remains nothing . . . . but ſome ſmall fragments . . . . a Hymn to Venus, and an Ode to one of her miſtreſſes.] The Hymn to Venus was preſerved by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (15), who inſerted it in his works as an example of a perfection he had a mind to characterize. With the ſame view Longinus (16) has preſerved to us the Ode to her miſtreſs. Catullus has tranſlated part of this Ode (17): all theſe circumſtances are a proof of the ſingular eſteem the antients had for her verſes.

(15) De colloc. verborum, cap. 81.

(16) Περὶ ὕψους, cap. ix.

(17) See in Iſaac Voſſius's Commentary upon Catullus, pag. 113, thoſe two pieces of Sappho corrected.

Tanaquillus Faber was reſolved to publiſh ſome obſervations upon that ode; but he abſtained from it becauſe he was brought into trouble for ſome things he had put in his edition of Anacreon (18). ‘Ut ne tandem bona fide ἄπος . . . . fiam, ſaith he (19), ‘quod ſane haud neceſſe eſt, decrevi nil quidquam ad hoc admirabile odarium dicere. Fuit olim, fateor, cum Sapphonem amabam; ſed ex quo illa me perditiſſima femina pæne miſerum perdidit cum ſceleratiſſimo ſuo congerrone, (Anacreontem dico, ſi neſcis, Lector,) noli ſperare quidquam à me dictum iri, unde aut ipſa, aut ipſius opera, (queis tamen olim in Græcia nil elegantius, nil magis terſum aut venuſtum quidquam extitit,) probari videantur. Itaque quando mihi impoſita fibula eſt, hîc lacuna eſto. - - - Leſt I ſhould be excommunicated in good earneſt, which is a thing that I am by no means fond of, I have taken a reſolution to ſay nothing at all upon this admirable ode. I confeſs that I formerly looked upon it as ſuch; but having been ruined by that leud woman, and by her moſt wicked and tattling companion, (if you are at a loſs, reader, to know who that is, I mean Anacreon), do not expect that I ſhould ſay any thing by which I might ſeem to approve either her or his work, (tho', in Greece, no productions were eſteemed more elegant, polite, and beautiful). Since therefore ſilence is impoſed upon me, here let there be a gap.' The fragment which he cites (20) out of his notes on Anacreon, ſhews us that he was perſuaded that Sappho writ this ode for a woman ſhe was in love with. We ſhall ſee in the following remark that his daughter was not of this opinion; and that nevertheleſs it is a very probable one. For the reſt, if there is no better proof than the above quoted Latin paſſage of this author (21), to pretend that he ceaſed to eſteem Sappho (22), it is to rely upon an ill foundation.

(18) See above remark [D] of the article of the firſt BATHYLLUS.

(19) Tanaq. Faber, Not. in Longinum, pag. 292.

(20) Id. ibid. pag. 293.

(21) Above citat (19).

(22) See the notes upon the Greek Poets by Mr le Fevre.

[D] Her amorous paſſion extended even to the perſons of her own ſex.] I cannot blame the charity of Mrs le Fevre (23), who has endeavoured, for the honour of Sappho, to render the fact uncertain; but I think her too reaſonable to be angry with us for believing our own eyes. The ode which Longinus has mentioned, is not in the ſtile of one female friend writing to another: it ſavours of love all over, and not of friendſhip: otherwiſe, Longinus, who was ſo good a judge, would not have brought it as a model of the art with which great maſters repreſent things: he would not, I ſay, have given us as an example of that art, the manner wherewith the ſymptoms of an amorous fury are collected in that ode, Τὰ συμβαίνοντα ταῖς ἐρωτικαῖς μανίαις παθήματα; and Plutarch would not have cited this ſame ode to prove that love is a divine fury, which cauſes more violent enthuſiaſms than thoſe of the prieſteſs of Delphos, or the Bacchantes, and of the prieſts of Cybele. Τί τοσοῦτον ἡ Πυθία πέπονθεν ἁψαμένη τοῦ τρίποδος; τίνα τῶν ἐνθεαζομένων οὕτως ὁ αὐλὸς καὶ τὰ μητρῷα καὶ τὸ τύμπανον ἐξιστᾶσιν (24). The poetical tranſlation of this is to be found in theſe verſes of Horace, if inſtead of iræ, anger, you put amor, love:

(23) In the Life of Sappho.

(24) Plut. de Amore, pag. 763. Here is Xylander's verſion, Quid tale aut tantum accidit Pithiæ cum tripodem attigit? Quemnam orgia agentium tibia & Magnæ matris carmina atque tympanum ſic animo abalienaverunt.

Non Dindymene, non adytis quatit
Mentem ſacerdotum incola Pythius,
  Non Liber æque, non acuta
    Sic geminant Corybantes æra,
Triſtes ut iræ (25).

Not Cybele ſuch heat inſpires
Ne'er Phœbus with ſuch raging fires
  His prophet's ſoul poſſeſs'd,
Nor Bacchus ſelf can raiſe a man
Half ſo much as anger can,
  When once it burns the breaſt.

Creech.

(25) Horat. Ode XVI, lib. i.

People were ſo perſuaded in Ovid's time, that Sappho loved women as men do; that he makes no difficulty of introducing her making a ſacrifice to Phaon of the female companions of her debauchery.

Nec me Pyrrhiades Methymniadeſve puellæ,
  Nec me Leſbiadum cetera turba juvant,
Vilis Anactone, vilis mihi candida Cydno:
  Non oculis gratia eſt Atthis, ut ante meis.
Atque aliæ centum quas non ſine crimine amavi
  Improbe, multarum quod fuit, unus habes.

. . . .

Leſbides infamem quæ me feciſtis amatæ,
  Deſinite ad citharas turba venire meas (26).

No more the Leſbian dames my paſſion move,
Once the dear objects of my guilty love;

(26) Ovidius, Epiſt. Sapph. ad Phaon.

it. Be it as it will, Sappho paſſed for a famous Tribas, and ſome are of opinion that this was the reaſon why ſhe was ſirnamed Maſculine (b) [E]. If her deſign was to diſpenſe with the other half of mankind, ſhe was fruſtrated of her expectation; for ſhe fell deſperately in love with Phaon, and did in vain all that ſhe could to make him love her: but he deſpiſed her and forced her by his coldneſs to throw herſelf headlong from a rock [F], to extinguiſh her devouring flame. How cruel he was

All other loves are loſt in only thine,
Ah, youth ungrateful to a flame like mine!
. . . .
Ye Leſbian virgins, and ye Leſbian dames,
Themes of my verſe, and objects of my flames;
No more your groves with my glad ſongs ſhall ring,
No more theſe hands ſhall touch the trembling ſtring.
POPE.

Horace is another evidence againſt her in the complaints he ſuppoſes ſhe made of the maids of Leſbos;

Et Æoliis fidibus querentem
Sappho puellis de popularibus (27.)

And Sappho, in Æolian ſtrains,
Who of the Leſbian maids complains.

for if ſhe had reaſon to complain that the ladies of her country envied her merit, ſhe would not have choſen the young ones for the ſubject of her complaint: but becauſe ſhe had ſpoke to them of love, and the greateſt part of them were either too ſimple, or, to ſpeak better, too crafty to be catched, and thoſe who had complied, had made her infamous; for this reaſon ſhe complained of the young maids. This verſe of Ovid, Deſinite ad citharas turba venire meas, ſhews, that the women of Leſbos had done juſtice to her fine verſes. For the reſt, I leave it to a new Father Sanchez to decide, whether a married woman, who had complied with the paſſion of Sappho, would have committed adultery, and made her huſband a cuckold, properly ſpeaking? I do not know whether this queſtion has eſcaped the inexhauſtible curioſity of the Caſuiſts about matrimonial cauſes.

Let us confirm this by the teſtimony of a great wit, who did not believe that his complaiſance for Mrs le Fevre ſhould go ſo far as to approve the pains ſhe has taken in favour of Sappho. After the death of her huſband, ſays he (28), Sappho, tho' young, renounced marriage, but not the pleaſure of loving. She had a ſoul too amorous to be without it; which may be eaſily judged by the tenderneſs which runs through her poems, and which undoubtedly ſets her above all the Poets as to that point. Thus finding herſelf too weak to vanquiſh ſo violent an inclination as that, ſhe wholly gave herſelf up to it, and loved all manner of ways, going even far beyond the bounds which modeſty naturally preſcribes to her ſex. It is in vain to juſtify her on that head; it cannot be done but at the expence of truth: and neither her averſion for the ſhameful love of Charaxus, nor all the honours ſhe received from the Leſbians, can waſh off a ſtain, which all thoſe who have ſpoke of her could not diſguiſe, notwithſtanding the encomiums they have given her, and which her own works evidence more clearly ſtill. Several beautiful women are put in the number of her miſtreſſes.

[E] She was ſirnamed Maſculine.] It is not ſo eaſy as it is thought to know truly what Horace means by Maſcula Sappho; but if he pretended to reproach her with her love againſt nature, it is eaſy to know he took the wrong time. The epithet would be very cold, and too far fetched without any neceſſity. There are, notwithſtanding, learned men who underſtand it ſo. Chabot (29) places among them the interpreter of Juvenal and Porphyrio, an antient ſcholiaſt upon Horace; and gives us Domitius for his author as to the latter. Without doubt he means Domitius Calderinus, whoſe commentary upon Martial I have not (30), but, according to Chabot, we find there, that Porphyrio has interpreted the word maſcula both in a proper and figurative ſenſe, 'Vel 'quia Sappho in poëtico ſtudio verſata eſt, in quo 'ſæpius enituit, vel quia tribas diffamata fuit. - - - 'Either becauſe ſhe made Poetry her ſtudy, in which ſhe 'frequently excelled, or becauſe ſhe was an infamous 'tribas' Cruquius, who has publiſhed the old ſcholiaſts upon Horace, has not publiſhed theſe words of Porphyrio. As for the interpreter of Juvenal, cited by Chabot, it is reaſonable that we ſhould take him for the ſcholiaſt of that Poet; but I do not find that he ſays what is imputed to him: It is Britannicus who ſays it upon the forty-ſeventh verſe of the ſecond ſatire (31). However it be with the antient commentators, it is certain that the moderns do commonly mention three opinions about the ſenſe of maſcula Sappho. 1. That this word means that ſhe was a tribas. 2. That it denotes the inclination ſhe had for the ſciences, inſtead of handling the ſpindle and diſtaff. 3. The courage ſhe had to precipitate herſelf at Leucas. This laſt opinion is Scaliger's (32), and Turnebus's (33), which is ſtrongly confirmed by the following verſes of Auſonius (34).

Et de nimboſo ſaltum Leucate minatur,
Maſcula Leſbiacis Sappho peritura ſaggitis.

And manly Sappho, with the Leſbian dart
Sore wounded, to relieve the cruel ſmart
From ſteep Leucate's formidable height
Threatens a furious leap. . . .

See the article LEUCAS, and the following remark.

Thevet rejects the firſt ſenſe of maſcula Sappho, and follows the ſecond and third, but not without confounding himſelf childliſhly. Horace and Auſonius, ſays he (35), when they called this Leſbian woman maſcula, meant nothing elſe but that ſhe did what was proper for men, in compoſing ſo excellent verſes, or that ſhe had undertaken to get into thoſe beautiful places of Leucas, near which the men durſt not come. What an abſurdity to give the name of beautiful places to a dreadful precipice, whither none went but out of deſpair? This therefore, continues he (36), is to wrong our Sappho, and to calumniate her without a juſt reaſon, ſince the divine Philoſopher Plato admired her for her dexterity and vivacity of wit, and for her profound wiſdom, which ſet her, not only above the reſt of her ſex, but alſo above the moſt able men. I make no manner of doubt but Thevet is a falſe witneſs here: I do not believe that ever Plato ſpoke of her profound wiſdom, and if he had given her that elogy, it ſhould not be underſtood in the ſenſe of Thevet, but in the ſenſe wherein it is taken at this very day among the Walloons, and was formerly taken in France. The midwives were called ſages, wiſe, not becauſe of their virtue, but becauſe they knew many things that other women knew not. They are called at this day femmes ſages in Guienne and Languedoc, but in other provinces, where they ſpeak more exactly the French, to avoid the equivocation, they make uſe of a tranſpoſition, and call them ſages-femmes. Tell at this day a Walloon, that he is happy in his children, that his daughters are ſages, he will think you laugh at them, and he will tell you they are not, that it is not proper for their ſex, and that it is enough for a maid to fear GOD, and underſtand houſwifry. This ſhews that he underſtands, by being ſage, to be learned, to know Latin, &c. The Greek word σοφός ſignified ſometimes a knowing man, and in this ſenſe Plato takes it ſometimes, and particularly when he ſpeaks of Anacreon. This is what a very good Critic has obſerved (37). In the ſame manner this word ought to be underſtood, if Plato had made uſe of it in praiſing Sappho. Let us conclude with theſe words of a commentator upon Tanaquillus Faber (38): 'It is very well known 'why Horace and Auſonius called her maſcula, not 'for her courage, but in the ſame ſenſe as γυνὴ ἀνδειχὴ 'in Lucian, where an impudent woman explains herſelf, ſaying, ἡ ἐπιθυμία ἀνδρὸς ἐςὶ μοι, 'and τὸ ϖὰν ἀνήρ εἰμι. - - - I have the inclinations 'of a man, and am thoroughly maſculine.'

[F] Phaon forced her, by his coldneſs, to throw herſelf headlong from a rock.] Mrs. le Fevre ſays that Sappho could not forbear following Phaon into Sicily, whither

---

(b) Maſcula Sappho. Hor. Epiſt. XIX, ver. 28, lib. i, Auſonius, Cupid. Crucif.

(27) Horat. Ode XIII, lib. ii, & ibid. Lambinus, Cruquius, Mr Dacier, &c.

(28) Longe-Pierre, in the Life of Sappho prefixed to the tranſlation of Sappho's Poems into French verſe.

(29) In Horat. Epiſt. XIX, lib. i.

(30) Chabot quotes it in Epigr. ad Philænim. lib. vii.

(31) Tale monſtrum libidinis dicitur Sappho excogitaſſe, unde maſcula eſt appellata ab Horatio in Epiſtolis. - - - Sappho is ſaid to have invented ſuch a prodigy of luſt, from whence ſhe was called Maſcula by Horace in his Epiſtles. See Vinetus upon Auſonius Cupid. crucif. ver. 25.

(32) In Auſon. Cupid. crucif. & in Virgil. Cirin.

(33) Adverſar. lib. x, cap. ii.

(34) Cupid. crucif.

(35) Thevet, Eloges des Savans Hommes, Tom. i, pag. 226.

(36) Id. ibid. pag. 227.

(37) See Mr le Clerc in the firſt volume of his Ars Critica, pag. 194, 195.

(38) Reland, Remarques ſur les Vies des Poëtes Grecs, folio G 4.

was [G]! She had been long before the widow of one of the richeſt men of the iſle of Andros, called Cercala, by whom ſhe had a daughter called Cleïs (i). So the mother of Sappho was called. I do not know her father's name, for we have eight to choſe upon (k), there being juſt ſo many different fathers aſſigned to her by authors (l). She had three brothers, one of whom, called Charaxus, ſold Leſbian wine in Egypt (m), and fell in love there with a famous courtezan, by ſome, called Rhodope; but Sappho calls her Doricha. She was very angry with her brother for this ſhameful engagement whither he retired that he might not ſee her; and that during her ſtay in that iſland, ſhe made the fineſt verſes in the world; and that it is very probable ſhe made there the hymn to Venus, that is ſtill extant, in which ſhe begs ſo ardently the aſſiſtance of that goddeſs. Her prayers proved ineffectual; the ſweet and tender verſes ſhe compoſed ſo often on this ſubject (39) were to no purpoſe: Phaon was cruel to the laſt degree. The unfortunate Sappho was forced to take a dangerous leap; for ſo I may juſtly call the remedy to which ſhe had recourſe, which was to go upon the promontory Leucas, and throw herſelf into the ſea. It was looked on in thoſe days as the true means to cure the pains of love, and for this reaſon that place was called the Lovers Leap. Some ſay (40) that Sappho was the firſt that made a trial of this way of curing love: others ſay, ſhe was the firſt woman that did it; but that, before her time, ſome men had done it (41). Several Poets have ſpoke of this deſpair of Sappho: one of them (42) having exhauſted all the counſels he could give to an unfortunate lover, and at laſt referring him to the great remedy of all evils, makes uſe of this expreſſion.

Quod ſibi ſuaſerunt Phædra & Eliſſa dabunt,
Quod Canace, Phylliſque, & faſtidita Phaoni.

What Phædra and the Tyrian queen adviſ'd,
And ſhe whom Phaon cruelly deſpiſ'd;
What Canace and Phillis did approve
As the beſt remedy for hopeleſs love,
That may you chuſe, by their example taught.

See here what Statius ſays;

Steſichoruſque ferox, ſaltuſque ingreſſa viriles
Non formidata temeraria Leucade Sappho (43).

And fierce Steſichorus with Sappho join'd,
Who, when ſhe took her manly leap of old,
With raſh, unſhrinking courage did behold
Leucate's dreadful precipice. . . . .

Pliny tells us a ſtory about the cauſe of Sappho's love for Phaon. It was ſaid that the occult qualities of a certain herb had excited that paſſion. Here are the words of Pliny, Ex his: he ſpeaks of the different ſorts of eryngo, or hundred-headed thiſtle, candidam noſtri centum capita vocant . . . . Portentoſum eſt, quod de ea traditur: Radicem ejus alterutrius ſexus ſimilitudinem referre, raram inventu: ſed ſi viris contigerit mas, amabiles fieri. Ob hoc & Phaonem Leſbium dilectum à Sappho. Multæ circa hoc non Magorum ſolum vanitates, ſed etiam Pythagoricorum (44). That is to ſay, according to the verſion of du Pinet, the Latins call the white eryngo Centum capita . . . and certainly it is a wonderful thing, if what they ſay of this root be true. For there are ſome that ſay, that the root of white eryngo (which is very rare) reſembles the parts of a man or a woman: and it is held, that if a man meets with one that repreſents the parts of man, he ſhall be beloved by women: and it is thought, this made Sappho in love with Phaon. And indeed, not only the Magicians, but alſo the Pythagoreans, tell ſtrange wonders of this root. Theſe are idle ſtories. Sappho was ſo well tempered for love that ſhe needed no occult qualities of roots to enflame her.

[G] How cruel he was!] The cruelty of Phaon will not ſurpriſe us ſo much, if we reflect that Sappho was only a widow upon the decline, who had never been handſome, who was ill ſpoken of in her widowhood, and who kept no meaſure in ſhewing the violence of her paſſion. A man that is never ſo little nice, does not care for ſuch unbecoming addreſſes, and draws ill conjectures from them. Add to this, that Sappho had not the endearment of novelty, which often, even with nice people, makes amends for the defect of beauty and the flower of youth. Phaon knew all ſhe was capable of; the trees and the graſs had been her confidents; and perhaps his flight proceeded more from being ſpent than from indifference. Conſider what ſhe herſelf writes to him by the pen of Ovid.

Hæc quoque laudabas, omnique à parte placebam,
  Sed tum præcipue cum fit amoris opus,
Tunc te plus ſolito laſcivia noſtra juvabat,
  Crebraque mobilitas, aptaque verba joco:
Quique, ubi jam amborum fuerat confuſa voluptas,
  Plurimus in laſſo corpore languor erat.

. . . .

Invenio ſilvam quæ ſæpe cubilia nobis
  Præbuit, & multa texit opaca coma.
Agnovi preſſas noti mihi ceſpitis herbas;
  De noſtro curvum pondere gramen erat.
Incubui tetigique locum qua parte fuiſti.

In all I pleas'd, but moſt in what was beſt;
And the laſt joy was dearer than the reſt.
Then with each word, each glance, each motion fir'd,
You ſtill enjoy'd, and yet you ſtill deſir'd,
Till all diſſolving in the trance we lay,
And in tumultuous raptures dy'd away.

. . . .

I find the ſhades that did our joys conceal,
Not him that made me love thoſe ſhades ſo well.
Here the preſ'd herbs with bending tops betray,
Where oft entwin'd in am'rous folds we lay;
I kiſs that earth which oft was preſ'd by you.

POPE.

She was not then ſo capable of hearkening to reaſon, as when ſhe repreſented to a young man, who courted her for marriage, that being older than him, ſhe would not marry him (45). The younger Phaon had been, the more ſhe would have found her account in him. If I have ſaid that ſhe was not handſome, it was becauſe I thought we ſhould prefer to the authority of Plato, who calls her the beautiful Sappho (46), the authority of Ovid, who makes her ſpeak thus:

Si mihi difficilis formam natura negavit,
  Ingenio formæ damna rependo meæ.
Sum brevis. At nomen quod terras impleat omnes
  Eſt mihi: menſuram nominis ipſa fero.
Candida ſi non ſum: placuit Cepheia Perſeo.

To me what nature has in charms deny'd,
Is well by wit's more laſting charms ſupply'd.
Tho' ſhort by ſtature, yet my name extends
To Heav'n itſelf, and Earth's remoteſt ends.
Brown as I am, an Æthiopian dame
Inſpir'd young Perſeus with a gen'rous flame.

POPE.

Mrs le Fevre had ſet me an example for not giving credit to Plato or Athæneus; for ſhe ſays that Sappho was not beautiful, that ſhe was neither tall, nor little, that ſhe had a very brown complexion, and very lively and ſparkling eyes. What ſhall I ſay of Maximus Tyrius (47), who pretends that as ſhe was black and little, Socrates (48) called her beautiful, only by reaſon of the beauty of her verſes.

(i) Suidas, in Σαπφῶ.

(k) Id. ibid.

(l) See the remark [K], in the article ANACREON.

(m) Strabo, lib. xvii, pag. 556. Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 596.

(39) Οὗτος δ' Φάων ἐςὶν ἐφ' ᾧ τὸν ἔρωτα αὐτῆς ἡ Σαπφῶ πολλάκις ᾆσμα ἐποίησε. Hic ille Phaon eſt in cujus amorem Sappho ſæpe carmen cecinit. - - - This is that Phaon whom the enamoured Sappho frequently made the ſubject of her verſes. Palæphatus de Incredibil. cap. xlix, p. m. 231. Phaſianinus having read αἷμα blood, inſtead of ᾆσμα ſong, made a ridiculous tranſlation.

(40) Menander, apud Strabon. lib. x, p. 311.

(41) Scaliger in Auſonium Cupid. crucif.

(42) Auſon. Epigr. XCII.

(43) Stat. lib. v, Silv. III, ver 154.

(44) Plinius, lib. xxii, cap. viii, pag. m. 183.

(45) In a fragment of a letter quoted by Mrs le Fevre.

(46) In Phædro, pag. m. 1214. Athenæus calls her alſo the beautiful Sappho, lib. xiii, p. 596, and ſo does Plutarch de Amore, pag. 763, and Julian the Apoſtate, Epiſt. ad Alypium Cæſar.

(47) Orat. VIII, pag. m. 86.

(48) Id eſt Plato, ubi ſupra.

ment [H]. It is ſaid that the Mitylenians did her the honour after her death to ſtamp their money with her image [I]. Some authors make mention of another Sappho [K].

Mr Moreri found one in Martial, only through an extreme inadvertency (n). We read in Ariſtotle the proof Sappho made uſe of to ſhew that death is an evil. The gods, ſaid ſhe (o), have judged it ſo, for otherwiſe they would die. There was in the Prytaneum of Syracuſe, a moſt beautiful ſtatue of Sappho: ſee what Cicero ſays of it, when he reproaches Verres with ſtealing it (p). It was the work of Silanion, and probably the ſame that Tatian ſpeaks of in reproaching the Gentiles with the honour they paid to diſhoneſt women. See citation (59).

(n) See the remark [K] towards the end.

(p) Cicero in Verrem, Orat. VI, fol. m. 78.

(o) Ἣ ὥσπερ Σαπφὼ ὅτι τὸ ἀποθνήσκειν κακόν· οἱ θεοὶ γὰρ οὕτω κεκρίκασιν· ἀπέθνησκον γὰρ ἄν. Aut quemadmodum Sappho, mori malum eſſe, Dii enim ſic judicarunt: alioqui mortui eſſent. Ariſtot. Rhetor. lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 445. E.

[H] She was very angry with her brother for this ſhameful engagement.] See how Ovid tells us this particular.

Arſit inops frater victus meretricis amore,
  Miſtaque cum turpi damna pudore tulit.
Factus inops agili peragit freta cærula remo,
  Quaſque male amiſit, nunc male quærit opes.
Me quoque, quod monui bene multa fideliter, odit;
  Hoc mihi libertas, hoc pia lingua dedit.

My brother next, neglecting wealth and fame,
Ignobly burn'd in a deſtructive flame.

POPE.

I leave you to judge what repriſals he might have made, and what weight the remonſtrances of ſuch a ſiſter could have. Athenæus obſerves that the invectives againſt the courtezan of Naucratis, were grounded upon the exceſſive ſums ſhe extorted from her lovers. Ἣν ἡ καλὴ Σαπφὼ ἐρωμένην Χαράξου τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτῆς κατ' ἐμπορίαν εἰς τὴν Ναύκρατιν ἀπαίροντος, διὰ τῆς ποιήσεως διαβάλλει ὡς πολλὰ τοῦ Χαράξου νοσφισαμένην. Quam pulcra Sappho Charaxi fratri ſuo mercaturæ gratia Naucratim profecto nave dilectam verſibus ſuis proſcindit, quod multa illum pecunia emunxiſſet (49). Herodotus calls that courtezan Rhodopis, and ſays that Charaxus, who had ſpent a great ſum to redeem her, was ill treated by the invectives of his ſiſter Sappho (50).

(49) Athen. lib. xiii, cap. vii, pag. 596.

(50) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. cxxxv.

[I] They ſay that the Mitylenians ſtamped their money with her image.] I ſhall obſerve on this occaſion, that Lambinus, for want of underſtanding a paſſage of Pauſanias (51), ſays falſely, That there was in the citadel of Athens a ſtatue of Sappho. Anacreontis Teii, ſays he (52), qui majore ex parte res amatorias ſcripſit, ſtatua in arce Athenienſium prima poſt Sapphonem locata eſt. Here is the Greek. Τοῦ δὲ τοῦ Ξανθίππου πλησίον ἕστηκεν Ἀνακρέων ὁ Τήϊος, πρῶτος μετὰ Σαπφὼ τὴν Λεσβίαν τὰ πολλὰ ὧν ἔγραψεν ἐρωτικὰ ποιήσας. It is evident that theſe Greek words mean nothing elſe, but that the ſtatue of Anacreon was put near that of Xanthippus; the ſtatue, I ſay, of Anacreon, who is the firſt after Sappho, who conſecrated to matters of love the greateſt part of the things he writ.

(51) Ex lib. i, pag. 23.

(52) Lambin. in Horat. Od. XVII, lib. i.

I ſhould be glad to know whether Thevet is miſtaken or not, when he aſſures us, That the Romans erected in memory of Sappho a ſtatue of Porphyry richly wrought (53). It is Tanaquillus Faber, who has obſerved, that the Mitylenians ſtamped their money with the image of this heroine, and by this treated her like a queen when ſhe was dead (54). He cites no body for it; but Mr Reland, who has made notes upon this work of Tanaquillus Faber (55), quotes this paſſage of Julius Pollux, οἱ μυτιληναῖοι μὲν Σαπφὼ τῷ νομίσματι ἐνεχάραττον. and obſerves that there are ſtill in being ſome medals of Sappho, which bear the name of the Mitylenians, ΜΥΤΙΛΕΝΑΙΩΝ. Thevet ſays, that he has taken the picture of Sappho from an antient medal, which he brought from the iſle of Leſbos, and that one like that, was given with ſeveral others, to the Baron de la Garde, then the French ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, by the firſt Phyſician of Sultan Soliman (56). Ariſtotle obſerves that the Mitylenians had paid honours to Sappho, but he does not tell us in what thoſe honours conſiſted (57). Tatian reproaches the Greeks with the ſtatue of the courtezan Sappho made by Silanion; of that courtezan, ſays he, who ſung her own incontinency, and was amorous, even to madneſs (58). Καὶ ἡ μὲν Σαπφὼ γύναιον πορνικὸν ἐρωτομανὲς καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῆς ἀσέλγειαν ᾄδει. Et quidem Sappho meretricia muliercula inſano amore capta ſuam ipſa laſciviam cantat (59). Pliny ſpeaks of a Painter called Leo, who had drawn the picture of Sappho (60).

(53) Thevet, Elog. des ſavans Hommes, Tom. i, pag. 223, Edit. 1671, in 12*mo.*

(54) Le Fevre, Vie des Poët. Grecs, p. m. 23.

(55) See the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres. Oct. 1700, pag. 461.

(56) Thevet, ubi ſupra, p. 224.

(57) Ariſtot. Rhetor. lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. 445. Mr Reland in his remarks upon Mr le Fevre, quotes the words of Ariſtotle.

(58) Tatian. Orat. contra Græcos, pag. m. 168, B.

(59) Id. ibid.

(60) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. xi, pag. m. 235.

[K] Some authors make mention of another Sappho.] Mr Moreri ſays there are ſome, who mention a ſecond maid of this name of Erythræ, who made verſes, and that this is the opinion of Athenæus, lib. 13. Athenæus does not ſay that this other Sappho was a Poeteſs, or that ſhe was born at Erythræ: he ſays that ſhe was of Ereſſus (61), by profeſſion a courtezan, and that ſhe fell in love with Phaon. According to this opinion the great Sappho, the Sappho of Mitylene, who made ſuch excellent Poems, might, without much trouble, be reſtored to a good reputation; there would be nothing elſe to do but to tranſport her bad fame upon the other Sappho. The worſt is, that a lame paſſage of Athenæus, ſeconded as much as you pleaſe by the evidence of Ælian (62), is not to ſerve us for a guide preferably to a thouſand authorities that are againſt it. Mr Lloyd, and Mr Hoffman adviſe us to diſtinguiſh well between the two Sappho's, the one of Eretria, and the other beloved by Phaon, as we ſee, ſay they, in Athenæus lib. 13. This is copied out of Voſſius (63), and is not the more true for all that; for Athenæus only ſpeaks there of one Sappho a native of Ereſſus, who was deſperately in love with Phaon: whether their love was mutual or no, he does not ſay. Suidas might occaſion a doubt, were it not probable that he has divided what ought to remain united. He ſpeaks of two Sappho's: what he ſays of the firſt, beyond all doubt belongs to her that excelled in Lyric poetry: what he ſays of the ſecond, viz. that ſhe was of Mitylene in the iſle of Leſbos, that ſhe threw herſelf from Leucate into the ſea for the love of Phaon, that ſhe played on inſtruments, and was famous for Lyric Poetry, certainly agrees no leſs with the firſt. I therefore ſee no reaſon of any weight for admitting two women of that name, eſpecially if we muſt diſtinguiſh the one from the other, by the qualities which Suidas and Charles Stephens attribute to them.

(61) A town in the iſle of Leſbos.

(62) Ælian. lib. xii, cap. xix. Var. Hiſt.

(63) Voſſius, de Poët. Græc. pag. 17.

Here is a very abſurd fault. (64) Canius, a Latin Poet, a native of Cadiz (65), and a friend of Martial .... married two wives, Thecphila a learned woman, but a little too free, and Sappho, not ſo well learned, but more reſerved. .... Martial mentions what I write, lib. 3. epig. 63. & lib. 7. epiſt. 68.

Caſtior hæc & non doctior illa fuit, &c.

This is what we read in Moreri's Dictionary. But if we conſult Martial, we find (66) that he only mentions one wife of Canius, and ſays ſhe was called Theophila; that ſhe was learned and made verſes which Sappho might praiſe; that the latter was not more learned than Theophila, but that Theophila was more chaſte than Sappho. The verſe which Moreri quotes is the laſt of the epigram. He ſhould not therefore have added an Etcætera. This is but a trifle in compariſon of his blunder in giving to Canius a wife called Sappho, leſs learned, but more modeſt than Theophila. I ſay nothing of two other faults which are in the article Canius of Moreri's Dictionary. He quotes the 19th epig. of the third book of Martial, inſtead of the 20th, and æmulator is put inſtead of æmulatur.

(64) Moreri, at the word Canius.

(65) This appears from the LXIId epigram of the firſt book of Martial, not quoted by Moreri.

(66) Mart. Epigramm. LXVIII, lib. vii.

SARAH, ſiſter and wife of Abraham [A], was his faithful companion in all his travels. She was already married to him, when they retired from Ur of the Chaldees to go to Haran (a). The barrenneſs, with which ſhe was afflicted in her own country, did not leave her in foreign countries; and this made her take the reſolution of giving her huſband a ſubſtitute, that ſhe might become a mother in the perſon of that ſubſtitute, ſince ſhe could not be one in her own perſon. Hagar, her ſervant, whom ſhe choſe for this employ, was quickly with child and paid her with ingratitude (b). She deſpiſed Sarah; but Sarah not being able to bear this inſolence, made ſuch uſe of the full power her huſband gave her over Hagar, that ſhe forced her in a little time to fly out of the houſe. One may ſee in another place (c) the return of this ungrateful ſervant and the extremities ſhe was reduced to, when ſhe was turned out a ſecond time. We ſhall not repeat it. It is better to ſay that at laſt by a particular bleſſing of God, Sarah proved with (a) Geneſis xi. 29, 31.

(b) Geneſis xvi.

(c) In the article of AGAR.

[A] Siſter and wife of Abraham.] That is ſo clear from the XXth chapter of Geneſis, that were it not for the ill habit contracted by ſome, of ſacrificing the natural ſenſe of the words of Scripture to the leaſt difficulties that ariſe, there could not be two different opinions about the matter. Let us take right the circumſtances of the fact. Abraham being come into the country of the Philiſtines, made Sarah paſs there for his ſiſter. Whereupon Abimelech taking her to be a maid, or a widow, ſo that nothing could hinder him from making her one of his wives, cauſed her to be brought to him. But knowing by revelation that ſhe was Abraham's wife, he reſtored her, complaining of their lies, which had expoſed him to great miſchief. I ſay, their lies; for, on the one ſide, Abraham had ſaid of his wife, ſhe is my ſiſter; and Sarah had ſaid of her huſband, he is my brother. Abraham excuſed himſelf, in the firſt place, on account of the fear he was in for his life, if he had ſaid ſhe is my wife; in the ſecond place, becauſe ſhe was truly his ſiſter, the daughter of my father, ſaid he (1), though ſhe is not the daughter of my mother. After this, he endeavoured to juſtify his wife by ſaying, that he had aſked of her as a favour, that whereſoever they came ſhe ſhould declare that he was her brother. I admire that they do not ſee in this diſcourſe, that Sarah was Abraham's ſiſter, not by the mother's ſide, but by the father's ſide. Theſe are my reaſons.

I. In the firſt place, if Sarah had not been the ſiſter of Abraham in this manner, the apology of her huſband would only have ſtill more deceived the good prince, who upbraided him with his former diſſimulation; for if the Patriarch's excuſes found credit, it was impoſſible to take Sarah for any other than the true and real ſiſter of Abraham by the father's ſide, nor could any man living gather from ſuch diſcourſe that ſhe was only his niece. I leave all knowing people to judge whether Abimelech could form any other ideas from Abraham's apology. But then I require that they be capable of placing themſelves in the exact ſituation, and in all the circumſtances of this adventure. It is to no purpoſe to ſuppoſe that Sarah was the daughter of Haran, and conſequently the grand-child of the father of Abraham; and to add, that a nephew is ſometimes called brother (2), and that a grand-ſon is ſometimes called ſon; that, I ſay, is to no purpoſe in this affair, for the circumſtances required that Abraham ſhould uſe the words in the moſt proper ſignification; for if he had not, he muſt have paſſed for a man who deſigned to impoſe upon Abimelech.

II. Beſides to what purpoſe ſhould he make uſe of this diſtinction, Daughter of my father, daughter of my mother, if he meant only that he was the uncle of Sarah? put the caſe that he might have called ſiſter, her that was only his niece; to what purpoſe ſhould he ſay that his mother was not the grand-mother of this niece? It is, will ſome ſay, to repreſent ingeniouſly the degree of his kindred in reſpect of Sarah. But why did he uſe the word daughter in an ambiguous ſignification? Why does he not uſe it in its right ſenſe, as I ſuppoſe he did. Beſides, the ingenuity ſpoken of would have been very unſeaſonable; it would have weakened the apology of the Patriarch; for it would make the bonds of kindred appear leſs ſtrong. If it be objected, that in my ſuppoſition that ſame ingenuity weakens the apology more then it ſtrengthens it; I will give a reaſon why Abraham declared that Sarah was not his ſiſter by the mother's ſide. They made a difference between the marriage of a man with his ſiſter both by the father's and mother's ſide, and the marriage of a man with his half ſiſter. The Athenians who permitted the marrying of the ſiſter by the father's ſide, forbad the marrying of the ſiſter by the mother's (3). Solon decided it ſo. On the contrary, Lycurgus permitted the Lacedemonians to marry the ſiſter by the mother, and not by the father (4). Some have ſaid, that as the community of blood is more certain between a brother and a ſiſter by the mother, than between a brother and a ſiſter by the father; the permiſſion of Solon was, generally ſpeaking, leſs odious (5) than the permiſſion of Lycurgus. Will any one pretend, after this, that, on my ſuppoſition, Abraham would have ſaid without any neceſſity, that his wife was not his ſiſter by the mother's ſide; as by the contrary ſuppoſition it would have been to no purpoſe to ſay, that his mother was not the grand-mother of Sarah?

III. Add to this, that if Abraham meant nothing elſe but that his father Terah was the grand-father of Sarah, he took the terms of father and ſiſter in a large and leſs proper ſignification. Why therefore did he declare that his mother was not the mother of Sarah. Was ſhe not ſo, in the ſenſe that he took the word father in relation to Terah; that is to ſay, was ſhe not the grand-mother of Sarah, juſt as Terah was her grand-father? Some think to clear the difficulty by ſuppoſing that Haran was the father of Sarah, and that he was not the brother of Abraham by the mother: they aſſign therefore two wives to Terah, and they ſuppoſe he had Haran by the one and Abraham by the other. Conſequently if Sarah was the daughter of Haran, her grand-father was the father of Abraham; but her grand-mother was different from the mother of Abraham. I anſwer, all this falls to the ground as ſoon as it is ſuppoſed that this Patriarch made uſe of the words ſiſter and daughter in a large ſignification; for upon this foot it is certain, that the mother of Abraham is grand-mother to the children of Haran, whether ſhe bore Haran, or whether ſhe was only the wife of him who begat him. As ſoon as you leave the proper and ſtrict ſignification of the words which denote the kindred, and follow the cuſtom obſerved in families, the word mother agrees to the wives in relation to all the children of their huſbands, and by conſequence that of grand-mother, with reſpect to all the children of all the children of their huſbands: ſo that if Abraham had taken the terms in the large ſignification, which the ſtile of friendſhip or civility has introduced into families, he could not have denied, as he did, that his mother was the grand-mother of Sarah. Some wiſh they could ſay that he took the ſame words ſometimes in a proper, and ſometimes in an improper ſignification. But would not this be to ſuppoſe that he acted the Sophiſter, and impoſed upon the honeſty of Abimelech?

IV. My fourth reaſon is taken from thence, viz. that it cannot be ſuppoſed upon any good grounds that Sarah was adopted by Terah. If it were ſo, Abraham might have made uſe of his diſtinction without departing from exactneſs of ſpeaking; for in that caſe his father might have been called the father of Sarah in a ſignification proper enough. But ſee here what ruins this evaſion: they have recourſe to it only to avoid the imputation of inceſt, and they do not avoid it by that; for a fraternity or brotherhood, founded upon adoption, properly ſo called, was no leſs an obſtacle to marriage than a natural fraternity. According to the laws, a brother who ſhould marry, his adopted ſiſter, committed inceſt, properly ſo called. ‘ Inter fratrem ſororemque nuptias eſſe prohi‘ bitas

(1) Geneſis xx. 12.

(2) Lot, Abraham's nephew, is called his brother, Geneſis xiv. 16: but this example is of no uſe to thoſe who ſuppoſe that Sarah was Lot's ſiſter; for upon this ſuppoſition Lot would be called brother, as being a brother-in-law, rather than as being a nephew,

(3) See the proofs of it apud Muretum, lib. xv, c. v, Variar. Lect. & apud Gebhardum in Corn. Nepotem Vit. Cimonis. Conſult the article CIMON remark [D].

(4) See the ſame authors.

(5) Filia patris (ſoror, non uterina) jure conjungebatur Noachidi, quoniam inter gentes ratio conſanguinitatis paternæ non habebatur. Jarchius, apud Heidegg. Hiſt. Patriarch. Tom. ii, pag. 78.

with child being ninety years old, and was brought to bed of a ſon called Iſaac. She lived 127 years (d). We ought not to forget that ſhe was very beautiful, and that her beauty and the complaiſance ſhe had for her huſband, not to call herſelf his wife but his ſiſter, expoſed her to the danger of two rapes [B], whereby her chaſtity had ſuffered ſhipwrack,

'bitas ſive eodem utroque parente, ſive altero tantum 'nati ſint: verum ſi per adoptionem ſoror facta ſit 'quandiu manet adoptio, etiam nuptias prohiberi: 'at ſi per emancipationem adoptio diſſoluta ſit, poſſe 'inter eos ritè iniri connubium (6). - - - Marriage is 'prohibited between a ſiſter and brother, whether they 'have both parents or only one in common: if the wo'man be a ſiſter by adoption, ſo long as that adoption 'continues, marriage is likewiſe prohibited: but if the 'adoption ſhould happen to be diſſolved, then they may 'lawfully marry.'

V. From hence I draw one of my chief reaſons. If any thing ſhould determine us not to take in a literal ſenſe the preciſe declaration of Abraham, that Sarah is truly his ſiſter, daughter of his father, but not of his mother, it would be the inceſtuous marriage that reſults from this fraternity. But does not that very thing refute thoſe, who ſay that Sarah was Abraham's niece (7)? Is it not agreed upon that this degree of kindred renders marriages inceſtuous? Our adverſaries therefore muſt ſeek out excuſes for the inceſt of Abraham. If they can find any, it will be as well for us as for them; the differences being only leſs or more, it will not be hard for us to give their reaſons the extent that will be needful for us; eſpecially conſidering that Jacob made no ſcruple to be married at the ſame time to two ſiſters, which in other times would have been an abominable thing. Clemens Alexandrinus looks upon this to be ſo ſmall a difficulty, that he tells us very coldly, that the words of the Patriarch teach us, that men muſt not marry a ſiſter by the mother's ſide. Τὰς ὁμομητρίας μὴ δεῖν ἄγεσθαι πρὸς γάμον διδάσκων. Docens eas quæ ex eadem matre natæ ſunt non eſſe ducendas uxores (8). It is certain there are good reaſons given to juſtify the Patriarch on that head; I ſhall not mention them; you may eaſily find them in other books. I ſhall only tell thoſe, who would accuſe me of undervaluing the conſcience of Abraham with reſpect to the crime of inceſt; that before they come at me, they muſt overthrow and defeat a great many antient and modern Divines, both Catholics and Proteſtants (9). I ſet no great value upon what is found in the Annals of Eutychius (10), that the firſt wife of Terah, mother of Abraham, was called Jona, and that his ſecond wife, mother of Sarah, was called Tehevitha; however it is a ſign, that there is an antient tradition for the opinion I have followed.

VI. Here is another reaſon. If Sarah was not the daughter of Terah, but his grand-daughter, ſhe muſt be the daughter of Haran, or of Nachor. But ſhe was neither. I prove it thus. We find in Geneſis (11), that the wife of Nachor was called Milca, and that ſhe was the daughter of Haran, father of Milca and Jiſca. Since the latter is named without there being the ſame reaſon for doing it as there was for naming the other, (for no huſband is aſſigned to her as to the other) it is probable that if Haran had had other daughters, they would have been named at the ſame time, and above all, Sarah would not have been forgotten, ſince mention had been made juſt before of her marriage with Abraham. We may then ſafely conclude that Haran had only two daughters, Milca and Jiſca. This reaſon is ſo convincing, that it obliges ſeveral of our adverſaries to ſuppoſe that Sarah and Jiſca are the ſame perſon. They do no great honour to the ſacred Hiſtorian. What an admirable writer would he be, if in three lines he ſhould give two different names to a woman, without telling us that they are only two names of the ſelf-ſame perſon? See in the XXIId chapter of Geneſis, the liſt of the children of Nachor: you will not find Sarah there, and you will ſee that his firſt-born came into the world after Abraham went out of his country; for it was at his return from mount Morija; where Abraham would have ſacrificed his ſon Iſaac, that he heard that Milcha had brought forty eight children to her huſband Nachor, viz. Huts, her firſt-born, &c. Beſides, were it poſſible, that if Sarah had been the daughter of Haran, the Scripture ſhould never have mentioned Lot as her brother?

VII. It is eaſy to anſwer thoſe who object the words of the Scripture (12), where Sarah is called the daughter-in-law of Terah; for a married woman is conſidered rather by the relations of her marriage, than by thoſe of her birth.

[B] To the danger of two rapes.] They reſemble one another as much as two drops of water. In both of them Abraham concealed his being Sarah's huſband; and bid her ſay he was her brother; and he did it becauſe he was afraid they would kill him, if they knew he was her huſband, and to the end that they might be kind to him for her ſake, if they believed that ſhe was not his wife. In both of them the raviſhers were puniſhed from above, before they could ſatisfy their luſt, reſtored Sarah, gave large preſents to her huſband, and reproached him with his lies. The firſt rape happened in Egypt by king Pharaoh; the ſecond in Guerar by Abimelech, king of the Philiſtines. Sarah was at leaſt ſixty-five years old when Pharaoh took her away, and ninety when ſhe was raviſhed by Abimelech; for ſhe was ten years younger than her huſband (13), and their voyage into Egypt was after their going out of Charan, that is to ſay, after the ſeventy-fifth year of Abraham (14). As for the journey to Gerar, it was after the foretelling of the birth of Iſaac, that is to ſay, when Abraham was a hundred years old. Say what you will, this hiſtory is a proof that Abraham feared death more than any conjugal diſhonour, and that he was far from being a jealous huſband. He leaves to the paternal care of Providence the honour and chaſtity of Sarah; but he is beforehand for the preſervation of his life, and neglects no human means. Not to acknowledge therein the infirmity of corrupt nature is to be voluntarily blind. That patriarch might have ſaid on this occaſion, Homo ſum, humani nihil à me alienum puto. (15) - - - I am a man, and therefore think myſelf liable to any thing which may happen to men. Thoſe who believe that the fear of danger made him reaſon ill, are miſtaken; there is no fear of GOD in this country, ſaid he (16), and they will kill me becauſe of my wife. He believed therefore that thoſe, who would make no ſcruple to kill a man, would make ſome to take away a married woman. Yes, he believed it, and not without reaſon. The good of ſociety, without doubt, more than the love of virtue, made the rape of a married woman to be looked on as an enormous injuſtice, the ill conſequences of which ſovereigns themſelves dreaded; but it was not looked upon as ſo great a matter, if a great lord took away a woman that was not married, in order to increaſe the number of his concubines. Therefore Abraham reaſoning ſolidly, might be ſure, that at leaſt the fear of men would hinder the Egyptians and the Philiſtines from taking away his wife, ſuffering him to live at the ſame time, becauſe he would be a perpetual witneſs of the violence done to a married woman. The reaſonable concluſion of this was to be afraid, leſt they ſhould privately diſpatch him, that they might keep Sarah, and yet not be reproached with taking away a married woman, for the public would have had no knowledge of that huſband, if he had been quickly diſpatched. This fear is not the worſt paſſage of this hiſtory. Who does not know the underhand dealings of David, in in order to deſtroy the huſband of his miſtreſs. The deſire of being well treated, as being the brother of the beautiful Sarah, is more blameable than the fear of being killed. However we ought to abhor the brutality of Fauſtus the Manichee (17), and content our ſelves with what St Jerom ſays of the matter (18). St Chryſoſtom (19), and St Ambroſe have found here matter for a Panegyric on the charity of Sarah, who was willing, in favour of her huſband, to expoſe her chaſtity to the greateſt dangers. 'Extrema adiit, 'ſororem ſe ejus aſſeruit, contenta, ſi ita eſſet neceſſe, 'periclitari pudore potius quam virum ſalute: ut 'tueretur maritum mentita eſt germanitatem, ne inſidiatores

---

(d) Moreri ſays falſly 137.

(6) Juſtinian. lib. i. Inſtitut. See the text of the article OCTAVIA.

(7) See Rivet in Geneſ. Exercit. lxxiii, Heidegg. Hiſt. Patriarch. Tom. ii, pag. 79.

(8) Clem. Alexandr. Stromat. lib, ii, pag. 421.

(9) Celmens Alexandrinus, St Jerom, Lipomanus, Oleaſter, Cajetanus, Sotus, Petavius, Codomannus, Father Abram, Muſculus, Piſcator, Heidegger, &c.

(10) Pag. 66. apud Heidegg. pag. 78.

(11) Chap. xi, ver. 29.

(12) Geneſis xi. 31.

(13) It is ſaid Geneſis xvii. 17. thas ſhe was ninety years of age when Abraham was a hundred years old.

(14) Geneſis xii. 4.

(15) Terent in Heautont. Act. I, Scene i, pag. m. 112.

(16) Geneſis xx. 11.

(17) He accuſed Abraham, Quod matrimonii ſui infamiſſimus nundinator avaritiæ ac ventris cauſa duobus regibus Abimelech & Pharaoni diverſis temporibus, Saram conjugem ſororem mentitus, quod erat pulcherrima, in concubitum venditarit. - - - - For that, like an infamous vender of his marriage rights, he had at different times, to gratify his avarice, and gluttony ſold his wife Sarah to the embraces of two kings, Pharaoh and Abimelech, falſely putting her off for his ſiſter, becauſe ſhe was extremely handſome. Vide Auguſtinum contra Faſtum, lib. xxii, cap. xxxiii.

(18) He calls it fœdum neceſſitatem. - - A ſcandalous neceſſity.

(19) Homil. xxxii, in Geneſ. See the remark [A] in the article ABIMELECH.

ſhipwrack, if God had not prevented it [C]. A ſingular providence ſaved her in this danger, and reſtored her to her huſband, with her honour ſafe and ſound, beſides the favours that were heaped upon him by the two princes who fell in love with her. This might ſweeten the ſad experience he had of the inconveniences which they find, who carry about with them a beautiful wife, which are ſometimes greater, than if they travelled with an ugly one. One cannot eaſily clear Abraham [D] and Sarah in this matter, nor about the buſineſs of Hagar; therefore they are in the wrong who are ſo angry with Calvin, for reproving them on this ſubject (e). We ought to keep at an equal diſtance from the irreverence of Fauſtus the Manichee (f), and from the superſtitious

(e) See Rivet, in Exercit. lxxxvii, Tom. i, Oper. pag. 333. Heidegg. Hiſt, Patr. Tom. ii, pag. 151, and the remark [I] of this article.

(f) See remark [B], citat. (17).

‘ ſidiatores pudoris ejus tanquam æmulum & vindicem uxoris necarent (20). - - - She expoſed herſelf to the greateſt dangers, and affirmed that ſhe was his ſiſter, chuſing rather to hazard her own chaſtity than the life of her huſband: to ſave him, ſhe falſly called herſelf his ſiſter, for fear that her lovers ſhould put him to death, as their rival, and his wife's defender.’ Origen was of another opinion; he found ſuch a ſcandal in the literal ſenſe, that he had recourſe to types and allegories. ‘ Alioquin, ſays he (21), quæ nobis ædificatio erit legentibus Abraham tantum Patriarcham non ſolum mentitum eſſe Regi, ſed pudicitiam conjugis prodidiſſe? Quid nos ædificat tanti Patriarchæ uxor, ſi putetur contaminationibus expoſita per conniventiam maritalem? Hæc Judæi putent & ſi qui ſint amici literæ non ſpiritus. - - - Otherwiſe what edification ſhall we have in reading that ſo great a Patriarch as Abraham was, not only told a lie to the king, but alſo betrayed the chaſtity of his wife? Or how ſhall the wife of ſo great a patriarch edify us, if we ſuppoſe that ſhe was proſtituted by the connivance of her huſband? Let the Jews imagine theſe things, and ſuch who are friends to the letter, and not to the ſpirit.’ Others have recourſe to inſpiration, and pretend that Abraham was directed by a prophetical ſpirit (22). This is the way never to be ſilent. This remedy ought to be better managed, and never to be uſed but as extream unction. Some (23) apply it to Sarah as to her deſiring her huſband to lie with her ſervant maid. As for thoſe who ſay (24), to excuſe Abraham, that his life was ſo neceſſary for the accompliſhment of the divine promiſes, that he was obliged to preſerve it at any rate, even at the expence of his wife's honour, they confute themſelves: they alledge for his juſtification, what is againſt him; for if his life was neceſſary for the fulfilling of the divine decrees, he might have been aſſured that no body could kill him.

The looſe Caſuiſts and protectors of equivocations, take a great advantage of this conduct of the Patriarch. See the laſt anſwer to the Lettres Provinciales, that is, the Entretiens de Cleandre & d'Eudoxe (25).

[C] Her chaſtity had ſuffered ſhipwrack, if GOD had not prevented it.] The Scripture does not tell us what diſtemper it was that hindered Pharaoh from lying with Sarah; it ſays only that God ſtruck him with great plagues, and all his houſe (26). As to Abimelech, the Scripture ſays, that God threatened him, in a dream, to kill him with all his family (27); but at the end of the chapter, it ſays, that at Abraham's prayer GOD cured Abimelech, his wife, and his ſervant-maids, and that afterwards they had children; for, adds the Scripture, The Lord had entirely ſhut up the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech, becauſe of Sarah the wife of Abraham. I believe one might ſooner have killed the interpreters, than hindered them from making conjectures upon thoſe plagues of Pharaoh: the field is more large, in this reſpect, than in relation to Abimelech; for the Scripture ſeems to denote a ſort of diſtemper, with reſpect to the latter. But they, probably, have judged of the one by the other, and, as it is likely, that the perſonal chaſtiſement of Abimelech fell upon the parts deſigned for generation, ſince his wife and maid-ſervants were afflicted in thoſe parts, it is believed that it was ſo likewiſe with Pharaoh (28). The Rabbins ſay (29), he was tormented with ſo violent a gonorrhœa, that he had no pleaſure to think of women, ſo far was he from being able to lie with them. They add, that Sarah had a guardian angel, who ſtruck in ſuch a manner all thoſe ſhe would have him ſtrike, that they had neither the deſire nor the power to come near her; and that it was by means of that angel that ſhe preſerved herſelf from the laſcivious purſuits of Pharaoh. Philo (30) ſays only, that this prince endured inſupportable pain and vexation, and was ſo far from thinking of the pleaſures of love, that he only thought of his diſtemper, and the means how to get rid of it. His whole court was viſited with the ſame ſcourge, becauſe they had aſſiſted or applauded him in the rape of Sarah. Eupolemon (31) ſays, that the plague got into the houſe of Pharaoh, and that Sooth-ſayers having anſwered, it was for the rape of a woman, he reſtored her without touching her. Joſephus (32) adds ſeditions to the plague. A modern author (33), who bears him an ill will, criticiſes him pretty ſmartly on this head. The reaſon he goes upon is, That a popular ſedition does not hinder a prince from diverting himſelf with a woman, and that neither it, nor the plague has any particular relation with the ſin of Pharaoh. This author therefore would have it, that he was afflicted in thoſe parts that ſhould have been the inſtruments of his debauchery, and he confirms his thought by the maxim of the wiſe man (34), Per quæ peccat quis per eadem & torquetur. - - - By what a man commits a ſin, by the ſame is he puniſhed. Be it as it will, it cannot be denyed, but that Sarah ſtayed ſome time in the houſes of her raviſhers: this is certain, at leaſt, as to the laſt rape, ſince they had leiſure to find out, that it was upon her account that the wombs of all the women in the court of Abimelech were ſhut up. From thence ariſes this ſmall difficulty. That prince reſtored Sarah, as ſoon as he underſtood by a dream, that ſhe was the wife of Abraham; he therefore knew nothing of it till ſhe had been ſome time in his houſe. What did he deſign to do with her, ſeeing he let her alone all that time? Was it for this that he took her into his houſe? Thoſe who make this objection, know not the cuſtom of the Eaſtern princes. They have many wives, and others are ſent to them from time to time: but we muſt not fancy that they careſs them one after another by turns; there are ſome, whoſe turn never comes, tho' they be moſt beautiful. Abimelech was contented to have Sarah in his houſe, knowing that he could lie with her when he pleaſed: but God prevented it, before he choſe his time. We may ſay the ſame of Pharaoh. I do not take him to have been ſogreat a monarch, as to obſerve the ceremonies that were practiſed in the court of Perſia, where a woman that pleaſed the king, was ordered to waſh and perfume herſelf a year before ſhe was brought to him (35). I ſhall not therefore inſiſt on the conjecture of St Jerom (36), who explains by this method, the reaſon why Sarah was ſometime unemployed in the houſe of Pharaoh. But let us ſay of this laſt king, what we have juſt now ſaid of the king of the Philiſtines; or we may ſay that they were ſtruck with a dangerous diſtemper the very firſt day they took her. Joſephus ſays Abimelch was ſo ſick that his life was deſpaired of by the Phyſicians. Others ſpecify the nature of his diſeaſe; they ſay he had ſuch violent pains in his genital parts, that he could not perform the act of copulation (37). For the reſt, St Chryſoſtom (38), and St Jerom do well agree; for the firſt maintains, that it required as great a miracle to make Sarah come out of the houſe of Pharaoh undefiled, as to preſerve Daniel in the midſt of hungry lions, and the three Hebrew children in the fiery furnace. There is a little difference to be obſerved between the two narratives of Moſes; he ſays expreſsly, that Abimelech did not come near Sarah, but he gives no account whether Pharaoh did ſo or no. Theodoretus (39) believed that the ſacred Hiſtorian uſed that precaution, with reſpect to Abilemech, to ſtop the mouth of ſlander, becauſe Sarah was brought to bed the ſame year ſhe had been with that prince.

[D] One cannot eaſily clear Abraham.] For beſides what we have ſaid above, would it not be an authority for the pernicious doctrine of equivocations if it was once certain that neither he nor Sarah told a lie? Thoſe who attack the ill morals of Leſſius, and ſome other Jeſuits, ſay ſtitious flattery of ſome others. The beauty of Sarah had ſomething peculiar in it, which ought not to be forgotten; viz. that it continued, at leaſt, till ſhe was ninety years old [E]. Several reaſons are given for it. Some ſay, that it was becauſe ſhe had had no children, and becauſe ſhe had renounced all matrimonial commerce, after ſhe ſaw herſelf barren [F]. In caſe theſe reaſons do not ſatisfy, there is added to them a particular

---

(20) Abroſ. de Abrah. cap. ii.

(21) In cap. vi. Geneſeos. Heidegger. pag. 149, pretends that Origen inſulted and cenſured Abraham, quod per conniventiam maritalem Saram contaminationibus expoſuerit. But how could he reproach him with it, ſince he rejects the literal ſenſe?

(22) Paulus Burgenſis, apud Heidegg. pag. 149.

(23) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. i, cap. x.

(24) Apud Heidegger. ubi ſupra.

(25) Pag. 128, & ſeq. of the Dutch Edit. 1696.

(26) Geneſis xii. 17.

(27) Geneſis xx.

(28) See Pererius in Geneſis. cap. xii, ver. 17.

(29) Apud Lyranum, citante Saliano, pag. 413.

(30) In Libr. de Abrah.

(31) Apud Euſebium, Præp. lib. ix, cap. iv.

(32) Lib. i, cap. viii.

(33) Salian. Tom. i, pag. 413.

(34) Cap. xi, ver. 17.

(35) Eſther, ch. ii.

(36) In Tradit. Hebraic. in Geneſ. Vide Pererium, in cap. xii. ver. 19.

(37) Tradunt quidam eum in veretro ita eſſe divinitus percuſſum ut nec coire cum muliere poſſet ne dum vellet & magnis ea in parte cruciatibus afflictaretur. Pererius in Geneſim. cap. xx, ſub. fin.

(38) Homil. XXXI, in Geneſ.

(39) Apud eundem Pererium, in cap. xii, ver. 19.

ſay that thoſe lie who make anſwers which have no relation to the intention of him who aſks a queſtion. Such anſwers, tho' they contain nothing but truth, do not ceaſe for all that to be lying; for example, if a ſon of Cain had been juridically interrogated who he was, with a deſign to know who was his father, and had anſwered that Cain was his uncle, he had ſaid nothing but truth, for his mother was Cain's ſiſter; yet his anſwer had not been exempt from deceit. The ſame may be ſaid of Sarah. Abimelech aſked her what relation ſhe had to Abraham; he had all the right imaginable to aſk her, for he was king of the country; his intention was to know whether ſhe was married, or no; and upon this he was to regulate his conduct as to her. She anſwered, I am Abraham's ſiſter; her huſband who had ſuggeſted to her this anſwer, ſaid on his part, I am Sarah's brother. Is it not the ſame thing, as if he had anſwered, the relation of brother and ſiſter is the greateſt relation that is between us, and would not this anſwer have been a formal lye? If one, that knows all the circumſtances of a great conſpiracy, ſhould be aſked, what do you know of it, and ſhould anſwer, I know ſuch a thing of it, which ſhould not be the chief matter of the conſpiracy, would not he be a deceiver, would he not be a liar? For his anſwer would be equivalent to this, I only know this. A commentator upon Geneſis (40), deſigning to prove that marriage between brothers and ſiſters was not practiſed in Abraham's time, makes uſe of this remark. Sarah anſwering, ſays he, that ſhe was Abraham's ſiſter, was preſently believed not to be his wife; therefore, at that time, theſe two relations were concluded to be incompatible. This reaſoning is falſe; for ſuppoſe that theſe marriages took place in a country, the cuſtom there would be, that the ſiſter, after her marriage, would no longer be called the ſiſter of her huſband, but his wife; ſo that every ſiſter, not called the wife of ſuch a one, but only his ſiſter, would be looked upon then not to be his wife: and for this reaſon, Abraham and Sarah neceſſarily and viſibly deceived the Egyptians and the Philiſtines, by ſuppreſſing the relation of marriage, and ſpeaking only of that of brotherhood; though thoſe nations were not ignorant of the compatibility of thoſe relations. But it was enough to be deceived by Abraham, that they ſhould know that the one ſwallowed up the other, much as the quality of father abſorbed that of uncle in the perſon of Cain, with reſpect to his children. In a word, the ſuppreſſion of a truth is a real lye, as often as it is deſigned to make the hearer form a falſe judgment, and when according to the uſe of the language ſpoken it cannot fail to produce that effect. Abraham and Sarah are in the caſe. Thoſe who deny that marriages between brothers and ſiſters, were known among the Canaanites, ought to read the chapter of Leviticus, where marriages in ſuch and ſuch degrees are forbid to GOD's people. Let us not forget that Iſaac made uſe of the diſſimulation of his father upon a like principle; he ſaid alſo, for fear of being killed, that Rebekah was his ſiſter (41).

[E] The beauty of Sarah . : . . continued . . . . till ſhe was ninety years old.] This is proved by the twentieth chapter of Geneſis, where it is ſaid, that Abraham, being gone into the country of Gerar, would only paſs for the brother of Sarah; which was the reaſon why Abimelech took her into his houſe with a deſign to marry her. The birth of Iſaac had been already fore-told to this patriarch: but his wife was ninety years old when this happened; therefore, &c. I know the Scripture does not ſay in this paſſage, that Sarah was beautiful, but it is no hard matter to collect it from the circumſtances of that journey. We find in the twelfth chapter, that the reaſon which obliged Abraham to ſay, in Egypt, that Sarah was his ſiſter, was, becauſe he ſaw ſhe was beautiful, and was afraid that they would kill him, that they might the more eaſily enjoy her. Sarah no ſooner appeared, but they took and carried her to the king's houſe. There is no doubt but Abraham diſſembled his marriage in Gerar upon the ſame motive. He himſelf declares (42) that he was afraid of being killed becauſe of his wife; he knew therefore ſhe was beautiful enough to inſpire love. The event ſpeaks it ſtill more clearly; for as ſoon as ſhe was ſeen by the king of Gerar, he took her to his houſe in order to make her his wife. It was without doubt for her beauty; for to ſay with Father Salian, that he took her as a venerable widow, who underſtood the management of a houſe, and as the ſiſter of a man whoſe alliance he looked on to be very advantageous to him, is a meer illuſion. It is probable, that Abraham went only into the country of the Philiſtines to avoid the famine that purſued him; it was therefore eaſy for the king of that country to gain Abraham without making himſelf a ſacrifice to the marriage of a widow fourſcore years old. He would have purchaſed, at a dear rate, the friendſhip of Abraham, if Sarah had been decayed as commonly women are at that age. Let us therefore acknowledge as a certain truth, that ſhe was ſtill a beautiful woman. An honeſt Capuchin of Paris (43) pleaſantly imagined that Abimelech took Sarah only to talk with her about devotion: he was, ſays he, a prophet and a man who reckoned it a ſingular happineſs to hold familiar converſation with Sarah upon the ſubject of a future ſtate. He thought this reverend mother would teach him many things concerning the kingdom of GOD. But would he have been chaſtiſed for ſuch good and ſpiritual intentions? What a ſtrange fancy! Fleſh and blood, without doubt, would have had a greater ſhare in their diſcourſes than devotion, if they had let him do what he pleaſed.

We ought not to mind the thought of Hugo de St Victor; the conſequences of it are dangerous: let us not open a breach in the holy Scripture; prophane men would enter into it that way, like wolves into a ſheep-fold, and commit a thouſand diſorders. This author pretends (44) that Moſes has not put in its proper place the taking away of Sarah by Abimelech, but in a time diſtant from the true time above thirty years. Let us maintain that Sarah was really ninety years old, when Abimelech deſigned to marry her. Nor ought we to have recourſe to the expedient of thoſe who ſay (45), that it is no greater wonder that Sarah ſhould have been handſome at ninety, than to ſee a handſome woman at forty now a-days; for, ſay they, women lived then to be 130 years, as now they live to be fourſcore. By their leave, they calculate wrong: where would they find, according to their ſupputation, the deadneſs of Sarah's womb of which the Apoſtle ſpeaks (46)? Why did it ceaſe to be with Sarah after the manner of women (47)? What would become of Abraham's celebrated faith with reſpect to the birth of Iſaac? Is it ſtrange, at this day, that a woman at forty, ſhould conceive? Let us adjuſt their calculation better: ninety years are to 130 much as fifty-ſix to eighty. It is therefore with our beauties of fifty-ſix years that we muſt compare Sarah. Now I confeſs that though it be very rare that a woman of fifty-ſix ſhould be taken away for her beauty, much leſs be deſigned for the bed of a ſovereign, as a dainty and royal bit, yet there are ſome for all that, that have beautiful remains at that age. See what I have related elſewhere out of Brantome concerning Joan of Arragon and the Ducheſs of Valentinois. We may therefore ſay, without having recourſe to miracles, which ought to be kept as much as poſſible for a great neceſſity, that the good conſtitution of Sarah, and her being exempt from lying-in and nurſing, might preſerve her beauty even to the age of ninety. Procopius thinks that when ſhe was made capable of conceiving, ſhe recovered her loſt beauty (48), and that GOD, by a ſpecial favour, made her thoſe two preſents at once. Procopius may ſay what he pleaſes.

[F] Some ſay . . . . . ſhe renounced all matrimonial commerce after ſhe ſaw herſelf barren.] Let us cite Pererius: Deinde id accidit Saræ ob ſummam ejus caſtitatem & continentiam, quippe quæ ſtatim ut ſenſit ſe ſterilem & invalidam ad generandum abſtinuit à copula carnali, (40) Pererius in Caput xi, Diſput. xvi. Bellarmin. Libr. de Matrimon. cap. xxviii, argues in the ſame manner.

(41) Geneſis xxvi, 9.

(42) Geneſis. xx, 11.

(43) Boulducus de Eccleſ. ante legem, lib. iii, cap. iv, apud Heidegger. pag. 157.

(44) Apud Pererium, I. Diſput. in Geneſ. cap. xx.

(45) Id. ibid.

(46) Rom. iv, 19.

(47) Geneſis xviii, 11.

(48) Addit Procopius divinitus cum fœcunditate Sara reſtauratam fuiſſe priſtinam pulchritudinem. Cornel. à Lapide in Geneſ. p. 149.

particular providence of GOD, who, as they ſay, preſerved from all the attacks of old age, the beauty of Sarah, amongſt other motives, to try the faith of Abraham [G]. This was not attended to by thoſe, who in the heat of their homilies exaggerated ſo much her decay [H], to make the greater wonder of the milk that filled her breaſts. It is pretended (g) that ſhe had ſo great a plenty of it, that ſhe was forced to take ſeveral children to nurſe; and that the day that Iſaac was weaned, ſhe gave all the children of thoſe that came to the feaſt, her breaſt to ſuck. They add, that ſhe herſelf would ſuckle her ſon, to remove all ſuſpicions that might ariſe from her age of Iſaac's being a ſuppoſititious child. St Chyſoſtom approves this thought (h). There is no probability that this holy woman died of grief, when ſhe was told that Iſaac was ſacrificed by Abraham; and we may boldly place this among the fables of the Rabbins (i). Joſephus ſays, that Sarah died a little after the return of her huſband and ſon: But according to his own calculation, ſhe lived twelve years longer; for he ſays with the Scripture, that ſhe was 90 years old when ſhe was brought to bed of Iſaac, and 127 when ſhe died; and, on the other hand, he aſſures us, that Iſaac was twenty-five years old when his father would have ſacrificed him.

It is here that I muſt ſhew, 1. That Calvin is wrongfully accuſed of having thrown the groſſeſt reproaches upon Sarah [I], becauſe ſhe deſired her huſband to make uſe of their carnali, ut ſupra oſtendimus ſuper illis verbis quæ ſunt in capite 18. Poſtquam conſenui & Dominus meus vetulus eſt, voluptati operam dabo (49)? It will not be improper to ſee on what he grounds his opinion. He makes uſe of theſe words of Sarah, Poſtquam conſenui & Dominus meus vetulus eſt voluptati operam dabo (50)? That is, after I am waxed old, ſhall I have pleaſure, my Lord being old alſo? Theſe are two difficulties that Sarah ſtarted to her ſelf when ſhe heard the promiſe that was made to Abraham, that his wife ſhould be brought to bed of a ſon the year following. Muſt I then, ſaid ſhe, notwithſtanding my great age, receive the careſſes of my huſband? this is the firſt difficulty: but is not my huſband too old for that? This is the ſecond difficulty. So that according to Pererius ſhe muſt have ſtarted almoſt the ſame objection which the virgin Mary did, how ſhall this be, ſeeing I know not a man (51)? I think we cannot reaſonable deny to this author that the words of Sarah ſignify, that ſhe and her huſband obſerved then a perfect continence; but all the reſt is nothing but meer conjecture, viz. That they had already above fourteen years agreed on a mutual abſtinence; that is to ſay, from the time that Hagar became the concubine of Abraham. But let us ſuppoſe it to be ſo: we muſt infer from thence, that Sarah put an end to matrimonial comforts when ſhe came to be ſeventy-five years of age. How then comes Pererius to draw from this one of his reaſons, why the beauty of that lady was preſerved to ninety years? Intemperantia Veneris cito mulierem inveterat & vehementer deformat ac turpat (52). That is to ſay, the immoderate uſe of Venereal pleaſures makes a woman ſoon grow old, and ugly. Be it ſo. I leave the diſcuſſion of it to Phyſicians; but does it follow from thence, that a total abſtinence from that exerciſe has a quite contrary effect, upon women; I mean that it puts off old age, and preſerves their beauty? No Logician will find any ſtrength in ſuch conſequences, generally ſpeaking, conſidering the great number of things, of which the two extreams are bad, and pernicious both for the body and ſoul. In particular, the conſequence here in queſtion, is ſtrongly impugned by Phyſicians (53). But if we ſhould be ſo complaiſant, as to grant it to Pererius, what ſervice would it do him in relation to Sarah, who, according to him, deprived her ſelf of the matrimonial right, only at the age of ſeventy-five years.

(g) See Pererius in Geneſ. cap. xxi, Salian. pag. 473, 474.

(h) Homil. xlv. in Geneſ.

(i) Who ſay ſo apud Toſtatum. See Salian, pag. 489.

[G] To try the faith of Abraham.] This ſeems at firſt ſight to be very ſtrange: for men can ſcarce conceive a greater temporal happineſs, than the perpetual beauty of what they love. What vows or wiſhes are ſo favourable to new married perſons, as to wiſh that they may never ſeem old one to another?

Diligat ipſa ſenem quondam, ſed & illa marito
  Tunc quoque cum fuerit non videatur anus (54).

May ſhe love him, when he ſhall antient grow;
And when ſhe's old, may he not think her ſo.

But if you conſider it well, you will find that for a man who is to travel with a family, a beautiful woman is no ſmall burthen. However, Abraham found it ſo, and may ſerve for an example. What fears was he not under of being killed, and what mortifying expedients was he not thereby obliged to have recourſe to? Be it as it will, a famous Divine of Zurich ſpoke in this manner: 'Puto pulcritudinis Saræ 'cauſam non fuiſſe aliam quam ſupernaturale Dei 'donum & ſpecialem ejuſdem providentiam, qui eam 'in extrema ſenectute voluit fieri matrem Iſaaci, atque 'ſimul cotem fidei & patientiæ Abrahami, quæ in 'hac ob formam uxoris immiſſa tentatione non parum 'explorata fuit (55). - - - I think that Sarah's beauty was 'owing to nothing elſe but a ſupernatural gift, and an 'eſpecial providence of GOD, who deſigned that ſhe 'ſhould be the mother of Iſaac in her extreme old age, and 'at the ſame time a whet-ſtone to the faith and patience 'of Abraham, which were not a little tryed by the 'temptation, which he was expoſed to on account of his 'wife's beauty.

[H] Thoſe who . . . . exaggerated ſo much her decay.] St Chryſoſtom ſays, that the rod of Moſes, which made water ſpring out of the rock, wrought a leſs difficult miracle, than was done when milk ſprung out of Sarah's breaſts. Non ſic admirabile fuit quod ex petra in deſerto ſcaturierint fontes aquarum quando illam virga Moyſes percuſſit, ſicut de vulva jam emortua puerum naſci, & lactis fontes ſcaturire (56). Here are the words of another Father: Portabat uterum gravem talis mater quæ inanis ambulare vix poterat . . . . . . Marcidæ mammæ quas in vacuos folles ſubducti ſucci detrimenta laxaverant, lactei fontis ubertate tenduntur (57).

[I] Calvin is wrongfully accuſed of having thrown out the groſſeſt reproaches upon Sarah.] Let us begin with the words of the accuſer. 'Non eſt prætereundum 'impiè loqui Calvinum qui Saram quaſi lenam & 'Abraham quaſi adulterum ancillæ ſuæ carpit (58). - - - 'It is not fit I ſhould paſs over the impiety of Calvin, 'who reflects upon Sarah as being little better than a 'bawd; and reflects on Abraham as if he had 'committed adultery with his own maid.' Theſe words, and ſeveral others that follow, are ſo like thoſe of Cornelius à Lapide, that there is reaſon to think Merſennus tranſcribed them from him. His work was printed in 1623. And that of Cornelius à Lapide in 1616. Carpit hic Calvinus Saram quaſi lenam, Abram quaſi adulterum ancillæ ſuæ Agar (59). This calumny againſt Calvin goes yet higher: I have, as much as I could, ſought for the firſt author of it, but I dare not ſay, I have found him in the perſon of Feuardentius. What is certain is, that this Monk preceded the Minime (60), and the Jeſuit (61) whom I have cited. His accuſation was not well known to Leonard Coqueus, who certainly would have named Calvin, and cited the Theomachia Calviniſtica, if he had known what is to be found there. He has done neither of them; his reproaches are indeterminate; they fall in general upon the Modern Heretics, and he cites another work of Feuardentius. Firſt he ſays that Fauſtus, the Manichee, blamed the conduct of the Patriarch Abraham, as a thing that betrayed his incredulity, and ardent deſire of having children (62), and

(49) Pererius in Geneſ. cap. xx, ver. 2. Torniellus & Cornelius à Lapide, are of the ſame opinion.

(50) Geneſis, xviii. 12.

(51) St Luke i, 34. Zecharias, in ver. 18 of the ſame chapter, alledges a difficulty like that of Sarah.

(52) Perer. in Geneſ. cap. xx. Diſput. i.

(53) See Gaſpar à Reies, Elyſio jucund. Quæſt. Campo, Quæſt. XLVI. where he maintains, quod omnimoda coitus dimiſſio magna damna parit præſertim in aſſuetis, in fœminis frequentiſſimè, in viris rariſſimè & cum minori noxa.

(54) Martial. lib. iv, Epigr. xiii.

(55) Heidegg. Hiſt. Patr. Tom. ii, pag. 148. Rivet had ſaid the ſame before him, Oper. Tom. i, pag. 277, and Pererius in Geneſ. had ſaid ſo before Rivetus.

(56) Chryſoſt. Homil. xlvi.

(57) Auguſt. Serm. lxviii, de Temp.

(58) Merſennus Obſervat. in Problemata Veneti, num. 119, pag. 165.

(59) Cornel. à Lapide in Geneſ. cap. xvi, ver. 2. pag. 170, Edit. 1623.

(60) Father Merſenne.

(61) Cornelius à Lapide.

(62) Crimen inurebat & quod habendæ prolis inſana flagrans cupiditate, & Deo, qui id jam ſibi de Sara conjuge promiſerat minime credens, cum pellice volutatus ſit. Leonh. Coqueus, in Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. lib. xvi, cap. xxv. He cites D. Auguſt. lib. xxii. contra Fauſtum. cap. xxx.

their maid-ſervant. 2. That St Auguſtin has not made a good apology for this conduct of Abraham [K].

and afterwards he adds: ‘ Refert etiam Feuardentius in appendice ad libros Alphonſi à Caſtro contra hæreſes lib. 1. verbo Abraham, quoſdam hæreticos modernos . . . . . non minus impios fuiſſe in ſanctiſſimum Patriarcham Abrahamum, ut cui crimen adulterii impingant (63) - - - Feuardentius alſo relates in his appendix to the books of Alphonſus à Caſtro againſt Hereſies lib. 1. at the word Abraham, that certain modern Heretics . . . . did with no leſs impiety reflect upon the moſt holy Patriarch Abraham, whom they accuſed of adultery.’ The particular accuſations againſt Calvin are contained in the following quotation. ‘ Piiſſimam aviam Chriſti Saram multis vexat contumeliis, multis jactat injuriis: † Sarai rationem alienam à verbo Dei apud ſe quærit. In ipſo progreſſu non leviter peccavit, quod orbitatis impatiens, à verbo Dei diſceſſit. Obrepit deſperatio. Connubii legem pervertit, lectum conjugalem polluendo. Nec culpa etiam vacat Abram, quod ſtulto ac præpoſtero uxoris conſilio obſequutus eſt. Reprehenſione digna eſt Abrahæ facilitas. Utriuſque autem claudicat fides. Dei virtutem non debuit alligare ordini naturæ, vel reſtringere ad ſuum ſenſum. Et in ſequentibus ⸸. Admittit concubinam quæ inſtar pellicis futura erat. Ad eandem qua ipſa fervebat impatientiam maritum ſollicitat. Vacillat quidem Abrahæ fides, cum à verbo Dei declinans, uxoris impulſu ad remedium prohibitum transferre ſe patitur. Momento uno tentationi ſuccumbit. Deinde, doloſiſſimo ſchemate utens, id ipſum quod negare ſe de illa fingit, palam adfirmat ‡: Neque enim domui ſuæ voluit erigere lupanar, nec ancilla ſuæ productrix, vel mariti lena eſſe . . . . . . O hominem in diſputando vafrum, veteratorem, & malitioſum! Ecquid enim aliud eſt Abræ, uxorem proſtituere, pudicitiam ejus nudare præſidio, pudicitiam prodere (quod Calvinus palam tribuit Abrahæ) quam ei lenocinari? Aut quid, Conjugii legem pervertere, lectum conjugalem polluere, pellicem viro quærere & subminiſtrare, alienam in thorum mariti inducere (quorum à Calvino inſimulatur Sara) quam domi ſuæ lupanar erigere, & mariti lenam eſſe, quod hic ſimulate Calvinus negat & damnat (64)! - - - - He throws out many groſs reflexions and reproaches upon Sarah the pious progenitrix of Chriſt. Sarah ſeeks a contrivance of her own not warranted by the word of GOD. In the courſe of her proceedings ſhe tranſgreſſed not a little, for not bearing the want of children with patience ſhe ſwerved from the word of GOD. She gave way to deſpair. She perverted the laws of wedlock, by polluting the marriage-bed. Neither is Abraham blameleſs, ſince he complyed with the fooliſh and prepoſterous counſel of his wife. The eaſineſs of Abraham deſerves to be cenſured. Both of them were deficient in their faith. They ſhould not have tied down the power of GOD to the order of nature, nor have confined it to their own ſenſe. Afterwards he ſays. She introduces a concubine who was to act the part of a harlot. She inſpires her huſband with the ſame impatience by which ſhe herſelf was tranſported. Abraham's faith did ſtagger, when ſwerving from the word of GOD; he ſuffered himſelf to be prevailed upon by the inſtigation of his wife, to make uſe of the forbidden remedy. In a moment he yielded to the temptation. After this, carrying on his deceitful ſcheme he openly aſſerts what he pretends to deny concerning her. For neither would ſhe convert her houſe into a brothel, nor do the office of a procureſs in bringing her huſband and maid together . . . O arch caviller and ſpiteful old fox! If Abraham proſtituted his wife, and betrayed her chaſtity by leaving it expoſed and defenceleſs (which Calvin plainly imputes to Abraham) what elſe did he do but . . . . for her? Or what elſe was it but to pervert the laws of wedlock, to pollute the marriage-bed, to ſeek out and provide a harlot to her huſband, and to lodge a ſtranger in his arms, of all which things Sarah is accuſed by Calvin, I ſay, what elſe was this but to convert her houſe into a brothel, and to be her huſband's . . . . which Calvin here artfully denies and blames?’ We may obſerve two frauds in the proceeding of this Franciſcan. He ſuppreſſes the expreſſions, wherein Calvin endeavours to extenuate the fault of Sarah and that of Abraham: this is the firſt foul play. He aſſerts impudently, that Calvin uſes a ſhameful turn of ſophiſtry, to accuſe, in effect, under a falſe appearance of negation, this holy woman of having been a . . . . . . to her huſband. This is, the ſecond fraud, and it is of ſuch a heinous nature that it may be called a dreadful calumny, The free manner with which Calvin judges of the conduct of the huſband and the wife, clearly ſhews that he ſought no artful evaſions: he ſpeaks his thoughts with the greateſt liberty; and makes uſe of all the right, that reaſon and Scripture give us of paſſing our judgment upon the quality of an action. It is therefore manifeſt, that he ſpeaks ſincerely, when he denies that Sarah acted as . . . . &c. This appears further by the words which follow, and which Feuardentius has ſuppreſſed. ‘ Improprie tamen vocatur uxor, quæ præter Dei legem in alienum thorum inducitur. Quare ſciamus hunc concubitum hic illicitum fuiſſe ut inter ſcortationem & conjugium quaſi medius fuerit. Idem omnibus commentis accidit quæ Dei verbo aſſuuntur. Quamlibet enim honeſto tegantur prætextu corruptela ſubeſt, quæ à verbi puritate degenerat, eamque vitiat (65) - - - - - Nevertheleſs a woman that is introduced into another's bed, in a manner not warranted by the law of G O D, is improperly called a wife. Let us therefore conclude, that as this commerce was unlawful, ſo it was a kind of middle ſtate between fornication and matrimony. The ſame thing happens in all thoſe inventions which are patched to the word of GOD. For however they may be diſguiſed under a plauſible pretence, there is a corruption in them which degenerates from the word of G O D, and taints the purity of it.’ This is the language of a plain and ſincere Caſuiſt; one may therefore be well aſſured that this is the worſt that Calvin deſigned to ſay. Now he ſays plainly, that the commerce of Abraham and Hagar was a kind of middle ſtate between fornication and marriage. Feuardentius has ſuppreſſed this remarkable paſſage of Calvin's commentary: ‘ Benedictionis (quam ſciebat divinitus promiſſam eſſe) potiundæ voto, conjugalem thorum ſponte alteri cedit . . . . ſic laudabile fuit votum Sarai quoad finem vel ſcopum in quem tendebat, ut tamen in ipſo progreſſu non leviter peccarit . . . . . . Utriuſque autem claudicavit fides, non in ſubſtantia quidem, ſed in medio ipſo (ut loquuntur) vel agendi ratione (66) - - - - It was from her deſire to obtain the bleſſing (which they knew GOD had promiſed) that ſhe voluntarily reſigned the conjugal bed to another . . . . . Thus the deſire of Sarah, as to the end and ſcope to which it tended, was laudable, yet not ſo but that ſhe ſinned greatly in the way ſhe took to compaſs it . . . . . . But the faith of both was defective, not indeed in the ſubſtance, but in the medium (as they ſay) or manner of acting.’

Obſerve, that copiers are very apt to magnify things. Cornelius à Lapide and Marinus Merſennus ſay plainly and abſolutely, that Calvin accuſes Sarah of . . . . and Abraham of adultery. Feuardentius was contented to ſay, that the accuſation was propoſed indirectly, and under a deceitful ſhew of a juſtification.

[K] St Auguſtin has not made a good apology for this conduct of Abraham.] He made uſe of four reaſons. The firſt is, That Abraham was not induced to this act by any motive of ſenſual love, but in order to have children: Uſus eſt ea (concubina) quippe ad generandam prolem, non ad explendam libidinem (67). The ſecond is, That he did it, not to injure his wife, but rather out of complaiſance to her, and to give her the conſolation which her ſtate of barrenneſs made her wiſh for. The third is, That this conduct was grounded upon the right, which St Paul ſpeaks of in the ſeventh chapter of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians: Likewiſe the man has not power over his own body, but the woman. There is no fault here, either on the wife's, or on the huſband's ſide; ſhe gives her maid to her huſband, in hopes of iſſue, and he takes the maid with the ſame view. Nulla eſt hîc cupido laſciviæ, nulla nequitiæ turpitudo. Ab uxore cauſa prolis ancilla marito traditur, à marito cauſa prolis accipitur; ab utroque non culpæ luxus ſed naturæ fructus exquiritur (68). The fourth reaſon is, That Abraham ſent away Hagar as ſoon as his wife deſired it. I have cited elſewhere (69) the words of St Auguſtin on this ſubject: Leonard Coqueus, a commentator on that Father, makes no ſcruple to refute him. He alledges againſt the firſt reaſon this axiom of St Paul, It is not lawful to do evil that

(63) Id. ibid.

† In cap. xvi. Gen. v. 1.

⸸ Ver. 2.

‡ Ver. 3.

(64) Feuardentius, Theom. Calviniſticæ, lib. ix, cap. i, pag. m. 426.

(65) Calvin. in Geneſ. cap. xvi, ver. 3. pag. m. 83, 84.

(66) Calvin. ibid. ver. i, pag. 83.

(67) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. xvi, cap. xxv.

(68) Id. ibid.

(69) In remark [C] of the article AGAR.

that good may come (70); and the common doctrine of the Moraliſts, That to make an action good, it is requiſite not only that the motive be good, but alſo that it be about a lawful matter. Ad hoc quod ſit actio honeſta, requiritur non modo bonus finis & reliquæ circumſtantiæ, verum etiam quod ſit circa debitam materiam (71). This furniſhes him with the refutation of the ſecond reaſon; for if the commerce of the Patriarch with his maid was bad in itſelf, it did not become lawful by Abraham's compliance with the deſire of Sarah: the counſels or ſuggeſtions of a wife do not excuſe a huſband in regard to unlawful things; which appears clearly by the fall of the firſt man, who, in vain alledged, that the wife whom GOD had given him had perſuaded him to eat the forbidden fruit. The third reaſon is no better than the reſt; for a wife cannot convey to another woman the right of which St Paul ſpeaks, any more than a huſband can yield to another man the right of which the ſame Apoſtle ſpeaks. Non poteſt uxor jus illud quod habet in corpus viri transferre in alteram mulierem, ut congreſſum viri ſui cum alia muliere aſſenſu ſuo poſſit facere licitum, ut nec vir poteſt transferre in alterum virum illud jus quod habet in uxorem (72). Leonard Coqueus ſays nothing on the fourth reaſon, becauſe he did not look upon it as part of the apology: but the moſt ſtupid reader may eaſily perceive, that it ſerves only to ſhew that the Patriarch was not moved to it by any impurity. It is a very good thing readily and eaſily to quit an unlawful intercourſe, but that does not prove that the enjoyment was lawful. This commentator ſuppoſes, that St Auguſtin did not alledge theſe reaſons as proofs of the purity of the commerce of Abraham and Hagar, but only as proofs ſufficient to refute the aſſertion of the Manichees, who affirmed that this Patriarch was deſperately in love with Hagar, and lay with her only to ſatisfy his paſſion. He ſuppoſes alſo, that the ſame Father knew very well the true reaſon that cleared Abraham, which was, that there was a real marriage between Hagar and her maſter. He examines afterwards the three reaſons of St Ambroſe. The firſt is taken from this, That Abraham lived before the law of GOD had forbidden adultery. ‘Abraham ante legem Moyſi & ante Evangelium fuit, cum nondum interdictum adulterium videretur, pœna criminis ex tempore legis eſt, quæ crimen inhibuit, nec ante legem ulla rei damnatio eſt (73). - - - Abraham lived before the law of Moſes, and before the Goſpel, when adultery does not appear to be forbid: the puniſhment of a crime, takes place from the time that the law forbids it; nor is there any condemnation of a thing before the law is in being.’ The ſecond is the ſame with the firſt and ſecond of St Auguſtin. The third is taken from hence, That the conjunction of Abraham and Hagar was one of the types of the Old Teſtament. The commentator obſerves (74), that Sixtus Senenſis (75) found in the firſt reaſon of St Ambroſe, two principles widely different from the common opinion of Divines. Firſt, That the action of Abraham was adultery. Secondly, That adultery was at that time lawful, ſeeing the law had not forbid it. He maintains that Hagar was the lawful wife of Abraham, and that adultery was a crime even before it was forbid by any poſitive law. It was enough that it was contrary to the law of nature: Erat tamen, per ſe illicitum & prohibitum lege divina naturali (76). As to the third reaſon of St Ambroſe, he refutes it by this aphoriſm, that the quality of a type does not infuſe any morality into things, nor conſequently take from them what is bad. ‘Plerumque, ſays St Gregory (77), res quælibet per hiſtoriam virtus, per ſignificationem culpa, & aliquando res geſta in facto cauſa damnationis eſt, in ſcripto autem prophetia virtutis. - - - Frequently a thing is, as to the hiſtory, a virtue, but by ſignification, a fault; and ſometimes the thing done, is, in fact, the cauſe of damnation, but in writing a prophecy of virtue.’ St Auguſtin follows the ſame principle. ‘In peccatis, ſaith he (78), magnorum virorum aliquando rerum futurarum figuram animadverti & indagari poſſe - - - In the ſins of great men, ſometimes we may obſerve and diſcover the figure of things to come.’

Let us obſerve here four things. In the firſt place, Coqueus makes St Auguſtin take an injudicious and inſincere courſe. He knew, ſays he, the true proof of the innocence of Abraham, and ſuppreſſed it; he contented himſelf with clearing him as to the reproach of being in love with his ſervant-maid. But was this enough? Had not the Manichees ſcope enough to load him with reproaches, tho' they had granted that he was not in love with Hagar? It is therefore to reproaches of this kind that St Auguſtin ought to have anſwered, and he did certainly do it. He pretended, that ſuppoſing the circumſtances, as he put them, a man was juſtifiable who lay with his wife's maid. But was there ever a looſer morality than his? Would they not at this day run down the Bauni's, and the Eſcobar's, if they taught that provided a man thinks only of leaving ſucceſſors behind him, his wife may prompt him to lie with her maid, and he may follow her counſel? Do not tell me that St Auguſtin conſiders only the age that Abraham lived in; for ſince he grounds his reaſoning on the right which St Paul gives to a huſband over his wife, and to a wife over her huſband, he propoſes, without doubt, to account for it at all times. We have ſeen, in another place (79) what he ſays of the action of Acindynus. My ſecond remark is, That the doctrine of Calvin is much purer on this point, than that of the antient Fathers. He condemns the conduct of Abraham and Sarah, plainly and directly. He ſeeks no excuſe for them from the uſe of Polygamy already eſtabliſhed among the nations. He ſays they had no right to oppoſe the law that ties married perſons one to another. ‘Nec valet excuſatio quod concubinam uxoris loco eſſe voluerit, quia fixum illud manere debuerat, mulierem viro adjunctam eſſe, ut eſſent duo in carnem unam. Tametſi jam polygamia apud multos invaluerat, legem tamen illam qua duo inter ſe mutuo obligantur convellere nunquam fuit in hominum arbitrio (80). - - - - Nor is it any excuſe that he deſigned the concubine to be in the place of a wife; for this ought to remain for certain, that the wife is joined to the huſband, ſo that they two ſhould be one fleſh. Notwithſtanding that polygamy had prevailed among many, yet that law by which the two are bound one to the other, was never to be diſpenſed with at any man's pleaſure.’ Nay, he obſerves, that this fall of Abraham ought to ſet us upon our guard againſt the ambuſhes of Satan, who attacks us, not only by perſons that are manifeſtly criminal, but alſo by good people. ‘Porro cum Sarai tam ſancta mulier inſtar flabelli, ad eandem qua ipſa ſervebat impatientiam maritum ſollicitet: hinc diſcamus quam ſedulo nobis agendæ ſint excubiæ ne qua occulta fraude nos circumveniat Satan. Neque enim improbos tantum & ſceleratos ſubornat qui ex profeſſo fidem noſtram oppugnent: ſed ut incautos opprimat, clam interdum ac furtim per bonos & ſimplices nos adoritur (81). - - - - Now as Sarah, ſo holy a woman, ſollicits her huſband to the ſame impatience wherewith ſhe herſelf was tranſported, hence let us learn how diligently we are to be on our guard, leſt by any ſecret fraud Satan circumvents us. For he does not only ſuborn wicked and reprobate men openly to oppoſe our faith; but that he may catch us unawares, he ſometimes attack us ſecretly, and by ſtealth, by means of the good and ſimple.’ In the third place, I obſerve that the liberty Calvin took of cenſuring ſeverely this action of Sarah and Abraham, is of much greater uſe to Chriſtian morality than the pains the Fathers have taken to juſtify Abraham and his wife. They have ſacrificed the general intereſts of morality to the reputation of a private perſon: I could almoſt find in my heart to apply to all thoſe, who are animated with that ſpirit, this fine ſaying of Cicero: Urbem philoſophiæ proditis dum caſtella defenditis (82). - - - You betray the town of Philoſophy while you defend the outworks. Laſtly, I obſerve, that Joſephus ſuppoſes a thing, of which the Scripture ſays not a word; that GOD commanded Sarah to put Hagar in her huſband's bed. Σάῤῥα τοῦ Θεοῦ κελεύσαντος ἐπικλίνει μίαν τῶν θεραπενίδων. Sara Deo jubente in thalamum ejus adducit unam famularum (83). Here is truly the Deus ex machina, - - - God in the plot, of the tragic Poets, and the ancora ſacra, - - ſheet-anchor, of the proverb. Several commentators upon Geneſis alledge the authority of this Hiſtorian, and obſerve that St Auguſtin has inſinuated the ſame thing. Idem inſinuat St Auguſtinus lib. 10. contra Fauſt. cap. 32 (84). There is no Gordian-knot but may be broke that way.

---

(70) Rom. iii. 8.

(71) Leonh. Coqueus, ubi ſupra, pag. m. 351.

(72) Id. ibid.

(73) Ambroſ. lib. i, de Abrah. cap. iv, apud Leonh. Coqueum, ibid.

(74) Leonh. Coqueus, ibid. pag. 352.

(75) Sixt. Senenſis, Bibl. Sanctæ, lib. v, Annot. xciv, apud Coqueum, ibid.

(76) Idem, Coqueus, ibid.

(77) Gregor. lib. iii, Moral. cap. xvi, aqud Coqueum, ibid.

(78) Auguſt. lib. iii, de Doctr. Chriſt. cap. xxiii, apud cund. ibid.

(79) See the remarks in the article ACINDYNUS (SEPTIMIUS).

(80) Calvin. in Geneſ. xiii. 1.

(81) Id. ibid. ver. 2. See alſo what he ſays a little after.

(82) See the arcle FRANCIS I. remark [P].

(83) Joſeph. lib. i. Antiq. cap. xi, pag. 19, C.

(84) Cornel. à Lapide, ubi ſupra. See alſo Merſennus, ubi ſupra.

SARISBERI (a) (JOHN OF) in Latin Sariſberienſis, an Engliſhman, Biſhop of Chartres, was born about the year 1110. He went into France at the age of ſixteen or ſeventeen. He afterwards had a commiſſion from the king, his maſter, to reſide near Pope Eugenius about the affairs of England. Some would have done him an ill office with that Pope, and falſely accuſed him; but at laſt the truth came to light, and he was continued near Eugenius, with all the favours he deſerved. He was ſtill more eſteemed by the ſucceſſor of that Pope, and being recalled into England, he received great marks of eſteem from Thomas Becket who was then High-chancellor. This chancellor wholly governed his maſter, Henry II, and as he wanted aſſiſtance under ſo heavy a burthen . . . . he made uſe of the counſel of Joannes Sariſberienſis, eſpecially about the education of the king's eldeſt ſon, and of many young noble Engliſh lords, whom he had undertaken to educate in good manners and learning. He deſired him alſo to take care of his houſe, whilſt he was abroad in Guienne with the king, his maſter. Being returned from that voyage, he was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and left the court to reſide in his dioceſe. Sariſberienſis accompained him, and faithfully followed him, when this prelate was obliged to retire into France, and when about ſeven years after he was recalled into England. It is well known that he was murdered in his own archiepiſcopal church. Sariſberienſis undertook to ward off a blow that one of the aſſaſſins aimed at the head of his maſter, but he received it on his arm: the wound was ſo great, that the Surgeons after they had attended him near a twelve month, diſpaired of his cure. It is pretended that he was cured by a miracle of Thomas Becket. He was made Biſhop of Chartres at the earneſt intreaty of the province ſome years after [A], and he lived in this Epiſcopal ſee with the ſame modeſty, and the ſame virtue which he had always preached up and recommended in his writings. He died about the year 1180 (b). He compoſed, among other books, a treatiſe in Latin intituled Polycraticus [B]. He was one of the greateſt wits of his age, and one of the moſt polite and moſt able men in good literature (c).

(a) Or Sariſberienſis, or Sariſburienſis, &c.

(b) Taken from the Life of Joannes Sariſberienſis, prefixed to the French tranſlation of his book de Nugis Curialium.

(c) Du Pin. Bibl. Tom. ix, p. 167. Dutch. Edit.

[A] He was made Biſhop of Chartres . . . . ſome years after.] Here is again one of thoſe writers of elogies, who neglect the dates (1). He could not mark in a more uncertain manner the time of the promotion of Joannes Sariſberienſis to that biſhopric, ſince he had not aſſigned the year of Thomas Becket's Death. Let us ſupply this defect, and ſay that this archbiſhop was killed about the end of the year 1170. This is certain, but it is not agreed in what year Joannes Sariſberienſis was made Biſhop of Chartres. Voſſius ſays it was in 1164 (2), but he is miſtaken. Father Labbe, who reproves him for it, places the promotion of that biſhop in 1172 (3), and adds, that he died in 1182, and was buried in the abbey of Notre Dame de Joſaphat. Father Oudin ſays the ſame (4). But Mr du Pin has not followed their chronology, except in the year of his death. Joannes Sariſberienſis, ſays he (5), was at laſt made Biſhop of Chartres in 1179, and died three years after.

[B] He compoſed, among other books, a treatiſe in Latin, intituled, Polycraticus.] This is a well known book, and there are ſeveral editions of it. It is intituled, Polycraticus, ſive de Nugis Curialium, & veſtigiis Philoſophorum. Father Labbe tells us that the firſt edition is that of Paris 1513, and that Conſtantine Frandinus procured it (6). I make uſe of the Leyden edition, ex officina Plantiniana apud Franciſcum Raphelengium 1595, in 8vo. Mr du Pin looks upon it as an excellent book, 'relating to the employments, the duties, the virtues, and vices of great men, and eſpecially of princes and great lords, which contains a great many moral thoughts, ſentences, fine paſſages of authors, examples, apologues, pieces of hiſtory, and common topics (7).' Lipſius ſays, it is a patch-work, that contains ſeveral pieces of purple, and fragments of a better age. In quo centone multos pannos purpuræ agnoſco & fragmenta ævi melioris (8). Janus Douza uſes this author too ſeverely; for he puts him in the claſs of compilers, who take on every hand, and are like Horace's crow. Omnium diſertiſſimè, ſays he (9), quoting the teſtimonies of authors who have ſaid, that a certain workman had found out the ſecret of making glaſs malleable, Joannes Saliſberienſis, quamvis ab exemplis ſuprà dictis in partem nonnihil diſſentiens, libro de Nugis Curialium iv. cap. v. qui Policraticus inſcribitur, non quidem de ſuo, ne quid erres, ſed verò de alieno (id quod Corniculæ iſti cum fartoribus illis ſemipriſcis, Solino puta, Macrobio, Iſidoro, atque aliis ejuſdem farinæ mangonibus commune) ſolens utique, præſertim de Satura Arbitri noſtri. See what James Thomaſius has anſwered to this cenſure of Douza (10). Note, That this work of Joannes Sariſberienſis has been tranſlated into French, and printed at Paris in 4to, 1640, with the title, Les Vanitez de la Cour. The author of the tranſlation only puts for his name D. M. at the bottom of his Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Marquis d'Aſſerac.

His other books are Metalogicus, ſeu Tractatus de Logica, Philoſophia, &c. printed at Paris 1610, and at Leyden 1639, in 8vo. Vita atque paſſio Sancti Thomæ Cantuarienſis Archiepiſcopi & Martyris. A book of letters publiſhed at Paris 1611, in 4to. Ex Bibliotheca Papyrii Maſſonis. Seven other hiſtorical letters inſerted by du Cheſne, in the fourth volume of his Collection of the Hiſtorians of France. There are many other letters of our author among thoſe of Thomas Becket, collected by Father Lupus, and printed at Bruſſels in 1682, in two volumes in 4to. Baleus ſays, that this biſhop compoſed a comment upon the Brunellus (11) of Vigelli; but a learned Critic (12) denies it for this reaſon, becauſe that poem was dedicated to William de Long-Champ, whom Richard, King of England, made Biſhop of Ely, in 1189, and who died in exile in 1197, fifteen years after the Biſhop of Chartres, who is the ſubject of this article.

(1) See the remark [D] in the article RUFFI.

(2) Voſſius de Hiſtor. Latinis, pag. 421.

(3) Labbe, Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. i, pag. 606.

(4) Oudin, in Supplem. de Scriptor. Eccleſ. pag. 441.

(5) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. Tom. ix. pag. 167. Dutch. Edit.

(6) Labbe, ubi ſupra.

(7) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(8) Lipſius in Tacit. Ann. lib. xii.

(9) Janus Douza Præcidan. in Petronium, lib. iii, cap. ix. pag. m. 594, 595.

(10) Thomaſ. de Plagio Literar. pag. 240.

(11) It is the title of a Latin poem, which is alſo called Speculum ſtultorum.

(12) Reineſius, Epiſt. ad Daumium, pag. 197. He does not ſay Vigellus but Nigellus.

SARNANUS, or DE SARNANO (CONSTANTIUS) ſo called becauſe he was a native of Sarno in the kingdom of Naples (a), lived in the XVIth century. He was a Monk of the order of St Francis, and was accounted a very ſubtile Philoſopher and Divine. He taught Philoſophy at Padua, and Divinity at Rome and Perugia (b). Pope Sixtus invited him from this laſt city to Rome where he honoured him with a cardinal's cap, and made him Biſhop of Vercelli (c). We have ſeveral books written by this Monk [A]. He died at Rome in the year 1595, and was

(a) And not in Umbria as Quenſtedt ſays, de Patr. Viror. illuſtr. pag. 346.

(b) Nomenclat. Cardinal. p. 170.

(c) Quenſtedt, ubi ſupra.

[A] We have ſeveral books written by this Monk.] The epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca miſcals him Conſtantinus Sarmanus, and only mentions his book upon the Univerſalia printed at Venice in 8vo in the year 1576 (1). He compoſed beſides that, a book De ſecundis intentionibus juxta doctrinam Scoti: Summa Theologica: Directorium Theologicum: Conciliatio Aureoli & Capreoli: Conciliatio Thomæ Aquinatis & Scoti, &c. This was buried at Sarno in the church of St Francis which he had cauſed to be built in a magnificent manner (d). His family name was Buccafoco. You will find his article in Moreri under the word Bucafoci.

(1) Epit. Geſn. pag. 174.

(d) Nomenclat. Cardinal. p. 171.

This laſt book is one of his moſt conſiderable productions. He has made there a collection of ſeven or eight hundred opinions, wherein Thomas Aquinas and Scotus contradict one another. This is what the author of the Apocalypſe de Meliton (2) takes notice of, after having ſaid that the miniſter, who, in anſwer to the Franciſcan Feu-ardent, author of a book intituled, Entremangeries Miniſtrales, - - - The diſſentions among the Miniſters, had publiſhed, Les Entremangeries Monachales, - - - - - The diſſentions among the Monks; had taken great advantage of the continual diſputes of the Jacobins and Franciſcans.

(2) Apocalypſe de Meliton, pag. 25. This book was printed in the year 1663. The author was called Mr Pithois. He had been a Friar Minime, but afterwards turning Proteſtant, he was Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Sedan, where he died very old in the year 1676.

SAVONAROLA (MICHAEL, or JOHN MICHAEL) a native of Padoua practiſed Phyſic with ſo much reputation that Nicholas D'Eſte ſent for him to Ferrara (a), and took him into his ſervice, giving him a very conſiderable ſalary (b). Leonel the ſon of Nicholas, and Borſa (c) brother to Leonel continued him in his employment (d). He obtained the freedom of the place, acquired an exceeding great character, and made a good deal of profit by his buſineſs (e). He was a man of piety, and took no fee from the poor (f). He died at Ferrara knight of the order of St John of Jeruſalem in the year 1431. The books he wrote were well received by the public (g), and have been printed in divers places (h). They treat of Phyſic. He left two ſons, the younger of whom was father to the famous Dominican (i) who is the ſubject of the following article.

(a) Joh. Franc. Picus, in Vita Hieron. Savonarolæ, pag.m. 108.

(b) Ghilini Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 197.

(c) He was the firſt that had the title of Duke of Ferrara and Modena. Jo. Fr. Picus, ubi ſupra.

(d) Ghilini, ubi ſupra. (e) Id. ibid. (f) Jo. Fr. Picus, ubi ſupra. (g) Ghilini, ubi ſupra.
(h) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 643. (i) Jo. Fr. Picus, ubi ſupra.

SAVONAROLA (JEROM) grandſon to the foregoing was born at Ferrara on the twenty-firſt of September 1452, and, without the knowledge of his parents, took the habit of a Dominican Fryar at Bologna in the year 1474. His ſuperiors employed him to teach Phyſics and Metaphyſics; but after having followed that buſineſs for ſeveral years, he took a diſguſt at theſe vain ſubtleties, and applyed himſelf wholly to the reading of pious books, particularly of the holy Scripture. He was employed to preach and confeſs, and did both with great aſſiduity, till ſuch time as he quitted the latter, that he might have the more leiſure for the former (a). He was ſent for in the year 1492, to prepare Laurence de Medicis for death (b). It is certain, 1, that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in an extraordinary manner by the auſterity of his life, and by the fervent eloquence with which he preached againſt immorality [A], without ſparing the the diſorders of the clergy, nor even the court of Rome; 2, that he pretended to partake in divine revelations; 3, that by all theſe means he acquired a great authority in Florence and the veneration of the whole city [B]; 4, that he loſt his credit, was excommunicated, degraded from his Eccleſiaſtical orders, hanged and burnt, in the year

(a) Taken from his Life, written by John Francis Picus, Count of Mirandola, in Collectione Bateſiana, pag. 108, & ſeq.

(b) Politianus, Epiſt. IV. libr. ii, fol. m. 92, verſo. See likewiſe John Francis Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ, pag. 115.

[A] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the auſterity of his life, and by the fervent eloquence with which he preached againſt immorality.] To the end I may not cite partial evidences, I ſhall quote the words of Paul Jovius, who has obſerved a pretty exact neutrality. 'Hieronymus Savonarola, ſays he (1), . . . uſque adeo auſtera vitæ diſciplina, ac erudito ſubtilique ingenio & in ſacris concionibus admirabili facundia valuit, ut &c. Savonarola diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner by the auſterity of his life, his learning, his ſubtle genius, and his admirable eloquence in preaching, that &c. He expreſſes himſelf ſtill more ſtrongly in another book. 'Tanta rerum atque animorum commutatio, ' . . . Florentiæ conſecuta eſt, ut Hieronymus, qui modò ſinglari ſanctîmonia, virtutiſque nomine animis civium imperitarat & in numerum divorum ut vivens referretur, publico conſenſu meruerat, concurſu populi, ſenatuſque decreto damnatus ſit, & in area curiæ fœdiſſimo ſupplicio concrematus. . . . Atque ita qui ab excellenti doctrina ac vitæ continentia, & honeſtate, facundiaque incredibili in admiratione hominum aliquandiu fuerat, omnibus contumeliis & cruciatibus affectus, miſerabile, & fortaſſe indignum tanta virtute, incerto levique populo ſpectaculum præbuit (2). - - - There followed ſuch a change of affairs and ſentiments, . . . at Florence, that Savonarola, who, a little before, had obtained a great power over the citizens by his ſingular ſanctity, and the reputation of his virtue, and had, in the opinion of all, deſerved to be canonized alive, was now condemned by a decree of the ſenate, and with the approbation of the people, and was ignominiouſly burnt in the yard of the court. - - - Thus he who for ſome time had been univerſally admired on account of his excellent doctrine, temperate life, and incredible eloquence; was forced to undergo all manner of indignities and torments, and afforded a miſerable ſpectacle, and perhaps, unworthy of ſo much virtue, to a fickle and inconſtant populace.' If you have a mind to ſee what has been ſaid touching the great ſucceſs of his ſermons, you need only conſult the appendix to Dr Cave's book (3). It is pretended, that the Florentines were converted by his preaching, much more than the Ninevites were by that of Jonas; for the city of Florence was reformed, not for a day, but for a long time, and caſt all the inſtruments of luxury into the fire. Quæ de Hieronymi Savonarolæ eloquentia Chriſtiana narrantur, mira eſſent & incredibilia, niſi fidem facerent ejus ſcripta, quæ incredibilem ſpirant pietatem & ardorem; & facilè perſuadent quod ferunt, efficacia verbi Civitatem Florentinam, deliciis abundantiâ opum diffluentem, fere totam non ſolum ad meliorem frugem ac modeſtiam Chriſtianam revocaſſe, ſed & ad planctus Ninive vitam civium convertiſſe, unde illis nomen gementium adhæſit, omniaque luxus inſtrumenta, appenſa Pyramidi flammis abſumpſerunt. Neque ad tempus & horam putes id genus vitæ arripuiſſe, aut ſervaſſe, ſuperſtite Savonarola; non minus diuturna & perennis fuit quam mira & repentina converſio (4). I give you notice that it is from one of Savonarola's brethren, and an apologiſt for the Dominicans, that I borrow theſe words.

(1) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. xlii, pag. m. 99.

(2) Idem, in Vita Leonis X. pag. m. 52.

(3) Wharton, in Appendice ad Hiſtoriam Literariam Guil. Cave, pag. 162, 163. He quotes John Francis Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ. See alſo Spizelius in Infelice Literato, p. 642.

(4) Vincentius Baronius Apolog. Ordin. Prædicat. Tom. ii, pag. 220, 221.

[B] He acquired a great authority in Florence, and the veneration of the whole city.] They conſidered him as a prophet ſent by God for the reformation of manners, and did not think that any thing ought to be undertaken without his advice, neither in the ſenate, nor in the houſes of private perſons. Thus Jovius ſpeaks of him. Hieronymus Savonarola . . . . literis admirabili præſertim eloquentia inſignis, qui in ſacris concionibus, & in privatis colloquiis ita multitudinis animos opinione virtutis ceperat, ut illum rerum omnium, quæ imminebant, verum vatem, divinumque depravatis moribus cenſorem year 1498 [C]. Theſe are things which are not conteſted; but people are divided in their ſentiments as to the point whether he was an honeſt man or an hypocrite. Some authors maintain that his conduct was the effect of a great zeal for truth, and for the reformation of the Church: others pretend that he was an impoſtor, who, to gratify his luſt of power, borrowed the maſk of virtue, and ſet up for a prophet. It is hard to find out the truth exactly in this conflict of opinions: for if, on the one hand, it be certain that the moſt impious hypocrites find apologiſts; it is no leſs certain, on the other, that the moſt honeſt zealots find accuſers; and it is equally certain that on both ſides, whether in defending or accuſing, people generally give full ſcope to party-intereſt, artifice, and diſingenuity. Methinks therefore that I ought to content myſelf with making ſome collections concerning what has been ſaid for or againſt this Dominican. Theſe will be found chiefly in the remarks. Philip de Comines, who had ſeen him, praiſes him much, and aſcribes to him the glory of having foretold certain things that came to paſs [D]. It is likewiſe upon his teſtimony that the greateſt ſtreſs is laid by perſons who cœlo miſſum crederent. Creveratque ei tanto aſſenſu authoritas, perpetuo omnis generis hominum ſexúſque & ætatis ſtudio collecta, ut nihil privatis in domibus, nihil in ſenatu ſine ejus viri conſilio rectè geri poſſe videretur (5). Varillas paraphraſes this paſſage by ſuch particulars as every body will not approve. He had been ſaying (6), that Savonarola was the moſt learned man (7) that had been in Italy from the age of the firſt Cæſars . . . ; that he had foretold ſo many extraordinary things, which proved true in every circumſtance, that he paſſed for a great prophet; and that the Florentines had ſuch a firm belief of his ſanctity, that they had canonized him (8) even in his life-time. Afterwards he goes on thus: ‘ His true and ſuppoſed talents made him ‘ act in Florence with more authority than if he had ‘ been the ſovereign of the place; ſince not only his ‘ advices were ſubmitted to in the public aſſemblies, ‘ but he was moreover an abſolute judge in domeſtic ‘ affairs, and decided the quarrels that happened be‘tween huſbands and wives, in ſuch a manner, that ‘ what he enjoined never failed to be executed without ‘ the leaſt complaint.’ No body has deſcribed the power of this Monk better than Juſtus Lipſius (9). I muſt not forget that among the ſigns of his credit, they reckon the honour he had to be deputed by the Florentines to the King of France (10). Let us ſee the obſervation which Mr Bullart makes upon this. ‘ Perſons of the higheſt rank ſinking their authority ‘ in order to raiſe his, he was pitched upon to go in ‘ quality of ambaſſador from the Republic to the ‘ King of France, Charles VIII, at Poggibone, to ‘ demand of him the reſtitution of Piſa to the ſtate ‘ of Florence. He diſcharged this commiſſion with ‘ great vigour, and threatned the king, by a ſpi‘rit of prophecy, with the anger of God, if he ‘ did not make this reſtitution, in conſequence of ‘ the treaties ſworn to in ſuch a ſolemn manner. ‘ Though the affair did not ſucceed according to his ‘ deſire, and the expectation of the Florentines; yet ‘ as he ſaw, that every thing in Italy ſubmitted to the ‘ power of the French; he befriended the intereſt of ‘ Charles, in order to gain his favour; but after the ‘ death of that prince, which happened on the day ‘ before Palm-ſunday, in the year 1498, his great au‘thority ſunk very much, and he was ſuſpected of ‘ having laboured in that negotiation more for him‘ſelf than the Republic (11).

There is a great want of judgment in the laſt part of this paſſage: for in the oppoſite ſide of the leaf, the author obſerves, that the death of Charles VIII, happened only four or five days before that of Savonarola; and he relates the things which ruined the reputation of that Dominican, and which were followed by his impriſonment, and the drawing up of his proceſs. Does not this utterly overthrow what he had ſaid in the preceding page, viz. that by the death of Charles VIII, the great authority of Savonarola ſunk very much; The truth is, that his fortune was ruined before the death of that prince was known at Florence (12). Freherus has committed the ſame blunder (13).

We ſhall ſee in the following remarks a good many quotations which ſerve to prove the text of.this.

[C] That he was hanged and burnt in the year 1498.] I am of opinion that it was the twenty-third of May, as ſeveral authors affirm (14). Perhaps, it will be objected to me that Porcacchi (15) tells us, that Peter Delphino, General of the Camaldules, takes notice in his letters that Savonarola was executed on the very day of Aſcenſion, and that ſince he makes this remark in a letter purpoſely written the twenty-ſixth of July, 1498, on that Friar's death, we have reaſon to believe that he is not miſtaken. Now Aſcenſion-day that year was the twenty-fourth of May. They may ſay what they will, I rather chuſe to believe John Francis Picus (16), and Bzovius (17), who tell us that Savonarola was executed on Aſcenſion-eve. Porcacchi quotes this letter of Peter Delphino for no other reaſon, but to ſtart an objection againſt Guicciardin, whom he ſuppoſes to have affirmed, that Savonarola was put to death on Palm-ſunday, the ninth of April. But it is not true that Guicciardin ſays ſo: he only ſays, that the authority of that Friar came to an end the day after that on which Charles VIII died, being Palm-ſunday. Finì il dì ſeguente a quello, nel qual terminò la vita di Carlo (giorno celebrato da' Chriſtiani per la ſolennità delle palme) in Firenze l' autorità del Savonarola (18). One cannot tell to what his parentheſis relates, whether it be to the day on which Charles VIII died, or to the day following; but we may be very well aſſured that he intended to ſay, that the eighth of April was the laſt day of Savonarola's authority; for he had juſt before obſerved that Charles VIII ended his life on the day before the eighth of April (19). There is alſo reaſon to believe that he places on the day after that monarch's death, not the death of Savonarola, but his impriſonment; and thus the criticiſm of Porcacchi is not well grounded. I think there are ſome little failures in Guicciardin's words, and am therefore more inclined to follow the dates of John Burchard (20), according to which Savonarola was impriſoned the ninth of April, two days after the great ſhew for making the proof by fire; and as beſides it is certain that ſaturday the ſeventh of April, being the eve of Palm-ſunday, was the day on which Charles VIII died; one does not ſee how Guicciardin could ſay that Palm-ſunday was either the day of that prince's death, or of the ruin of Savonarola's power. Obſerve, by the by, how much thoſe people are miſtaken, who ſay that Charles VIIIth's death contributed towards the downfal of this Monk (21). They could not ſo much as have heard at Florence of that monarch's ſickneſs (22), when Savonarola was impriſoned. Philip de Comines is miſtaken, when he ſays that Charles VIII and Savonarola died within four or five days of one another (23). Petavius is likewiſe miſtaken, in putting down the ninth of April for the day of that Friar's puniſhment (24). Nauclerus ſays in general, that it was in the month of April (25). Peter de St Romuald places it in the twenty-firſt of September 1493 (26).

[D] Philip de Comines . . . praiſes him much, and aſcribes to him the glory of having foretold certain things that came to paſs.] Being come to Florence, where he went to meet Charles VIII on his return from Naples in the year 1495, he made a viſit to Friar Jerom living at a reformed Convent, a man of a holy life as it was ſaid, and who had reſided fifteen years in that place (27). ‘ My reaſon for going to ſee him,’ continues who ſtrive to juſtify the revelations of Savonarola; but as he mentions a prophecy which

---

(5) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 47. Add to this what he ſays in his Elogies of learned men, cap. xlii, p. 99. Hieronymus Savonarola . . . . uſque adeo . . . . valuit; ut populum . . . quo vellet facile impelleret, privatiſque familiarum, ac ipſis quoque ſummi magiſtratus conſiliis miſceretur. Futura enim prædicere, veluti divino adflatum numine credebant. - - - The authority of Savonarola . . . . was ſo great that he did what he pleaſed with the people . . . and had a ſhare in directing not only the private concerns of families but alſo the reſolution of the chief magiſtrates. For they believed him to be a Prophet inſpired by God. See likewiſe Volaterran, lib. v, pag. m. 181, & Gratianus, de Caſib. Viror. illuſtr. pag. 131, 132.

(6) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 212.

(7) It is an Hyperbole; for John Picus, Hermolaus Barbarus, and ſome others were more learned than Savonarola.

(8) This expreſſion is too ſtrong when compared with the Latin of Jovius. See the foregoing remark, citat. (2).

(9) Lipſius, Monitor. & Exempl. Polit. lib. i, cap. iii, pag. m. 139.

(10) Ut ad Carolum Regem, Piſas legatus mitteretur. Jovius in Elogiis, p. 99.

(11) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom ii, pag. 5. See alſo Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles VIII, book iv, p. 345, Dutch Edition.

(12) See the remark [C].

(13) Mutatis deinde rebus, Rege Carolo defuncto, & Florentinis diffidentibus, Hieronymi autoritas imminuebatur in dies. Freher. in his Theatre, p. 96. Verheiden in Iconibus, pag. 14. ſays the ſame thing.

(14) Jo. Franciſcus Picus, in Vita Savonarol. pag. 136. Reuſnerus in Diario Hiſtorico, p. 79. Wharton in Appendice ad Hiſtor. Literar. p. 163. Du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. xii, p. 115, and ſeveral others.

(15) In his marginal notes upon Guicciardin, fol. 99, verſo.

(16) In Vita Savonarol. p. 130.

(17) Bzovius, Annal. Tom. xviii, ad ann. 1498.

(18) Guicciardin, lib. iii, fol. m. 99, verſo.

(19) La notte innanzi all' ottavo dì d'Aprile morì il Re Carlo. Id. ibid. fol. 99.

(20) See remark [G].

(21) See remark [C].

(22) It was an Apoplexy that carried him off in a very ſhort time. See Varillas, in his Hiſtory of that Prince, the laſt page but one.

(23) Comines, book viii, ch. xix.

(24) Petavius, Ration. Temp. Part. i, lib. ix, cap. x, pag. m. 623.

(25) Naucler. Part. ii, Gener. L, pag. m. 990.

(26) In his Journal Chronol. Tom. ii, p. 334.

(27) Comines, book viii, ch. ii, pag. m. 498. John Francis Picus in Vita Savonarolæ, pag. m. 114, ſays that Savonarola went to Florence in the year 1489. Sixtus of Siena, *apud Pope Blount Cenſ. Auth. pag.*345, ſays that Savonarola preached at Florence for the ſpace of 7 years. Theſe calculations do not agree with that of Philip de Comines.

continues he (28), ‘ was becauſe he had always preached very much in the king's favour, and his words had kept the Florentines from turning againſt us: for never had a preacher ſo great an influence over a city: he had conſtantly foretold the king's coming, (notwithſtanding all that was ſaid or written to the contrary) affirming, that he was ſent by God to drive the tyrants out of Italy, and that nothing could reſiſt nor withſtand him: he had likewiſe ſaid that he would come to Piſa, and that he would enter the city, and that on the ſame day the Florentine ſtate would come to an end: and ſo it happened; for that very day was Peter de Medicis expelled: and many other things had he foretold in his ſermons before they came to paſs, as the death of Laurence de Medicis: and he likewiſe ſaid publickly that it was revealed to him. He had preached, that the ſtate of the Church ſhould be reformed by the ſword. This is not yet accompliſhed, but it is very near the point: and he ſtill maintains that it ſhall be *. Several perſons blamed him for pretending to divine revelations, others believed him. For my part I think him a good man: and I aſked him, whether the king could proceed in his journey without any danger to his perſon, conſidering the great preparations of the Venetians againſt him, of which he was able to give a better account than I could, who was juſt come from Venice. He anſwered, that the king would meet with ſome difficulties by the way, but he would overcome them all, and gain immortal honour by it, though he had not above a hundred men in his company; and that God, who had conducted him hither, would guard him in his return; but becauſe he had not applied himſelf as he ought, to the reformation of the Church, and becauſe he had ſuffered his ſoldiers to plunder and rob the people, as well thoſe of his own party, and ſuch as had opened their gates freely to him, as his enemies, that God had pronounced judgment againſt him; and that he ſhould ſhortly feel a laſh of the whip. However, he bid me tell him that if he would have compaſſion on the people, keep his army from doing miſchief, and puniſh them when they did it, as his duty required, God would revoke or mitigate his ſentence; and that it was not ſufficient for him to plead, I my ſelf do no harm. He added, that he would go himſelf to meet the king, and would tell him theſe words, and ſo he did, and ſpoke of the reſtitution of the Florentine places. When he mentioned that ſentence of God, the death of the dauphin came very freſh into my mind; for I knew nothing elſe that the king could lay ſo much to heart: and this I likewiſe ſay, to the end it may the better be underſtood, how the whole of this expedition was a myſtery conducted by God himſelf.’ It is thus that he ſpeaks in the ſecond chapter of the eighth book. Let us ſee what he ſays in the nineteenth chapter, where he relates the tragical end of this Dominican. ‘ Friar Jerom, who foretold many things before they came to paſs, ... had always maintained, that the king would paſs the Alps, and he preached it publickly, ſaying, that God had revealed to him as well that, as other things which he ſpoke of. He ſaid that the king was choſen by God to reform the Church by force, and to puniſh the tyrants; and becauſe he gave out that he knew things by revelation, ſeveral people murmured againſt him, and he drew upon himſelf the hatred of the Pope, and of ſeveral in the city of Florence. His life was exceedingly virtuous, as it plainly appeared, and his ſermons were levelled againſt vice, by which means he brought many of his fellow-citizens to live well, as I have ſaid. . . . . He has all along affirmed publickly in his ſermons, that the king would return once more into Italy, to fulfil that commiſſion which God had given him, to reform the Church by the ſword, and to drive the tyrants out of Italy, and that in caſe he did not do it, God would puniſh him ſeverely. He printed all his firſt ſermons with thoſe which he preached lately, and they are now to be ſold. As for that ſevere puniſhment with which, as he ſaid, God threatned the king, if he did not come back; Savonarola frequently wrote to him concerning it, not long before his death; and to the ſame purpoſe were the words which he ſaid to me, when I talked with him at the time of our return from Italy: for he told one that ſentence was given out in heaven againſt the king, in caſe he did not execute the will of God, and if he did not keep his men from plundering (29).’ He ſays (30), that the crimes laid in Savonarola's charge, were only that he ſowed diſcord in the city, and that as to what he pretended to ſpeak by prophecy, he had private information of it from his friends that were of the council. I will neither accuſe nor excuſe them, continues he; I do not know whether they did well or ill in putting him to death: but he ſaid many true things which the Florentines could not poſſibly have told him: and as touching the king, and the evils that were to befal him according to Savonarola's prediction, you ſee what has happened to him; firſt his ſon's death, and then his own. I have ſeen ſome letters which he wrote to that prince. Note he obſerves (31), that there were ſome Florentines who ſtill expected the king's return, and wiſhed for it, on account of the hopes which Savonarola gave them, and that they waſted and exceedingly impoveriſhed themſelves by reaſon of the expence they were at, from an earneſt deſire to recover Piſa, and the other places which they had delivered to the king: among which, Piſa was then in the hands of the Venetians.

REFLECTIONS upon this narrative of Philip de Comines.

I. This may induce us to believe that Savonarola foretold the return of Charles VIII, in a preciſe and abſolute manner; for if he had only foretold it as a thing probable, and grounded himſelf on this, viz. that God required and threatned to puniſh the king if it was not executed, he would not have inſpired the Florentines with ſo much confidence. It is then very likely, that he promiſed to them abſolutely as a certain fact, the ſecond expedition of Charles VIII; but that in addreſſing himſelf to that prince, he did not hold the ſame language, but only gave him to underſtand, that it was the will of God he ſhould return into Italy, and, in caſe of failure, denounced againſt him the indignation and the ſevere judgments of his Creator. He found no better way than this to verify the prophecies which he gave out at Florence. Philip de Comines, who was better acquainted with affairs of ſtate, than with the intrigues of prediction-makers, did not diſtinguiſh theſe two ſprings, or this duplicity of language: he confounded the one with the other, and ſuppoſes that the Monk added an if in his ſermons, as he did in his letters (32); which is contrary to all likelihood. It is proper to obſerve, that if this prophet had been very ſure in the matter, he would not have denounced theſe terrible judgments of God to Charles VIII; for in ſo doing, he believed it poſſible for that monarch not to make the ſecond expedition. How then durſt he foretel it, and ſay that God had revealed it to him? When God reveals that ſuch a thing will happen, is it in the power of man to hinder it from coming to paſs? Can they chuſe any meaſures that will prevent it? Is it neceſſary to threaten them with ſome misfortune, in caſe they ſhould make it miſcarry? Let us conclude, that the threatnings uſed with Charles VIII, and the certainty of the revelation touching his return into Italy, are things which can never be reconciled in any wiſe head. If you ſhould anſwer, that theſe threatnings were to ſerve as the means to bring about the event, and that therefore they were no ſign of Savonarola's uncertainty, I will deny the fact; for Charles VIII did not return into Italy, and conſequently the threatnings of that Monk were not one of the means which God had fore-ordained to that end. Turn yourſelf which way you will, you can never diſprove his being a falſe prophet in this point. He puts me in mind of the Drabicius's and Knotterus's of our days, people that began by wiſhing earneſtly for the ruin of the emperor, and who proceeded by foretelling it, afterwards by looking every where round for a prince able to procure it; and laſt of all, by ſignifying to that prince that he was predeſtinated to that great work, and that if he did not ſet about it, God would puniſh him ſeverely (33). There is ſometimes more malice than enthuſiaſm in this proceeding, a war is only aimed at: for as a man very well ſkilled in theſe artifices ſaid, it is certain that prophecies, whether ſuppoſed or true, have often inſpired the perſons for whom they were made, with the deſign of undertaking the things that were promiſed to them (34).

(28) Comines, ibid. p. 499.

* That might relate to the future taking of Rome, and the ranſom of Pope Clement VII, in the year 1527. This marginal note which I find in my edition, is not made by Philip de Comines, and I do not underſtand why he expreſſes himſelf in the preſent tenſe, and he ſtill maintains it, ſince he wrote his Memoirs, after Savonarola's death.

(29) Comines, cap. xix, pag. 594, 595.

(30) Ibid. pag. 596.

(31) Ibid. pag. 595.

(32) For example the king will return, or if he does not return, God will puniſh him.

(33) See the remark [C], of the article DRABICIUS.

(34) See the remark [H] of the article KOTTERUS. See alſo the remark [C], of the ſame article near the end.

which proved falſe, I mean that which affirmed that Charles VIII would come a ſecond time into Italy, he ſerves as a witneſs to thoſe who cenſure the ſaid prophet. This will appear from a paſſage that I quoted out of Gabriel Naudé [E], one of the authors who blame the conduct of our Monk. He does not do it with ſo much harſhneſs as Volaterranus who has roundly affirmed that Savonarola was an arrant cheat, and that riſing

II. I ſhall make another reflection upon the narrative of Philip de Comines. This author is too ready to help Savonarola out with the accompliſhment of his predictions. He verifies the threatnings of that monk in the death of the Dauphin, and in that of Charles VIII. They were looſe threatnings, and did not much expoſe him; for that prince might meet with vexations from a hundred quarters, and more eaſily than perſons of a private condition; ſo that one riſked nothing at all in threatning him with ſome misfortune. A prophet has nothing to fear when he keeps to ſuch generalities. He may even ſave himſelf by a back-door, in caſe the princes whom he threatens ſhould fall into no affliction: he may ſay, that ſuch long proſperity is a judgment from God, that it hinders them from minding their ſalvation, as they would have done in adverſity. Comines is too charitable and good-natured; he might have very well excuſed himſelf from making the applications. This fault has produced others; there are writers who have very falſly alledged his authority, for ſaying that Savonarola propheſied, that the King of France would not long ſurvive the Dauphin. Neque inficias tamen ire Cominæus potuit, Savonarolam multa verè prædixiſſe, de quibus nemo mortalium potuiſſet admonere, Nam & Regi, inquit, fore prædixit, ut extincto filio ipſe quoque non diu ſupereſſet (35).

Sleidan is perhaps the cauſe of the error which I have juſt taken notice of; for thus he has tranſlated the end of the paſſage of Philip de Comines: Nam & Regi prædixit, fore, ut extincto filio, ipſe quoque non diu ſupereſſet, atque has illius ad regem literas, ipſe legi (36). Nothing could be more unfair than this tranſlation; it does not at all anſwer to theſe words of the original: ‘Et touchant le Roy, & les maux qu'il dit luy devoir advenir, luy eſt advenu ce que vous voiez, qui ſeut (37) premier la mort de ſons fils, puis la ſienne, & ay veu des lettres qu'il eſcrivoit audit Signeur.’ The tranſlation has ſo confounded things, that it directly and formally aſcribes to the prophet what is no more than a pure comment of the hiſtorian. Beſides, it affirms, that the hiſtorian had ſeen the letters which contained that pretended prediction; but Comines only ſays, that he had ſeen ſome letters from Savonarola to the king. To make a faithful tranſlation, it ſhould have been expreſſed thus: & quidem quoad Regem mala ipſi contigerunt quæ is eventura dixerat, quod ipſimet cernitis, nempe primo obitus filii, ac deinde ipſius Regis. Nonnullas vidi epiſtolas ſupradicto Principi ab eo ſcriptas. This ſimplicity without elegance is much better than a fine Latin ſtile which corrupts the ſenſe of the original.

III. Here follows a third reflexion. The event has proved, that Charles VIII was not choſen by GOD to reform the Church by the ſword, and to drive the tyrants out of Italy. He no ways reformed the Church: Hiſtorians (38) mark his expedition as one of the æra's of the greateſt calamities of Italy; and it is certain that no advantage accrued from it to that part of the world. What elſe can we conclude from this, but that the Monk was deceived in his pretended revelations. He did not ſee farther than another into the decrees of GOD; but he had the confidence to boaſt that he knew them. Let it not be alledged that if Charles VIII had reformed the Church by his ſword, and cauſed his ſoldiers to obſerve an exact diſcipline, Savonarola's predictions would have had their full accompliſhment. Theſe are idle evaſions. When GOD predeſtinates to the end, he likewiſe predeſtinates to the means: ſo that if the means of reſtoring to the Church her primitive form, and to Italy her liberty, had depended on the ſword of Charles VIII, and on the good diſcipline of his troops, that prince would have been predeſtinated to theſe means, and if ſo, he would have put them in execution, for nothing can hinder the decrees of GOD. It is then falſe that providence had pitched upon him for this work; and conſequently Savonarola, who affirmed it, ought to be looked upon as a falſe prophet in that reſpect. I ſhall not repeat what has been ſaid elſewhere (39) in anſwer to the evaſions and ſubterfuges of thoſe who, after not ſucceeding in their predictions, lay the fault on the ſins of men. If theſe ſins were to hinder the event, there was no decree in heaven concerning the exiſtence of that thing: for which reaſon, every man who foretold that it would come to paſs was miſtaken; and if he had been truly inſpired, he would have known the real obſtacles that would happen, and not the pretended exiſtence of what was not to happen.

I do not know what authority Varillas had for ſaying that when there was a dearth at Florence, it did no ſervice to Savonarola that he had foretold it, that on the contrary, the Florentines were ſo much the more offended at his not having applied a proper remedy (40). They would not have been altogether in the wrong: for he governed the whole city; and if he was obliged as a prophet to foretel the barrenneſs of the earth; as director of the affairs of ſtate he was obliged to provide ſupplies of corn: otherwiſe, his prediction was to no purpoſe.

I muſt not omit that his converſation with Philip de Comines has been ill related by Varillas, who has not only tacked to it extravagant additions and enlargements, but likewiſe an intolerable falſity, viz. that Savonarola affirmed that Charles VIII would not return into Italy (41).

[E] Philip de Comines ſerves as a witneſs to thoſe who cenſure Savonarola. This will appear from a paſſage of .... Gabriel Naudé.] ‘Since all the praiſes which have hitherto been beſtowed upon that perſon, are to be aſcribed either to the affection of his friends and followers, or to the artifice and ſubtlety of heretics, who would gladly make him more zealous than St Paul, more learned than St Auguſtin, and more eloquent than St Chryſoſtom, becauſe they appropriate him to themſelves; I reckon that in order to judge of him with more reaſon and equity, we may in the firſt place ſay of the predictions which brought him into ſuch vogue and eſteem, that ſo far were they from being occaſioned by a divine enthuſiaſm, like thoſe of the prophets, and of many other ſaints and favourites of GOD, that on the contrary, they have been almoſt every one falſe †, as appears in his having affirmed that Charles VIII would come a ſecond time into Italy, that the perſon who ſhould graſp at the dominion of Florence would come to a miſerable end, that John Picus would recover of the illneſs of which he died two days after, and in many more of his prophecies, ſtill more vain, which are amply deduced and told in the book that John Poggius wrote upon the falſity of them: and that if any of them proved true, it muſt be owned, that this happened either by chance, or becauſe he had private information given him of what was to be done by a great number of friends that he had in the council of the Florentines, and in that of the King of France. Laſtly, As to what concerns the reſt of his actions, we may truly judge by theſe, that he was a very great politician, dignified ſometimes with the moſt honourable employments, and endowed with ſuch a ready and perſuaſive eloquence, that he may juſtly be compared to thoſe antient orators, who had no leſs dominion and influence upon popular and democratical ſtates, than the winds have upon the ſea, keeping them at pleaſure in the calm of peace, or in the ſtorms of war, making them roll ſometimes one way and ſometimes another, turning them upſide down, and, in ſhort, managing them at pleaſure, and to the tune of their diſcourſes. Savonarola may boaſt of having done this for above the ſpace of ten years at Florence, although he likewiſe made uſe of his revelations, and of his counterfeit and diſſembled piety, to keep up his credit and reputation ſo long, knowing from the examples of Arius and Mahomet, that the reſpect of religion has an extreme influence upon our minds; and that when once a man has got the fame of living holily, he makes the people believe what he pleaſes, eſpecially if he be endowed with a graceful

(35) Spizelius, in Infel. Literato, pag. 666. He quotes p. 636. a paſſage of John Francis Picus contra capitulum 11, Samuelis Caſſinenſis where that error is to be found.

(36) Cominæus, ex Verſione Latina Sleidani Edit. Amſt. 1656, in 12mo. As I have not this tranſlation at preſent by me, I quote it upon the authority of Mr Crenius, Præf. ad Chriſtoph. Helvici Elenchum Judaicum, &c. Edit. Lugd. Batav. 1702.

(37) It is ſceut in the editions of Sleidan, but the whole ſeries of the diſcourſe ſhews that we ought to read feut, or fut.

(38) See Guicciardin and Jovius at the beginning of their Hiſtories.

(39) See remark [E] of the article St BERNARD.

(40) Varillas, Ancedotes de Florence, p. 214.

(41) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles VIII, book iv, pag. 345, 346. Dutch Edition.

† Comines, lib. viii, cap. xix.

riſing up in rebellion againſt the Church he endeavoured to found a new ſect (c). What he adds, that Savonarola, when he went to church in order to preach, got armed men to accompany him (d), is no ſmall proof of a factious ſpirit. It cannot be denied that he concerned himſelf too much with political affairs [F]. This is always blameable in perſons who have dedicated themſelves to the miniſtry of the word of GOD; but they are chiefly to be condemned when they meddle with the government, in a ſtate which is divided into factions. Now this was preciſely Savonarola's caſe. There were two factions in the republic of Florence: the one endeavoured to ſupport the houſe of Medicis, or at leaſt the Ariſtocracy; the other wanted to extirpate that houſe, and to ſet up a popular governmnent. In theſe diviſions he made himſelf the head of a party, and the ſoul or primum mobile of the Democratical faction (e); ſo that he may be well compared ‘graceful delivery, and an uncommon eloquence (42).’ Naudé concludes, that it was eaſy for Savonarola to bear rule at Florence, quando, as Jovius, in ſpeaking of him, has very well obſerved; ‘Nihil validius eſſet ad perſuadendum, ſpecie ipſa pietatis, in qua etiam tuendæ libertatis ſtudium emineret (43). - - - - Since there it not a more powerful inſtrument of perſuaſion than a ſhew of piety, in which alſo a great zeal for the ſupport of liberty is conſpicuous.’

We ſhall ſee below ſome other ſtrokes of his cenſure. Take notice, if you pleaſe, that he might have found in Philip de Comines another proof of Savonarola's illuſions (44), and do not forget what he obſerves touching the information which that prophet could receive from the court of France, and the council of the Florentines. This was no bad method of foretelling. It has been ſaid, that there were confeſſors who revealed to him the ſecrets of their penitents, and that he owned it in priſon. Another good way of making it to be thought that he had revelations from above. ‘Frater Hieronymus carceribus mancipatus poſtquam ſepties quæſtionibus & tormentis expoſitus fuit, ſupplicavit pro miſericordia, offerens dicturum & ſcripturum omnia quibus deliquiſſet. Dimiſſus eſt de tortura & ad carceres repoſitus, & aſſignata ſibi carta & atramento ſcripſit crimina & delicta ſua in foliis, ut aſſerebant, LXXX & ultra, ſcilicet quod non habuit unquam aliquam revelationem divinam, ſed habuit intelligentiam cum pluribus ex Fratribus in civitate Florentia & extra eam per multa milliaria reſidentibus qui ei Confeſſiones Chriſti fidelium revelarent cum confitentium nominibus & cognominibus, ex quibus ſibi plura dicebantur, & confitentes ipſos pro hujuſmodi peccatis & criminibus privatim, aliquando in genere publicè corripiebat, aſſerens ſibi à Salvatore noſtro Domino Jeſu Chriſto eſſe revelata (45). Savonarola being committed to priſon, after he was ſeven times put to the rack, begged for mercy, promiſing that he would make a full diſcovery of all his crimes in writing. He was releaſed from the torture, and remanded back to priſon, and having paper and ink given him, he wrote down his crimes and offences in eighty leaves and upwards, as it is affirmed, viz. confeſſing that he never had any divine revelation, but that he held a correſpondence with ſeveral Friars reſiding in the city of Florence, and many miles out of it, who revealed to him the confeſſions of their penitents, together with their names and ſirnames, which gave him ſtill farther information; and that he ſometimes publickly reproved in general thoſe who had confeſſed the like crimes in private, affirming that they had been revealed to him by our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.’ This is what we meet with in the journal of a maſter of the ceremonies under Pope Alexander VI. I have not the book where John Poggius gives the particulars of Savonarola's prophetical lies; but the following paſſage ſpecifies ſome of them. A perſon named John Poggius wrote a treatiſe which was printed at Rome, containing thirteen chapters, in all which, addreſſing his ſpeech to Savonarola himſelf, after having proved his predictions to be falſe, particularly, for that having ſent his cap to Charles Strozza, when he was upon his death-bed, and foretold that he ſhould be inſtantly and throughly cured by putting it on, the ſaid Strozza had no ſooner touched it but he gave up the ghoſt; and in the like manner, having ſent it to a Goldſmith called Coſmo, and to ſeveral other ſick perſons for the ſame purpoſe, viz. of a cure, foretold and promiſed, they all of them died in a very ſmall time: and likewiſe for that he had publickly affirmed that John Picus of Mirandola, would recover of the illneſs of which he died two days after that prediction. I ſay, the ſaid John Poggius after having confuted the reaſons of Savonarola, and exhorted him to return under the obedience of the Pope, proves him to be an infidel, an infamous apoſtate, a ſeditious man, a diſturber of the publick peace and happineſs, a ſchiſmatic, a rebel to the ſupreme biſhop, and therefore juſtly excommunicated (46). Read alſo this other paſſage: Quam ille multa de Eccleſiæ reformatione, de Turcarum & Maurorum converſione, de Florentinorum fœlicitate, quæ mox adimplenda & aſtantium multi erant viſuri antequam moreretur, prædixit? addens (in revelationum compendio) illas abſolutas & immutabiles Prophetias eſſe? Attamen nihil horum ferè adhuc contigit, pleraque omnia intra centum ferme annos contraria contigerunt (47). Martin del Rio reproaches him in theſe words, with having foretold abſolutely, and without condition, three or four things as immutable and near events, the reverſe of which had happened before the revolution of a century He had foretold the converſion of the Moors and Turks, and the felicity of Florence, that is to ſay according to the principles of Democracy. But ſo far were the Florentines from recovering that government, that they fell under a monarchical one. He ſeemed to be ſo firmly perſuaded of the certainty of his predictions, and had ſo rivetted that perſuaſion in the Monks of his convent, that he and they conſented to verify by the teſt of fire (48), the following poſitions; I. The Church of GOD wants reformation: II. It ſhall be ſcourged; and III. It ſhall be renewed: IV. Florence ſhall be ſo too after having been ſcourged: V. There ſhall be hopes after that, and the infidels ſhall be converted to JESUS CHRIST: VI. All theſe things ſhall happen in our days: VII. The excommunication of Friar Jerom is void, thoſe who pay no regard to it do not ſin (48*). He affirmed, that he had ſuch a diſtinct view of futurity, and was ſo thoroughly ſatisfied with the evidence of that object, that it would have been as difficult for him not to give his aſſent thereto, as to deny the firſt principles (49). It is in this ſtrain that a perſon muſt ſpeak, who deſires that what he preaches up in a prophetical manner ſhould make a deep impreſſion upon peoples minds; but the return from this voyage is ſomewhat dangerous.

[F] It cannot be denied that he concerned himſelf too much with political affairs.] He begun by little and little to ſhew ſome marks of his ſecret ambition, when ſo ſoon as in the year 1484, as he himſelf ſays in the book he wrote on his prophecies, he mixed with Politicians, and procured himſef to be called to the council, which at that time was held at Florence for eſtabliſhing a popular government, where he excited all the citizens to embrace it with one conſent; and propoſed to them four or five points of great conſequence, in order to ſupport themſelves in it, ſaying, that theſe were revealed to him by GOD Almighty, and that they ought punctually to obſerve them, if they were deſirous of making their ſtate the moſt flouriſhing in all Italy. Whereupon, tho' affairs had not taken the turn that he expected, he nevertheleſs did not fail to improve, day after day, his credit with the people, teaching, in the ſermons he preached in the year 1489 on St John's revelation, that the Church was threatned with a ſpeedy reformation, after that of the petty kings and tyrants of Italy, who were ſhortly to feel the avenging ſcourge of all their iniquities. He proved this in ſuch a manner by paſſages of the holy ſcripture, and by maintaining the certainty of his revelations, that after the expedition of Charles VIII into Italy, which he had foretold and proclaimed two years before, every body ſo confidently expected that he would return again, as Savonarola affirmed, that they did not loſe hopes of it till the year 1498, in which King Charles, and

(c) Volaterran. ubi infra.

(d) Non religioſis ſed Militum gladiis atque lictoribus ſtipatus ad templum divinumque verbum prædicandum accedebat. Volaterran. lib. v, pag. m. 181.

(e) See remark [G].

(42) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes accuſez de Magie, chap. xvi, pag. m. 455. & ſeq.

(43) Id. ibid. pag. 460.

(44) That which I have obſerved in the remark [C], viz. that Charles VIII was deſtined to procure the reformation of the Church, and the deliverance of Italy.

(45) Excerpa ex Diario Johannis Burchardi, pag. 55. Edit. Hannoveranæ 1696. See alſo pag. 46, and the Preuves & Obſervations ſur les Memoires de Comines, pag. 335, the Hague Edition 1683.

(46) Du Verdier Vauprivas, Proſopographie, Tom. iii, pag. 2333, 2334.

(47) Martin. Del Rio, Diſquiſ. Magicar. lib. iv, cap. i, Quæſt. III, §. vi, pag. m. 197.

(48) See the remark [G].

(48*) Excerpta ex Diario Burchardi, pag. 46. Preuves ſur Comines, pag. 331; but inſtead of fideles, we muſt read infideles.

(49) Adeo clare cernant futura, iiſque præbeant aſſenſum; ut æque facilè ſint negaturi prima, & receptiſſima notiſſimaque Scientiarum principia, quod de Savonarola ille dictitabat. (in Compendio Revel) & de quodam ſuo familiari, quem non nominat, Picus affirmat, quem ego Hieronymum hunc fuiſſe opinor. Mart. Del Rio, Diſquiſ. Magicar. lib. iv, cap, i, Quæſt. I, pag. 139. See John Francis Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ, pag. m. 113.

compared to the tribunes of the people, who favoured Marius againſt Sylla in the Roman republic, or rather to the Athenian Demagogues, who ſo frequently became the directors of the ſtate. Can a Fryar, a miniſter of the altar, in a word, a clergyman, embark in this ſtormy ſea? Is it not a kind of engagement to ſin? Will not ſuch a man be almoſt neceſſarily obliged to ſupport himſelf by foul intrigues, and by plots that generally end in popular tumults (f), in plunderings, in maſſacres, in proſcriptions, and in ſentences of death haſtily paſſed, and no leſs haſtily executed, by the faction which hath prevailed. Savonarola's party redered themſelves odious by ſuch an execution upon ſeveral conſiderable perſons (g), and he thereby ſowed the ſeeds of his own ruin. He did no leſs contribute to it by his contempt for the thunders of the Vatican, and his declamations againſt the Pope; but what compleated his deſtruction was, that having agreed that his doctrines ſhould be verifyed by the trial of fire, he viſibly ſhuffled, and his heart failed him, when the time came for executing his engagement [G]. By and he that had favoured him ſo much in his ſermons, were tranſlated from this life into another (50) . . . . . He had incurred the hatred not only of Pope Alexander VI, and of the greateſt part of the clergy, againſt whom he uſed to declaim in the pulpit; but likewiſe of all the principal citizens of Florence, by the execution which he adviſed to be made of ſeven or eight of the chief noblemen amongſt them: ſo that having no friends left but the partiſans of Paul Antony Soderini, who made uſe of him to ſupport the popular government, in oppoſition to Guy Antony Veſpucci, who wanted to eſtabliſh an Ariſtocratical form, they were not able to reſiſt thoſe of the contrary party, who, during this commotion, broke open the gates of his convent, and dragged him to puniſhment. This they did in order that their city might have reſt and quiet, by the death of that man who kept them at variance with the Pope, on account of his new doctrine, and nouriſhed factions and diviſions amongſt them, which, if they had been ſuffered to go any further, could not have failed to end in the ruin of their ſtate and authority (51). Had he meddled with the government, with no other view but to maintain concord, and had ſucceeded in his deſign, he could hardly be excuſed; for as laymen have no buſineſs with things appertaining to the altar, ſo Monks have as little to do with political affairs: every one ſhould keep within the bounds of his own profeſſion. What ſhall we ſay then of a man who immerſed himſelf wholly in cabals of ſtate, and occaſioned ſo many troubles and diviſions? Paul Jovius is moderate enough in the cenſure which he paſſes upon him. 'Is Mediceo nomini maximè erat 'infeſtus, oppugnabatque eum Reipublicæ ſtatum, 'quem paucorum potentium, uti prædicabat, vis & 'libido regere poſſet: ob id civitatem in partes jam 'planè diduxerat, ita ut à gravibus ſaniſque civibus 'non ineptè reprehenderetur, quòd a religione divi'narumque rerum contemplatione, ambitioſius quam 'ſacratum virum deceret, ad munia regendæ Reipub'licæ tranſiviſſet (52). - - - He was chiefly ſet againſt the 'family de Medicis, and oppoſed that form of a Re'public, which, as he ſaid, was liable to be governed 'by the violence and luſt of a few great men. For this 'reaſon he had evidently divided the city into parties, 'and was very juſtly cenſured by grave and wiſe citi'zens; becauſe, that laying aſide his religious profeſſion, 'and the contemplation of divine matters, he had con'cerned himſelf in the management of the ſtate, with 'more ambition than became a man of his holy profeſ'ſion.' See in Guicciardin (53), how he declared it to be the will of God, that the government of the people ſhould be ſet up, and neverthelеſs, he conſented that they ſhould infringe the prerogatives of that form of government, in the point of executing four or five perſons that were condemned for high treaſon. 'Their 'relations having appealed from the ſentence to the 'great council of the people, by virtue of a law 'which had been made at the eſtabliſhment of the 'Democracy; thoſe who had been authors of the con'demnation, fearing leſt compaſſion for their age and 'quality, and the multitude of their relations, ſhould 'mitigate in the minds of the people the ſeverity of 'the ſentence, beſtirred themſelves ſo much, that they 'procured it to be debated before a ſmaller number 'of citizens, whether they ſhould be ſuffered to pro'ceed in their appeal or not; where, as the advan'tage both in number and authority was on their 'ſide, who maintained, that it was a dangerous thing, 'and might very poſſibly end in ſedition; and that 'the laws themſelves allowed they might be diſpenſed 'with in the like caſe to prevent tumults; ſome of 'the chief magiſtrates were impetuouſly, and in a 'manner by force and threatnings, forced to conſent, 'that, notwithſtanding the appeal lodged, the execu'tion ſhould be performed that very night; and in 'this the friends of Savonarola were more zealous 'than the reſt, to the great ſcandal of him who did 'not diſſuade, even his own followers, from violating 'a law which he himſelf had propoſed a few years 'before, as very uſeful, and almoſt neceſſary for the 'preſervation of liberty (54).' We may diſcover in this conduct of Savonarola, ſome marks of the unregenerated man, and of the unchriſtian Politician. Note, That Varillas ſuppoſes that this Monk endeavoured to ſave the lives of theſe ſtate-criminals (55). Had that been true, Guicciardin would not have ſaid juſt the reverſe. I add, that Antony Maria Gratiana, Biſhop of Amelia, obſerves, that the relations of the condemned perſons in vain beſought Valori and Savonarola upon their knees; they could not obtain for them that they ſhould enjoy the privilege of an appeal to the people (56).

[G] What compleated his deſtruction was, that having agreed that his doctrines ſhould be verified by the trial of fire, he viſibly ſhuffled . . . . when the time came for executing his engagement.] Guicciardin has diſcovered ſo great an inclination to juſtify Savonarola, that I cannot chuſe a leſs ſuſpected narrative than his. I ſhall quote it ſomewhat at length, that I may ſhew all the cauſes of this Monk's ruin. Savonarola . . . . having been long before accuſed to the Pope of the following crimes, that he preached ſcandalouſly againſt the manners of the clergy, and of the court of Rome, that he nouriſhed diviſions in Florence, that his doctrine was not entirely Catholic, and having, for theſe reaſons, been ſummoned to appear at Rome by ſeveral apoſtolical briefs, refuſed to go there, alledging divers excuſes; and, on this account, he had at laſt in the preceding year been excommunicated by the Pope. By reaſon of this ſentence he abſtained ſome months from preaching, and if he had abſtained longer, he might have obtained his abſolution eaſily; becauſe the Pope, who made no great account of Savonarola, had proceeded againſt him rather by the inſtigation and perſuaſion of his adverſaries, than for any other cauſe. But he, concluding that it was owing to his ſilence that his reputation declined ſo faſt, or that the end which he had in view was thereby interrupted, as he had chiefly raiſed himſelf by his vehemence in preaching, deſpiſed the Pope's orders, and returned afreſh to the public diſcharge of that office; affirming that the cenſures publiſhed againſt him were unjuſt and void, as being contrary to the will of God, and prejudicial to the intereſt of ſociety. He railed moſt ſeverely at the Pope and the whole court: which occaſioned a violent uproar. His adverſaries (whoſe authority with the people increaſed daily) deteſted this diſobedience, and laid to his charge that by his raſh conduct the Pope's mind was altered, and that too at a time when he was treating with other confederates about the reſtitution of Piſa, and when it was proper to do every thing that might confirm him in that inclination. On the other hand, his followers defended him; ſaying, that people ought not, for the ſake of worldly conſiderations, to diſturb the works of God; nor conſent that, under ſuch pretexts, the Popes ſhould begin to meddle with the affairs of their Republic. This diſpute having laſted ſeveral days, and the Pope being ſtrangely provoked, and thundring out new briefs and threatnings of excommunication againſt the whole city, he was at length commanded by the magiſtrates to deſiſt from preaching. He obeyed their orders, but ſeveral of his brethren did in divers churches the ſame thing that he

(f) In Republics ſeditions are commonly the Sacra Anchora, the laſt reſource, or the laſt reaſon of one of the parties. They are the ſame that great guns are in kingdoms, Ratio ultima Regum, - - The laſt argument of kings. They are Deus in Machina, the God that unravels the incidents of the plot, and who decides the cauſe.

(g) See Paul Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. m. 51.

(50) Naudé, ubi ſupra, pag. 447, & ſeq.

(51) Id. ibid. pag. 449, & ſeq.

(52) Paulus Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 48.

(53) Guicciardin, lib. ii. folio m. 45, verſo.

(54) Guicciardin, lib. iii. fol. 124.

(55) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 216.

(56) Gratianus, de Caſibus Virorum illuſtrium, pag. 133.

By this means he loſt his reputation, and the very next day (b) a number of armed men haſtened to his convent, and having dragged him from thence delivered him into the

he had done. As the clergy was no leſs divided than the laity, the Monks of other orders did not ceaſe to preach againſt him with great vehemence: and they were inflamed at length to ſuch a degree, that one of the Friars who adhered to Savonarola, and one of the Friars minors, agreed to enter into the fire in the preſence of the whole people, to the end, that, according as Savonarola's Friar ſhould eſcape or be burnt, every one might plainly ſee whether he was a prophet or an impoſtor: becauſe formerly he had ſeveral times affirmed in his ſermons, that, as a ſign of the truth of his predictions, he would obtain of G O D, when it ſhould be neceſſary, the favour to paſs unhurt through the middle of the fire. Being nevertheleſs vexed, that the propoſal of coming to an immediate proof of it ſhould have been made without his knowledge, he dexterouſly tried to divert it. But as the thing had already gone too far, and was preſſed by ſome citizens, who deſired to ſee their country rid of ſo much vexation, it was at laſt neceſſary to proceed. Wherefore the two Friars, accompanied by all their brethren, being come on the day appointed to the place which is before the public palace, where were aſſembled, not only all the people in Florence, but likewiſe ſeveral others from the neighbouring towns: The Friars minors were informed, that Savonarola had ordered his Monk to carry the ſacrament in his hand when he entered into the fire. As they begun to proteſt againſt this, and to alledge, that by ſuch means an attempt was made to endanger the authority of the Chriſtian faith, which would decline very much in the minds of the ignorant, if the Hoſt ſhould burn; and as Savonarola, who was preſent, ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution, there aroſe ſuch a diſcord between them, that they did not proceed to make the experiment. He loſt ſo much credit by this, that the next day his adverſaries, encouraged by ſome accidental tumult (57), took arms, and joining to theſe the authority of the ſupreme magiſtrate, they entred by force into the convent of St Mark, where he reſided, and carried him, together with two of his brethren, to the publick goal (58).

We ought not to blame Guicciardin for omitting the minute particulars of this amazing challenge; for ſuch an hiſtorian is not obliged to trace the progreſs of things of that kind. It is ſufficient for him to give the ſubſtance of them: but the reader will no doubt be very glad to find here ſupplements to Guicciardin's narrative, ſince we are ſpeaking of a very ſingular adventure. I ſhall ſay then, that the ſeven theſes which I have mentioned above (59), were the firſt ſubject of the challenge. Savonarola having given notice that he would defend them, a Friar minor inveighed againſt them in his ſermons, and offered to maintain that they were heretical. He was ſeconded by his brethren, and Savonarola by his, ſo that a violent diſpute aroſe between the two orders. The Dominicans declared, that they were ready to forfeit their lives, if they did not make out the truth of thoſe theſes before an unſuſpected judge, and they choſe the fire for ſuch a judge (60). The Franciſcans having accepted of it; Dominic de Peſcia a Jacobin, ſigned a writing by which he engaged to enter into the fire with the Friar minor that had preached againſt the theſes. He declared, that he hoped to come out ſafe and ſound from the middle of the flames. The Friar minor declared that he was ready to diſpute with Friar Savonarola, and that another Franciſcan ſhould enter into the fire with Dominic de Peſcia. Some other Franciſcans offered themſelves to this trial, with the hopes of paſſing thro' it unhurt: but there was one who required that Savonarola ſhould enter with him into the fire, and who confeſſed that he believed he himſelf ſhould periſh in it (61). A great number of Dominicans bound themſelves by writing to undergo the trial: a great many others made the ſame offer; and on the firſt day of April 1498, almoſt every one of Savonarola's hearers cried out, Here am I, Sir, here am I, that will enter into the fire for your glory. Queſta matina ultimamente che ſiamo a di primo d'Aprile, parrechie migliara di perſone, di quelle che ſi trovano in ſancto Marco noſtro alla predica con grandiſſimo fervore, gridando ciaſcuno, ecco io, ecco io, andarò in queſto fuoco per gloria tua ſignore (62). It was thought ſtrange that Savonarola did not accept the challenge of the Franciſcan, who demanded him by name for an antagoniſt. He juſtified himſelf, by ſaying that it was not worth his while to enter into the fire with a ſingle Franciſcan; but that if his adverſaries, and eſpecially ſuch of them as reſided at Rome, and their adherents, would expoſe themſelves to the fire, he was ready to accompany them; being well aſſured that he ſhould come off in the ſame manner as the three Hebrews that were caſt into the furnace at Babylon. Si maſſimamente per che il mio entrare nel fuoco con un ſolo frate non farebbe quella utilità nella chieſa che richiede una tant' opera, quanto e queſta ch' iddio ci hà poſta nelle mani. Et però mi ſon offerto & mi offeriſco de novo, di far io proprio Iſperienza, ogni volta che gl' auverſarii di queſta noſtra doctrina & maxime que' de Roma e lor adherenti vogliano commettere la cauſa in queſto padre ò in altri, & mi confido nel noſtro Salvatore Jeſu Chriſto & non dubito punto ch'io andarò per il fuoco come fece Sidrac, Meſach & Abednago nella fornace ardente, non non per miei meriti ò virtu, mà per virtu di Dio, il quale vorrà confirmare la ſua verità & manifeſtare la ſua gloria in queſto mundo (63). I paſs by the other anſwers which he made to the objections: they are to be ſeen in this book which I quote (64).

The magiſtrates of Florence having well conſidered all theſe challenges, and the commotions which this thing bred in the city, gave orders that they ſhould proceed to the execution of their engagements on ſaturday the ſeventh of April 1498. The Friar minor, accompanied only with one of his brethren, went to the place of execution before the hour appointed; but Dominic de Peſcia let it paſs, and came, a little after, in proceſſion with the croſs and the Hoſt, and with Savonarola, and all his brethren, and a great multitude of people. The Friar minor declared to the magiſtrates that he did not at all doubt but that he ſhould be burnt, and begged of them not to paſs a judgment in Savonarola's favour, unleſs the Dominican ſhould come out of the fire without receiving any harm. This was promiſed to him: and becauſe there were people who ſuſpected, that the one or other of the Friars, or perhaps both, had hid ſome charm under their gown, they were ordered to pull off their clothes, and to put on new ones, which had been juſt made for them. The Friar minor conſented to it, and even offered to go naked into the flames. The Dominican on the other hand made uſe of ſubterfuges to keep his gown; and it was granted him at the requeſt of the Friar minor himſelf, who repreſented, that ſince it was of cloth it would infallibly burn with the perſon that had it on. Afterwards, the Dominican proteſted that he would not enter into the fire without the crucifix. This was agreed to at the entreaty ſtill of the Friar minor, who repreſented that the crucifix was of wood, and that conſequently inſtead of being a preſervative againſt the fire, it would be burnt with the Dominican. The latter aſked, as a new favour, that he might be allowed to enter into the fire with the holy ſacrament, and declared, that without that he would not expoſe himſelf to the trial. The magiſtrates refuſed to grant his petition, and thereupon the aſſembly broke up; every one returned to his own houſe; and this was the iſſue of an affair which had drawn the attention of the whole city (65). People murmured, chafed, and entertained ſuſpicions againſt Savonarola; and on the monday following, which was the ninth of April, they atacked the monaſtery of the Dominicans, and took that Friar out by force (66).

I take this from the Journal of John Burchard, who was clerk of the chapel to Pope Alexander VI, and maſter of the ceremonies. He ſays, that theſe things were thus notified to the Pope by the Florentine ambaſſador. I confeſs, that the narrative of an apologiſt for Savonarola (67) does not agree in every circumſtance with this, and that it contains a curious particular, which is not in the other, viz. that Savonarola offered to forfeit his life, in caſe the very ſilk that covered the holy ſacrament ſhould receive the leaſt damage by the fire. The Apologiſt adds, 1. That Dominic de Peſcia would have entered into the flames without the conſecrated Hoſt, if one of his companions (68) had not been warned by Angels, that it was not fit he ſhould enter otherwiſe: 2. That perhaps this angelical warning was deſigned to hinder people from imputing this miracle to ſome magic virtue, the

(b) Two days after according to ſome authors.

(57) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom. ii, pag. 6, ſays that Savonarola raiſed this tumult among the people.

(58) Guicciardin, book iii, near the end. fol. m. 127, ad ann. 1498.

(59) In the rem. [E], citat. (48).

(60) My author, who ſays this pag. 46, quotes pag. 51, ſome Extracts from a diſcourſe of Savonarola which intimate that the Franciſcans were the firſt that propoſed the teſt of fire. See below citat. (72).

(61) Bench' io creda ardere, ma per ſalute dell' anime ſon molto contento che io ardi. Excerpta ex Diario Burchardi, pag. 48.

(62) Ibid. p. 50.

(63) Ibidem.

(64) Ibid. & pagina ſequenti.

(65) It might well have been ſaid upon that occaſion,
Spectatum admiſſi riſum teneatis amici?
Would you not laugh to ſee this fooliſh ſhow?
Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 5, or
Parturiunt montes naſcetur ridiculus mus.
The lab'ring mountain breeds a ſilly mouſe.
CREECH.
Id. ibid. ver. 129.

(66) Taken from the Excerpta ex Diario Joh. Burchardi, pag. 49, & ſeq.

(67) Joannes Franciſcus Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ, pag. 128, & ſeq.

(68) He was called Sylveſter of Florence.

the hands of juſtice. He was put to the rack, and it is ſaid that he confeſſed his impoſture [H]. He was hanged and burnt with two other Jacobin Friars, Dominic of Peſcia and Sylveſter of Florence, of whom the one had refuſed to enter into the fire the effects of which are reſtrained by the preſence of the holy ſacrament. I obſerve, that Volaterranus has not related this adventure well; for he ſuppoſes (69) that Savonarola having boaſted that he had the gift of miracles, and that he could paſs unhurt thro' the middle of the fire, the magiſtrates ordered him to make the trial, and diſcovered the cheat, by ſeeing him reſolved not to do it without the Hoſt in his hand. This error of Volaterranus in ſuch an eſſential circumſtance of a fact, which he had almoſt ſeen with his own eyes is unpardonable.

Reflections upon Savonarola's conduct, with regard to the challenge of the Franciſcan.

For the reſt, we cannot accuſe thoſe people of being raſh, who entertained ſuſpicions to Savonarola's diſadvantage; all appearances were againſt him. It was already a prejudice againſt him, that being perſonally challenged to enter into the fire, he declined to enter himſelf, and ſubſtituted a deputy. He made a very fooliſh excuſe, when he pretended that by reaſon of the great work to which he was deſtined by God, it was beneath him to engage with a ſingle Franciſcan; for he could have done nothing more uſeful towards the advancement of that work, than the good ſucceſs of the trial would have been. What more authentic proof could he give of his extraordinary miſſion, than to convince the people that he paſſed unhurt thro' the middle of the flames which conſumed his accuſer? Would not this have been as ſufficient to legitimate his miſſion, as the puniſhment of Korah was to confirm that of Moſes? Obſerve well, that this Monk did not expreſs any doubt of the activity of the fire. He ſaid, he was fully perſuaded that he ſhould receive no manner of damage (70): ſince therefore he was to ſurvive the tryal, he had no reaſon to believe that it would incapacitate him for executing his deſigns. On the contrary, he had reaſon to believe that it would render him the more capable of bringing them about. We ſee then that he gave grounds for a violent ſuſpicion, that he was afraid of loſing his honour and his life at the ſame time; and it was no ſign of courage his offering himſelf to the perſonal proof, provided his enemies at Rome would undergo it with him: for there is no manner of difference between promiſing nothing at all, and promiſing upon ſuch conditions as one knows will not be accepted.

Do not object to me his conſenting that one of his brethren ſhould enter into the fire, and let it not be concluded from thence that he acted ingenuouſly. I confeſs that he hazarded his reputation, as he ſays himſelf, and that he would have been obliged to abſcond, if his deputy had loſt his life. Si uno di queſti tali andando ſotto la mia fede & per far l'ubedienza da me impoſta come ſi ſono promptiſſimamente offerti, ardeſſe nel fuoco, chi non vedde ch'io & che queſta tutt'opera & impreſa di Dio andarebbe meco in ruina & ch'io non potrei piu in alcun luogo comparire (71). But that does not prove his ſincerity; for the challenges of the Franciſcans had him reduced to ſuch a non-plus, that he could not preſerve his reputation but by expoſing himſelf to that teſt of fire, or by conſenting that one of his brethren ſhould do it. He confeſſes, that without this, the honour of GOD, and his holy truth, would fall to the ground: Concioſia che noi non habbiamo offerto queſta tale iſperienza & fuoco, mà loro ſono quelli che ce l'hanno meſſo inanzi; & noi ſiamo coſtanti ad accettar la, accio che l'honor di Dio & la ſua ſanta verità non vadi per terra (72). What was to be done in ſo great an extremity? It was neceſſary to ſhew confidence at leaſt in the perſon of a deputy, truſting to this, that the magiſtrates would not order the proof, or that, at worſt, expedients might be contrived to elude it, which would be of leſs conſequence, being employed by Dominic de Peſcia, than if Savonarola himſelf ſhould make uſe of them. Such were actually invented. It is true they were of no great ſervice; but the thing was gone ſo far, that it was not now the queſtion, whether one ſhould hazard nothing at all, but whether one ſhould hazard more or leſs.

The Friars minors obtained an indiſputable advantage: their champion diſcovered both a great deal of charity, and a great deal of courage; for he preſented himſelf to a certain death; he had good ſenſe enough to be perſuaded that the fire would give no quarter to him, he was ready to die for the ſalvation of ſo many ſouls, who, as he thought, were miſled by Savonarola. He hoped, that their eyes would be opened, and that the deceit would laſt no longer than they ſhould ſee the ſubſtitute of the deceiver periſh in the flames. He had ſome grounds to fear leſt they ſhould judge that, ſince the two antagoniſts periſhed alike, both ſides were in the wrong; but without doubt he hoped that the evil would entirely ceaſe, provided it was once believed that Savonarola erred. Note, That if the Dominicans, who offered themſelves to the trial, were fully perſuaded, that the fire would reſpect them, they did not ſhew much courage. Note alſo, that by virtue of that perſuaſion, they thought themſelves innocent of the crime of ſelf-murther. 'Mi 'confido, ſaid Savonarola (73), nel Sig. & Salvatore 'Jeſu Chriſto, & nel ſuo S. Evangelio, che ciaſcuno 'di loro ne uſcirà illeſo, cioe ſenza alcun damno, & 'quando di queſto dubitaſſe punto, non lo direi, per 'non eſſer homicida. - - - - I truſt in our Lord and 'Saviour JESUS CHRIST, and in his Goſpel, that every 'one of them ſhall come out unhurt, and if I had the leaſt 'doubt of it, I would not ſay ſo, for fear of being a 'murtherer.' He laid that crime to the charge of his adverſaries, who offered themſelves to the proof, believing at the ſame time that they ſhould periſh in it (74).

[H] It is ſaid that he confeſſed his impoſture.] What Guicciardin relates, ſavours of a man who is tender of unfortunate peoples reputation. Savonarola, ſays he, was examined with tortures, although they were not very ſevere; and upon the examination, a proceſs was publiſhed, which (laying aſide all the injurious reproaches that had been thrown out againſt him, of avarice, or bad morals, or of his having carried on ſecret intrigues with princes) contained, that his predictions had not proceeded from divine revelation, but from his own opinion, grounded upon the doctrine and obſervation of the holy ſcripture, and that he had not been induced thereto from any ill deſign, nor from a deſire of acquiring high preferments in the Church by that means: but that he had earneſtly wiſhed to be the inſtrument of calling a general council, in which the corrupt manners of the clergy might be reformed, and the ſtate of the Church of GOD, which had deviated ſo far, might be reduced to as great a reſemblance as poſſible of thoſe days that were neareſt to the times of the Apoſtles; and that he would have thought it a much greater honour to finiſh that great and uſeful work, than to obtain the papal dignity; becauſe the former could only proceed from a moſt excellent life and doctrine, and a ſingular reſpect for all men, whereas the latter was very often obtained by ill means, or by the favour of fortune. In conſequence of this proceſs, confirmed by him in the preſence of ſeveral Friars likewiſe of his order, but (if what his adherents publiſhed afterwards be true) in few words, and in ſuch as were capable of divers interpretations; by ſentence of the general of the Dominicans, and of Biſhop Romolino, who was afterwards Cardinal of Surrente, the commiſſaries deputed by the Pope, he and the other two Friars were with the uſual ceremonies in the Church of Rome degraded from their holy orders, and being delivered over to the ſecular arm, they were hanged and burnt (75). He adds, that Savonarola ſuffered death courageouſly, without ſaying one word that might ſhew either his guilt or his innocence; but that this did not put an end to the difference in the opinions and paſſions of men; becauſe ſeveral perſons conſidered him as an impoſtor; and, on the other hand, ſeveral believed that the confeſſion which was publiſhed had been falſly invented, or that the torture had more power than truth, upon a man of his conſtitution, which was very delicate. They excuſed his frailty by the example of the prince of the Apoſtles, who, without being impriſoned, or conſtrained by any torture or extraordinary violence, did at the bare words of chambermaids and ſervants, deny that he was the diſciple of that Maſter, from whom he had ſeen ſo many holy precepts and miracles proceed.

There are three things to be conſidered in this narrative. The firſt is, That Savonarola was delivered over fire without the conſecrated hoſt (i), and the other had exhorted him to it under the pretext of a revelation. The vigorous reſiſtance, which the Jacobins made when their

---

(69) Volaterran. lib. v, pag. m. 181.

(70) See above citat. (63).

(71) Excerpta ex Diario Burchardi, p. 50.

(72) Ibid. p. 51.

(73) Ubi ſupra, pag. 48.

(74) Nè per queſto ſiamo noi crudeli & homicidi, ancorche li auverſarii, quali ſi ſono ſottoſcritti publicamente confeſſano d'haver in queſto fuoco à morire . . . . & però non gia noi, ma loro ſono crudeli & homicidi di ſe medeſimi. Ibid. pag. 51.

(75) Guicciardin, lib. iii, near the end. fol. m. 128.

over to the ſecular arm, becauſe, as he himſelf confeſſed, he had known things to come by acquired lights, and had aimed at nothing elſe in his actions, but to bring back the Church to her antient purity. The ſecond is, That the confeſſion he made thereupon was expreſſed in ambiguous words. The third is, That at his execution he neither owned that he was guilty, nor proteſted that he was innocent, and that neverthele/s there were a good many perſons who continued to look upon him as a ſaint, though they made no doubt of his having denied the truth in priſon.

GUICCIARDIN cenſured.

I. I obſerve upon the firſt of theſe three articles, that Guicciardin has not diſcharged the duty of an hiſtorian well; for he has not only ſuppreſſed the greateſt part of the accuſations which were acknowledged as true by Savonarola, but he has likewiſe unfairly repreſented thoſe which he has related. It was very allowable for him to believe that the Judges had oppreſſed the innocence of that Friar; but he had no right to mangle or diſguiſe the repreſentations which had been publiſhed of that caſe. Now he has done both, ſince it is certain that they contain ſeveral heads of accuſation and confeſſion which he has paſſed over in ſilence, and that in thoſe which he has mentioned, he has ſtruck out what things were criminal, and only left an idea of innocence. If an hiſtorian can be allowed thus to diſcharge the office of an advocate, he ought at moſt to do ſo by ſome reflexions apart, and not in the thread of the narration itſelf, which ſhould be ſtrictly conformable to the publick records. Guicciardin is too hard upon the Judges, and too eaſy to the party accuſed: it is not his fault if it be not believed that they cauſed a man to be burnt for having dared to affirm that by a ſtrong meditation upon the oracles of the Bible, he had learned that certain things would happen. The pretenſion of ſuch a man may be very raſh, and liable to cenſure; but it does not render him worthy of corporal puniſhment: and conſequently Savonarola's Judges would have been murtherers and aſſaſſins, if they had put him to death for an offence of that nature. Let us ſee wherein the artifice and miſrepreſentation of the hiſtorian conſiſts. He has ſeparated two things which ſhould have been put together; the one is what Savonarola confeſſed in priſon, the other is what he had preached before. This Friar confeſſed that his knowledge of things to come was not infuſed, or an immediate revelation of the Holy Ghoſt; but he had boaſted of ſuch a revelation (76); and it is upon that account that his confeſſion, which otherwiſe would have been a trifle, rendered him vaſtly guilty. He found himſelf convicted by his own confeſſion of an horrible and infamous impoſture. Guicciardin has taken great care not to furniſh his readers with hints for this remark: he wiſhed, no doubt, that they might not compare Savonarola's confeſſion with his preceding conduct. If you have a mind to know part of what Guicciardin has ſuppreſſed, read the following paſſage of Nauclerus; we find there, that, according to the acts of the proceſs which was publiſhed, Savonarola acknowledged that his conduct had been one continued ſeries of vanity and ambition, to which he had made his pretended prophecies ſubſervient. ‘Die nona menſis Aprilis, dictus F. Hieronymus, præſentibus multis teſtibus, fuit interrogatus & examinatus in aula Baroncelli, primò verbis, pòſt minis, dein cum tortura. demum 19. ejuſdem menſis ſine læſione dixit, omnia per ipſum prophetizata, fuiſſe ficta, & quòd ob gloriam humanam aucupandam talia prædicaverit, & quòd videbatur civitas Florentia bonum inſtrumentum ad faciendum creſcere ſuam gloriam. Et ad coadjuvandum ſuum finem, confeſſus eſt ſe prædicaſſe res, per quas Chriſtiani cognoſcerent abominationes quæ fiebant Romæ, & quòd reges & principes ſe congregarent ad faciendum concilium: quod ubi factum fuiſſet, ſperaſſet deponi multos prælatos, etiam Papam: & quando fuiſſet æſtimatus in concilio, manſiſſet & ſtetiſſet in magna reputatione in toto mundo: & ſi non fuiſſet in papam electus, ſaltem primum locum tenuiſſet. De renovatione eccleſiæ & converſione infidelium, dixit ſe habere ex ſcriptura ſacra, ſed quòd fieri deberet citò, non habuerit ex ſcripturis aut revelatione. Quòd oſtenderit ſe iviſſe in paradiſum, hoc feciſſe ſe ad attribuendum ſibi reputationem & gloriam. Circa factum inobedientiæ pontificis, quòd non ivit Romam, feciſſe ſe, ne occideretur in via. Circa factum excommunicationis reſpondit, quanquam multis aliter videretur, crediderit ipſe tamen illam eſſe veram & obſervandam, obſervaverit per aliquod tempus. Sed ubi viderit quòd ibat opus ſuum in ruinam, ceperit modum non obſervandi, & quòd pertinaciter ſteterit contrà pro honore, reputatione ac manutentione operis ſui. Hæc & multa alia interpretatus eſt, prout in examine quod impreſſum eſt, continetur (77). - - - - On the ninth day of April the ſaid Savonarola was, before many witneſſes, interrogated and examined in the hall Baroncelli, firſt with words, afterwards with threatnings, and laſt of all with the torture. At length, on the nineteenth of the ſame month, he freely owned, without being racked, that all his predictions had been feigned, and that he had preached up ſuch things for the ſake of human glory, and becauſe the city of Florence ſeemed to him a proper inſtrument for procuring it. He confeſſed that in order to promote his ends, he had preached things, by which Chriſtians might know the abominations which were practiſed at Rome, and kings and princes might jointly procure a council to be called; in conſequence of which he had expected that many prelates, and the Pope himſelf, would have been depoſed; that after he had been once reſpected in the council, his reputation ſhould have been firmly eſtabliſhed throughout the whole world; and that if he had not been choſen Pope, he would at leaſt have held the firſt rank. As to the reformation of the Church, and the converſion of the infidels, he ſaid, he had the knowledge of thoſe things from ſcripture, but as to their happening ſoon, he neither knew it from ſcripture nor revelation. With reſpect to his ſaying that he had been in Paradiſe, he confeſſed, that he did it for the ſake of acquiring glory and reputation to himſelf; and as to his diſobeying the Pope, in not going to Rome, he attributed it to his fear of being killed by the way. Concerning the fact of excommunication, he anſwered, that though many were of a different opinion, he himſelf had believed it true and proper to be complied with, and that therefore he had ſubmitted to it for ſome time. But when he ſaw his deſigns go to ruin, he took a reſolution not to mind it, and that he had oppoſed it obſtinately for the honour, reputation, and ſupport, of his undertaking. Theſe and many other things did he confeſs, as they are contained in the proceſs that was printed.’

II. The ſecond thing which I ſaid was to be conſidered in Guicciardin's narrative, is, that Savonarola made uſe of expreſſions which had a double meaning. His apologiſts are perplexed a little upon that head, and they own that ſome votaries of that new ſaint wavered upon that occaſion (78); but there were others who juſtified him by the example of the antient prophets, whoſe anſwers ſeemed to ſignify quite the reverſe of what they intended. ‘Illud affirmantes fuiſſe in uſu prioribus illis veteris Teſtamenti prophetis, perfidis interrogantibus obliquè adeò ambiguèque reſpondere, ut quæ affirmaverant negaviſſe viderentur, contraque quæ negaverant viderentur affirmaſſe. Sic Micheam Acabo Regi de Aſſyriis expugnandis reſpondiſſe; ſic Prophetam Amos nec ſe Prophetam eſſe, ſed nec Prophetæ filium dixiſſe. Sic Joannem Baptiſtam dum de Prophetiæ munere rogaretur loquutum fuiſſe. Et in hanc quoque ſententiam Prophetæ Ezekielis nonnulla, deque reſponſo Eliſei ad Hazaelem depromi dicebant (79). - - - Affirming that the antient prophets of the Old Teſtament were uſed to make ſuch oblique and doubtful anſwers to the queſtions of the wicked, that they ſeemed to deny what they affirmed, and, on the other hand, to affirm what they denied. Thus ſuch was Micaiah's anſwer to king Ahab concerning his victory over the Aſſyrians; thus did the prophet Amos ſay, that he was neither a prophet, nor the ſon of a prophet. Thus, ſaid they, John the Baptiſt anſwered, when he was aſked whether he was a Prophet; they add, that ſome things to the ſame purpoſe might be quoted out of the Prophet Ezekiel, and out of Eliſha's anſwer to Hazael.’ They alledged (80) that their convent was attacked [I], did not well become the diſciples of a prophet of the New Law, eſpecially ſince this attack was countenanced by the authority of the magiſtrates (k). Some believed that Savonarola was very juſtly puniſhed; but others conſidered him as a martyr, and endeavoured to have part of his aſhes that they might keep them as a relick (l); for which reaſon they were thrown into the river. Books were written for his juſtification [K], and we muſt not omit that the Proteſtants have

---

(i) See the remark [G].

(76) Guicciardin himſelf affirms it in another place, viz. book ii, fol. m. 44, verſo. Affermando non predire queſto, & molte altre coſe, le quali continuamente predicava, per diſcorſo humano, ne per Scientie di Scritture; ma ſemplicemente per divina rivelatione. - - - - Affirming that he did not foretel this and many other things which he conſtant- preached up, by any human reaſoning, nor by the knowledge of the Scriptures; but purely by divine revelation.

(77) Naucler. Part. ii, Gener. L, pag. m. 990. See in Spizelius in Infel. Literato, pag. 659, a confeſſion of Savonarola, in terms that are ſtill more barbarous: it is taken from the book of John Poggius, Edit. 1498.

(78) See John Francis Picus, ubi ſupra, pag. m. 132.

(79) Id. ibid.

(80) Ibid. pag. 133.

(k) See in the remark [H], the words of Guicciardin.

(l) Sixt. Senenſis, Biblioth. lib. iv, apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. Auth. pag. 345. See likewiſe the Proſopographie of Du Verdier, Tom. iii, pag. 2333, and what I quote from John Francis Picus, in the remark [H] near the end.

---

that Thomas Aquinas affirms, that a perſon accuſed is not obliged to confeſs the truth before unjuſt judges. They remembered (81), that there had been martyrs whom the violence of torture had compelled to ſpeak againſt their conſcience, and thus they confirmed themſelves in the credit which they had given to that new prophet. Such are the effects of being infatuated with a man, who acquires the reputation of an inſpired ſaint. Such an infatuation is generally an incurable diſeaſe. Let the event give the lye to that man's prediction, let him vary, let him recant, let him contradict himſelf, let him fall into weakneſſes and groſs faults; for all this, people are not cured of their prepoſſeſſion, they ſeek to juſtify him at the expence of the greateſt ſaints of the antient and new law, they will rather ſtrip faults of their vicious nature, than believe that he is guilty of any faults (82).

(81) Ibid.

(82) See the remark . . . . of the article . . . .
. . . . .
or what Seneca ſays of Cato's drunkenneſs.

The prepoſſeſſion of Savonarola's votaries was ſo extravagant, that they religiouſly preſerved all they could of the wood-pile where he was burnt. This ſuperſtition of theirs was foreſeen, and for that reaſon all the aſhes had been ſuddenly taken away and thrown into the river: but ſomething remained, and there was even a bone that fell from amidſt the aſhes, and part of a finger which was carried off, during the time that they were throwing ſtones at the gibbet, where the three Dominicans were hanged, All theſe were kept as relicks, and, as ſome ſay, wrought a good many miracles. ‘ Corporum abſumptorum cineres quoſcum- ‘ que potuerunt in unum redactos, plauſtriſque delatos, ‘ in Arni fluvium injecerunt. Ex incendio ſuperfuere ‘ nonnulla, quæ cautè rapta, religioſeque ſervata ſunt. ‘ Item os, quod puer quidam dum veheretur in Ar- ‘ num, delapſum vehiculo pertulit ad matrem: Item ‘ & digiti cujuſdam pars dum penderent de cruce, ſax- ‘ orum decuſſa grandine. Ab ipſis reliquiis quæ pro- ‘ dierunt ſigna divinitùs ſuis referemus locis (83).

(83) Jo. Franciſcus Picus, ubi ſupra, p. 166: he ſays, in that very place that Savonarola's heart was found in the river Arno two days after. He boaſts that he had a part of it. See the following remark citation (97).

III. My third remark upon Guicciardin's narrative is, that St Peter's example does but little ſerve to juſtify the Florentine prophet; for that Apoſtle's fault was followed by a quick repentance, and repaired by a long fidelity; but we do not find that Savonarola made uſe of the only means left to attone for his fault. It was to declare upon the ſcaffold, that he entreated GOD to forgive him, for having been ſo weak as to deny in priſon, what he had affirmed in the pulpit. Guicciardin obſerves that he did not ſay a word, either to accuſe or clear himſelf.

Let us not forget to obſerve that it is a difficult matter to reduce the apologiſts for certain people to a non-plus, for they almoſt continually find examples, which they place before us, as a barrier which we are obliged to reſpect. You ſee how Savonarola's friends endeavoured to ſhelter themſelves under the antient prophets, and the martyrs of the primitive church; and though they ſhould be forced to confeſs that he had been ſeduced by the illuſions of the devil, they would have modern ſaints to alledge in his juſtification. This is the obſervation of a Proteſtant divine. Et dato interveniſſe, ſays he (84), illi imaginationi illuſionem aliquam & allocutionem diabolicam ſive internam ſive externam, hoc non magis ipſius orthodoxiæ, pietati, & particulari cauſæ, ob quam paſſus eſt præjudicare poteſt, quam Jordani, aliorumque ſanctorum Papalium monachorum: de quorum illuſionibus paſſim legendæ, & vitæ, Delrio l. 4. c. 1. qu. 3.

(84) Voetius, Diſput. Theolog. Tom. ii, pag. 1070.

Theophilus Raynaud ſays that, according to Baptiſta Fulgoſius, Savonarola confeſſed his impoſtures (85); but I do not find this in the chapter which he (86) cites. Father Baronius anſwering that paſſage of Theophilus Raynaud takes no notice of this falſe quotation (87). The teſtimony of Pierius Valerianus would have turned to better account (88).

(85) Theophilus Raynaud, de immunitate Cyriacorum, Diatr. vi, pag. 298, Apopompæi.

(86) Theophilus Raynaud, quotes Baptiſta Fulgoſius l. tit. de Religioſo cultu. c. i. I make uſe of the edition printed Coloniæ 1604, in 8vo.

(87) Vincent. Baronius, Apolog. Ordinis Prædicat. Tom. ii, pag. 88, & ſeq.

(88) See his words in the remark [M].

[I] The vigorous reſiſtance which the Dominicans made when their convent was attacked.] They made proviſion of fire-arms, and killed five perſons. Three of them were killed, and particularly the brother of Savonarola. Quem (conventum S. Marci) Fratres ejuſdem conventus benè clauſerant & in eo bombardis & aliis armis offenſivis muniti erant, quæ in populum traxerunt, qui tandem conventum vi intravit interfectis quinque ex ſuis, tribus autem ex monachis, quodam Fratre profeſſo Ordinis prædicatorum germano dicti fratris Hieronymi & duobus aliis (89). They were obliged to ſet fire to the convent, in order to get the better of the Monks who defended it (90).

(89) Excerpta ex Diario Burchardi, pag. 54.

(90) Concrematis templi foribus nec incruenta irruptione (Savonarola) comprehenditur. Jovius, in Elog. cap. xlii, pag. 190. See him alſo in Vita Leonis X, pag. 52.

[K] Books were written in his juſtification.] ‘ Dominic Benivenius publiſhed a book of his miracles ‘ and prophecies, and Francis Picus † was ſo warm in ‘ his defence that, notwithſtanding he was extremely ‘ religious and a ſtrict Catholic, he did not ſcruple to ‘ attack and very much to abridge the power and au- ‘ thority of the Pope, in order to ſhew that Alexander ‘ VI had no reaſon to forbid him the pulpit and to ‘ excommunicate him (90*).’ This is what Gabriel Naudé ſays. He does not obſerve that this Benivenius publiſhed his book before Savonarola's death; I ſhall therefore add this particular as I find it in Du Verdier Vau Privas. Savonarola had acquired among the greateſt part of the Florentines the character of a holy man and of a prophet, and as ſuch had been cryed up and defended in printed pieces, particularly in a treatiſe written by Dominic Benivenius, a Florentine Prieſt, in order to vindicate and prove the truth of the doctrine and prophecies preached up by the ſaid Savonarola; which treatiſe was printed at Florence by Francis Bonacorſo, in the year 1496 (91). Giſbert Voëtius obſerves, that this Benivenius publiſhed after the author's death the abridgment which Savonarola had written of his prophecies, and that he prefixed to it a Preface full of commendations (92). The ſame Voëtius adds, that Sabellicus in the IX book of the X Ennead, and Ferronus in the IId book of the Hiſtory of France, make a profeſſed apology for this Dominican. He is miſtaken (93) as to Arnoldus Ferronus, who only ſaid, that there are people who pretend that Savonarola was juſtly put to death as an impoſtor, but that no body refuſes him this commendation, that he was temperate, and beſides a man of wit and learning. Hunc quod eſſet Gallorum ſtudioſior quàm alii vellent, à Florentinis adnitente Pontifice quaſi violatæ perſuaſionis reum damnatum: alii, cum impoſturis plebem falleret, & Auguris divini nomen aucuparetur, jure cæſum volunt: certe ad temperantiæ & ſobrietatis laudem, doctrinæ & ingenii gloriam adjeciſſe eum nemo diffitetur (94). Without doubt what miſled Voëtius was his ſeeing Sabellicus and Ferronus quoted near one another in the margin of Martin del Rio, and his not conſidering the disjunctive which that author makes uſe of. It plainly inſinuates, that Ferronus is only alledged as an Hiſtorian who doubts whether Savonarola deſerved death. ‘ Ex partium ‘ ſtudio, & Alexandri VI atque Mediceorum odio ‘ factum, ut non conſideranter Hiſtorici nonnulli † ‘ defenſionem Savonarolæ ſuſceperunt, vel damnationis ‘ juſtitiam in dubium vocarent (95). - - - It was owing ‘ to party-zeal, and their hatred to Alexander VI and the ‘ family de Medicis, that ſome Hiſtorians raſhly under- ‘ took the defence of Savonarola, or called the juſtice of ‘ his ſentence in queſtion.’

† In Apolog. pro Hieron. Savonarol. viri prophetæ innocentia.

(90*) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes, pag. 452.

(91) Du Verdier, Proſopogr. Tom. iii, pag. 2333.

(92) Voëtius, ubi ſupra, p. 1068.

(93) He has miſled Spizelius, ubi ſupra, pag. 628.

(94) Arnoldus Ferronus, de Rebus geſtis Gallorum, lib. ii, circa fin. fol. 45, Edit. Pariſ. 1555, in 8vo.

† Sabellic. Ennead. 10, lib. ix, Arn. Ferron. lib. ii, Rerum Francicar. & alii.

(95) Mart. Del Rio, Diſquiſ. Magic. lib. iv, cap. i, Quæſt. iii, §. vi, pag. m. 197.

Naudé is in the right to ſay that John Francis Picus was warm in the defence of Savonarola. He makes him a Saint who wrought miracles; and he intreats his readers to remember him in their prayers to GOD, and to Jerom Savonarola (96). He ſays (97) that the heart of that holy man was found in the river, that he has a part of it, and that it is ſo much the dearer to him as he has found by experience that it cures ſick people, and drives out Devils. He obſerves (98) that a great number of thoſe who perſecuted that Dominican died miſerably (99), and among theſe he reckons Pope Alexander VI. He mentions two traditions touching that Pope's death, which, as he ſays, happened

(96) Jo. Franciſcus Picus, ubi ſupra, p. 108.

(97) Id. ibid. pag. 136, 137.

(98) Id. ibid. pag. 137, & ſeq.

(99) Father Baronius, Apologet. Ord. Prædicat. Tom. ii, pag. 88, threatens Theophilus Raynaud in the following manner. Non videt vindictam capiti ſuo impendentem, qualem ſenſerunt adverſariorum 80, qui in illum conjuraverant, eoſque omnes mors immatura & infeliciſſima abſtulit. - - - - He does not ſee the vengeance that hangs over his head, ſuch as was felt by eighty of his adverſaries, who had conſpired againſt him, and who all came to an untimely and miſerable end.

have declared for him [L]. He died however like a good Roman Catholic (m). There is pened ſoon after (100). There were however four years between Savonarola's death and Pope Alexander's. One of theſe traditions is that the Devil ſtrangled him; the other that the poiſon which he prepared for ſome cardinals was given to him by miſtake (101). Note that according to the firſt tradition he had made himſelf over to the Devil upon condition that he ſhould attain to the Papal dignity. The apologiſt makes mention of another book which he had written in defence of Savonarola's revelations. ‘Ad hæc viſa quæ ſibi divinitus offerebantur ſcriptis mandata, uno complexus eſt libro, cui titulus eſt Revelationum Compendium, in quem inſipienter invectus eſt quidam Samuel Caſſinenſis ex ordine Minorum, qui vulgo Zoccolanti dicuntur libello proprio & peculiari, quem vix in publicum datum inita defenſione Hieronymi confutandum ſuſcepi, defenſionemque illius inſcripſi Hieronymo Tornelio præſidi ordinis Minorum (102). - - - Moreover he comprehended his celeſtial viſions, which he had deſcribed at large before, in one book intituled Revelationum Compendium. Againſt this one Samuel Caſſinenſis, of the order of Fryars Minors, who are commonly called Zoccolanti, inveighed fooliſhly in a particular book, which was no ſooner publiſhed than I undertook to confute it and defend Savonarola This vindication I inſcribed to Hieronymus Tornelius, general of the ſaid order of Fryars.' He had likewiſe written a book to ſhew that Savonarola had been excommunicated unjuſtly. Defenſio Hieronymi Savonarolæ ſive de injuſta ejus excommunicatione ad Herculem Æſtenſem (103). He delayed publiſhing the life of our Dominican till the year 1530. Dr Bates has inſerted it in his Vitæ ſelectorum aliquot Virorum, printed in the year 1681 at London. Father Quetif, the Jacobin, had publiſhed it at Paris in the year 1674: he was the firſt that publiſhed it entire. He added notes to it, and ſeveral other tracts (104); and he is one of the moſt conſiderable apologiſts for Savonarola. Several of his brethren have ſignalized themſelves in the defence of that prophet. See particularly Bzovius (105), Vincent Baronius (106), Noel Alexander (107), &c.

---

(m) See the paſſage of Coëffeteau in the remark [L].

I am ſurprized that Gabriel Naudé has made no mention of the apology written by the Dominican Thomas Neri (108), nor of that which was compoſed by Ambroſe Catharinus. One Timothy Peruginus (109) was likewiſe an advocate for Savonarola. Note that Catharinus did not adhere to his firſt ſentiments. ‘Anno Domini 1494, Hieronymum Savonarolam, Ordinis ſui fratrem, propter fructum prædicationis defendit, licet per errorem, ut nunc ſenex in tertio de Conſyderatione libro ſuo fatetur (110). - - - In the year 1494, he defended Savonarola, a Fryar of his order, on account of his great ſucceſs in preaching. But therein he did wrong, as he confeſſes, now when he is old, in his third book upon Conſideration.' He is even numbered among thoſe who have attacked Savonarola (111). I ſhould never have done if I were to give the liſt of all thoſe who have praiſed that Dominican: we ſhould find there particularly Marſilius Ficinus, Mathew Toſcanus (112), and Flaminius. The laſt made four verſes which Jovius has thought proper to give (113) in that very place where he owns that out of tenderneſs he paſſes by the inſulting epitaph which another Poet had compoſed. That which Flaminius wrote is as follows.

Dum fera flamma tuos, Hieronyme, paſcitur artus,
   Religio flevit dilaniata comas;
Flevit, & ô dixit crudeles parcite flammæ;
   Parcite, ſunt iſto viſcera noſtra rogo.

While, holy Jerom, the devouring flame
Prey'd on thy tender limbs, religion came;
The goddeſs wept, and tore her ſacred hair,
Then, in an agony of wild deſpair,
Oh ſtop, ſhe cry'd, ſtop cruel flames, a while,
And ſpare my bowels in the burning pile.

[L] The Proteſtants have declared for him.] Let us begin with a paſſage of Gabriel Naudé: it is in page 453 of his apology for the great men that have been accuſed of Magic. Beza, Vigner, Cappel, du Pleſſis Mornai ‡, and all the Lutherans of Germany commonly call Savonarola in their books the faithful witneſs of Truth, the forerunner of the Evangelical Reformation, the ſcourge of the great Babylon, the ſworn enemy of the Roman Anti-Chriſt, and to conclude in a word with Jeſſenius à Jeſſen, the Luther of Italy. I wonder they do not likewiſe call him the John Hus of the ſame country, ſince they were both put to the ſame death, were both Hereſiarchs, and both have their names marked with great letters in the Regiſter and Journal of their Martyrs, witneſs the following verſes which they put under his effigies,

En Monachus ſolers: rerum ſcrutator acutus
Martyrio ornatus, Savonarola pius.

Behold acute Savonarola, here
The Monk, the Martyr, and the Saint appear.

He adds that Beza ſays expreſly when he ſpeaks of him in his elogies, that his having ſo far diſpleaſed Alexander VI, was a great proof of his ſingular piety, that this wicked Pope could have no reſt till he had cauſed him to be moſt unworthily burnt. Homini tam perditè ſcelerato, quàm fuit Alexander ille Borgia Pontifex hujus nominis ſextus uſque adeo diſplicuiſſe, ut non niſi te indigniſſimè damnato & cremato quieſcere potuerit, maximum eſſe videtur ſingularis tuæ pietatis argumentum (114). It is an argument good enough for an Orator, but not for a writer that would ſpeak hiſtorically or dogmatically, ſince the moſt cruel tyrants put ſome people to death juſtly (115).

Naudé might have quoted Bale, Flacius Illyricus, John Wolfius, and Verheiden. This laſt author ſpeaks of Savonarola in a ſtile of admiration (116). It muſt nevertheleſs be acknowledged that he only conſidered Savonarola in an advantageous light: a great ſource of falſe reaſonings. Mr du Pleſſis Mornai gave into the ſame ſnare; he did not ſhew this perſon but on the ſide that appeared fair to him (117). This was the reaſon that when one of his antagoniſts preſented the other ſide to the readers, the diſpute became more intricate, and there was a neceſſity for going back. I ſhall cite Coëffeteau's words. He that deſires to ſee Savonarola's doctrine defended againſt thoſe who accuſed him of Hereſy, let him read the learned apology which Thomas Neri a Florentine Monk of his order wrote for him; and particularly as to what concerns the article of Juſtification, which du Pleſſis does moſt of all inſiſt upon, let him read the anſwer to the firſt objection, and he will know that never any man ſpoke more like a Catholic than he, nor in a manner more agreeable to the doctrine of the Church of Rome. . . . . Such reaſon is there to believe that he died a Catholic, ‘and here follows the account which his great friend the learned Prince of Mirandola gives of the matter †. Savonarola, ſays he, having notice given him of his being condemned to die, called immediately for a Prieſt to whom he might confeſs his ſins, and deſired to receive the moſt holy communion, which being brought to him, he begged earneſtly that they would allow him to take and hold the Sacrament between his hands; and this being granted to him, he began to ſay, with great chearfulneſs and devotion, that he knew and was aſſured that therein was the great and true God, the fountain of ſupreme goodneſs, and the maker of heaven and of earth, and of all creatures: that he knew for certain that therein alſo was preſent the moſt holy, indiviſible, and inſeparable Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, &c. Do you think, Mr du Pleſſis, that a Lutheran or Calviniſt would have died in this manner, and made ſuch a confeſſion of faith? Let your Beza therefore take him from among the idols of your party: let not Luther call upon him any more, as a voucher to his impiety, and as for you do not perſiſt in making him an Heretic contrary to his own confeſſion. Certain it is, that if he had been ſuch, neither Picus Mirandolanus, nor Marſilius Ficinus, nor Neri, nor ſo many other famous men, who have always lived in the Communion of the Church of Rome, would have taken it into their heads to celebrate his praiſe, ‘even (100) Had multo poſt tempore. Jo. Fr. Picus, ubi ſupra, pag. 139.

(101) Id. ibid.

(102) Id. ibid. pag. 125.

(103) Spizelius, ub ſupra, pag. 633, quotes a paſſage of it. I believe it is of this book that Mr Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquite, p. 571, ſpeaks, when he ſays that John Picus Mirandolanus, (he ſhould have ſaid John Francis) wrote a book on purpoſe to defend Savonarola againſt the Pope.

(104) See the Journal des Sçavans of the 20th of January 1676, pag. 23. Dutch edition.

(105) In Tom. xviii, Annalium.

(106) In Apologet. Ord. Præd. Tom. ii, pag. 88, & ſeq.

(107) In Select. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Capit. Sæc. xv, xvi.

(108) See in the following remark the paſſage of Coëffeteau.

(109) In the Life of Savonarola.

(110) Cochleus, Append. Part. iii. ad Conradum Brunum de Seditionibus, p. 350.

(111) See Voëtius, ubi ſupra, Part. ii, p. 1068, who quotes Sandæus lib. iii, theolog. var. comment. 22, pag. 567.

(112) In Peplo illuſt. Viror. Italiæ.

(113) Jovius in Elog. pag. 100.

‡ In Elogiis, in the third part of his Biblioth. Hiſt. at the year of our Lord 1498, in his Apologie contre Leſſius & Coton, ch. 52, in his Myſtere d'Iniquité. in Epiſt. Philoſoph. Savonarolæ præfixa.

(114) Naudé, ubi ſupra, p. 455.

(115) See the remark [A] of the article of the Marſhal de MARILLAC, num. II.

(116) Verheiden, in Iconibus, pag. 14, 15. Note, that he is miſtaken in ſaying that Savonarola was burnt at fifty years of age.

(117) See the Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 570, & ſeq.

† Pic. Mirand. in Apolog.

is ſome foundation for doubting whether the title of Martyr, which has been beſtowed upon him even after his death. But with what face can you reckon among the Lutherans and Calviniſts, a Monk who lived continually in his cloyſter, ſtrictly obſerving his vows, and ſo earneſtly exhorting his brethren to do the like, that he appeared to be ſuperſtitious in his way of life? With what face can you reckon among the Lutherans and Calviniſts, a Monk who conſtantly celebrated the holy ſacrifice of the Maſs, and who has even written books to explain the myſteries of it, and to teach us how we muſt partake of the fruit which God communicates to us therein †? How can people place in the liſt of Lutherans or Calviniſts, a man that always believed in the ſeven Sacraments of the Church, always invoked the Saints, and always prayed for the dead, whom he believed to be in Purgatory. Let any one take the pains to read Savonarola's books, and if he does not find there all that I have been ſaying of him, I am willing to paſs for a calumniator. What if he had ſome particular opinions? We do not call people Heretics who only err, but ſuch as join obſtinacy to error. To conclude, it was not for having groaned under the heavy load of abuſes after a Reformation, that he was burnt: but his greateſt crime was a ſtate-crime, inaſmuch as he preached in a Republic that was divided into factions, the moſt powerful of which, being oppoſed by him, put him to death as a ſeditious perſon (118).’

This paſſage did a little ſurprize the apologiſt for Mr du Pleſſis, and obliged him to give good words. True it is, replied Andrew Rivet (119) that either Savonarola did not know all the doctrine of Luther and Calvin, ‘ amidſt the darkneſs of the time, or elſe he durſt not in every point make an open profeſſion of that doctrine, being ſurrounded by Inquiſitors. It cannot be denied however that he ſaw the neceſſity of a Reformation in the Church, that he ſighed after it, and expected it: and upon that account we place him in general among the witneſſes of truth: knowing alſo, that in ſeveral particulars he taught more purely than the Monks of his time, as ſtill appears by the books we have of his, eſpecially by the collections of his Sermons preached at Florence upon the ſubject of reforming the Church. It is a ſign that his writings were not reliſhed by the Church of Rome, ſince Pope Clement VIII forbids the greateſt part of his Sermons, and his Italian dialogue upon truth, to be read till they had undergone a purgation ‡. If this truth were for his advantage, he would not conſent to have his eyes ſhut. . . . . . It is a great prejudice in our favour his being among the prohibited authors. As for the circumſtances of his death, it is very poſſible that there were ſome things which we ſhould be unwilling to approve. But that does not at all oblige us to reject what he either did or ſaid well. For in this and other things of the like nature, we follow St Paul's advice, Try all things, and hold faſt that which is good ⸸, receiving no man, as the author of our faith who is only a man. . . . . For the reſt, if his crime had only been a ſtate-crime (120), it is not at all likely that they would have burnt him: and what our Hiſtory had advanced upon the authority of Guicciardin, ſhews that there was ſomething elſe, namely that he preſſed hard for a council to reform the corrupt manners of the Clergy, and to bring back the ſtate of the Church of God, which had deviated ſo much, to the model of the Apoſtles. Upon this account it is that we conſider him as one of us, notwithſtanding that he was a Dominican (121).’ All this is weak; for he finds himſelf obliged tacitly to acknowledge that Savonarola died an idolater, and that he taught ſeveral doctrines which Luther and Calvin held in abomination. If his mind was earneſtly ſet upon the Reformation of the Church, that might only concern bad morals, and the abuſes which had crept into diſcipline; and in that caſe he would not deſerve to be excluded from the number of true Roman Catholics. It is not at all to be doubted but that in the moſt corrupt ages, thoſe who were the moſt devoted to the deciſions of Councils, and to the Pope's authority, were nevertheleſs ſenſible that ſtrange diſorders were committed in the diſtribution of Indulgences, and in the election of Popes, and by the non-obſervance of the rules of diſcipline, that there was an exceſſive worldly pomp in the court of Rome, and that it were to be wiſhed a ſtop could be put to theſe diſorders. Do we not ſee at this day monks (122), and pariſh-prieſts (123) write books againſt the abuſes which are committed in religious worſhip? Are they for all that the leſs averſe to what is called the ſect of Calvin, the ſect of Luther? Let us therefore ſay that Mr Rivet does not extricate himſelf well. He was to prove that Savonarola condemned the deciſions of Councils which Calvin and Luther have condemned. But this is what he has not done; he contents himſelf with ſaying, that the Pope did forbid ſeveral of Savonarola's pieces to be read till they had undergone a purgation. This remark is too looſe, for we know that the congregation of the Index does ſometimes take the ſame method with certain books where there is nothing but trifles, or equivocal expreſſions, to be corrected. Rivet expoſes ſome faults of Coëffeteau concerning the diſpute between John Fiſher and Luther; he ſays (124), that as Fiſher does not make the leaſt mention of Savonarola's writings, it is without any reaſon aſſerted, that he has ſhewn by all the writings of this great man, that he was entirely againſt what Luther taught. Rivet alſo obſerves, that it is falſe that Luther quoted any thing from Savonarola in point of doctrine; he only ſaid, that he ſeemed to deſerve a place among the ſaints of JESUS CHRIST, whom the murtherers had burnt in divers places. It is nevertheleſs true (125), that Luther quotes him as an author that is very orthodox upon the ſubject of Juſtification and the merit of good works; but if he had known that this Monk died in committing acts of idolatry, would he have preſumed to reckon him among the ſaints of JESUS CHRIST?

If you have a mind to know what Savonarola's Orthodoxy was, read this paſſage of Mr du Pleſſis. He explodes human traditions as much as poſſible in his books, acknowledges no ſalvation but in gratuitous juſtification by faith in CHRIST, and to that he adheres without depending upon any other merit: he is for giving the ſacrament in both ſpecies, abſolutely condemns indulgences, and, as well in point of life as in point of doctrine, owns Antichriſt to be in the court of Rome. The doctrine of free juſtification, in particular, is excellently handled in his Meditations upon the Pſalms xxx and l, which Poſſevinus, the Jeſuit, acknowledges to have been written by him the evening before his execution *. As for his ſermons, and other books, the Index Romanus has maimed and diſfigured them at pleaſure (126). Since Mr du Pleſſis only cites Poſſevinus, a man, who ſometimes judged of books that he had never read (127), it would have been proper that Rivet, his defender, had oppoſed to Coëffeteau good extracts from Savonarola's works, to the end that the reader might certainly know whether that Monk condemned the doctrine itſelf of indulgences, or only the abuſes in the practice, and whether, ſetting aſide all traditions, he was for retaining nothing but what was contained in the Scripture. It is not at all probable that his views were ſuch, ſince he approved of monaſtic vows. It is not a ſure way to judge of what an author believed dogmatically concerning gratuitous juſtification, and the merit of good works, from a work which he compoſes in order to prepare himſelf for death; for in that ſituation people humble themſelves as much as they can, and have recourſe to the moſt certain remedy, which is the grace and mercy of God (128). Laſtly, it is neceſſary to diſtinguiſh whether an author ſwerves from the deciſion of councils, or from the particular ſentiments of ſchoolmen. Theſe ſentiments did ſometimes acquire ſuch a large extent, that they almoſt hid the deciſion of the council under their ſhadow. It may therefore appear that a man, who oppoſes them, does really ſwerve from the doctrine of the Church of Rome, but ſometimes it is only a falſe appearance: the doctrine of Juſtification is no longer ſo great a ſubject of diſpute, ſince it has been thoroughly ſifted and explained. I ſay this without adopting entirely the following words of Mr Peliſſon. ‘A great part of Germany is long ago weary of being called Lutherans and Proteſtants rather than Catholics. They are privately aſhamed of having made a breach for the ſake of queſtions that are forgotten, and which him by ſome authors, juſtly belongs to him [M]. It is ſaid that the council of Piſa promiſed

---

† Liber Savan. de Myſt. Miſſæ.

(118) Coëffeteau Reſponſe au Myſtere d'iniquité, pag. 1217.

(119) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Tom. ii, p. 632.

‡ Oracolo della riformatione della Chieſa. In Venetia al Segno del Pozzo. ann. 1560. Index lib. prohib. ſub Clemente VIII.

⸸ 1 Theſſal. ii. ver. 4.

(120) We ſhall ſee in remark [M], that his crime included an execrable impoſture, viz. his making people believe that he had immediate Revelations.

(121) Rivet, ubi ſupra, pag. 633.

(122) Father Mabillon in his treatiſe de ignotorum Sanctorum cultu.

(123) Mr Thiers, in ſeveral books, and particularly in that of the Devotion la plus neceſſaire & la plus négligée. See alſo the treatiſe on the Jubilee of which the Journaliſts of Trevoux have given an extract in their month of July 1702, edition of France.

(124) Rivet, ubi ſupra, pag. 632.

(125) In the preface which he prefixed to the Meditations of Savonarola, Edit. 1523. Mr Seckendorf Hiſtor. Lutheran. quotes this whole preface.

* Poſſevinus in Apparat. Tom. i.

(126) Du Pleſſis, ubi ſupra, p. 572.

(127) Se the remark [F], of the article MACHIAVEL.

(128) See what I have quoted from BELLARMINE, in the text of his article, citation (g).

'ceaſe to be queſtions, now that people are leſs warm, 'and more willing to hear and underſtand one another: diſputes which made ſo great a noiſe in the beginning of the ſchiſm, and which no body mentions 'now, concerning juſtification by faith, or by the merit 'of good works, concerning the efficacy of the ſacraments, by the opus operatum, or by the opus operantis, and other things of the like nature (129).'

As Coëffeteau was a Dominican, and conſequently very much diſpoſed to ſave the honour of Savonarola, I ſee, without ſurpriſe, that he does not complain of Du Pleſſis, for having left out of the long quotation of Guicciardin what concerns the trial of fire. I think it as little ſtrange, that he does not find fault with an explication of his, which is very liable to cenſure. Guicciardin alledging here, they are the words of Mr Du Pleſſis, no other crime but this, that whereas he had formerly aſcribed his predictions to divine revelation, at his death he acknowledged that he had them from the obſervation and interpretation of the holy Scripture, without doubt of the Apocalypſe, which with us ſignifies the ſame thing as Revelation, and which we are very well aſſured is divine (130). This interpretation cannot agree with Guicciardin's text; for as we have ſeen above (131), that hiſtory affirms (132) that Savonarola had not grounded his ſermons upon the knowledge of Scripture, nor upon human reaſoning, but merely upon a celeſtial revelation; that nevertheleſs he confeſſed before his judges (133) his having foretold things to come, not by a divine revelation, but by a particular opinion into which he had been led by the ſtudy of the word of GOD. It is then evident that there is a contradiction between what he confeſſed to his Judges, and what he ſaid before: and it is not neceſſary to point out the illuſion of Du Pleſſis; every body may readily perceive it, and conclude from thence, that the force of prejudices is very apt to ſeduce people, and that it ſtrangely miſleads ſuch authors as have a mind to juſtify, at any rate, thoſe whoſe teſtimony ſeems uſeful to them. John Francis Picus aſſures us, that Savonarola believed he had at laſt received a meaſure of prophetic light, which delivered him from all thoſe uncertainties that remained with him while he joined his own reaſonings to the inſpiration of GOD (134). We ſhall ſee preſently whether the lie contained in the contradiction, which I have juſt mentioned, was worthy of puniſhment.

[M] There is ſome reaſon for doubting whether the title of martyr . . . . juſtly belongs to him.] We have ſeen (135), that Luther gave him this title. Reuſnerus (136), Heidegger (137), and ſome other Proteſtants, give it to him; but Rivet, who had read Coëffetau, was more reſerved, as has been ſeen in the foregoing remark. It is not very eaſy to conceive how the Proteſtants could place among the martyrs of JESUS CHRIST a man who had celebrated the maſs, and invoked the ſaints all his life, and who, in the article of death, had communicated, according to the ceremonies of Rome, with an act of faith touching the real Preſence, and with an act of adoration to the ſacrament, which he held between his hands. This, according to the principle of the Proteſtants, was to live and die in the boſom of idolatry, and conſequently out of the way of ſalvation. Now a reprobate and damned perſon cannot be a true martyr, although even he ſhould loſe his life for the ſake of orthodox opinions. Is it not certain that if Alexander VI had put a man to death, who preached up the greateſt part of the Proteſtant doctrines, but who at the ſame time was an Antitrinitarian, the miniſters would think that neither ſuch a perſon's ſufferings, nor his declamations againſt Rome, nor his zeal for the reformation of the Church did any honour to their party? Why? Becauſe dying in the guilt of an hereſy, which damns people, he could not be conſidered otherwiſe than as a ſon of Gehenna, and ſlave to the Devil. The very ſame thing muſt be ſaid of thoſe who die in a ſtate of idolatry.

Among ſo many authors who affirm that Savonarola ſuffered the puniſhment of fire for the zeal which had moved him to preach againſt the Pope, there is not, perhaps, one that has duly examined his trial. It is nevertheleſs highly neceſſary to read, with attention, all the acts of a martyrdom, before one pronounces that this or that perſon died the martyrs of JESUS CHRIST. For if the Judges, who condemn an orthodox man to death, declare in their ſentence that they do not puniſh him for the ſake of his opinions, but becauſe he had endeavoured to eſtabliſh them by ſeditious ways, he cannot be accounted a martyr, unleſs it be certain that he was falſly accuſed of ſedition. It is therefore requiſite to examine maturely, and without prejudice, all the parts of a trial, and if we find by this examination that the orthodox man was convicted of having ſpirited up the people to demoliſh the altars and plunder the churches, and of having even ſet his hand to the work, we ought to acknowledge that the ſentence, which condemns him to death for this cauſe, is not the condemnation of a martyr. A miniſter who ſhould return at this day (138) into France, and who ſhould be taken and hanged for preaching privately, would deſerve the title of a martyr, altho' even the Judges ſhould expreſsly affirm in their ſentence, that they condemned him becauſe he had acted againſt the edicts of the prince; but if they grounded their condemnation wholly upon this, that he had been convicted of acting as a ſpy, and of plotting inſurrections in favour of the enemies of the ſtate, there would be no more any room for pretending that he was a martyr. I ſuppoſe the proofs to be legal and ſuitable to the practice of criminal courts with reſpect to the depoſitions of witneſſes, or intercepted letters, or the accuſed party's own confeſſion, ſhould it even be extorted by the rack; for this laſt proof is a legal one in ſeveral countries, and it cannot be invalidated juridically under pretence that pain forces ſome people, of a delicate make, to accuſe themſelves of what they have not done. It would not be ſufficient to ſay at random, that the Judges had ſuborned falſe witneſſes, and forged letters: it would be neceſſary to bring good proofs for this, without reſting upon probabilities. All the world knows that the Jeſuits are reproached with having converted into martyrs ſome of their brethren who were puniſhed as ſtate-criminals. The compilers of Martyrologies ought to have the delicacy of Julius Cæſar, who deſired that his wife ſhould be not only virtuous, but alſo free from ſuſpicion (139). If Judges are to be arraigned in the caſe of martyrdom, things ſhould be brought to a moral demonſtration; for otherwiſe the innocence of the martyrs will be a perpetual ſubject of diſpute, a dubious virtue, and liable to ſuſpicion at leaſt.

I put this queſtion now to thoſe who ſay that Savonarola was burnt for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had incurred the diſpleaſure of the court of Rome, Have you read the acts of his trial? Did you find there that he was charged with no other crime but railing at the Pope, deſpiſing the excommunications of Rome, and preaching, that the Church wanted to be reformed? In that caſe I yield the point to you. But as you cannot have read them without finding that among ſeveral other ſhameful confeſſions which were drawn from him, he acknowledges that his predictions were only grounded upon the conſequences which he had deduced from Scripture it is impoſſible for you to juſtify yourſelves, your report is very unfaithful.

In effect, this acknowledgment of Savonarola convicted him of an impoſture that was full of prophanation and impiety, ſince he had ſaid, for ſome years, that his knowledge of things to come proceeded from an immediate and prophetical inſpiration. This, no doubt, was the principal reaſon which the Judges alledged for ſentencing him to be burnt. The manner in which Mr Du Pleſſis Mornai endeavours to reconcile theſe two things, is wrong; I have ſhewn the invalidity of it (140). Thoſe who would excuſe Savonarola by the goodneſs of his intentions, do not deſerve a hearing; for it is certain that Numa Pompilius, and ſome other antient legiſlators had the public intereſt in view, when they gave out that GOD dictated to them the ordinances which they eſtabliſhed. Is this pretext ſufficient to clear them from the infamous character of impoſtors? But granting that they might be excuſed, it would be impoſſible to excuſe Savonarola. A Chriſtian, a Monk, who profanes the name of GOD to ſuch a degree as to put off his particular opinions for immediate revelations, is infinitely more criminal than the Gentiles, who were wanting in their reſpect for the falſe gods of Paganiſm.

(129) Peliſſon, de la Tolerance des Religions, pag. 141, 142.

(130) Du Pleſſis, ubi ſupra, pag. 572.

(131) In the remark [H].

(132) Guicciardin, lib. ii, fol. m. 44, verſo.

(133) Id. ibid. fol. 100.

(134) Jo. Franc. Picus, ubi ſupra, pag. 112, 113.

(135) In the remark [L], citation (126).

(136) Reuſner. in Diario, p. 79, & in indice.

(137) Heidegg. in Hiſtor. Papatus, pag. 191, 192, & in indice.

(138) I write this in the year 1702.

(139) Τὴν Καίσαρος γυναῖκα καὶ δίαβολῆς δεῖ καθαρὰν εἶναι. Cæſaris uxorem etiam criminationis (and not criminis as Xylander has tranſlated) immunem, Plut. Apoph. p. 306, A. See him alſo in Vita Cæſaris, pag. 712, and Sueton. in Cæſ. cap. lxxiv.

(140) In the foregoing remark.

If

promiſed his canonization to the Dominicans, provided they would take part againſt Pope

If you anſwer, that this was not the true reaſon of Savonarola's puniſhment, it was only the pretence, I aſk you, is a man allowed, upon certain facts, to give his conjectures, and interpretations, which are charitable, with reſpect to the party accuſed, and malicious with reſpect to the Judges? And after all, this does not juſtify the perſons whoſe narratives he examines; for they ſay not a word concerning the motives which the Judges alledged. They decide the point without ſetting forth the tenor of the acts. Does not this ſhew a conduct full of temerity and paſſion?

This does not concern thoſe who acknowledge that the records of the trial charge ſeveral great crimes upon Savonarola, but who pretend that foul play was uſed in drawing up theſe records, and that there appeared falſified copies of them. Spizelius tells us, that the famous Mr Magliabechi communicated to him ſeveral remarks concerning this falſification. ‘Quid, quod inquiſitionis etiam ſeu examinis libellus & commentarius duplex fabricatus ſit; ſincerus unus, alter à Ceccone quodam Actuario falſatus & legitimo ſuppoſitus referente Timotheo Peruſino, cap. 49. Vit. Hieron. ‡. Qui de iniquiſſimâ & ſceleratiſſimâ proceſſus Savonaroliani adulteratione haud ita pridem pluribus etiam per litteras me edocuit & clariſſima fraudis impoſturæque (ab hoſtibus Hieronymi commiſſæ) indicia fecit Ampliſſimus & famigeratiſſimus Bibliothecarius Florentinus, D. ANTONIUS MAGLIABECIUS (141). - - - - What ſhall we ſay as to this, that there was a double account of the trial, or examination, drawn up; the one genuine, the other falſified, and put in the room of the true one, by a certain Notary, whoſe name was Cecco, as we learn from the narrative of Timothy Peruſinus. But the perſon who, not long ago, fully informed me, by his letters, of the moſt unjuſt and ſcandalous manner in which Savonarola's trial had been falſified, and gave me the cleareſt proofs of the fraud and impoſture committed by the enemies of that Dominican, was the famous Florentine Library-keeper, Mr ANTONY MAGLIABECHI.’ I will neither doubt of this, nor of the paſſion which may poſſibly have prevailed in the minds of the Judges: I ſhall only warn thoſe who ſo poſitively affirm, that the ſole cauſe of Savonarola's death was, his having railed at the Pope, that Guiciardin, who is rather his Apologiſt than his Hiſtorian, owns, that the party accuſed renounced the title of a Prophet. He was therefore convicted of impoſture in point of prophecy, by his own confeſſion: a moſt heinous and execrable crime upon which the Judges condemned him. ‘Graviſſimum crimen viſum, quod ſe à Deo futurorum moneri, cœleſtique juſſu ea populo enunciare mentitus, plebis ſtudia ac voluntates falsâ ſpecie religionis captâſſet, aut divinum ſe vatem ferens, impendiò mendacio hominibus impoſuiſſet. (142). - - - His greateſt crime ſeemed to be, that falſly pretending to be warned of things to come by GOD, and to be commiſſioned from Heaven to declare them to the people, he had gained upon the ſpirits and inclinations of the mob by a counterfeit ſhew of religion; or that feigning himſelf to be a divinely inſpired prophet, he had impoſed upon men by an extravagant lie.’ Can people boaſt of ſuch a martyr? The different courſes which his followers took to juſtify him in this point (143), ſhew too plainly that they did not doubt but the records of the trial were faithful, with reſpect to this confeſſion of Savonarola. It is to be carefully noted, that if his accuſers are ſuſpected of calumny, his apologiſts are ſuſpected either of being guided by infatuation, or by the intereſt of their order. Thoſe who have made it their buſineſs to juſtify him, were either his diſciples, or monks of his order. There is nothing that people will not do rather than own that they have been the dupes of an hypocrite; and when once they have ſuffered themſelves to be prepoſſeſſed with a notion that ſuch a devotee is a Prophet, they hardly ever give it up; they will ſooner exclaim againſt the Judges who condemn him, than acknowledge their own weakneſs. Neither the Franciſcans, Savonarola's adverſaries, nor the Dominicans, his brethren, ought to be conſulted here. We muſt have recourſe to the teſtimony of ſuch as have no ſhare in the quarrels of the two orders. Pierius Valerianus, and Juſtus Lipſius (144), who come under that claſs, are not at all favourable to our Dominican. One of them declares, without any ceremony, that he was burnt for the impoſture and impiety of which he was convicted. ‘Savonarola Divi Dominici ſacris initiatus non modo literatus, ſed magnæ apud literatos omnes auctoritatis, Chriſtianæ diſciplinæ concionator egregius, admirabilis omninò doctrinæ, niſi pravo eam ingenio contaminaſſet, poſtquam facundia fretus ſuâ Florentinum populum eò compulerat, ut ab Alexandro Pontifice Maximo, atque adeò ab Eccleſiæ Romanæ inſtitutis diſſentiret, majoremque ſibi adrogaret auctoritatem, quam ab ipſo rerum opifice per manus traditam adſecutus eſſet Petri ſucceſſor Rom. Pontifex; de doctrina ſua, deque Dei familiaritate, quæ ſe ad colloquium uſque dignatum palam profitebatur, fidem æquo pertinacius tueri perſeverat, mendacitatis & impoſturæ demum convictus, impietatiſque damnatus, in urbis, quam deceperat, medio cum aſſeclis aliquot concrematus eſt (145). - - Savonarola the Dominican was not only learned himſelf, but likewiſe a man of great authority among the learned, and an excellent preacher of Chriſtian diſcipline. His doctrine was thoroughly admirable, if he had not corrupted it by an evil diſpoſition. By his eloquence he induced the people of Florence to diſſent from Pope Alexander, and conſequently from the inſtitutions of the Romiſh church. He took upon him a greater authority than the Pope of Rome, as St Peter's ſucceſſor, had received, handed down to him from GOD himſelf. He perſiſted with an unreaſonable obſtinacy in defending his doctrine, and boaſting of his familiarity with GOD, which he publickly declared had gone ſo far as to be admitted to converſe with him. At laſt, being convicted as a liar and impoſtor, and condemned for his impiety, he was burnt, with ſome of his under-agents, in the middle of that city which he had deceived.’ The judgment which Gratianus paſſes upon him is much of the ſame nature (146).

I cannot tell whether the Judges knew of the letters which Savonarola wrote to Charles VIII, exhorting him to return into Italy, and to reform the Church by the ſword (147). They would have found there a juſt cauſe to condemn him for treaſon, for it is an act of rebellion to call in foreign armies: the heads of a faction cannot lawfully uſe ſuch means to render it the uppermoſt in their country. On the other hand, it was a ſtrange, if not a mad, project, to think of making the ſword of a king of France the inſtrument of reforming the Church. Did he want him to employ dragooning? Or was it only his deſire, that he ſhould oblige the court of Rome, by the terror of his arms, to call a council? But what freedom could there be in an aſſembly held by the will of a conqueror? Would people dare to give their opinions otherwiſe than he ſhould think fit.

To ſay ſomething of Savonarola's ſentiments with reſpect to excommunication, I ſhall obſerve that the Proteſtants are miſtaken, perhaps when they conceive him to be orthodox upon this point. Take notice, I pray, that on his being excommunicated by Alexander VI, he left off going into the pulpit for ſome time; but when he perceived that ſilence diminiſhed his credit, and put a ſtop to his deſigns, he began to preach again, and continued to do it till the magiſtrates forbad him (148). This unequal conduct is neither worthy of a Prophet, nor of a new Apoſtle; the ſame reaſon which hindered him from ſubmitting to the Pope's orders, ſhould have hindered him from ſubmitting to the orders of the magiſtrates; for if the intereſts of the great work, to which he fancied himſelf commiſſioned in an extraordinary manner, required that notwithſtanding the Pope's orders, he ſhould exerciſe the function of a preacher, ſince it is better to obey GOD than men (149), they likewiſe required him to exerciſe it notwithſtanding the prohibition of the ſecular arm. There is ſome probability that he would have alledged the ſame reaſons againſt a council which he did againſt Alexander VI, in caſe the council ſhould have treated him in the ſame manner that the Pope had done. He would have believed then that there was no tribunal upon earth which could put him to ſilence; and who knows if he did not fancy that as a prophet he ought to hold immediately of GOD, and enjoy the privilege of a ſpecial commiſſion to bring all his cauſes directly before the court of Heaven?

---

‡ Narrat. ibid. Peruſinus, verum & ſincerum Proceſſum Hieronymi, ab eodem Ceccone nequam, Lucretiæ de Medicis, Leonis Papæ X ſorori, Jacobi Salviati conjugi fuiſſe poſtea conceſſum, cujus & ipsâ lectione commota mitior exinde & æquior in Hieronymum fuerit. - - - Peruſinus relates in the ſame place, that the true and genuine tryal of Savonarola was afterwards communicated by the ſaid villain Cecco to Lucretia de Medicis, ſiſter to Pope Leo X. and wife to James Salviati, and that the reading of it made ſuch an impreſſion upon her as to give her a more favourable opinion of Savonarola from that time.

(141) Spizelius, ubi ſupra, pag. 662.

(142) Gratianus, de Caſibus, Viror. illuſtr. pag. 140.

(143) See the remark [K].

(144) Lipſius, Monit. & Exempl. Politic. lib. i, cap. iii, pag m. 139, 140.

(145) Pierius Valerianus, de Literat. Infelicitate, lib. ii, p. m. 78, 79.

(146) Gratianus, ubi ſupra, p. 141.

(147) See in the remark [D] the words of Philip de Comines.

(148) Taken from Guicciardin. lib. iii: I have quoted his words in the rem. [G].

(149) Cui Mandato (Papæ) non obedivit aſſerens Deo obedire oportere magis quam hominibus. Burchardus in Diario, pag. 46.

Pope Julius II, but that they refuſed to buy it at that price (n). He wrote many books wherein we find a great deal of unction and piety [N]. I ſay ſomething of a letter which he wrote to the Pope, wherein he examines, among other things laid to his charge, Heaven? The diſcipline of the Proteſtants does not allow of ſuch notions: it eſtabliſhes tribunals which forbid preaching, ſuſpend, and excommunicate; it requires that their authority ſhould be ſubmitted to, and treats as ſchiſmatical and contumacious perſons, thoſe who ſhake off this yoke, under the pretence that they have been unlawfully condemned (150).

But what ſhall we ſay of the ſubmiſſion which Savonarola promiſed in his letter to the Pope, dated the twenty-ninth of September, 1497. He clears himſelf as well as he can from every thing that had been ſaid of him to the Pope; he alledges ſtrong reaſons why he had not taken a journey to Rome when the Pope ſent for him. He treats as ſlanderers thoſe who termed it diſobedience: he declares that he is ready to retract any thing ſaid or written by him, which his Holineſs ſhall judge worthy of cenſure. He concludes by ſubmitting his perſon, his writings, and his words, to the authority of the Church, and to that of the Pope. Dignetur Sanctitas veſtra mihi ſignificare quid ex omnibus quæ ſcripſi vel dixi ſit revocandum, & ego id libentiſſime faciam; nam & hac vice & ſemper, ſicut ſæpius dixi, ac etiam ſcpripſi, meipſum & omnia mea dicta & ſcripta ſubjicio correctioni S. R. E. &. S. V. cui ſemper meipſum & fratres meos ejuſdem pedibus proſtratus plurimum commendo (151). If he had pretended that as a Prophet, he was exempted from all Eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; and if he had been ſuch a man as the Proteſtants extolled, what I have juſt now quoted would be the language of a great hypocrite.

A PROOF of Savonarola's Fanaticiſme.

Let us obſerve, that if this Dominican was not an impoſtor, he muſt neceſſarily have been a prodigious Fanatic. I prove it thus: He foretold, among other things, the approaching converſion of the Mahometans, and ſhewed himſelf to be ſo fully perſuaded of the certainty of this prophecy, that he declared, that whoever ſhould enter into the fire for the ſupport of it, would come off without receiving any damage (152). If he ſpoke ſincerely, his perſuaſion was as ſtrong as it could poſſibly be. Now ſince the falſity of the prediction makes it plainly appear that he was not inſpired, we ought to conclude that his Fanaticiſm was come to the higheſt pitch. Every body, I think, muſt know that the virtue of a Fanatic, his zeal, his mortifications, are not words of a double meaning. It is generally a virtue proceeding from vapours, an irregularity of the organs, a diſorder in ſome fibres of the brain. I am willing to believe that thoſe who have ſo much cried up the martyrdom of Savonarola had never read the facts which I have mentioned in this remark, nor made the reflexions which naturally ariſe from them. I muſt do this juſtice to Voëtius, that altho' he has diſputed the ground by inches in favour of that Dominican, he does not fail to acknowledge that he had ſomewhat of a vertigo. He does not make him a true Prophet of the New Law, as others have done (153). 'Ego, ut viri illius ſanctitas & zelus communiter deſcribitur & in ſcriptis ejus, præſertim practicis elucet, partim politicis conjecturis, (ut erat perſpicaciſſimus politicus), partim ferventiſſimo ſtudio & forti imaginationi talium rerum, quas prædicebat, & inde ortæ phantaſticæ infirmitati ac vertigini prædictiones illas tribuerem (154). - - - As the zeal and holy life of that man are generally deſcribed, and as they ſhine forth in his writings, eſpecially in his practical ones, I am tempted to impute his predictions, partly to his political conjectures, (for he was a moſt diſcerning Politician) partly to his fervent ſtudy and ſtrong imagination of ſuch things as he foretold, and to a fantaſtical infirmity and vertigo proceeding from thence.' When he ſays that the Proteſtants contented themſelves with alledging this man to their adverſaries as a domeſtic evidence, and for an argument ad hominem, he ſhews what they all ſhould have done, but not what they all did. 'Nec obſcurè perſtringit noſtros (Naudæus) qui propter communionem ſcil. hæreſios virum illum laudaverint. Sed duo illi repono: quorum primum eſt in illo quinque admiranda prædicari, eruditionem; eloquentiam; ſanctitatem & zelum; ſtudium orthodoxiæ & reformationis eccleſiæ: prophetias & hinc tantam ejus æſtimationem apud optimum quemque in orbe Papali: nil ergo mirum, ſi noſtri ad hominem (uti ajunt) hunc domeſticum teſtem adverſariis ſuis oppoſuerint; quidquid ipſi de eo ſenſerint. Alterum eſt, &c. (155). - - - - Neither does he (Naudé) obſcurely glance at the Proteſtants, as if they had praiſed this man on account of his being a joint partaker with them in Hereſy. But I ſay two things in anſwer to him; firſt, that five admirable qualities were aſcribed to him, learning, eloquence, ſanctity and zeal, a concern for orthodoxy and the reformation of the Church, and the gift of prophecy, for which he was ſo much eſteemed by the beſt of the Roman Catholics; ſo that it was no wonder if the Proteſtants in an argument ad hominem (as the phraſe is) oppoſed this domeſtic evidence to their adverſaries, whatever their own private opinion of him was. The other is, &c.' It is certain that Savonarola not only knew the corruption of the Church, but alſo ſhewed a great deſire to correct it. If he had only known it, he had been in the ſame caſe with other people; for even the moſt licentious prieſts knew very well, that a clergyman guilty of concubinage, ſimony, &c. was in a diſorderly way; but they did not wiſh for a reformation of abuſes. There are few people at this day in Rome itſelf who do not think that the intrigues made uſe of for the election of the Popes are an evil; and how many good Papiſts are there who wiſh to ſee a ſtop put to this diſorder, and to ſeveral others? What was particular in Savonarola, was therefore his daring to ſay, that it was neceſſary to baniſh the corruption: and upon that footing, the Proteſtants might place him in general among the witneſſes of truth. I do not believe that the compilers of theſe witneſſes have always acted with a ſuitable diſcernment. This by the by. If Ferrante Palavicino, who was hanged for his books againſt the Pope; if the authors of the Syndicat of Alexander VII, and the Hiſtorian of Dona Olympia, had lived in the XIIIth or XIVth century, Flacius Illyricus might have put them in his catalogue; nevertheleſs there are no perſons leſs worthy of that place than ſuch authors.

Note, That there are Proteſtants who maintain that Savonarola was an impoſtor. Read the theſis Artes tyrannicas Hieronymi Savonarolæ repræſentans, - - - Repreſenting the tyrannical arts of Jerom Savonarola, which was defended at Iëna in the year 1690, under the preſidency of Mr Buddeus.

[N] He wrote a great many books, wherein we find a good deal of unction and piety.] This is Mr Du Pin's judgment upon them: He has compoſed (ſays he) a (156) prodigious number of books, moral, ſpiritual, and practical: they abound in the unction and maxims of piety: he there freely cenſures vice, and teaches the pureſt and the moſt ſublime morality (157). Mr Du Pin has given us the catalogue of this Fryar's works, we find it alſo in the Appendix to Dr Cave, with a great many particulars concerning the different editions (158). Some of them were put in the Index Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum, and there aroſe a great diſpute under Pope Paul IV, whether or not they ſhould all be treated in the ſame manner; but by the extraordinary vigilance of the Dominicans it was carried in the negative, and it was reſolved to ſtand to what had already been decreed againſt ſome of them, and that even theſe ſhould not be branded as heretical or erroneous: the penalty of ſuſpenſion was thought ſufficient (159). Of all the many books written by Savonarola, none has been more univerſally approved of than that which is intituled, Triumphus Crucis, ſeu de Fidei Chriſtianæ veritate, - - - The Triumph of the Croſs, or of the Truth of Chriſtianity. Cardinal Onophrius (160), who died at Rome in the year 1646, ordered by a codicil annexed to his laſt will, that they ſhould cauſe it to be reprinted in good characters . . . . with the Paraphraſe of the ſame author upon the Miſerere, and left five hundred crowns for that purpoſe (161). Let us obſerve that Savonarola's book againſt Judicial Aſtrology, was printed in Italian, at Florence, in the year 1495, and that it was tranſlated into Latin, and illuſtrated with notes, by Thomas Boninſignius. This tranſlation was printed at Florence in the year 1581, in 8vo (162). The ſame book was tranſlated into High Dutch, by Thomas Eraſtus (163). It is ſaid that Savonarola encouraged John Picus to write againſt Judicial Aſtrology (164). The reaſon that is given for his hatred to

(n) Baron Apologet. Ordinis Prædicat. Tom. ii, pag. 91.

(150) Witneſs what paſſed in Holland in the year 1667, againſt the miniſter Labadie, who among other books cauſed one to be printed with this title, Traitté de ſaiſon eccleſiaſtique & theologique tout enſemble, des Cenſures reeles Eccleſiaſtiques, Suſpenſions, Interdictions ou Excommunications, &c.

(151) Savonar. Epiſt. ad Alexandrum VI, in the Preuves ſur l'Hiſtoire de Comines, p. 346.

(152) See the remark [G].

(153) Gurtlerus, (for example) profeſſor of Divinity at Deventer. He proves it by the paſſage of Philip de Comines, which he quotes according to the bad tranſlation of Sleidan. See his Syſtema Theologiæ Propheticæ, cap. xxiv, pag. 430, 431, Edit. Amſt. 1702.

(154) Voëtius, ubi ſupra, Part ii, pag. 1070.

(155) Id. ibid. pag. 1069.

(156) Du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. xii, pag. 115, Dutch Edition.

(157) Ib. p. 116.

(158) Wharton, Appendix ad Hiſtor. Literariam Gul. Cave, pag. 164, & ſeq.

(159) See Wharton, ibid. p. 163.

(160) He was brother to Urban VIII, and had been a Capuchin Friar. Pierre de S. Romuald, Journal Chronol. Tom. ii, pag. m. 289.

(161) Ibid. See alſo the Preuves ſur Philippe de Comines, pag. m. 346.

(162) Wharton, ubi ſupra, pag. 164.

(163) Verheiden, in Iconib. p. 15.

(164) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom. ii, pag. 6.

charge, the accuſation of his boaſting that he converſed with God [O]. He had great conflicts with the devils, and rendered himſelf formidable to theſe princes of darkneſs [P]. I muſt not forget that one of the things which ſerved to make him odious was his affection for the King of France (o). There is room to believe that he was attached to that prince, becauſe having preſumed to propheſy that great revolutions would happen, and turning his eyes on all ſides to ſeek out the Cyrus deſtined by God to fullfil that great work (p), he found none ſo fit for that purpoſe as Charles VIII. From that moment he declared him to be the choſen Cyrus of God, and dedicated all his ſervices to him. It is the common practice of theſe falſe prophets, and we have examples of it to Aſtrologers appears to me very chimerical: however, I ſhall recite it, it will ſerve to ſhew the credulity of Florimond de Remond. ‘ The exceſſive vanity of ‘ Savanarola, who pretended to be a prophet, was pre- ‘ ſently found out by the very Aſtrologers; for as there ‘ was a conjunction of Venus and Saturn, and the ‘ Moon was in the meridian of her hemiſphere, on ‘ the twenty-firſt of September, 1452, at forty-four ‘ minutes paſt five in the afternoon, they immediately ‘ ſaw the pride and arrogance of that Monk. For ‘ this reaſon was he ſuch a bitter enemy to Aſtrology, ‘ having armed Picus Mirandolanus againſt it (165).’

[O] I ſay ſomething of a letter . . . wherein, among other accuſations, he examines that, of his boaſting that he converſed with GOD.] There is no doubt but that he was ſaid to enjoy that excellent prerogative; but this is no proof that he himſelf had acknowledged it expreſsly. Thoſe who are fond of a devotee, aſcribe many more things to him than he himſelf pretends to. They preſently go beyond bounds, by amplifying. If he confeſſes that God has been graciouſly pleaſed to reveal ſome event to him, and that he partakes of immediate illumination, they officiouſly decide the manner of it, and affirm, at laſt, that God converſes with him as he did with Moſes. Be it as it will, the prevailing opinion was, that he himſelf pretended to talk with God. Here is a great witneſs for this opinion. The people of Florence are not fooliſh, whom, nevertheleſs, Friar Savonarola perſuaded that he converſed with GOD. It is thus that Gabriel Naudé (166) cites the teſtimony of Machiavel. I ſhall give it more at large, to the end that the tenderneſs of the author, and the occaſion of his diſcourſe may be ſeen. He had juſt ſaid that, tho' it be more eaſy to perſuade ignorant people into a new thing, it is not impoſſible to do the ſame by people of ſenſe. After that, he quotes the example of Friar Jerom. ‘ Al popolo di ‘ Firenze non pare eſſere ne ignorante ne rozzo, non- ‘ dimeno da Fratre Girolamo Savonarola fu perſuaſo ‘ che parlava con Dio. Io non voglio giudicare s'egli ‘ era vero ò nò, perche d'un tanto huomo ſe ne deb- ‘ be parlare con riverenza. Ma io dico bene che in- ‘ finiti lo credevano, ſenza havere viſto coſa neſſuna ‘ ſtraordinaria, da farlo loro credere; perche la vita ‘ ſua, la dottrina, il ſoggetto che preſe, erano ſuf- ‘ ficienti à fargli preſtare fede (167). - - - - The people ‘ of Florence neither ſeem to be ignorant nor fooliſh, ‘ and nevertheleſs they ſuffered themſelves to be perſuaded ‘ by Friar Jerom Savonarola that he converſed with ‘ GOD. I will not pretend to judge whether this was ‘ true or falſe, becauſe one ought to ſpeak with reverence ‘ of ſo great a man: but this I may ſay, that vaſt num- ‘ bers of people believed it, without having ſeen any ‘ thing extraordinary to make them do ſo; becauſe his ‘ life, his doctrine, and the ſubject that he pitched upon ‘ were ſufficient to gain credit to him.’ We have ſeen above (168) the teſtimony of Pierius Valerianus. I could cite a great many others, but where is the neceſſity of compiling? Do we need any other proofs but the letter which Savonarola wrote to Pope Alexander VI, to vindicate himſelf from the accuſations contained in a brief of the ſaid Pope? The fourth of theſe accuſations is, that he was ſaid to converſe with God (169). He anſwers, that he never ſpoke ſo in expreſs words, but that, ſuppoſing he had even made uſe of that expreſſion, he ſhould not deſerve to be puniſhed, ſince there is no law for puniſhing thoſe who ſay that they converſe with God. He adds, that ſuch a law would be abſurd and impious, ſince no man can impoſe a law upon God, who may converſe with whom he pleaſes. Quarto dicitur & cum deo loqui: hoc etiam nunquam expreſsè dixi, nec unquam utor tali modo loquendi, ut teſtis eſt univerſus populus Florentinus: quod etiam ſi dixiſſem nullam propter hoc incurrerem pœnam; non enim invenitur in aliquo loco ſcriptum, nec in toto corpore Juris Canonici nec Civilis nec in aliquo authentico libro, quod qui dixit ſe cum Deo loqui puniatur: ſtultum etiam eſſet & impium facere talem legem, cum nullus poſſit imponere legem Deo; poteſt enim ipſe loqui cum quibus vult, & eis præcipere ut dicant, Hoc dixit Dominus meus, ſicut Prophetæ faciebant (170).

His anſwers to the greateſt part of the other accuſations go almoſt upon the ſame foundation. He denies (171), for example, that he had boaſted of being a prophet; but he maintains, that if he had done ſo, he ſhould not be liable to puniſhment. He does not acknowledge (172) that he ſaid abſolutely, and with a deſign to make himſelf equal to God, If am a liar, Jesus Christ is ſo. He confines himſelf to certain particular caſes, wherein he pretends that he might lawfully uſe that expreſſion. He has recourſe to a diſtinction of the like nature, when he tries to juſtify himſelf for having ſaid (173), that ſuch as did not give credit to his predictions were out of the way of ſalvation. I only meant that, ſays he, of ſuch people as oppoſed me through a ſpirit of obſtinacy. He was no bad proficient in the art of Sophiſtry, that art which is ſo neceſſary to thoſe who deal in predictions (174).

[P] He had great conflicts with the devils, and rendered himſelf formidable to theſe princes of darkneſs.] Naudé puts him ‘ in the rank . . . . of thoſe Monks ‘ of whom St Jerom ſays, qui dæmonum contra ſe ‘ pugnantium portenta fingunt, ut apud imperitos & ‘ vulgi homines miraculum ſui faciant, - - - who in- ‘ vent ſtrange ſtories of their fighting with devils, in ‘ order to excite the admiration of vulgar and ignorant ‘ people, ſince the half of the book, which he wrote ‘ upon his prophecies, contains nothing elſe but the ‘ conference he had with the devil whom he miſtook ‘ for a hermit (175).’ John Francis Picus affirms, that the devils which tormented the bodies of poſſeſſed people, or haunted the convent of the Dominicans, very much dreaded the ſight of Savonarola, and that out of pure ſpite and rage they always pronounced his name, with ſome alteration or abridgment of the letters. They threatned him often, and fled as faſt as they could, being awed by the words which he pronounced againſt them. He drove them from the cells of the monaſtery, among other means, by the ſprinkling of holy water, accompanied with the ſinging of Pſalms. For this reaſon they deſiſted from tormenting the other Monks, and redoubled their efforts againſt him alone. He was ſometimes obliged to ſtop ſhort, while he was walking the rounds in the convent, with a deſign to protect the Friars from their inſults; for they had thickned the air to ſuch a degree, that he could not go any further. I ſhall quote my author words; they are more emphatical than the idea which I give of them. Dæmones qui vel obſeſſa corpora vexabant, vel ad hominum terriculamenta per ædes ſancti Marci ſtrepebant, mirum in modum ab aſpectu Hieronymi formidabant, nec unquam ejus ſincere nomen præ rabie exprimebant, ſed aut literas invertentes, aut nomen decurtantes aut in aliud ludicrum transformabant (176). . . . . Minabantur illi perſæpe, ſed illicò evaneſcebant, ſanctiſſima quæ in eos effunderet verba ſubveriti. Eo tempore quo Ethruriæ ſodales fratres à Ciſalpinis ſecreverat, dæmonum numeroſa cohors, bono quod inde ſequi conjectabatur infeſta, cæptum præpedire opus molita eſt: proinde & cænobii habitatores univerſos moleſtiis impetere, & terroribus quatere, quorum inſultibus, tum orationibus, tum adjurationibus continuis Hieronymus obſiſtebat, & noctu etiam ſanctæ aquæ aſperſione per Monaſterium pſallens eos à cellis & edibus abigebat. Sed poſtquam juvari Diſcipulos Hieronymi precibus magis quam lædi ſuis infeſtationibus ac umbratilibus bellis animadvertêre dæmones, ceſſandum ſibi duxerunt: plus tamen in Hieronymum conaminum, quo poterant impetu molientes, cui & noctis intempeſtæ ſilentio conſuetum dum iter arriperet, (o) See in the remark [K], the words of Arnoldus Ferronus.

(p) See Nauclerus, Gener. L. Part. ii, pag. m. 989.

(165) Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, livr. i, chap. v, num. 4, pag. m. 30.

(166) Naudé, ubi ſupra, ch. iii, pag. m. 52.

(167) Machiav. Diſcorſi ſopra Tito Livio, lib. i, cap. xi, p. m. 32.

(168) In the remark [M], citat. 146.

(169) Quarto dicitur & cum deo loqui. Savon. Epiſt. ad Alexandrum VI: It is in the Preuves ſur les Memoires de Phil. de Comines, p. m. 337, & ſeq. Burchard, in his Diarium, pag. m. 46, ſays In prædicationibus ſuis publicè dicebat Salvatorem noſtrum ſæpe ſibi loqui. - - - He ſaid publickly in his ſermons that our Saviour often converſed with him.

(170) Savonar. ibidem.

(171) Ibid. pag. 340.

(172) Ibid. pag. 339.

(173) Ibid.

(174) See the remark [K] of the article DEJOTARUS.

(175) Naudé, ubi ſupra, p. 451.

(176) Jo. Franc. Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ, pag. 123.

it which are of a fresher date still than that of Drabicius. I do not know whether Savonarola had not attended to a maxim which Machiavel has published since, quoting him for an example of it [Q]. This maxim is, that Prophets who are not supported by the secular arm, nor by any other weapons besides their own tongue and the prepossession of the people, sola Majeſtate armati, armed with nothing else but majeſty, are exposed to terrible changes of fortune. I ſhall make a remark upon the different ways of writing his name [R].

& cellas omnes pſalmis & aquæ ſacræ guttis ſeu propugnaculis armaret, ſic denſarunt aërem (mihi poſtea ſicut ipſe retulit) ulterius ut ſibi facultas omnino per cænobium incedendi præcluſa videretur; hiſque ſunt illi verbis interminati. Quot tibi malorum acervas & quæris; Nos in te namque tot & tanta concitabimus, ut ſuſtinere non valeas. Ad quæ lætus ille reſpondit, quæcumque vellent pararent & exererent, horum nihil ſe formidare, quià adjutorium ejus in nomine Domini qui fecit cœlum & terram (177). This paſſage is in the chapter where the author relates the extaſies of Savonarola, and that the Holy Ghoſt appeared in the ſhape of a dove, and put his bill to that Friar's ear. ‘ Silveſter ejus vitæ comes & Martyrii conſors, roganti mihi de Hieronymi ſanctitate, atque obſecranti ut occulti quippiam in rerum ejus confirmationem (ſciebam enim eum multorum ſecretorum conſcium) affirmavit, columbæ ſpeciem, quæ ſancti Spiritus præſentiam gratiamque indicaret, ſemel atque iterum ſe vidiſſe Hieronymi humero inſidentem, argenteis aureiſque coruſcantem pennis redimitam, & roſtro in aurem ipſius porrecto inſuſurrantem (178). - - - Sylveſter, who was companion to Savonarola in his life, and partaker with him in his martyrdom, when I aſked him concerning Savonarola's ſanctity, and begged that he would give me ſome ſecret proof of it, (for I knew that Sylveſter was well acquainted with many ſecret particulars of Savonarola's life) aſſured me, that he had ſeen oftener than once the appearance of a dove, which intimated the preſence and grace of the Holy Ghoſt, perch upon Savonarola's ſhoulder, and glittering with gold and ſilver feathers, whiſpering him with it's bill in his ear.’

(177) Id. ibid. pag. 124.

(178) Id. ibid. pag. 123.

REFLEXIONS upon a paſſage of Mr Claude, concerning Luther.

In reading this remark, perhaps, ſome people will call to mind a certain circumſtance in the diſputes which Mr. Claude had with the gentlemen of Port Royal, and will poſſibly imagine that theſe gentlemen did a raſh thing, when they challenged him to prove, that in Luther's time the Monks talked loudly of their exploits againſt the devils. This makes me ſay, that Savonarola's example would have been of no ſervice to Mr Claude. Every body knows that the controverſy-writers of the church of Rome object, as a very ſtrong argument, the diſpute which Luther relates to have paſſed between him and the devil concerning the maſs. Mr Claude, when he comes to anſwer this objection, ſays, among other things, that Luther, following the ſtile of the Monks of that time, who uſed by a kind of rhetorical figure to ſtuff books with their exploits againſt the devil, relates that once upon his waking in the night, the devil accuſed him that he had cauſed the people of GOD to commit idolatry, and had committed idolatry himſelf during the ſpace of fifteen years that he had ſaid private maſſes (179).

(179) Claude Défenſe de la Réformation, pag. 136.

The reply that was made to this paſſage is reduced to three queſtions, the laſt of which I leave out: for it is ſufficient to mention here the firſt and ſecond. ‘ The firſt is, whether a ſenſible perſon can believe that Luther's ſtory is a rhetorical figure. The ſecond, whether this figure be an uſual thing with the Monks (180).

(180) Addition aux Préjugez Legitimes contre les Calviniſtes, p. 364: the Bruſſels edition 1683.

What was ſaid upon the firſt queſtion would be ſuperfluous here; I ſhall only ſpeak of the explication of the ſecond.

‘ The ſecond queſtion † may be decided with as little difficulty; for it conſiſts in a fact which it concerns Mr Claude to prove, and he deſerves to be looked upon as a ſlanderous perſon, unleſs he can juſtify the ſame by examples. He ſays, that the Monks of that time uſed, by a kind of rhetorical figure, to ſtuff books with their exploits againſt the devil. We confeſs that we know no examples of ſuch figures. There are Monks who relate apparitions of devils, but then they relate them as true, and with an intention to make them paſs for ſuch. If theſe apparitions are well-grounded, they were in the right to relate them, and the holy fathers have done ſo before them. If they have believed them upon too ſlight a foundation, their credulity is to be cenſured. If they have related them without believing what they told, they deſerve the character of knaves and impoſtors. But Mr Claude cannot prove that any one has related ſtories like that which Luther tells, and with circumſtances as particular as thoſe inſerted by him, at the ſame time that he only wanted to make them paſs for rhetorical figures. We therefore ſtill expect that Mr Claude ſhould explain himſelf upon this point, and unleſs he do ſo, he cannot eſcape being condemned by wiſe people, as guilty of a diſhonourable malignity (181).

† This ſecond queſtion is, whether the Monks in Luther's time uſed to ſtuff books with their exploits againſt the Devil by rhetorical figures like the ſtory which Luther tells of his conference with the Devil, which ſtory Mr Claude would gladly put off for a rhetorical figure.

(181) Ibid. pag. 372, 373.

It is manifeſt that Savonarola's exploits againſt the devils cannot be alledged as a proof of what Mr Claude had advanced; for they are not at all things that were related by a kind of rhetorical figure.

[Q] A maxim that Machiavel has publiſhed ſince, quoting him for an example of it.] I ſhall cite him according to the French tranſlation of Mr Amelot, and with his notes. ‘ To (182) underſtand this point well, it is neceſſary to ſee whether theſe Legiſlators ſtand by themſelves, or depend upon others, that is to ſay, whether, in order to carry on their enterprize, they are obliged to make uſe of prayers and entreaties, and in that caſe they are always unſucceſsful: or if they are able to force an obedience, and then they hardly ever fail to ſucceed. From thence it comes that all the princes, whom I have named, with arms prevailed, and without them were undone. For, beſides the reaſons mentioned, there is a fickleneſs in the nature of people. It is eaſy to perſuade them of a thing, but difficult to keep them up in that perſuaſion. Things ſhould therefore be ſo well ordered, that when they no longer believe, they may be compelled to believe by force. Moſes ‡, Cyrus, Theſeus, and Romulus, could never have got their laws to be obſerved long, if they had been unarmed, as it happened in our days to the Dominican Jerom Savonarola, who was ruined for want of having the means in his hands of obliging thoſe who had once believed his words to perſiſt in their faith, and of compelling the incredulous to believe them ‡.

(182) Machiavel, in his treatiſe, Del Principe, chap. vi.

‡ Whoever reads the Bible with a ſound judgment, ſays Machiavel, (in the 30th chapter of the third book of his Diſcourſes) will ſee that Moſes, to render his laws inviolable, was obliged to put to death an infinite number of people, who oppoſed his deſigns out of envy. Moſes having called the Iſraelites together, ſaid unto them: Thus ſaith the Lord God of Iſrael, put every man his ſword by his ſide, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and ſlay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour. And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moſes: and there fell of the people that day about three thouſand men. (Exod. xxxii. 27, 28.)

‡ Machiavel ſays, he had perſuaded the people of Florence, that he converſed with God (Diſc. lib. i, cap. xi.) Nardi ſays that thoſe of Savonarola's party were called at Florence, Piagnoni, that is to ſay, the Weepers or Hypocrites: and his enemies, Arrabiati, that is to ſay, the mad or undiſciplinable (Hiſtor. Flor. lib. ii.)

[R] I ſhall make a remark upon the different ways of writing his name.] The true name is Savonarola; but the French have been allowed to change the termination a little by ſaying Savonarole. They ſhould be ſatisfied with this alteration, and not ſay Savanarole, as they almoſt all do. Some have carried their liberty a great deal further; Du Verdier Vauprivas (183) writes Savoranole: Prateolus (184) Sevanarola: Du Pleſſis Mornai (185), and James Gohori (186), Savonaroola: Florimond de Remond (187) Savonarolle: a diſciple of Mr Buddeus (188) Savanorola.

This confirms what I have ſaid in other places (189).

(183) In his Proſopographie, Tom. iii, p. 2330. (184) In Vol. II, of his Hiſtoire de l'Egliſe, fol. 304. (185) Myſtere d'Iniquité, the Saumur edition in folio, and the Geneva edition in 8vo. (186) In the tranſlation of Machiavel upon Titus Livius, lib. i, ch. xi. (187) Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, livr. ii, ch. i, p. m. 121. (188) In a theſis maintained at Iëna, in the year 1690. (189) In the remark [B] of the article EPHORUS. See likewiſe the article MONTMAUR, at the beginning of the text, in the margin.

SAWICKI (GASPAR) a Jeſuit, was born at Vilna in Lithuania in 1542. He entered into the ſociety of Jeſuits at Rome in 1566, and after having ſtudied Divinity, he returned into Poland and taught controverſy at Vilna. He was for nine years Prefect of the novices at Cracow, and ſuperior of the profeſſed houſe five years in the ſame city. He had in other places no leſs honourable employments. He was alſo a preacher. He followed the ambaſſadors of the King of Poland into Muſcovy, and was a great aſſiſtance to them during the three years of a cloſe impriſonment he ſpent with them. Notwithſtanding his great age, and his ſickneſs, he was obliged to accept the office of procurator of the Jeſuits at Rome, and acquitted himſelf very well in it: but as he was returning into Poland, he died in a poſt-chariot near Francfort upon the Oder, the nineteenth of January 1620. He compoſed many books, wherein, inſtead of his own name, he took a ſuppoſititious one (a) [A]. I do not believe now that it is he, who treated Eraſmus ill, in a book publiſhed under the name of Gaſpar Cichocius [B].

[A] He compoſed many books, wherein, inſtead of his own name, he took a ſuppoſititious one.] That which he intituled, Anatomia conſilii editi de ſtabilienda pace Regni Poloniæ, Jeſuitis pulſis, was publiſhed in 1611, under the name of Gaſpar Cichocki. He publiſhed in the Poliſh tongue a dialogue, Curſoris & Nautæ in quo de violentia Gedanenſium Monialium S. Brigittæ per Hereticos facta proſcriptione narratio inſtituitur; and he took the name of Lunowſki. He compoſed under that of John Golubſki, Replica rumorum Poſnanienſium ab hæretico Miniſtro per Pruſſiam ſparſorum. Triplica contra duplicam Miniſtri Torunienſis. Mirabilis concordia, ſeu potius veriſſima rabies Evangelicorum inter ſe, contra Joannem Tiviecki Hæreticum (1).

[B] That he treated Eraſmus ill.] Father Theophilus Raynaud having mentioned ſome things very diſadvantageous to Eraſmus, refers his reader to Gaſpar Chicocius: Videndus qui varias ejus impietates & adverſus eum judicia ſapientum addenſat Gaſpar Chicocius, lib. 1. Alloquiorum cap. 19. & 20 (2.) Guy Patin, who knew books well, and had a good library, was ſhort in the matter: it is probable he thought he could hear no news of that book at Paris, ſince he conſulted the oracle at Lyons, I mean the author himſelf, who had cited Chicocius. Give me leave, ſays he to his friend of Lyons, to be a little importunate with you: When you ſee Father Theophilus, try to know of him who Gaſpar Chicocius is, lib. 1. Alloquiorum, who writ againſt Eraſmus, and where that book was printed (3). He gives us no account of any anſwer. As for me, I ingenuouſly confeſs I never ſaw that book: thoſe whom I have conſulted about it, told me that they had never heard of ſuch an author.. I thought it was Gaſpar Sawicki, and I affirmed it in the firſt edition of this Dictionary; but I am now of another opinion: I find it was a canon and curate of Sendomir. He is cited in a book of Staniſlaus Lubienietſki (4). I have read in Simon Starovolſcius, that Gaſpar Cichocius, born at Tarnowitz, a city of the leſſer Poland, was made Maſter of Arts in 1567, and that afterwards he obtained of Cardinal George Radziwil, this canonry and rectory, and that he compoſed two books, the one called Anatomia, to juſtify the Jeſuits, and the other Alloquia Oſieciana, to refute the errors of Heretics (5). This laſt work would have brought a great miſchief upon him, for he treated the King of England very ill in it; but death freed him from the danger. Fecit .... librum .... Alloquia Oſieciana dictum, quo Hæreticorum errores oſtendit ac refutat ſimul, quamvis ſucceſſu parum felici, quod minus honorificam in eis Regis Angli mentionem feciſſet: tuliſſetque ſane multa acerba & gravia, ni mors ſenem opportune liberaſſet (6).

(a) Taken from the Bibliotheque of Alegambe, p. 152.

(1) Taken from Alegambe, Bibl. Scriptor. Societatis Jeſu, p. 152, 153.

(2) Th. Raynaudus, Erotemat. de malis ac bonis Libris, p. 25.

(3) Patin, Tom. ii, letter cclxxxvi.

(4) Gaſpar Cichocius Canonicus & Parochus Sendomirienſis in Alloquiis Oſiecenſibus memoriæ prodidit. Staniſl. Lubieniecius, Hiſtor. Reform. Polon. pag. 20.

(5) Simon Starovolſcius, Elog. & Vit. centum Poloniæ Scriptor. cap. lxxix, pag. 100.

(6) Id. ibid.

SCALA (BARTHOLOMEW) a learned man in the XVth century, was born at Florence in the year 1424 (a). He was the ſon of a Miller [A]; but he raiſed himſelf by his induſtry and and learning. He was a domeſtic of Coſmo de Medicis, after which the Florentines raiſed him by degrees to ſeveral conſiderable employments, and ennobled him, and gave him a place in the ſenate [B]. He was alſo ſecretary to that Republic (b). He wrote Latin tolerably well for thoſe times, but now and then a barbariſm eſcaped him (c). Politian having criticiſed on a little Poem of Scala, opened the way to a quarrel, which increaſed much by the anſwers and replies (d). It is ſaid that Scala bore him already a private grudge, becauſe ſeveral letters he had writ in the name of the Republic had not pleaſed Laurence de Medicis, who had employed Politian to write others (e). Be this how it will, Scala undertook to write the Hiſtory of Florence, from the foundation of that city till the year 1450. His work comprehends twenty books, but he only compleated five, becauſe death hindered his going on. Neverthele ſs he lived ſeventy-three years, for he did not die till the year 1497. He alſo compoſed the life of Vitalian Borromeo, and an harangue to Innocent

[A] He was the ſon of a Miller.] It is Leander Albertus who tells us ſo. ‘ Bartholomæus Scala, ſays he ‘ (1), vir doctus, ut potius Muſarum alumnus, quam ‘ inter rotas molarum natus videretur. - - - - Bartholomew Scala, a learned man, who rather ſeems to have ‘ been the foſter-child of the Muſes than one born in a ‘ mill.’ Scala writes himſelf, that he was of a low extraction. ‘ Veni nudus, omnium rerum bonarum ‘ egenus ad remp. viliſſimis ortus parentibus, multa ‘ cum fide, nullis omnino divitiis, aut titulis, nullis ‘ clientelis, nullis cognationibus (2). - - - - I came to ‘ the Republic naked and deſtitute of every thing, being born ‘ of the meaneſt parents. I brought with me a great deal ‘ of integrity, but no riches nor titles, neither dependents ‘ nor relations.’ Politian having called him monſtrum furfuraceum, - - a mealy monſter, gives this reaſon for it: ‘ Monſtrum quidem qui ex colluvione monſtro‘rum compoſitus es: furfuraceum verò in priſtini ſor‘dibus natus, & quidem piſtrino digniſſimus (3.) - - You ‘ are a monſter truly, as being made up of a filthy jumble ‘ of monſters; and mealy, as having been born in a dirty ‘ grinding-houſe, which is indeed much the fitteſt place ‘ for you.’

[B] The Florentines raiſed him, and gave him a place in the ſenate.] Speaking of this in the letter juſt now cited, he ſays: ‘ Coſmus tamen pater patriæ noſtræ ‘ me complexus eſt, recepitque in familiæ obſequia. ‘ Interea Florentinus populus ad prioratum me evexit, ‘ deinde ad vexilliferatum; tandemque & in Senato‘rium me ordinem equeſtremque collocavit, tanto pro‘fecto ſuffragiorum conſenſu, ut nihil eſſe factum un‘quam popularius multi putarent (4). - - - Neverthele ſs ‘ Coſmo, the true father of our country, caſt a favourable ‘ eye upon me, and received me into the number of his ‘ domeſtics. In the mean time the people of Florence raiſed ‘ me to the dignity of a prior, afterwards to that of a ‘ ſtandard-bearer, and laſt of all they placed me in the ‘ rank of ſenators and knights, with ſuch an unanimity ‘ of ſuffrages, that, in the opinion of many, nothing was ‘ ever done in a more popular way.’ Politian would have thought, that he had treated him too well if he had ſaid to him, Cabal did as much towards it as merit:

He

(a) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 616.

(b) Politian. Epiſt. III, lib. v, & Ep. xviii, lib. xii.

(c) As culex in the feminine gender, and monſtrum in the maſculine gender. Polit. Epiſt. viii, & xvi, lib. xii,

(d) See the 12th book of Politian's letters. You will find alſo three letters of Scala in the fifth.

(e) Scis autem tu quoque literas illum ſæpe tuas publice ſcriptas rejeciſſe, nobiſque dediſſe formandas, quæ prima odii livoriſque in me tui cauſa extitit. - - - But you likewiſe know that he often rejected the letters, which you had written in the name of the Republic, and gave me the charge of compoſing them, which was the firſt cauſe of your hatred and ill will to me. Polit. Ep. xviii. lib. xii.

(1) Deſcript. Ital. p. 70.

(2) Scala, Epiſt. ad Ang. Politian. It is the 16th of the 12th book of Politian's Letters. Paris 1526, in 4*to.*

(3) Politian. Epiſt. xviii, lib. xii.

(4) Scala, ibid.

Innocent VIII &c (f) [C]. Alexandra Scala his daughter was well verſed in the Greek and Latin tongues, as I ſhall preſently ſhew, and thereby ſhe came to be married to a learned Greek. Politian praiſed her much, he did not think it at all fit that he ſhould extend to the daughter the reflexions which he had caſt upon the father. The daughter on her ſide had no regard to that quarrel, but anſwered the civilities of Politian with other civilities.

(f) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 616.

He pretends that it was a mere ſport of fortune. ‘ De honoribus quidem nihil eſt quod tibi nimium placeas ; vetus enim ludus hic, ut indigni tollantur in altum, videlicet ut hoc quoque poſſe fortuna declaret, cujus tu ſolius opus es (5). - - - You have no reaſon to value yourſelf on account of your preferments, becauſe they are entirely owing to fortune, whoſe old game it is to exalt men of no merit, on purpoſe to ſhew that to this alſo her power extends.’

[C] He alſo compoſed . . . . . an harangue to Innocent VIII, &c.] The liſt of his works, if I am not miſtaken, is pretty compleat in the catalogue of the Florentine writers, compoſed by Pocciantius, and printed at Florence in 1589. There were then but few of Scala's writings printed. Two learned Danes took care to publiſh the chief of them, viz. the Florentine Hiſtory (6), and the Life of Vitalian Borromeo (7) I cannot tell whether the Apologies, which Marſilius Ficinus very much eſteemed, and the Letter which he writ upon the queſtion, Whether a wiſe man ought to marry (8), have been publiſhed. Apologi centum ad Laurentium Medicem, quos miris encomiis exornat Ficinus in 8vo, libro epiſtolarum (9).

(5) Politian. ubi ſupra.

(6) Oliger Jacobæus publiſhed it in 4to. It is mentioned in the fourth Journal of Italy 1677.

(7) Chriſtopher Bartholinus publiſhed it. It is mentioned in the ſame Journal of Italy.

(8) This queſtion was handled by Heinſius. See in Baudii Amores the letter, An & qualis viro literato ſit ducenda uxor? To which is added the diſſertation of an anonymous writer, De Matrimonio Literati, an cœlibem eſſe an nubere conveniat? It is in a collection of ſeveral pieces, printed in the year 1606.

(9) Pocciantius de Scriptor. Florentinis, p. 24.

SCALA (Alexandra) daughter to one learned man and wife to another, was her ſelf well ſkilled both in the Greek and Latin tongues (a). Her father was the abovementioned Bartholomew Scala. I have ſpoken in its proper place, of Michael Marullus her huſband. Politian lived in a more amicable way with her than with her father. He praiſed her often in Greek ; ſhe anſwered him in the ſame language (b). They writ verſes to each other, which were printed: but what Marullus and Politian writ to one another, was the fartheſt thing in the world from compliments (c) ; it was a war of erudition, full of animoſity and injurious words. The reaſon why Marullus married Alexandra Scala, was becauſe he would perfect himſelf in the Latin tongue [A], if we may believe Paulus Jovius: but if we may believe her huſband, ſhe was very beautiful, and very virtuous, and why ſhould we doubt that thoſe good qualities, and the employments of her father might not have procured to her the courtſhip of Marullus? It would be a very edifying thing to ſee this Poet make verſes in praiſe of his wife [B] ; for we ſcarce ſee any

(a) Voſſius, Hiſt. Lat. p. 616.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Cum Politiano . . . maledicentiſſimis epiſtolis lites extenderat. Jovius, Elog. cap. xxviii.

[A] Becauſe he would perfect himſelf in the Latin tongue.] I ſhall ſet down a paſſage of Paulus Jovius. ‘ Nihil jam Græcè doctum eſſe ſatis ad laudem putabat, niſi tota patrii ſermonis facultas Romanæ facundiæ jungeretur, Propterea Florentiæ Alexandram eruditi ingenii puellam uxorem duxit (1). - - - He did not think it a ſufficient praiſe to him that he was maſter of the Greek tongue, unleſs to his native ſtock he could likewiſe join the Roman eloquence, for which reaſon he married, at Florence, Alexandra, a young woman of wit and learning.’ Mr Varillas paraphraſing according to his cuſtom what he finds in books, enlarges upon Paul Jovius in this manner : ‘ The love Marullus had for the Latin tongue, made him marry the daughter of Bartholomew Scala (2), who underſtood and ſpoke it admirably well. She taught him ſo well, that Laurence de Medicis found him capable of tranſlating the Morals of Plutarch (3).’ I have already ſhewed that Marullus made Latin verſes before he married Alexandra Scala ; and therefore Jovius ſays too much, and Varillas, inſtead of rectifying it, amplifies it. We may compare his pen to ſpectacles.

[B] Make verſes in praiſe of his wife.] We are not to believe, that all the verſes we find in Marullus's poems to the praiſe of Alexandra Scala, were made after he married her ; we can, at moſt, only ſuſpect this little epigram to have been ſo (4).

Quod tam tota decens, formoſaque tota venuſta
  Rara quidem, ſed non unica Scala mea es ;
At quod caſta, decens, at quod formoſa pudica,
  Diſpeream ſi non unica Scala mea es.
Nam cum Pieridum reputo commercia ſacra,
  Jam non ulterius unica, Scala dea es.

My Scala, while I mark and trace
Your ev'ry charm, and ev'ry grace,
I own ſuch beauty to be rare ;
Yet others may be found as fair.
But when your heav'nly charms I ſee
From all immodeſt tincture free,
Then let me periſh, but I find
Scala the phœnix of her kind.
While laſt, as preſident of wit,
I ſee you with the Muſes ſit,
Scala no more a phœnix, is
A goddeſs mix'd with goddeſſes.

But if we conſider it well, we ſhall find no expreſſion here that ſignifies any thing of marriage ; mea Scala may as well be applied to a miſtreſs as to a wife ; and we ſee that Marullus makes uſe of the ſame mark of tenderneſs towards Sappho,

Hoc Sappho melior mea,
  Cujus facta domi dictaque plurima
Præſtans ingenium inquinant.

In this my Sappho's overcome,
Whoſe actions and diſcourſe at home
Defile her noble wit.

ſays he (5), praiſing the good manners which Alexandra Scala learned in the ſervice of the Muſes. All the other verſes he made in her praiſe, do manifeſtly relate to the time that preceded their marriage. There are ſome wherein he praiſes her (6), becauſe when ſhe was about fifteen years of age, ſhe made admirable verſes.

Cum verſu referas novem ſorores,
Vix luſtris bene adhuc tribus peractis,
Cùm dulci ſale ſeriiſque blandis
Ipſum jam ſuperes puella patrem,
Quo nihil gravius facetiuſque eſt.

Since e're three luſtrums of your age
Be reckon'd up, you thus engage
In Verſe and Poetry divine
To be the rival of the Nine ;
Since you at ſuch an age excel
Your father who compoſ'd ſo well,

Both

(1) Jovius, Elog. cap. xxviii.

(2) The Printers have put Seula.

(3) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 179.

(4) Lib. iv, pag. m. 80.

(5) Epigr. lib. iv, pag. m. 71.

(6) Lib. iii, p. 64.

any now of this nature [C]: marriage commonly dries up the Poetical vein, which flowed ſo abundantly for a miſtreſs. But it does not appear that when he made thoſe verſes on her, he was her huſband. This learned Florentine woman died in 1506 (d).

(d) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

Both in the humorous and gay,
And in the grave and ſolemn way.

In this ſame epigram he calls her mea Scala; yet one cannot believe that he was then her huſband. Let us ſee what he ſays to her father.

Plus multo tamen, ô beate amice, eſt
Quod Scalam Latio pater dediſti,
Aucturam numerum novem ſororum
Caſto carmine, caſtiore vita (7).

(7) Lib. iii, p. 54.

But this, O happy friend, is more
Than all which you have done before,
In that you gave us Scala. She Will one among the Muſes be;
So chaſte her numbers are, and ſtill
Her life more chaſte . . . .

He was not then his ſon-in-law, when he ſpoke to him in that manner. That is plain.

[C] We ſcarce ſee any now of this nature.] There are many modern Poets, who would look upon themſelves to be highly reproached for having prodigally ſpent their praiſes, if they ſhould be told that they had praiſed their very wives. They would think that this expreſſion would have more force, than if it ſhould be ſaid of them, that they had praiſed all from the ſcepter down to the ſhepherd's crook, and from the cedar of mount Lebanon, to the hyſſop that grows on the wall. They would believe that this idea would give their flatteries the ſame extent which is given to love, in the following verſes (8):

(8) Hiſtoire Amour des Gaules.

Je penſerois n'être pas malheureux,
Si la beauté dont je ſuis amoureux
Pouvoit enfin ſe tenir ſatisfaite
De mille amans avec un Favori;
Mais j'enrage que la coquette
Aime encor juſqu'à ſon mari.

Yet ſhould not I unhappy prove
If that the fair-one, whom I love,
Could with a thouſand lovers be Content and eaſy: but that ſhe
Should love her very huſband too
It makes me mad . . . . .

The moſt gallant Poets among the Antients did not pretend to ſo falſe and abſurd a nicety. Ovid praiſes his wife extreamly (9); Martial would have poſterity to know that his wife ſpoke well, and that ſhe kept him from being ſorry that he had left Rome.

(9) Ovidius, Triſt. lib. iv, Eleg. ix.

Tu deſiderium dominæ mihi mitius urbis
Eſſe jubes: Romam tu mihi ſola facis (10).

(10) Martial. Epig. xxi, lib. xii.

At my long abſence from the town
You bid me leſs afflicted be,
Since I am not aſham'd to own
That you alone are Rome to me.

I ſhall omit Statius, who hath ſo much praiſed his wife (11).

(11) Stat. Silvar. V. lib. iii.

SCAMANDER, a river of Phrygia near Troy. It was alſo called Xanthus; but there was a great difference between theſe two names: Scamander belonged to human language, Xanthus to that of the gods (a). This is the opinion of Homer. Some writers pretend that this Poet means that Xanthus was the antient name of this river [A], and that Scamander was the modern: others ſay, that it was called Scamander before it was called Xanthus [B], and ſeveral etymologies are given of thoſe two names (b). It is pretended that the waters of that river had the property of making womens hair that bathed in it, of a light colour, and that the Trojan women

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) See the remark [B].

[A] Some writers pretend, that Homer means that Xanthus was the antient name of this river.] Let us firſt cite what he ſays.

Ἄντα δ' ἄρ' Ἡφαίστοιο μέγας ποταμὸς βαθυδίνες
Ὃν Ξάνθον καλέουσι θεοὶ, ἄνδρες δὲ Σκάμανδρον.

Contra autem & Vulcanum magnus Fluvius verticibus profundus
Quem Xanthum vocant dii, homines vero Scamandrum (1).

(1) Homer. Iliad. lib. xx, ver. 73.

With fiery Vulcan laſt in battle ſtands
The ſacred flood that rolls on golden ſands;
Xanthus his name, with thoſe of heav'nly birth,
But call'd Scamander by the ſons of earth.

Pope.

Meziriac makes this remark upon it: 'As, ſays he, 'Vigenere has well obſerved upon the Scamander of 'Philoſtratus, when Homer gives two names to ſome 'things, one according to the gods, and the other 'according to men; it is to be underſtood that that 'of the gods is the antient, and almoſt forgotten 'name, and that of men the modern and moſt in 'uſe (2).' He might have cited the ſcholiaſt upon Homer to this purpoſe, and not Vigenere. Τῶν διωνύμων τὸ μὲν πρεσγενέστερον ὄνομα εἰς θεοὺς ἀναφέρει ὁ ποιητὴς, τὸ δὲ μεταγενέστερον εἰς ἀνθρώπους (3). Obſerve that Plutarch owns that Xanthus was the antient name (4). He adds, that this river was not called Scamander till Scamander the ſon of Coribas, had drowned himſelf in it, having loſt his ſenſes by an exceſs of devotion; that is, by having aſſiſted too aſſiduouſly at the myſteries of the mother of the gods. For ſo Meziriac (5) explains the Greek of Plutarch. Mauſſac explains it otherwiſe. Τῶν τῆς Ῥέας μυστηρίων τελουμένων αἰφνιδίως θεασάμενος, ἐμμανὴς ἐγένετο. Dum Rheæ myſteria celebrarentur derepente conſpectus furere cœpit (6). - - Being ſuddenly diſcovered and ſeen by thoſe who were celebrating the myſteries of Rhea, he went mad.

(2) Meziriac upon Ovid's Epiſtles. p. 467.

(3) Schol. in Iliad. lib. xx. ver. 74.

(4) Plutarch. de Fluviis, p. m. 43.

(5) Meziriac, ubi ſupra, p. 468.

(6) Plutarch. ib. p. 44.

[B] Others ſay it was called Scamander before it was called Xanthus.] Meziriac quotes three authors upon this matter. Theſe are his words (7): 'Ariſtotle 'book iii. chap. 12. of his hiſtory of animals, ſpeaks 'thus: Δοκεῖ δὲ καὶ ὁ Σκάμανδρος ποταμὸς ξανθὰ πρόβατα ποιεῖν, διὸ καὶ τὸν Ὅμηρον ἀντὶ 'Σκαμάνδρου Ξανθὸν προσαγορεύειν αὐτόν. It ſeems 'that the river Scamander makes ſheep of a reddiſh 'colour, and that for this reaſon Homer calls it Xanthus, inſtead of Scamander. Antigonus paradox 74, 'follows Ariſtotle and cites him. Ælian book viii. 'chap. 21. de animalibus, ſays the ſame more clearly 'ſtill. Ὁ δὲ ἐν Τροίᾳ Σκάμανδρος, ἐπεὶ ξανθὰς 'ἀποφαίνει πιούσας τὰς ὄϊς, πρὸς τῷ Σκαμάνδρῳ τῷ 'ἐξ ἀρχῆς, ἄλλο ὄνομα ἡ τῶν προβάτων ἐπίκτητος 'χρόα ἔθετο. τὸν Ξάνθον. The river of Troas called 'Scamander, becauſe it makes the ſheep rediſh that drink 'of its waters, has got the name of Xanthus, beſides 'that of Scamander, which it had before.' After this Meziriac ſays (8), that the river Scamander, according to ſome, owes its origin to Hercules. That Hero being ready to die of thirſt, fell a digging the earth, out of which ſprung the head of a river, which from thence was called Scamander, as if one ſhould ſay σκάμμα ἀνδρὸς, the digging of a man. There is a ſcholiaſt women made uſe of that advantage [C]. It is alſo ſaid that the maids of that country, as ſoon as they were betrothed, went thither, to offer their virginity to Scamander; which gave an opportunity to a young Athenian to enjoy Callirrhoë [D]. I do not think that ſcholiaſt (9) who ſays, that the place where Hercules digged the ground yielded ſome drops of water, becauſe it had been ſtruck with thunder, as a conſequence of the prayers which that hero had directed to Jupiter, when he was much diſtreſſed with thirſt. This ſcholiaſt pretends that the river that flowed out of this place was called Scamander, becauſe it eaſed Hercules, as if one ſhould ſay Camander, γενόμενον καμάτου ἄκος αὐτῷ. He adds, That it was called Xanthus, becauſe the Trojan women, by waſhing themſelves in it, made their hair become light-coloured (10). The author of the great Etymologicon tells us, that this river took its name from Scamander the ſon of Teucer, who came into Phrygia out of the iſle of Crete his native country; but that afterwards this river was called Xanthus, becauſe the three goddeſſes, before they ſet themſelves before Paris to be judged by him, went and waſhed themſelves in this river, which made their hair light coloured (11). All this overthrows the hypotheſis of thoſe, who ſay that the name Xanthus preceded that of Scamander.

(7) Meziriac, ubi ſupra, p. 468. Note that Mauſſac in Plut. de Fluviis, p. 281, quotes that paſſage of Ariſtotle.

(8) Meziriac, ibid. pag. 469. ex Euſtathio, in Iliad. lib. xx, & autore Magni Etymologici.

[C] It is pretended that it's waters . . . had the property of making the women's hair that bathed in it of a light colour, and that the Trojan women made uſe of that advantage.] See the proofs of all this in the preceding remark. It had alſo the ſame virtue upon ſheep, as may be ſeen by the three authorities of Meziriac; to which I add theſe words of Pliny: ‘In ‘Bœotia amnis Melas oves nigras (facit) . . . rufaſ‘que juxta Ilium Xanthus unde & nomen amni (12). ‘The river Melas in Bœotia makes the ſheep black . . . ‘and Xanthus near Troy makes them red, from whence ‘alſo the name of that river is derived.’

[D] And that the maids . . . offered their virginity to Scamander, which gave occaſion to a young Athenian to enjoy Callirrhoë.] I will relate this ſtory as we find it in Vigenere. ‘In this river, (as Æſchines relates ‘in his epiſtles) young maids were wont to bathe them‘ſelves when they were betrothed, invoking the river ‘in theſe words, λάβε μου Σκάμανδρε τὴν παρ‘θενίαν. Receive, oh Scamander, my virginity. This ‘gave an opportunity to Cimon the Athenian, who ‘was deſperately in love with Callirrhoë already pro‘miſed to another, to hide himſelf among the buſhes ‘that grew along the waterſide, and put on a hat ‘of ruſhes and reeds; and when the damſel came as ‘uſual to bathe, and had pronounced in ſinging the ‘aforeſaid words, he came out of his ambuſcade, and ‘told her he willingly accepted of it: And ſo hav‘ing carried her upon the bank, he preſently deflow‘red her (13).’ It is certain that this is found in one of Æſchines's letters (14), and therefore the citation is juſt; but Vigenere has not related all that he ſhould have told his readers: It is neceſſary they ſhould know ſome other circumſtances to make the moſt inſtructive reflexions. I ſay then that Æſchines does not ſpeak of this adventure, as of a hiſtory learned by tradition, or read in ſome old chronicle. If he had ſpoke of it in this manner, we might place his ſtory in the rank of Boccace's novels; it would be more reaſonable not to believe it, than to believe it. He ſpeaks of it as of a thing almoſt done in his ſight: Ἡμεῖς ἅμα τε τοῖς οἰκείοις τῶν γαμουμένων καὶ τοῖς ἄλλοις ὄχλοις πόῤῥωθεν τὴν ἑορτὴν καὶ τὰ λουτρὰ τῶν παρθένων, ᾗ θέμις τοῖς ἐξωτέρω ὁρᾷν, ἐθεόμεθα. Nos una cum cognatis nupturarum & cæteris turbis eminus feſtum & lavacra virginum quatenus fas nobis externis erat, ſpectabamus (15). - - - We, together with the relations of the bride's, and the other multitude, looked on at a diſtance, and ſaw the feſtival and bathings of the virgins, as far as it was allowed to us ſtrangers. His fellow-traveller was the perſon, who committed that infamous act; he cenſured him for it, and found that he was impenitent, and alledged for his excuſe, that many had played the ſame trick before. It is neceſſary alſo to know the ſimplicity of the young maid, who was abuſed: She was fully perſuaded that it was the god Scamander who had got her maidenhead; for, four days after, ſpying Cimon among thoſe that were looking on to ſee a proceſſion paſs, ſhe ſaluted him with a great deal of reſpect, and told her nurſe, There is Scamander, on whom I beſtowed my virginity. The nurſe made a great cry, and ſo the matter was divulged. Τέτταρσιν ὕστερον ἡμέραις πομπὴ μὲν ἦν Ἀφροδίτης· ἐπόμπευον δὲ αἱ νεωστὶ γεγαμημέναι· καὶ ἡμεῖς τὴν πομπὴν ἐθεώμεθα. ἡ δὲ νύμφη ἰδοῦσα τὸν Κίμωνα ὡς μηδὲν αὐτῷ κακὸν συνειδότα ἅμα ἐμοὶ θεώμενον. προσεκύνησε. καὶ ἀποβλέψασα πρὸς τὴν τροφὸν· ὁρᾷς ἔφη, τίτθη. τὸν Σκάμανδρον, ᾧ τὴν παρθενίαν ἔδωκα. καὶ ἡ τίτθη ἀκούσασα, ἀνέκραγε, καὶ τὸ πρᾶγμα ἔκπυστον γίνεται. Cum quatriduo poſt pompa eſſet veneris, & recens nuptæ ei pompæ intereſſent, nos quoque illam ſpectabamus. Sponſa autem Cimonem conſpicata, ut nullius mali ſibi conſcium, unà mecum ſpectantem, honorem ei præbuit: & nutricem intuita, Vides (inquit) mea nutrix, Scamandrum, cui virginitatem dedi? quo illa audito, exclamat: itaque facinus divulgatur (16). When we conſider that wit and learning never appeared with ſo much luſtre, as in the age that Æſchines lived in, we may the better apprehend the fatal power of a falſe religion. It deſtroys good ſenſe, it extinguiſhes the light of nature, and in ſome ſort degrades a man to the condition of a brute beaſt. Callirrhoë, was born of an illuſtrious family (17), and was without doubt, nobly educated; and yet the impertinencies of the poets, canonized by the heathen prieſts, had ſo much corrupted her judgment, that in good earneſt ſhe believed rivers were deities, who crowned themſelves with reeds, and could enjoy a woman. In the reign of Tiberius, an illuſtrious lady was not leſs ſimple (18); ſhe believed ſhe had lain with Anubis, and bragged of it as of a great favour. The Monks, who have played ſo many tricks chiefly to inveigle women, never durſt, that I know of, tell them that ſuch a ſaint would lie with them. The ideas of purity and immateriality have always been ſtrictly joined in Chriſtianity with thoſe of beatification. But I make no doubt, if they would undertake ſuch a thing, but they might bring ſome devout women, that now are, to believe what the Roman votary of Anubis ſuffered herſelf to be perſuaded of. This maxim, The corruption of the moſt excellent things is the worſt (19), is verified by the example of religion. There is nothing ſo advantageous to man, if we conſider either the mind or the heart, as to know God well: On the other hand, nothing is ſo fatal to all the faculties of a reaſonable mind, as to know God ill, as the Pagans did. Obſerve what Homer ſays, that the prieſt of Scamander was honoured at Troy as a god.

Ὑψήνορα δῖον
Υἱὸν ὑπερθύμου Δολοπίονος, ὅς ῥα Σκαμάνδρου
Ἀρητὴρ ἐτέτυκτο, θεὸς δ' ὡς τίετο δήμῳ.

Hypſenora nobilem
Filium magnanimi Dolopionis qui Scamandri
Sacerdos factus fuerat, Dei vero inſtar honorabatur à populo (20).

Then dy'd Hypſenor, generous and divine,
Sprung from the brave Dolopion's mighty line;
Who near ador'd Scamander made abode,
Prieſt of the ſtream, and honour'd as a god.
Pope.

A reflexion upon a thought of Cicero, concerning the Divinity of Romulus.

I ſhall make one obſervation more upon the ſmall effect which the light of learning had againſt the darkneſs of idolatry. Cicero admired the divinity of Romulus, becauſe it was not eſtabliſhed in the days of ignorance, when it was ſo much the more eaſy to put off fictions, becauſe rude and ignorant minds were brought without any difficulty to believe them; but in an age, when learning was already far advanced, and had entirely aboliſhed the antient barbarity, under which the uncultivated ſpirit of the firſt men had been detained. It ſeems, that from this principle, he would conclude that neither fiction nor impoſture had any ſhare in the belief of the Romans concerning the divinity of Romulus. Magis eſt in Romulo admirandum, quod cæteri, qui that this river merited the reputation which it has acquired by the help of the Poets, but, on the other hand, it was more conſiderable than ſome fancy [E]. Julia, the daughter of Auguſtus, had like to have been drowned in it; Agrippa, her huſband, was very much affected with the danger ſhe had been in [F], and ſhewed his indignation, for what had happened, againſt the Trojans, tho' they ought not to have been made accountable for it

---

(9) The ſcholiaſt upon Homer, in Iliad. xxi, apud Meziriac, ibid. p. 469.

(10) Ξάνθος δὲ ἐκλήθη ὅτι ξανθῦναι τοῦ ὕδατος αἱ Τρωάδες ξάνθας κόμας ἔσχον.

(11) Meziriac, ibid.

(12) Plin. lib. ii, cap. ciii, p. m. 252, 253.

(13) Vigenere, on the Scamander of Philoſtratus, p. 8. of the firſt volume, Edit. in 4*to*.

(14) It is the tenth. They are printed with Demoſthenes. See p. 125, of the Geneva edition 1607.

(15) Æſchines, ubi ſupra.

(16) Id. ubi ſupra, p. 126. A.

(17) Πατρὸς δὲ τῶν ἐπιφανῶν, illuſtre patri nata. Id. ibid. p. 125.

(18) See Joſephus, Antiq. lib. xviii, ch. iv.

(19) Corruptio optimi peſſima.

(20) Homer. Iliad. lib. v, ver. 76.

qui dii ex hominibus facti eſſe dicuntur, minus eruditis hominum ſeculis fuerunt, ut fingendi proclivior eſſet ratio, quum imperiti facilè ad credendum impellerentur. Romuli autem ætatem minus his ſexcentis annis jam inveteratis literis, atque doctrinis, omnique illo antiquo ex inculta hominum vita errore ſublato fuiſſe cernimus . . . . Ex quo intelligi poteſt, permultis annis ante Homerum fuiſſe quam Romulum, ut jam doctis hominibus ac temporibus ipſis eruditis ad fingendum vix quicquam eſſet loci. Antiquitas enim recepit fabulas fictas etiam nonnunquam inconditè. Hæc ætas autem jam exculta præſertim eludens omne, quod fieri non poteſt, reſpuit (21). St Auguſtin refutes extremely well this reaſoning. He ſays, 1. There was no place but Rome that believed Romulus was a god. 2. That it was little, and as it were in its infancy, when it embraced this opinion. 3. That poſterity was obliged to retain this faith, to render the city more flouriſhing, and more capable of founding a great empire. 4. That the people that were ſubdued by the Romans, did not believe of Romulus, what they believed of him at Rome; but out of policy they ſaid the ſame the Romans did. You will ſee better in the original words the thoughts of St Auguſtin. Cicero propterea dicit divinitatem Romuli mirabiliter creditam, quòd erudita jam tempora fuerunt, quæ falſitatem non reciperent fabularum. Quis autem Romulum Deum niſi Roma credidit, atque id parva & incipiens? Tum deinde poſteris ſervare fuerat neceſſe, quod acceperant à majoribus, ut cum iſta ſuperſtitione in lacte quodammodo matris ebibita creſceret civitas, atque ad tam magnum perveniret imperium, ut ex ejus faſtigio velut ex altiore quodam loco alias quoque gentes, quibus dominaretur, hac ſua opinione perfunderet: ut non quidem crederent, ſed tamen dicerent Deum Romulum, ne civitatem cui ſerviebant, de conditore ejus offenderent, aliter eum nominando quam Roma, quæ id non amore quidem hujus erroris, ſed tamen amoris errore crediderat (22). He forgot the two principal anſwers which he might have made. He ſhould have ſaid in the firſt place, That the light of learning, and the improvement of the mind, had not made their way as far as Rome, when the Divinity of Romulus was propoſed. 2. That this light, and this improvement, cannot hinder ſuch like fictions from taking root. Did not Alexander paſs for a god? Did they not make decrees upon this article of faith (23), in the moſt learned cities of Greece, when learning was come to the higheſt pitch it had ever been at? Did not the Romans, in the greateſt knowledge, believe that the ſoul of Julius Cæſar was converted into a ſtar (24)? Did they not erect temples and altars to a living emperor (25)? Could the Philoſophers cure the crafty ſpirit of flatterers, and the credulous ſpirit of the mob? If other things than learning and ſcience had not interpoſed, the divine worſhip of Alexander, Cæſar, Auguſtus, &c. had continued as long as that of Hercules and Romulus.

[E] It merited not the reputation which it has acquired by the help of the Poets, but, on the other hand, it was more conſiderable than ſome fancy.] Homer (26) making Scamander the ſon of Jupiter, always repreſents it as a great river, and liberally beſtows on it the epithets, δινήεις, vorticoſus, full of whirl-pools; βαθυδινήεις, profunde vorticoſus, full of deep whirl-pools; βαθύῤῥοος, profunde fluens, deep-flowing; and the like, theſe expreſſions are exceſſive. Pomponius Mela had reaſon to ſay, that Scamander and Simois paſs for greater rivers than they really are (27). The moderns ſpeak of them with the utmoſt contempt. 'As 'to the rivers Simois and Xanthus, ſo much celebrat'ed by the Poets, which watered the meadows of 'Troy, we can ſay nothing of them, but that they 'are rather little brooks, where ſcarce a Loach or 'Minnow can live; for in ſummer they are dry, and 'in winter a Gooſe can hardly ſwim there. If we 'have raiſed any doubts about thoſe rivers, it is no 'new thing; for in Ariſtotle's time they could not be 'found. Read the 12th chapter of the 3d book of 'the hiſtory in this manner: Scamander etiam amnis 'flavas reddere oves creditur: quamobrem Xanthum pro 'Scamandro nuncupatum ab Homero autumant. As if 'Ariſtotle meant that Homer had taken Scamander 'for Xanthus; for Xanthus is as much as to ſay fla'vus, fair. Let the queſtion therefore be put, whe'ther Scamander and Xanthus be the ſame or no (28)?' If the laſt half of this paſſage had not been full of faults, I had not quoted it. I find there firſt of all this falſity, that, in the time of Ariſtotle, the river Scamander was not to be found. In the ſecond place, it is falſe that the words which are quoted out of Ariſtotle, do prove what Belon deſigned to prove. Laſtly, He ſhould have ſaid that Xanthus and Scamander are all one. I do not criticiſe upon the other half of the paſſage. Belon ſpeaks as an eye-witneſs. I will not bring into queſtion his ſincerity, nor give any credit to Thevet, who ſays that Xanthus and Simois are great rivers. I ſhould be ſorry to contradict ſuch a man. They are Lewis Guion's words (29) concerning Thevet; but what I ſay of it (30), I have borrowed from Belon, a Phyſician of Mans, out of the ſecond book of his Obſervations, and I have often heard him relate it, being at Paris, to Poſtel, whoſe company I frequented four years. Beſides, one called Albert le Bon, who ſays he was in thoſe parts, and ſtayed there a whole winter, perfectly agrees with what Belon has written on that ſubject. I believe Thevet never was there, and that what he writ was only by hear-ſay. But as on the one ſide I do not deny what Belon ſays, I am ſure on the other ſide, that thoſe rivers were not antiently ſo little. Their waters may have taken another courſe, either under the earth, or otherwiſe: So that tho' the Moderns may ſay, without any hyperbole, what they aſſert; they cannot engage us to believe that Pliny is miſtaken, when he ſpeaks of the Scamander as of a navigable river (31). Scamander amnis navigabilis, & in promontorio quondam Sigeum oppidum, dein portus Achæorum, in quem influit Xanthus (32) Simoenti junctus, ſtagnumque prius faciens Palæſcamander. The words of Strabo are not leſs favourable to me: They teach us that the Scamander having received the Simois, dragged along ſo much mud and ſand, that they had almoſt filled up the mouth of the river, and formed lakes and moraſſes (33). This cannot be ſaid of a little brook or rivulet, but of rivers that are pretty conſiderable.

[F] Agrippa, her huſband, was very much affected with the danger ſhe had been in.] The fragments of Nicolas Damaſcen tell us that Julia had like to have been drowned there, in the year of Rome 738, and that Agrippa was ſo angry with the Trojans, under the pretence of their not having ſent guides to this princeſs, that he fined them in a hundred thouſand drachms (34). This puniſhment was unjuſt, for they had not received any notice of her arrival. Behold, will ſome ſay, a man who may be put in the number of cuckolds who have been very obliging and kind to their wives. If ever man was a cuckold, Agrippa was: I appeal to the anſwer that ſhe gave to thoſe who wondered that her children were ſo like Agrippa: I never am unfaithful to him, ſaid ſhe, but when I find myſelf with child. Cumque conſcii flagitiorum mirarentur quo modo ſimiles Agrippæ filios pareret, quæ tam vulgo poteſtatem ſui corporis faceret: ait; Numquam enim niſi navi plena tollo vectorem (35). Suetonius obſerves that one of the reaſons why Tiberius made ſome difficulty to marry Julia was, becauſe ſhe had been too free with him during her marriage with Agrippa (36). How often were the galants of that princeſs put to the torture? Pliny reckons this inquiſition among the misfortunes of Agrippa (37). The cuckoldom of this favourite is therefore a certain thing: but can his good nature towards her be ſufficiently proved by the indigation he ſhewed againſt the Trojans? I do not believe it; for it is probable his love for Julia was not the true cauſe of his anger; it was an effect of policy. He was angry, either to make Auguſtus believe that he ſeriouſly eſpouſed the intereſt of Julia, or to maintain his credit. A ſubject married (21) Cicero, de Republica, lib. iii, apud Auguſtin. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxii, cap. vi, p. m. 1036, 1037.

(22) Auguſt. ibid. p. 1037.

(23) See the remark [F], of the article OLYMPIAS.

(24) See Suetonius, in Cæſare, cap. 88.

(25) Horat. Ep. i, lib. ii.

(26) Homer. Iliad. lib. xxi, ver. 2.

(27) Huc ab Idæo monte demiſſus Scamander exit, & Simois fama quam natura majora flumina. Pompon. Mela, lib. i, cap. xviii.

(28) Belon, Singularitez, book ii, ch. vi, p. 182.

(29) Louïs Guyon, Diverſes Leçons, Tom. i, book ii, ch. x, p. 261.

(30) He had juſt before quoted Belon's words, about the ſmallneſs of thoſe two rivers.

(31) Plinius, lib. v, ch. xxxi, p. m. 610.

(32) Pliny ſhould have ſaid that Xanthus and Scamander are the ſame river.

(33) Strabo, lib. xiii, p. 410.

(34) Nicol. Damaſcen. in excerptis à Valeſio editis, p. 418.

(35) Macrob. Saturnal. lib. ii, cap. v, p. m. 275.

(36) Juliæ mores improbaret ut quam ſenſiſſet ſui quoque ſub priore marito appetentem quod ſane vulgo etiam exiſtimabatur. Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. vii.

(37) In tormentis adulteriorum conjugis. Plin. lib. vii, cap. viii. pag. m. 22.

it. Strabo criticiſes upon Homer concerning the ſpring of the river Scamander [G]. There were other rivers of the ſame name [H]. I ſhall not have much to ſay againſt Mr Moreri [I].

married to the daughter of his ſovereign, is not at liberty to forbear puniſhing ſuch as diſhonour his wife: Whatever he may be inwardly, he is outwardly obliged to appear on ſuch occaſions revengeful. Beſides, Agrippa knew very well, that the Trojans had not grounded their conduct upon any diſcontent which he could have to his wife. Thus, the contempt they might have ſhewed for her, had fallen upon himſelf; and conſequently he thought himſelf obliged, out of policy, to puniſh them for it, to teach all ſubjects to fear and honour him.

[G] Strabo criticiſes upon Homer, about the ſpring of the Scamander.] That Poet ſays, that this river had two ſprings, the one cold, and the other hot, near Troy (38); but Strabo (39) aſſures us, that it had only one ſpring upon mount Ida, and that this ſpring was cold. He conjectures the hot ſpring was deſtroyed, and conſequently he does not accuſe Homer of being miſtaken in that point.

[H] There were other rivers of the ſame name.] There was one of them in Sicily (40), near Ægeſta, and another in Bœotia. The latter was a monument of the frailty of the female ſex. The matter of fact was thus. Deimachus, the ſon of Eleon, accompanied Hercules to the expedition of Troy. The war growing long, he deſigned to divert himſelf with a young maid that was much in love with him. She was the daughter of Scamander, and was called Glaucia. She at laſt moved Deimachus, he gratified her deſires, and got her with child. Some time after he was killed in a battle. Glaucia, who was afraid ſhe could not hide her fault, fled to the protection of Hercules, and told him all that had paſſed between Deimachus and her, and found him a man full of compaſſion, who, beſides, was glad that the race of his friend was not extinct. He carried her into Bœotia with the ſon of which ſhe was delivered, and put her into the hands of Eleon. This ſon was called Scamander, and reigned in the country. He gave his name to the river Inachus (41).

[I] I have not much to ſay againſt Moreri.] I. According to him, Caſtaldus aſſures us, that the Scamander is at preſent called Simois; but Ortelius cites Gaſtaldus, to prove that the modern name is Simoeres (42). II. It is too general an expreſſion to ſay, that this river falls into the Ægean ſea. He ſhould have ſaid, that it's mouth is at the promontory of Sigeum (43). III. Theſe words epotaque flumina Medo prandente, are ill placed immediately after theſe, Herodotus relates, that the army of Xerxes dried it up; for there is none but would imagine that this Latin is the tranſlation of the very words of Herodotus: which is falſe. It is Juvenal whom he ought to have cited for theſe Latin words (44). He ought to have cited Herodotus, ʼΑπέλιπε τὸ ῥέεθρον, οὐδ᾽ ἀπέχρησε τῇ στρατιῇ τε καὶ τοῖσι κτήνεσι πινόμενος. Hunc (Scamandrum) profluentem ſua aqua deſtituit nec hominibus jumentiſque potantibus ſuffecit (45).

(38) Homer. Iliad. lib. xxii, ver. 147.

(39) Strabo, lib. xiii, p. 414.

(40) See Strabo, lib. xiii, and Diodorus Siculus, lib. xx.

(41) Taken from Plutarch in quæſtionib. Græcis, p. 301.

(42) Ortelius, in Theſauro Geograph. Voce Scamandrus, in Edit. Hanov. in 4to.

(43) Strabo, lib. xiii, p. 411.

(44) Juven. Stat. X, ver. 177.

(45) Herodot. p. m. 400.

SCHEFFER (John) Profeſſor in the univerſity of Upſal, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Straſburg in 1621. He was not thirty years old when he went into Sweden, where Queen Chriſtina gave a favourable reception to all learned men. He had already ſhewed his learning by the works he had publiſhed [A]. The profeſſorſhip, to which he had been called, was given him (a) in the univerſity of Upſal, by the care and intereſt of the Barons Skytte. It was the ſame profeſſorſhip that Freinſhemius had, and which he left to be the queen's library-keeper; it was, I ſay, the profeſſorſhip of Eloquence and Politics (b). Scheffer gained great applauſe in this profeſſorſhip, and was much eſteemed by the learned Chriſtina, who ſettled a very good penſion upon him, which ſhe paid him even after ſhe had abdicated her dominions. He compoſed, by her order, ſome books [B]. His employments multiplied afterwards, for he was made library-keeper of the univerſity of Upſal, Regius profeſſor honorary of the Law of Nature (c), and member of an academy which was wholly taken up in illuſtrating the Swediſh antiquities. The works he publiſhed in this laſt quality are a moſt illuſtrious proof of his diligence, and of his zeal for the honour of that nation. He died the twenty-ſixth of March 1679 (d). The catalogue of his writings has been printed more than once [C].

(a) It was in the year 1648.

(b) It was founded by John Skytte in the year 1625.

(c) Profeſſor Juris Naturæ ac Gentium.

(d) Taken from his Elogy prefixed to a book printed at Amſterdam in 1698, with this title, Joh. Schefferi Miſcellanea, which differs only from the Lectionum Academicarum Liber, printed at Hamburgh 1675, as to the title and ſome Prolegomena.

[A] He had already ſhewed his learning by the works he had publiſhed.] Theſe three are mentioned in his elogy (1): Diſſertatio de varietate Navium, printed in 1643, in 4to. Agrippa liberator ſeu de novis Tabulis, printed in 1645, in 120. Æliani variæ Hiſtoriæ Notis illuſtratæ, printed in 1647, in 8vo.

[B] He compoſed, by her order, ſome books.] Queen Chriſtina obliged him to tranſlate out of Greek into Latin the Strategicum Mauritii, and to illuſtrate the Philoſophy of Pythagoras. The Strategicum and the Arriani Tactica, which he cauſed to be printed (2) in Greek and Latin, with notes, at Upſal, in the year 1664, were never printed before. He publiſhed the ſame year, and in the ſame place (3), an eſſay of his enquiries into the Philoſophy of Pythagoras, De natura & conſtitutione Philoſophiæ Italicæ ſeu Pythagoricæ Liber prodromus magni Operis de Philoſophia Pythagorica, de Vita Pythagoræ, & de claris Pythagoricis.

[C] The catalogue of his writings has been printed more than once.] He himſelf prefixed it to his Lectiones Academicæ, publiſhed at Hamburgh, 1675; and he informed his reader that the catalogue of his books had been added by his Bookſeller to his Political Diſſertations upon Livy, in the year 1665. From that time, continues he, my friends have exhorted me from ſeveral places, to publiſh the ſequel of that catalogue. I do it, the more willingly, becauſe I am certain it contains ſome works, that are not known in foreign countries, and that lie here in the duſt, either through the negligence of my Bookſeller at Upſal, or for other reaſons. Quem (Indicem) eo libentius juris facio publici quo ſcio certius, eſſe quæ ſive oſcitantia Librarii Upſalienſis, ſive cauſis aliis hic jacent pulvere ſepulta, & iccirco alibi ignorantur (4). I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that it is of great importance to an author, that his works be printed by a Bookſeller who knows how to ſell them; for among idle or unſkillful Bookſellers, the beſt books lie upon their hands. There is to be ſeen a more exact catalogue of the works of Schefferus in Suecia literata; and we have a new one prefixed to a book ſold at Amſterdam as printed in 1698, with the title of Joh. Schefferi Miſcellanea. It is divided into four claſſes. The firſt contains what he has writ concerning Sweden: I will only mention the Upſalia Antiqua, cujus occaſione plurima in Antiquitatibus Borealibus & gentium vicinarum explicantur. This work was printed at Upſal in 1666, in 8vo. The author has left it to his heirs, corrected and enlarged. De ſitu & vocabulo Upſaliæ Epiſtola defenſoria, at Stockholm, 1677, in 8vo. Memorabilium Suecicæ Gentis Exemplorum Liber, at Hamburgh, 1671, in 8vo. De tribus orbibus aureis nuper in Scania erutis è terra Diſquiſitio Antiquaria, at Stockholm, 1676, in 8vo. De antiquis veriſque Regni Sueciæ Inſignibus, at the ſame place, 1678, in 4to. Lapponia ſive Gentis Regioniſque Lapponum Deſcriptio accurata cum figuris, at Francfort, 1673, in 4to. This work was printed in Engliſh at Oxford, 1674, in High Dutch at Nuremberg the ſame year, in 4to, and in French (5) at Paris, in 1678, in 4to. It was found very much enlarged in the

(1) Prefixed to his Miſcellanea, at Amſterdam 1698.

(2) In 8vo.

(3) Likewiſe in 8vo.

(4) Joh. Schefferus, ad Lector. benevolum.

(5) Father Lubin is the author of that verſion.

the ſtudy of the author. Suecia Literata ſeu de Scriptis & Scriptoribus Gentis Sueciæ, Opus poſtumum, Stockholm, 1680, in 8vo. There is in it a catalogue of the Swediſh writers and of foreigners who have writ books in Sweden. It is diſpoſed, not according to an alphabetical order, but according to Chronology. There is a great defect in the index, for the authors are placed in it only according to their Chriſtian names. The author, perhaps, would have mended that fault, if he had been alive when it was printed. Mr Mollerus has given a ſecond edition (6) of it, and has added many curious and inſtructive remarks to it; Hypomnemata, as he calls them, Hiſtorico-Critica paucula è pluribus ſelecta. The ſupplements he has made to the article of our Scheffer, may be of very great uſe to thoſe who would know the circumſtances or dependencies of the writings of this profeſſor. The ſecond claſs of his writings contains Autores Græcos & Latinos illuſtratos. You may ſee there that he has publiſhed, with Notes, the Panegyric of Pacatus (7), the various Hiſtories of Ælian, the Fables of Phædrus, the Fragment of Petronius, Juſtin, Hyginus, Obſequens, &c. The third claſs contains the Miſcellanies, that is to ſay, the work I have already mentioned, de Philoſophia Pythagorica, and his book de Militia navali Veterum, printed at Upſal in the year 1653, in 4to, which was found with ſo many corrections and additions in the ſtudy of the author, that it is a new work (8). That de Antiquorum Torquibus, printed at Stockholm in 1656, in 8vo. That de Re Vehiculari Veterum, cum Pyrrhi Ligorii Libro ejuſdem argumenti ex Italica Lingua in Latinam verſo & Animadverſionibus illuſtrato, printed at Francfort in 1671, in 4to. That de Arte pingendi, printed at Nuremberg in 1669, in 8vo. Index in Libros Grotii de Jure Belli & Pacis. Conſilium de Inſtitutione Literaria, &c. The fourth claſs contains the books not printed, which conſiſt of Notes upon the author of the book concerning the Pre-Adamites, of Letters, Harangues, Programs, Adverſaria, &c.

In the ſupplements of Mr Mollerus to the ſecond edition of Suecia Literata, it is obſerved, that there were publiſhed after the death of the author, Breviarium Politicorum Ariſtotelis, at Stockholm, 1684, in 8vo, and Hugo Grotius de Jure Belli & Pacis, in uſum Guſtavi Adolphi Comitis de la Gardie, enucleatus, at Stetin, 1693, in 12mo. Obſerve that Scheffer, under the ſuppoſititious name of Conſtantinus Opellus (9), printed a letter, wherein he attacks the book of Mark Meibomius de Triremium fabrica, publiſhed at Amſterdam, 1671, in 4to.

(6) At Hamburgh 1698, in 8vo.

(7) At Stockholm, in 1651. & 1668, in 8vo.

(8) Quos ita auctos mutatos atque emendatos reliquit Schefferus, ut haberi poſſint pro aliis & novis.

(9) Joh. Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Sueciam Literatam, p. 460.

SCHEIBLERUS (Christopher) was born in the year 1589 at Armsfeld (a) where his father was miniſter. He made ſuch a conſiderable progreſs in his ſtudies that he was appointed profeſſor of the Greek tongue in the univerſity of Gieſſen, and afterwards of Logic and Metaphyſics in the year 1610, when he was no more than one and twenty years of age. In the year 1614 he was made profeſſor of Natural Philoſophy. He behaved in his employments with great diligence, till ſuch time as the univerſity was tranſported from Gieſſen to Marpourg in the year 1624. He was called in 1625 by the magiſtrates of the imperial city of Dortmund (b), and accepted of the place which they offered to him of ſuperintendant of the church and rector of the college. He contented himſelf with theſe during his whole life, for he always refuſed the more conſiderable employments that were preſented to him elſewhere. He was going to preach a ſermon in praiſe of Luther on the tenth of November 1653, when he was ſurpriſed with an Apoplexy of which he died ſuddenly in the veſtry (c) of St Mary's Church (d). He was a laborious man, and moſt aſſiduous in diſcharging his painful functions. He preached twice a week and gave ſeveral lectures every day. He taught Divinity, Metaphyſics, and Hebrew, and pretty often cauſed Theſes to be maintained before him (e). He publiſhed divers books [A]. Among other children he left JOHN SCHEIBLERUS, who has been profeſſor of church-hiſtory in the univerſity of Gieſſen.

(a) In Germany in the county of Waldec in the circle of Weſtphalia.

(b) In Latin Tremonia. It is in the county of Marck, in the circle of Weſtphalia.

(c) Taken from the Theatre of Paul Freher, p. 571, 572. The death of Sheiblerus is put there on the 21ſt of November; but his ſon has put it on the 10th according to the old ſtyle, which is the 20th according to the new.

(d) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Logic of Scheiblerus, in the Gieſſen edition 1654.

(e) Freher in Theatro, pag. 572.

[A] He publiſhed divers books.] You may find a liſt of them in pag. 572, of the Theatre of Paul Freherus, and a better ſtill in the Diarium Biographicum (1). I ſhall only ſpeak of his Logic, which, of all his writings, had the greateſt run. He began with publiſhing, in the year 1613, the Introductio Logicæ; he added to it, in the year 1614, Commentaria Topica, and, in 1619, the treatiſe de Propoſitionibus, and another, de Syllogiſmis & Methodis. Then the work was compleat. There have been ſeveral editions of it; but many errors crept into them. The author reviſed and corrected it ſome time before his death, a Bookſeller having undertaken to publiſh a new edition of it, which he actually did in the year 1654, in 4to. It is better than the foregoing editions, without even excepting the Geneva one (2), in 1651 (3). We muſt obſerve that Scheiblerus had publiſhed his Metaphyſics before the two laſt parts of his Logic were printed. He underſtood perfectly well the ſubtilties and abſtract notions of the ſchools.

(1) Witte, Diarium Biograph. ad 10, Nov. 1653.

(2) They call it Ebrodunenſis in the title of the Gieſſen edition. This makes me believe that the Geneva Bookſeller, cauſed to be put in ſome of the copies, Ebroduni, that is at Iverdun, a town of the Canton of Bern, where they printed for the Bookſellers of Geneva.

(3) Taken from the preface of Scheiblerus's Logic, in the edition of Gieſſen, 1654.

SCHESTED (Annibal) a Daniſh nobleman of great wit and merit, married a daughter of Chriſtian IV King of Denmark, ſiſter of the Counteſs Eleonora, of whom I ſhall ſpeak in the article of Count Ulefeld. It has been ſaid (a) that this count and Mr Scheſted loved, both at once, the Counteſs Eleonora, and that this rivalſhip was the cauſe of the great hatred that was between them all their life. They were always on different ſides; and when Mr Scheſted pleaded the cauſe of the king, who wanted to divorce his wife, the other pleaded for the queen. The Judges pronounced ſentence in favour of the wife againſt the huſband, and the breach was made up ſoon after. Mr Ulefeld married the Counteſs Eleonora; his rival afterwards married one of her ſiſters: but his hatred continued, and it is ſaid that he gave ſad proofs of it when this count was detained priſoner at Malmoë by the Swedes (b). The Chevalier de Terlon (c) tells us, that Mr Scheſted was made priſoner near Copenhagen by a Swediſh party, and that the great civilities which the King of Sweden ſhewed him, made him ſuſpected by the court of Denmark; and on the other ſide the Swedes ſuſpected that he had ſuffered himſelf to be taken on purpoſe, that he might ſend advice to Copenhagen of what paſſed in their camp. This Chevalier ſays hereupon, that Annibal Scheſted always gave to the King of Denmark conſtant proofs not only of a great reſpect, but likewiſe of all the zeal and fidelity that a prince can expect from the moſt affectionate of his ſubjects. He was ſent ambaſſador into Sweden after the treaty of peace concluded the twenty-ſeventh of December 1659. You will find in the Supplement of Moreri (d), that he died at Paris the twenty-third of October 1666, aged fifty-eight years, and that he was there as plenipotentiary of Denmark for the negotiation of a treaty of peace.

(a) See the book intituled, Le Comte d'Ulfeld, Nouvelle Hiſtorique, printed at Paris in 1677.

(b) See the remark [L] of the article ULEFELD.

(c) Memoir, pag. 141, Dutch Edit.

(d) At the word Hannibal.

SCHILLER (ELIAS) publiſhed in the German tongue a book of controverſy, which was confuted by a profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker, in the year 1641. That profeſſor's name was Nicolas Vedelius: he informs us that Dr Schiller's book had been printed a very few years before at Cologn, under the title of The Grounds of the Catholic Truth, that it was a piece well digeſted and extremely capable of impoſing upon the people, and that it was not at all ſurpriſing if ſuch a book, conſidering the ſituation of affairs at that time, had ſhaken or perverted ſeveral Proteſtants in Germany: that the author, who preſumed too much upon the force of his pretended proofs [A], and who had forſaken Lutheraniſm to embrace Popery, did at bottom exhibit nothing elſe but quirks and cavils, and only ſought to withdraw the deciſion of controverſies from the tribunal of Scripture (a).

(a) Taken from Vedelius, in the preface of his Ecclesiaſtes Catholicus, printed at Franeker in the year 1641, in 12mo.

[A] He preſumed too much upon the force of his pretended arguments.] Some of his rodomontados appear in the following words of Vedelius: 'Placet autem Schillerus in labore iſto ſibi adeò, ut capite nono glorietur libellum ſuum eſſe invictum & irrefutabilem: concidere per eum, totum miniſterium Evangelicorum, Confeſſionem Auguſtanam, formulam Concordiæ, Catecheſes, Reformationem, pretenſionem SUB UTRAQUE & omnia. Etiam quemvis indoctum & imperitum Scripturæ Laicum poſſe omnia noſtra beneficio ſui tractatus refutare, & è contrario totam Catholicam, ut loquitur, Religionem defendere. Hinc capita ſingula ferè Thraſonicâ jactatione concludit: Quid quæſo, ait, adverſum hæc dici poteſt? Et cap. 14. ex argumentis ſuis quibus probare volebat Eccleſiam Romanenſem habere aſſiſtentiam perpetuam Spiritus S. educit conſequentias, quas irrefragabiliter inde ſequi pronunciat. Eodemque capite gloriatur ſe poſuiſſe fundamentum Catholicæ veritatis, quod nullo modo everti & concuti poſſit; idque adeo declarâſſe & probâſſe ut etiam idiota & Scripturæ Sacræ ignarus quivis homo non ſolum tuto & infallibiliter ſuperſtruere poſſit omnes & ſingulos articulos ſuæ Catholicæ Religionis & fidei, ſed etiam omnibus Hæreticis uno ictu os obturare, & omnes ipſorum fidei Confeſſiones proſternere queat, &c. Sic ille ipſe de ſuo opere judicat oblitus cum reliquâ veritate etiam moniti à Spiritu S. profecti: laudet te os alienum, &c (1). -- Schillerus, ſays he, is ſo pleaſed with this performance, that in the ninth chapter he proudly aſſerts his book to be unanſwerable: and that by it the whole miniſtry of the Proteſtants, the confeſſion of Augſburg, their form of concord, their catechiſm, reformation, their pretenſions of communicating in both ſpecies, &c. fall to the ground at once. That by the help of his treatiſe any ignorant layman is able to confute all our arguments, and to defend every part of the Catholic religion, as he calls it. There is ſcarce a chapter which he does not end with a vain-glorious inſult: and what, ſays he, can be anſwered to theſe things? In the fourteenth chapter, where he endeavours to prove the continual preſence of the Holy Ghoſt with the Church of Rome, he draws conſequences from his arguments, which, as he ſays, follow inconteſtibly. And in the ſame chapter he boaſts, that he had laid down a true and unalterable foundation for the Catholic truth; and this he pretends to have made ſo certain, and clear, that any ſimple or illiterate man, who knows nothing of the Bible, may not only ſafely and infallibly build every article of his Catholic faith upon it, but may likewiſe be capable of putting Heretics to ſilence, and demoliſhing all their creeds at a blow, &c. In this manner does he extol his own work, forgetting, among other ſacred truths, the wholſome advice of the Scripture, which ſays, Let the mouth of another commend thee, &c.' Vedelius undertook to confute him, becauſe he heard that a Proteſtant gentleman, being ſtaggered with the reading of his book, was ready to fly off. He ſpent no more than eleven days in confuting him, amidſt his other public and private buſineſs (2). His anſwer contains 125 pages in 12mo.

(1) Nicol. Videlius, Præfation. Eccleſiaſt. Catholici, folio d 2.

(2) Idem, ibid.

SCHILLING (CHRISTOPHER) was one of the learned men of the XVIth century, eſpecially in Greek (a). He was a native of Franckenſtein in Sileſia, and taught firſt at Hirſchberg in his own country, and afterwards in the Palatinate, and at laſt he was admitted Phyſician in the univerſity of Padua. The reaſon that made him leave Hirſchberg, was becauſe he had a diſpute concerning the Euchariſt with Balthaſar Tileſius, miniſter of that place; for he inſerted in the Catechiſm which he dictated to his diſciples, certain things which he had of Melanchthon (b), and which did not pleaſe Tileſius. The concluſion of this diſpute was, that Schilling loſt his place, as I have already obſerved in the article of David PAREUS. He retired into the Palatinate, and was made rector of the college, which the Elector Frederic III founded at that time at Amberg. It was in the year 1566. He was afterwards rector of the college of Heidelberg, from whence, I think, he went away becauſe of ſome diſpute about precedency. He is an author [A].

(a) See the Life of David Pareus, pag. m. 8, 11, 12, 25.

(b) He had been Melanchthon's Diſciple at Wittemberg for the ſpace of nine years.

[A] He is an author.] There is a collection of his Greek and Latin poems, printed at Geneva in the year 1580 (1), and ſome letters upon queſtions of Phyſic, in a collection of pieces printed in 1598 at Francfort (2).

(1) Konig, Bibl. pag. 734.

(2) Linden, renovat. p. 180.

SCHOMBERG (NICOLAS OF) Cardinal and Archbiſhop of Capua in the XVIth century, was a German, of the noble and ancient family of Schomberg in Miſnia. He had been a Dominican friar, and it was Savonarola who gave him the habit at Florence in 1497 (a), and who by his preaching had ſtirred up in him a deſire of entring into that order; for Schomberg travelled into Italy only out of curioſity. He had ſeveral employments among the Dominicans; he taught Divinity at Rome and Florence; he was prior in a convent of the latter city, and was made Procurator-general of that order by the choice of the famous Thomas de Vio who was General of it, and who has made himſelf ſo well known under the name of Cardinal

(a) According to Seckendorf, Hiſt. Luther. lib. iii, pag. 93. It was in the year 1495.

Cajetan. Leo X (b) gave to Schomberg the Archbiſhopric of Capua in the year 1520. Clement VII made him one of his moſt intimate counſellors, and ſent him into France to negotiate a peace between Charles V and Francis I. As he was not a very acceptable man to the French, he had much ado to obtain leave to be at the conferences of Cambray, where he contributed much to the peace that was concluded there. Paul III made him a cardinal-prieſt by the title of Saint Sixtus in the year 1535 (c). It is ſaid that even before he was made a cardinal, he had like to have been elected Pope in the conclaves, wherein Hadrian VI and Clement VII were choſen (d). He preached five ſermons before Pope Julius II upon the temptation of JESUS CHRIST, which were much eſteemed [A]. There are ſome of his letters in the collection of thoſe of princes (e), and one among the reſt upon the death of Sir Thomas More chancellor of England (f). It is ſaid that he was couſin of the nun who was married to Luther (g). He died at Rome September 29, 1537, aged a little more than ſixty-five years, and was buried in the convent della Minerva near Cardinal Cajetan his good friend (h). Conſult the Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm by Seckendorf, pag 92. lib. iii. You will find a fine elogy upon this prelate prefixed to each of the two dialogues of Alcyonius de Exilio.

(b) Cardinal Pallavicini, ubi infra ſays it was Clement VII.

(c) Ex Bibl. Ordin. Prædic. Altamuræ, p. 271.

(d) Id. ib. Rupipozæus, Nomenclat. Cardinal. pag. m. 125. Lettere di Principi, lib. iii, fol. 33. Ughellus, Tom. vi. in Archiep. Capuan.

(e) Oldoinus, Athen. Roman. pag. 506.

(f) It is to be found fol. 33, of the third book, printed at Venice in 1581.

(g) Palavic. Iſtor. del Concil. lib. iii, cap. xvii, ex Relatione Legati Soriani. Mr Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 92, denies it.

(h) Altamura, ubi ſupra.

[A] He preached five ſermons .... which were much eſteemed.] He preached them in the year 1505 (1). They were printed in the year 1511. The very next year they were re-printed at Leipſic (2), where they were alſo printed again in the year 1684 (3). becauſe the copies of them were become very ſcarce. Altamura had no reaſon to ſay, that theſe ſermons were preached before Leo X; for they came out of the preſs before the creation of that Pope.

(1) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, p. 93.

(2) By the care of John Schleiniz his couſin, Biſhop of Meiſſen. Seckend. ibid.

(3) Acta Erudítor. Lipſ. 1684. pag. 486.

SCHOMBERG (THEODORICUS OF) a German gentleman, ſerved in the army of the Reiſters, which Prince John Caſimir, ſon of the Elector Palatine brought into France, to the aſſiſtance of the Proteſtants in the year 1567, and performed a very courageous action at the paſſage of the river Seine [A]. He continued afterwards to do a great many good ſervices, till he was killed at the battle of Ivri in the year 1590, having given great proofs of his valour, and contributed notably to the victory which Henry IV gained (a).

(a) Thuanus, lib. xcviii. Divila, lib. xi.

[A] He performed a very courageous action at the paſſage of the river Seine.] The Royaliſts had caſt into the ford, planks nailed with circles and caltrops, and were in order of battle on the other ſide of the river. The Proteſtants placed four hundred Arquebuſiers, by the willows on the banks of the river, for a guard to thoſe who cleared the ford with rakes. Schomberg threw himſelf into the river a-croſs all this, and made ſo briſk a charge upon the enemy, that he killed forty upon the ſpot, and brought two ſtandards to the Prince of Condé, who having no order of knighthood to give him, put about his neck a chain worth two-hundred crowns at the head of the army (1).

(1) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, livr. iv, ch. xv.

SCHOMBERG (GASPER DE) Count of Nanteuil, a German gentleman of an ancient family in Miſnia [A], being in France during the religious wars, was ſo much eſteemed, that Charles IX took him into his ſervice. He was at firſt engaged in the Huguenot party; for while he ſtudied at Angers in the year 1562, he put himſelf at the head of the Proteſtants, to hinder the Catholics from making themſelves maſters of that city (a); but not having ſucceeded in his deſign, he retired to the Prince of Condé, who ſent him into Germany to carry letters to the Duke of Deux-Ponts, to haſten the levies that were expected from him, and to the Landgrave of Heſſe, to obtain aſſiſtance of men and money. He became afterwards a Royaliſt, and very much thwarted the deſigns of his firſt maſter. He hindred him dexterouſly [B] in the year 1568 from being ſuccoured by the troops of the Prince of Orange. He was often ſent into Germany to make levies there, and acquitted himſelf with a great deal of honour in the command that he had of thoſe troops (b). But he was not leſs fit for the cabinet than for the field, as he plainly made it appear in many important negotiations. Thuanus, who negotiated with him the accommodation of the Duke of Mercœur, and many affairs concerning the edict of Nantes, does very much commend him (c): he aſſures us, that he was a man of great wit, and of an admirable prudence, very

(a) Thuan. lib. xxx.

(b) Magnis Germanorum exercitibus cum ſupremi caſtrorum Tribuni dignitate præfuit. Thuanus, lib. cxxii. Mr le Laboureur, Addit. to the Memoirs of Caſtelnau, ſays that he had that command under the title of Colonel of the Black Bands.

(c) See Thuanus's Life and his Hiſtory, lib. cxxii, ad ann. 1599.

[A] Of an ancient family in Miſnia.] I remember to have read the funeral oration of Henry de Schomberg, ſon of this gentleman, pronounced at Toulouſe by Peter de Bertier, who was afterwards Biſhop of Montauban. I have forgot the words he made uſe of to celebrate the high birth of the deceaſed: I can nevertheleſs affirm, that he gave out that his anceſtors had been raiſed to the moſt eminent employments in Saxony, and that they had been of the firſt rank for many ages in thoſe parts. But Mr de Seckendorf obſerves, that his family was never raiſed in Germany to the dignity of a count; and that Gaſpar de Schomberg was of a branch collateral to that of Cardinal de Schomberg. See his Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm, book 3. p. 92.

[B] He dexterouſly hindred.] I ſhall make uſe of the very words of d'Aubigné. 'Near Soiſſons, ſays he (1), Gaſpard Schomberg came by the king's order to the prince (2), with whom he treated of a general agreement to aſſiſt his army with money, and make them return into Germany; but he privately managed the greateſt part of the captains ſo well, that when the Prince ſpoke to them of going to join the Prince of Condé, he found them all cold divines, and bad partiſans, diſcourſing of the juſtice of war, without forgetting the right of kings, and the affairs they had in their own country. Schomberg went away, having received ſome abuſive language, and even a box of the ear from Genlis; and the Prince was forced to go towards Straſbourg, and ſell 'his very ſkillful in the affairs of war, dextrous and experienced in negotiations, of a manly perſuaſive eloquence, of a ſingular probity, civil, magnificent, officious and obliging to every body. He gave evidence of a particular zeal for the good and glory of France, under three kings ſucceſſively, during the ſpace of thirty-five years. He loved learned men; and, to ſay all in few words, he did every thing with ſo much honour and diſintereſtedneſs, that neither the dignities with which he was inveſted, nor the great affairs that went through his hands both in peace and war, prevented his leaving a great many debts behind him. He died of a ſudden death in his coach near St Antony's gate in returning from Conflans, where he had aſſiſted at a council held there by Henry IV, to name commiſſioners for executing the edict of Nantes. It was on the fifteenth of March 1599. He had been naturalized in 1570, and made ſome time after governor of the upper and lower Marche (d). He had married Joan Chateigner de la Rochepozai, widow of Henry Clutin Sieur d'Oiſel, ambaſſador of France at Rome, by whom he had two ſons and three daughters [C]. I could not diſcover for a long time whoſe ſon the young Schomberg was, who was killed at the famous duel of Quelus and Entraguet in the year 1578 (e). He was one of the ſeconds of the latter; and this was the firſt time that ſeconds fought (f): but at laſt I have found in Father Anſelme (g) that he was brother to our Gaſpar de Schomberg.

(1) D'Aubigné, Hiſtoire Univerſelle, Tom. i, livr. v, ch. xxviii, pag. m. 482.

(2) That is, to the Prince of Orange.

Thoſe who have a mind to ſee a particular account of his actions and employments, with remarks upon the antiquity of his family and the glory of his anceſtors, need only conſult the elogies of Sammarthanus (b).

(d) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 248.

(e) Journal de Henri III.

(f) Mezerai, Abregé Chronolog. Tom. v, pag. 231, ad ann. 1578.

(g) Pag. 678, of Tom. i, of the Palais de l'Honneur.

(b) You find there at the end of the fifth book, Abelii Sammarthani Scævolæ F. Elogium illuſtriſſimæ gentis Schombergiæ.

‘ his plate, his tapeſtry, his moveables, and his ſpare ‘ cloaths, dividing all among the chiefs, and giving ‘ them (if not what he ought) at leaſt what he could; ‘ and afterwards he mortgaged to them the principality of Orange and Montfort, promiſing to pay ‘ them the intereſt and principal within twelve years: ‘ And he and thoſe, who were better minded, joined ‘ the Duke of Deux-Ponts, who was then preparing ‘ for the wars of France.’ See Mr Varillas in the life of Charles IX, in the year 1568, but eſpecially Thuanus lib. 43. in the ſame year.

[C] Two ſons and three daughters.] HENRY, of whom I give an article; HANNIBAL, who was killed in the war of Hungary againſt the Turks; CATHERINE, who died before her father, without leaving any children by her marriage with Lewis de Barbançon, Sieur de Cany; MARGARET, who was not married, and FRANCES, who left children by her marriage with Francis de Daillon, Count du Lude (3).

(3) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 248.

SCHOMBERG (HENRY DE) ſon of the foregoing, was a Marſhal of France, and of a much diſtinguiſhed merit, not only for his brave actions, but alſo for his excellent qualities. One may ſee an account of his employs and actions in Mr Moreri, who has copied it out of Father Anſelme. He might alſo have copied what follows (a), viz. That Henry de Schomberg was firſt married in the year 1599, to Frances d'Epinai (b), ſiſter and heireſs to Charles Marquis d'Epinai in Bretagne; and afterwards, in 1631 to Anne de la Guiche, daughter and heireſs to Philibert de la Guiche, Great-Maſter of the Ordnance of France. He had by his firſt wife Charles de Schomberg, of whom I ſhall ſpeak below, and a daughter who was married to Roger du Pleſſis, Duke de la Roche-Guyon, Knight of the king's orders, and firſt gentleman of the bed-chamber. By the ſecond marriage he had a poſthumous daughter, who was baptized at Paris the fifth of March 1633, and who was married to Charles de Rohan, Duke of Mombazon, and Prince of Guemené.

(a) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, p. 248.

(b) She died the ſixth of January, 1602.

SCHOMBERG (CHARLES DE) ſon of the foregoing, was Duke of Haluïn by his marriage with the ducheſs of that name, and Marſhal of France. You may ſee an account of his dignities and exploits in Moreri, copied word by word from Father Anſelme (a). He ſhould alſo have copied that Anne Ducheſs of Haluïn (b), his wife, died of the ſmall Pox at Nanteuil, without iſſue, in November 1641 and that he was married again on the twenty-fourth of September 1646, to Mary de Hautefort, tire-woman to the queen, and daughter to Charles, Marquis de Hautefort, by whom he had no children. This Mary de Hautefort, was much celebrated, for her virtue, by Scarron and other Poets: but a modern ſatiriſt has given her a furious ſtab [A]. Lewis XIII had (a) Hiſtoire des grands Officiers, pag. 257.

(b) The book intituled, L'Etat preſent de la France, printed in 1657, ſays pag. 89, that this Anne d'Haluïn's ſecond huſband, was Henry de Foix, and de la Valette, Count de Candale, eldeſt ſon of the late Duke d'Epernon, from whom ſhe cauſed herſelf to be divorced, in order to marry Monſ. de Schomberg.

[A] A modern ſatiriſt has given her a furious ſtab.] It is the author of a book which was printed at the Hague (1), in the year 1687, with this title; Memoires de Mr L. C. D. R. concernant ce qui s'eſt paſſe de plus particulier ſous le regne du Cardinel de Richelieu, & du Cardinal Mazarin. It is not well known who writ this book (2); it is only gueſſed that it was one who had been ſecretary to the Counteſs de Soiſſons, neice to Cardinal Mazarin. He has, without doubt, a great deal of wit; but there never was ſuch a packer of all ſorts of ſtories, nor ſuch a compiler of all the ſatirical rhapſodies that are to be picked up in the taverns and armies. There is nothing more falſe than than what we read in the firſt tome of the Mêlanges of Vigneul Marville (3) in theſe words: ‘ From that ‘ time (4), the Petits Maîtres were not heard of till ‘ the time of cardinal de Richelieu, who kept in his ‘ ſervice a certain number of bold and reſolute fellows, ‘ whom he employed in the execution of his deſigns. ‘ Rochefort, whoſe memoirs are publiſhed, was one ‘ of them.’ This pretended Rochefort was either not born, or at leaſt was very young when this cardinal died. Be this how it will, he ſays, pag. 93. That the Ducheſs of Chevreuſe was apprehenſive, leſt la Porte whom, though he was a Taylor by trade, ſhe had taken into her bed, ſhould ſacrifice her to the wife of the Mareſchal of Schomberg, who, after having reſiſted the king's addreſſes, could not, according to common fame, defend herſelf from a perſon ſo meanly deſcended. Before I mention what the Abbot Faydit has pubilſhed on this

(1) The title ſays A Cologne, chez Pierre Marteau.

(2) He is the ſame man who for a long time wrote the Hiſtorical and Political Mercury, who compoſed the Life of Mr de Turenne, the Memoirs d'Artagnan, of the Marchioneſs de Freſne, the the Annals of the Court and Paris, the Converſations of Colbert and Bouin, the Memoirs of Fontaine, of the Marquis de Mombrun, &c. He came back to Holland after the peace of Ryſwic, and took the name of Mr de Milli. His true name is De Courtille: he is of Champagne.

(3) Pag. 324, of the firſt edition of Rouën.

(4) That is from the time of Henry III.

had a great kindneſs for her, and ſhe ſuffered a diſgrace which rather heightned than diminiſhed her reputation [B].

this ſubject, I ſhall make this little remark; that the time that is allotted for this affair, is that which paſſed between the death of Cardinal de Richelieu, and that of Lewis XIII. Now at that time the Marſhal de Schomberg had not married the lady in queſtion; and therefore, it is an abſurd thing to give her that title. Let us ſee what the Abbot Faydit ſays.

I confeſs, ſays he, 'That what determined me, when I compoſed my book (5), to ſet down at length the paſſage of Celſus, was only the deſign I had effectually to comfort, by the example of the moſt bleſſed virgin, a moſt virtuous lady, whoſe honour was attacked by a moſt unjuſt and cruel calumny. Thoſe who know me, are not ignorant that I have a long time made profeſſion of honouring an illuſtrious Ducheſs and Mareſchalleſs of France, who having been, in her youth, the ornament and admiration of the court, as well for her eminent piety as for her beauty and wit, is become, in her old age, the edification of all the town by the continual examples of her virtues, and the joy of all thoſe who ſee her, by the ſweetneſs of her converſation. But as there is nothing ſo pure but what is attacked by calumny, there is an inſolent ſcribbler, who in a book full of falſities, intituled, Memoires de M. L. C. D. R. has had the impudence to beſpatter with his venomous ſatire ſo fine a life, and without conſidering that this lady, of whom he ſpeaks ſo ill, is the ſame whom the poets, who are naturally ſatirical, called in her youth Sainte Haut .... (6): he has not been afraid, with the baſeſt and moſt ridiculous detraction that could be thought of, to give her for a galant, a man whom ſhe had never either ſeen or known. Going one day to viſit her, I found her a little aſtoniſhed to ſee herſelf ſo baſely treated in that impertinent book: I could not forbear telling her, on purpoſe to comfort her, that the moſt bleſſed virgin herſelf, who was the pureſt of all creatures, had been either not able, or not willing, to eſcape the calumnies of inſolent men; and that a little after her death, a famous writer had the impudence to aſſert, That ſhe had lived in a criminal correſpondence with a ſoldier called PANTHER, and that he was the father of JESUS CHRIST. As this ſeemed new to her, and was beſides a proper ground of conſolation in her caſe; ſhe gave me to underſtand, that ſhe ſhould take it as a favour, if I would write out that paſſage for her (7).

I thought myſelf obliged not to leave out any thing in this diſcourſe; for it ſeemed to me, that every thing in it might be of ſome uſe to one or other. I will add one obſervation; which is, that ſo many perſons ought not to be ſuffered to have the boldneſs to defame the greateſt names. I know ſeveral perſons, who are very much grieved at the impunity of this licentiouſneſs. It would be more tolerable, if thoſe ſatirical authors were ſure of what they publiſh: but for the moſt part they have no certainty of it, and ſometimes they know they lie, and they would obſtinately refuſe to retract, if their calumnies were made evident. They would not imitate the act of an honeſt man, which is publiſhed in the Mercure Politique, for the month of December 1695. Let us copy the paſſage. Theſe are the words of the author of that work: 'Since I am upon the ſubject of the late Archbiſhop of Paris, I find myſelf obliged to ſay, that I am ſorry I have related *, what the author of l'Eſprit de Mr Arnaud, has ſaid of the Ducheſs de la Meilleraye. The author of that ſatire, who has advanced indiſcreetly, ſo many facts that are found to be falſe, has put her in the number of ſome ladies, with whom it is pretended that this archbiſhop was in a correſpondence of gallantry; and yet it is certain, that ducheſs never in her life ſpoke with that prelate. It is the teſtimony which all Paris gives her. I am convinced that Madam de la Meilleraye was little concerned at the report of this chimerical commerce upon the credit of an author, who will never paſs for canonical. I am very willing, notwithſtanding, for my own intereſt, to diſown what I have ſaid, tho' in truth I believed nothing of it, as I did plainly enough inſinuate. (8).

[B] Lewis XIII had a great kindneſs for her, and ſhe ſuffered a diſgrace, which rather heightned than diminiſhed her reputation.] One may ſee a pretty large account of this amour, in the Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France. Cardinal de Richelieu, as we are told, was much alarmed at this paſſion of the king, tho' Mademoiſelle de Hautefort had not the ſame penetration, nor a mind ſo capable of intrigues (9), as the firſt miſtreſs (10); he was alarmed, I ſay, after he diſcovered that ſhe was wholly governed by the counſels of Mademoiſelle de Chennerault (11). He and St Mars preſſed the king ſo much, that he ſent orders to thoſe two ladies to be gone preſently from the court, and they entred forthwith into a convent at Paris: But the cardinal would not let them ſtay long there; he obliged them to retire; Mademoiſelle de Chennerault into Poictou, and Mademoiſelle de Hautefort to one of her country ſeats, forty leagues from the court (12). This paſſion of the king was mixed with great reſpect, and great jealouſy. He durſt not take the leaſt liberty with that lady, as may be judged by what I am going to ſay. One day the queen having received a billet, of which ſhe was willing to make a myſtery, pinned it to the tapeſtry of her chamber, that ſhe might not forget to anſwer it, and the king coming in a little while after, the queen not deſiring that he ſhould ſee it, commanded Madam de Hautefort, who was her lady of honour, to take it, and hold it faſt, which ſhe did. The king would needs take it from her, and they ſtruggled a pretty while in ſport; but Madam de Hautefort, not being able to defend herſelf any longer, put the billet in her boſom, which proved a ſure ſanctuary to it; for the king durſt not touch there, and had no more the curioſity to ſee it (13). That is a proof of his reſpect; here is another of his jealouſy. The Marquis de Gevres was killed, while all things were making ready for his marriage with Mademoiſelle de Hautefort. The king, 'entring ſome days after into her chamber, found her upon her knees before her praying-deſk, and coming ſoftly up to her, he ſaw that ſhe was reading the veſpers for the dead, and imagining that it was for the Marquis de Gevres, he conceived ſo ſtrong a jealouſy, that he would not for ſix weeks hear her ſpoken of, tho' he himſelf had propoſed the match; which may be attributed to the uſual caprices of love, which often looks upon, as an evil, the things that it has earneſtly wiſhed for (14).' I deſire to be looked upon here, only as a copyer; for I will not warrant that this author is exact, as to the bottom of this affair, and much leſs, that he has not made tranſpoſitions of times and places. I have ſome ſcruple about this ſtory, in the Continuation of the Menagiana. Madem. de Schomberg de Hautefort, was one of the ladies that Lewis XIII uſed to ſee; but ſhe was diſguſted with the court, and retired to the Magdelonnettes. The Abbot de la Victoire going thither to ſee her, ſaid to her: Madam, is it then to honour the king that you are retired hither (15)? I make upon this three obſervations. 1. This lady could never be called Mademoiſelle de Schomberg; for the latter name came only by her marriage with the Marſhal de Schomberg. 2. Her retreat from the court was againſt her will. 3. It is very odd, that among ſo many ſorts of convents, ſhe ſhould chuſe the Magdelonnettes, a place in ſome manner deſigned for publick penance. This made me doubt of her having retired thither; but I have been well informed that ſhe did.

As to what further concerns her, ſhe was a ſecond time diſgraced under the regency of Anne of Auſtria. See the ſtanzas that Benſerade made upon that ſubject (16).

---

(5) Viz. The abſtract of a ſermon preached on St Polycarp's day in the church of St John en Greve at Paris, with the proofs of the facts alledged therein. That book was printed in the year 1689, ſee pag. 36.

(6) Scarron did it.

(7) The Abbot Faydit, Suplément à la Diſſertation ſur le Sermon de Saint Polycarpe.

* It is in the ſixth volume, for the month of Auguſt, p. 189.

(8) Mercure Hiſtorique & Politique, December 1695, pag. 661, 662.

(9) Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France, Tom. ii, pag. 183, Edit. 1695.

(10) Madam de la Fayette, whom the cardinal had removed from the court.

(11) I think it ſhould be Chemerault.

(12) Intrig. Galantes, ibid. pag. 186.

(13) Ibid. p. 184.

(14) Ibid. p. 115.

(15) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 379, Dutch Edit.

(16) They are in the 5th volume of the collection of the beſt pieces of the French Poets, printed in 1692, p. 187, of the Dutch Edition.

SCHOMBERG (Frederic de) created Marſhal of France on the thirtieth of July, in the year 1675, and killed at the famous paſſage of the Boyne in Ireland, on the tenth of July 1690, was one of the greateſt captains of his time, and commanded armies under more kings, and was raiſed to eminent dignities in more countries than any other. He would deſerve a long article here; but not having received the memoirs which I expected, I am forced to refer it to another time. He is one of thoſe great men, whoſe Hiſtory ought to be written by an able pen. I do not doubt but that the Duke of Schomberg, his worthy ſon, has already thought of procuring this honour to his family (a), and this fine preſent to the common-wealth of learning.

In the mean time, one may be informed of many things, by conſulting the memoires of Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt, publiſhed in the year 1700. You will find an extract of them in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans - - - Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, for the month of November 1700.

(a) It is different from that of the Marſhals of Schomberg, mentioned in the foregoing articles. See Seckendorf, Hiſtor. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 93, litera b, where he ſhews that their ſeat was upon the Rhine, in the dioceſe of Triers. Theodoric de Schomberg, de quo ſupra, was of this family, if we believe the State of France, Tom ii, pag. 166, Edit. 1680.

SCHORUS (Antony) a native of Hoochſtraten in Brabant (a), was one of the beſt Grammarians of the XVIth century. He laboured very diligently to introduce Cicero's Latin into the ſchools (b), and compoſed ſome books very uſeful for that purpoſe [A]. A comedy, which he made his ſcholars act at Heidelberg, where he taught the Belles Lettres, was the cauſe that he was forced to fly [B]. He died at Lauſanne, in the year 1552 (c).

(a) Valer. Andr. Bibliotheca Belg. pag. 76.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. & Simlerus, in Epitom. Bibl. Geſneri, p. 67.

[A] He compoſed ſome books very uſeful for that purpoſe.] That which is called Theſaurus Ciceronianus, is a methodical abridgment of Robert Stephens, and of the obſervations of Nizolius. His Phraſes Linguæ Latinæ, ratioque obſervandorum eorum in authoribus legendis quæ præcipuam ac ſingularem vim aut uſum habent, were printed at Baſil in 1550 (1), and afterwards re-printed a great many times (2). They printed at Straſbourg in 1549, his two books de ratione diſcendæ docendæque Latinæ & Græcæ Linguæ (3).

[B] A comedy . . . . was the cauſe that he was forced to fly.] This comedy was only acted in his own houſe, in the preſence of few people: Nevertheleſs, it made a noiſe, which ſoon reached the emperor's ears, and obliged him to give orders that this fault ſhould not go unpuniſhed. The Elector Palatine, Frederic II, having read the emperor's letter to him about it, was much troubled; he knew nothing of the matter; but he quickly informed himſelf of it. Schorus made his eſcape; ſome of his ſcholars were impriſoned by the rector of the univerſity. Here is the ground of the complaint. This comedy introduced religion, deſiring to be lodged with great men; they ſhut the doors againſt her; ſhe addreſſed herſelf at laſt to perſons of the meaneſt rank, who gave her a lodging. What will people think of the great ones, ſaid the emperor, if it be once permitted to decry them upon the ſtage as the perſecutors of religion? You will find this account in the thirteenth book of the annals of Hubert Leodius. A modern author has cited this, to ſhew that comedies may be permitted (4), and he obſerves, that in England and the Low-Countries, the liberty of the comedians was very ſerviceable to the introduction of the Reformation. Sæpe actores quam artificioſe perſtringunt vitia inveterata publiceque graſſantia, quod alii certe vix tanta cum παῤῥησίᾳ auderent. Nec abſque fructu: prout contigit circa Reformationis initia in Anglia, uti obſervavit vir pietate atque doctrina conſpicuus Johannes Foxus in Hiſtoria Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ. Similiter in Belgio comœdiæ, à viris doctis ſcriptæ, cum exhiberent quam graphice in Theatro Babylonis turpitudinem, haut parum ſub initium Reformationis quam plurimos commoverunt, nec minus cum fructu ſpectatorum proſtituerunt Antichriſtianam doctrinam, quam Orthodoxam veritatem eidem oppoſitam aſſeruerunt (5). I muſt needs ſay here, that in 1558, there was acted at Rochelle, before the King and Queen of Navarre (6), a comedy, which repreſented the abuſes of Popery, and the remedy that might be brought to it out of Scripture. The clergy was offended at it, and made complaints to the King of Navarre himſelf (7). Mr Vincent, Miniſter of Rochelle, adds to the recital of this adventure a ſolid reflexion. 'I do not think, ſays he (8), That, under pretence of 'the hiſtorical account I have given, it will be im'puted to me, that I pretend to authorize this man'ner of treating things that belong to religion. . . . '(9). If it be true, as it was loudly ſaid at Ro'chelle, that all this (10) came from Joan d'Albret, 'Queen of Navarre, who would, in her turn (11), 'make uſe of the liberty of the ſtage, to make it tell 'truths, which the doctors of the Church of Rome 'had but too juſtly drawn upon themſelves (12); we 'cannot at all give our approbation to it. We 'know that religion is too grave and too holy to be 'brought upon the ſtage under any pretence whatſo'ever, and that ſhe is too much an enemy of the world, 'and its fooliſh vanities, to beg aid of its miniſters. 'Nevertheleſs, as God is admirable in all his ways, 'and knows how to draw good out of evil when he 'pleaſes; and as, to correct a prophet that was go'ing aſtray from his duty, he made an aſs ſpeak*: He 'permitted here one of the ſtages of the world to 'ſpeak, ſince the pulpits were ſilent; he permitted, I 'ſay, to the ſhame of the paſtors of that time, that 'ſome comedians, whoſe profeſſion it is to repreſent 'fables, ſhould at that time be doctors of truth, ſince 'the paſtors, whoſe buſineſs it was to preach that 'truth, did no longer teach any thing but fables.'

(1) Epitom. Bibl. Geſneri, p. 67.

(2) I make uſe of the Cologn edition 1595, in 8vo.

(3) Epitom. Bibl. Geſneri, p. 67.

(4) Martinus Schoockius, Exercit. xxix, pag. 507, 508.

(5) Id. ib. pag. 507.

(6) Antony de Bourbon and Joan d'Albret.

(7) Vincent, Recherches ſur les commencemens & les premiers progrés de la Reformation en la Ville de la Rochelle, pag. 40. See above the ſecond article NAVARRE, remark [E].

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 40, 41.

(9) Id. ib. p. 43.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 42.

(11) To underſtand this, the reader ought to know that the author had been ſpeaking of a dramatic piece acted at Paris, in the college of Navarre, againſt Margaret de Valois, mother to Joan d'Albret. See above the firſt article NAVARRE, citat. (22).

(12) Id. ib. p. 43.

* Num. xxii. 28.

SCOT (Reginald) an Engliſh gentleman, compoſed a book, whereof all the copies that could be found were burnt (a). He endeavoured to ſhew, that all the accounts of Magicians and witches are chimerical. The firſt part of this work was tranſlated into Dutch, and printed in 1609, and made a great impreſſion upon the readers (b). Mr Voëtius complains much of it [A].

(a) Voët. ubi infra, pag. 544.

(b) Voët. Diſputat. Theol. Tom. iii, pag. 573.

[A] Mr Voëtius complains much of it.] The paſſage I am going to cite, will ſerve both for a proof of, and a comment on this article. 'Reginaldus Scot (1) 'nobilis Anglus magiæ crimen apertè negavit, & ex 'profeſſo oppugnavit, omnes ejus mirabiles effectus 'aut ad melancholiam, alioſve naturales morbos, 'aut ad artem, induſtriam, & agilitatem hominum 'figmentis & præſtigiis ſuis illudentium, aut ad ſtolidas imaginationes, dictorum magorum, aut ad vanas 'nugas & fictiones eorundem magorum referens. Ejus 'liber tit. Diſcovery of witchcraft in Anglia combuſtus 'eſt; quem nominatim etiam perſtringit Sereniſſ. 'Magnæ Britanniæ Rex Jacobus in Dæmonologia, eum'que tangit diffuſiſſimæ eruditionis Theologus Johan'nes Raynoldus, in cenſ. lib. Apocryph. tom. 2. prælect. '169 (2). In eundem, ſed innominatum calamum 'ſtrinxit eximius & ſubacti judicii Theologus Gulielm. 'Perkinſius in tractatu de Baſcanologia. Pars libri iſtius

(1) He calls him twice Schot, pag. 544.

(2) It ſhould be 196. That fault proceeds from a tranſpoſition of figures, which is a thing but too common among Printers.

‘ Reginaldi Scot elenctica (nam reliqua in editione Anglicana conjurationes continebat) in Belgicum idioma tranſlata eſt, ante annos aliquot Lugd. Batav. per Thomam Baſſon; ex illius libri lectione, ſeu fonte perenni, non pauci ab illo tempore docti & indocti in Belgio fluctuare, & de Magia σκεπτικίζειν ac λιβερτινίζειν, (ut Libertinis & Semilibertinis infeſta eſt patria noſtra) quin eo ignorantiæ ſæpe prolabi, ut non iniquè illis applicari potuerit, quod Sereniſſ. Rex Jacobus in Dæmonologia ſubdito ſuo Reginaldo Scot: eſſe quaſi novos Sadducæos: cum omnes diabolorum operationes, & apparitiones ſuaviter exibilant, tanquam anicularum, aut ſuperſtitionis meticuloſæ phantaſmata ac fabellas (3). An Engliſh nobleman openly denied, and profeſſedly wrote againſt the crime of witchcraft, imputing all it's wonderful effects either to melancholy and other natural diſtempers, or to the art, induſtry, and agility of men, that delude people with their ſubtle contrivances and tricks, or to the fooliſh imaginations, idle talk, and groundleſs fictions of thoſe called witches. His book intituled, The diſcovery of witchcraft, was burnt in England. His moſt ſerene majeſty James, King of Great Britain, ſtrikes at it by name in his Dæmonologia. John Raynold, a divine of a moſt extenſive learning, touches upon it in his cenſure on the Apocryphal books. Againſt the ſame book, tho' without naming it, William Perkins, an excellent divine, and of a well formed judgment, alſo exerciſed his pen. The reaſoning part of this book of Scot, was tranſlated into Dutch ſome years ago at Leyden by Thomas Baſſon. From the reading of that book, as from a perpetual ſpring, not a few from that time in Holland, both learned and unlearned, began to waver and to grow Scepticks and Libertines in the article of witchcraft, (as our country is very much peſtered with Libertines and Half-libertines) nay, to ſuch a depth of ignorance do they often fall, that what King James in his Dæmonologia ſaid of his ſubject Reginald Scot, may be very juſtly applyed to them: that they are a kind of new Sadduces: Since they laugh at all the operations and apparitions of devils, accounting them no better than the fantoms and ſtories of old women, or of a fearful ſuperſtition.’

SCHULTINGIUS (CORNELIUS) a licentiate in Divinity and canon of St Andrew at Cologn towards the latter end of the XVIth century, was of Steinwich (a) in Over-Yſſel. He applied himſelf very much to controverſy, and after having publiſhed ſeveral books againſt the Proteſtants [A], he undertook as his maſter-piece to confute the Inſtitution of Calvin. He thought this would be attacking them in their chief fortreſs (b). I ſhall ſpeak of this confutation, and thereby make a ſupplement to what I have ſaid already (c) upon the editions of that book of Calvin [B]. There is a great

[A] Several books againſt the Proteſtants.] Valerius Andreas gives us the following catalogue. Edidit Eccleſiaſticæ Diſciplinæ Libros VI. Coloniæ. Bibliothecam Eccleſiaſticam. Ibid. 1599, & 1602. Opus variarum Lectionum & Animadverſionum adverſus Libr. I. Inſtitutionum Joan. Calvini. Ibid. 1601. 4. Refutationem totius Theologiæ Calvinianæ, præſertim Inſtitutionum ejuſdem Calvini. Ibid. 4. Theſaurum Antiquitatum Eccleſiaſticarum, è VII prioribus Annalium Baronii Tomis, contra Centuriatores Magdeburgenſes ac Calviniſtas, totidem Tomis ordine Alphabetico contextum. Ibid. Tragicomœdiam Conſtantini Magni & S. Helenæ. Ibid. 1602. Confeſſionem Hieronymianam, è D. Hieronymi Operibus juxta Locorum Theologicorum capita. Tomis IV, apud Mylium, 1584. fol. Denique Hierarchiam Anacryſin adverſus varios Calviniſtarum Libros & celebratas ab iiſdem Synodos. Ibidem apud Herm. Hobergium, 1604 (1). The Oxford catalogue takes notice that the Bibliotheca Eccleſiaſtica, ſeu Commentarius de explicatione Miſſalis & Breviarii, comprehends four volumes, and that the Variæ Lectiones & Animadverſiones contra Inſtitutiones Calvini & Petri Martyris Locos communes, comprehends five, printed in the year 1602. The whole title of this book will be ſeen in the following remark. Valerius Andreas is not at all diſtinct upon this head: he has firſt taken notice of what the author publiſhed againſt the firſt book of Calvin's Inſtitution; and afterwards he has marked down, in a looſe manner, the confutation of the Inſtitution. He ſhould have ſaid that the Opus variarum Lectionum, &c. contains four volumes againſt the four books of the Inſtitution, and that they were printed in the year 1602, at Cologn, by Stephen Hemmerden, at the author's expence. Obſerve, he fancied that his books nettled the Heretics very much, and that his pen was ſo formidable to them that the Engliſh would not ſuffer what he publiſhed to be imported into their country. Mordere, ſugillare, arrodere Calviniſtæ non prætermittunt, cùm Hieronymianam Confeſſionem, de Diſciplina Eccleſiaſtica libros, Theſaurum Antiq. Eccleſiaſticarum, tum omnium maximè Bibliothecam Eccleſiaſticam, ſeu Comment. ſacros de explicatione Miſſalis & Breviarii, propter eorum cœnas, ritus, agendas, & formulas reprehenſas adeò in Anglia in primis exploſerunt, ut publicè prohibuerint in inſulam importari (2).

[B] I ſhall ſpeak of this confutation, and thereby make a ſupplement to what I have ſaid already upon the editions of Calvin's Inſtitution.] The title which Schultingius gave to the firſt volume of his book is Bibliothecæ Catholicæ & Orthodoxæ, contra ſummam totius Theologiæ Calvinianæ in Inſtitutionibus Joannis Calvini & Locis communibus Petri Martyris, breviter comprehenſæ: vel potius, Variarum Lectionum & Animadverſionum contra primum Librum Inſtitutionum Joannis Calvini Tomus primus. The title of the following volumes differs only from this in reſpect of the number as well of the volume, as of the book of the Inſtitution which is confuted. It may be affirmed, with reaſon, that this book of Schultingius is no more than an indigeſted heap of collections, and a laborious rhapſody. It is almoſt nothing but a piece compoſed of borrowed paſſages, and an index of the authors who have confuted Calvin on the matters in controverſy. The errors of pointing, and orthography, and all others, which Printers are liable to commit, are innumerable in it; but be this how it will, it may ſerve for a repertory, and I have found in it facts concerning Calvin's Inſtitution, which ſeemed to me very well worth being taken notice of, allowing them even to be fabulous.

Our canon begins with comparing Calvin's Inſtition and the common-places of Martyr (3). He finds in both the ſame diſpoſition of the ſubjects, the ſame order of books and chapters, and the ſame arguments againſt the Romiſh religion. He will not declare himſelf on either ſide of the queſtion, whether Calvin be the plagiary of Martyr, as ſome great men believe (4), or whether he took all from his own ſtock, as ſome others imagine; but however it be, he peremptorily decides that Martyr was a more learned man than Calvin. If he had read the preface to the common-places of Martyr, he would have known certainly how to regulate his opinion touching the queſtion of plagiariſm; for it appears by that preface that theſe common-places were drawn up and digeſted after the death of Martyr. Dr Burnet has made uſe of this obſervation to expoſe a miſtake of Mr Varillas (5). Let us remember that Martyr did not embrace the Proteſtant religion till the year 1542, and that he died three years after the laſt reviſal of Calvin's Inſtitution, from whence it follows that neither his common-places, nor even his other books, could have ſerved as models, nor as an original ground-work to the Inſtitution, the third edition of which, as enlarged by the author, was in the year 1543.

After that the canon obſerves the great credit which this book of Calvin's has obtained among the Proteſtants. He quotes (6) a miniſter (7), who has given an abridgement of it in the German tongue, and who aſſures us, that ſince the birth of JESUS CHRIST there has not appeared a more pious nor a more uſeful book than this. He ſays that Piſcator, in his epitome of the ſame book (8), and Beza, in the preface to his Confeſſion of Faith, make the ſame judgment of it; and that in England they want little great deal of paſſion and heat in the writings of this canon of Cologn: he obſerves that the

---

(3) Giſb. Voëtius, Diſputat. Theolog. Tom. iii, pag. 564, 565.

(a) From thence comes the firname of Lithocomus.

(b) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his firſt volume againſt the Inſtitution of Calvin.

(c) In the remarks [F] and [BB] of the article CALVIN.

(1) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belgic. pag. 164.

(2) Schulting. Epiſt Dedicat. Tom. i, Bibl. Catholicæ.

(3) Schulting. Tom. i, Biblioth. Cathol. pag. 1.

(4) Quod magni viri ſentiunt. Id. ibid.

(5) See the ſecond Criticiſm of Dr Burnet, upon Varillas's Hiſtory of Hereſy, p. 12, and following.

(6) Schulting. ubi ſupra, pag. 6.

(7) Caſpar Olerianus, miniſter of the Elector Palatine.

(8) Printed at Herborn in the year 1586.

little of preferring Calvin's Inſtitution to the Bible, that the biſhops order all the miniſters to get that book almoſt by heart; that they lay it upon the pulpit in their churches; that in Scotland they make the ſtudy of Divinity begin with the reading of this Inſtitution; that at Heidelberg, Geneva, Herborn, and in the Calviniſts univerſities, they expound it publickly; that in Holland the laymen as well as miniſters have it always in their hands, curiouſly bound. This is the ſubſtance of a more ample diſcourſe, which I ſhall quote entire, for the rarity of the fact, according to the Latin of the author. In Anglia ejus (Calvini) Inſtitutiones ipſis penè Biblicis ſcripturis præferuntur, mandant pſeudoepiſcopi omnibus miniſtris, ut penè ad verbum has ediſcant, nec unquam de manibus deponant, collocantur in templis ſublimi loco in pulpito, cuſtodiuntur tanta diligentia ac ſi Sibyllina forent oracula, quæ ſumma fidelitate apud Romanos aſſervata fuiſſe, veteres Romani ſcriptores tradidere †. In Scotia omnes ſtudioſi adoleſcentes poſt ſuſceptum gradum magiſterii, ſtudium Theologiæ ab his principiis nempe lectione Inſtitutionem incohant. Omnes Apoſtatæ Monachi, Sacerdotes, Canonici, quotquot à nobis ad ipſos deficiunt, jubentur initio ſuæ ſcilicet converſionis fundamenta prima Theologiæ ex hiſce Inſtitutionibus addiſcere, ut ex Synhodis eorum Belgicis collegi. Heidelbergæ, Genevæ, Herbornæ & in Univerſitatibus Calviniſtarum vel ipſæ Inſtitutiones, vel earum compendia publicè à doctoribus Studioſis Theologiæ explicantur. Hæ Inſtitutiones ab ipſis in omnes linguas vertuntur, ut omnium nationum homines hoc veneno peſtifero inficere, & corrumpere poſſint. In Belgio nullus eſt verbi miniſter & præco, nullus Senatorii ordinis vir paulò latior, nullus præſes vel præfectus, breviter, nullus ſacrarum literarum cupidus (omnes autem penè ſunt ejuſmodi in Theologia Calviniana verſati à ſupremo conſiliario uſque ad infimum aurigam & nautam) qui non haſce aureas ſcilicet eorum judicio Inſtitutiones nocturna verſet manu verſetque diurna, extrinſecus auro, purpura omnique precioſiſſimo ornatu veſtiunt & ornant tanquam præſtantiſſimam margaritam evangelicam & quaſi theſaurum cœlitus delapſum, ex his libris omnes controverſias decidunt & dijudicant (9). Every body perceives that there are too many hyperboles and childiſh exaggerations in this paſſage.

Let us ſee what he ſays upon the editions of Calvin's Inſtitution.

He finds that they became more correct in proportion as the author multiplied them, and therefore as the firſt is the moſt imperfect, the laſt, which is that of the year 1559, is the moſt perfect, it ſeems to him that Calvin, looking on that work as his favourite production, he applied his whole wit and vigour to correct, embelliſh, and enlarge it, to the end that he might therein give a very compleat ſyſtem, and a perfect idea of his Theology. Videtur autem mihi Joannes Calvinus, ab eo tempore quo ſcribere cœpit, deinceps uſque ad finem vitæ ſuæ, omne ſtudium ſuum omnemque operam & vires ad has inſtitutiones augendas, locupletandas ſic contuliſſe, ut ſuæ Theologiæ perfectam idæam & ſpecimen exhiberet (10). This notion agrees well enough with the preface which Calvin has put before the edition of the year 1559. Scultingius obſerves (11), that the firſt edition is of Baſil 1536, in 8vo; that the ſecond is of Straſbourg, 1539, in folio; that the third is of Geneva, 1545, in folio, and in 8*vo*; and the fourth is of Geneva, 1559, in folio, and in 8*vo*. That the edition which the univerſity of Heidelberg cauſed to be publiſhed in the year 1572, differs from the reſt in ſeveral things, and is the worſt of all; that two were publiſhed at Lauſanne, with notes; the one in the year 1576, the other in 1585: that the German tranſlation of Heildelberg differs prodigiouſly (12) from the text of John Calvin; that the firſt, viz. that of Baſil, 1536, is divided into no more than eight chapters (13), and contains no advertiſement to the reader; that the Geneva Catechiſm has been added to the third edition; that Bellarmin, in the fourth chapter of the firſt book de Pontifice, quotes an edition of the year 1554, and ſhews wherein it is contrary to the edition which followed; that the edition of Straſbourg, 1539, carries this title, Inſtitutio Chriſtianæ Religionis nunc vere demum ſuo titulo reſpondens, auctore Alcuino: Argentorati apud Wendelinum (14) menſe auguſto anno Domini 1. 5. 3. 9., and that before the Epiſtle Dedicatory are to be read theſe words, Potentiſſimo Illuſtriſſimoque Monarchæ magno Francorum Regi Principi ac Domino ſuo Alcuinus, which inſinuates that it is Alcuinus who addreſſes his diſcourſe to Charlemaign; the falſe name of Alcuinus having appeared in the firſt edition, they wrongfully put in the ſecond nunc demum ſuo titulo reſpondens (15); that many variations are found in the doctrine of Calvin when the different editions which he has given of this book are compared together (16); that the editions publiſhed by the Bookſellers, without his being concerned in them, vary ſtill more, they have added, changed, and left out, many things in them, according to the taſte of particular men: Si ſæpius & plures editiones inveniantur ſunt Typographorum non Calvini, ibi ſunt multa adjecta, mutata, ablata pro judicio privatorum hominum (17); that the method of this book is wonderful, and that it may be compared to the Inſtitutes of Juſtinian, which, as the Lawyers juſtly acknowledge, have been formed with ſo much order and ſymetry, that nothing can go beyond them. Methodus profecto adeò inſignis eſt & artificioſa ut cum Inſtitutionibus Juſtiniani conferri poſſint, quo Libro Jureconſulti meritò ſentiunt, nihil ſcriptum eſſe magis methodicè, niſi forte hoc alicui meritò diſplicere poſſit quod de Principiis Theologiæ (à quibus omnis ordiri debet diſputatio) non in 1. ſtatim libro, ut fieri oportuiſſe multi ſentient, ſed in ultimo libro 4. tractarit, nempè de auctoritate Eccleſiæ, Pontificis, Conciliorum & Sacræ Scripturæ. Methodum Albertus Pighius valdè laudat & filum orationis ac ſtylum dicendi (18). That as ſoon as this book of Calvin came out of the preſs at Straſbourg about the year 1545, Bernard Cincius, Biſhop of Aquila carried a copy of it to Cardinal Marcellus Cervinus, the Pope's legate, at the court of the emperor (19); that theſe two able men, being of opinion that this book was more dangerous than the other writings of the Lutherans (20), put Albertus Pighius upon examining it, who having judged that Calvin was an antagoniſt worthy of his notice, undertook to confute him; and that he began with the ſubject of Grace and of Free-will; upon which he publiſhed ten books againſt Calvin; that he had a deſign to publiſh others upon Juſtification and the principle of faith, but that death hindered him from finiſhing them. Hic (Albertus) Calvinum nequaquam contemnendum ſed dignum antagoniſten, quo cum congrederetur, in quem calamum ſtringeret, ac pro pietate & orthodoxa fide decertaret judicavit. Quo factum eſt, ut decem libros de gratia, & libero arbitrio contra Joan. Calvinum in lucem emiſerit, cui ſi diuturnior vita ſuperſtes fuiſſet, propoſuerat etiam de juſtificatione hominis, & de principiis credendorum contra eundem Calvinum ſcribere, & ad iſta tria primaria puncta eiſdemque annexa, nempè de gratia & libero arbitrio, de juſtificatione, de Principiis credendorum inchoatos non abſolvit, nec in lucem edidit (21).

Let us make ſome remarks upon this account of the canon of Cologn.

I. Firſt of all we muſt lay it down as a certain fact (22), that the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Inſtitution was dated from Baſil, not on the firſt of Auguſt 1536, as ſeveral editions have it, but on the firſt of Auguſt 1535, as it is to be ſeen in ſome others. It is a ſtrong preſumption that the firſt edition is of the year 1535, ſince it is highly probable that the book was compleat and ready for the preſs when the author dedicated his Epiſtle Dedicatory. If it was, we ſhould have room to conclude that the copy which is kept in the Library of Geneva (23), which wants the forty-two firſt pages, but which takes notice, at the end, that the impreſſion was finiſhed in the month of March 1536, is not the firſt edition; for if it were, we muſt ſay that Calvin left Baſil before his book was printed, and that the Printer made no great haſte, and did not finiſh the edition till the month of March 1536. This is not probable, and it is far leſs ſo than to ſuppoſe that a book ſo well written as this, and ſo fit for the times, was ſold off with ſo great diſpatch that it was very ſoon neceſſary to think of a ſecond edition, which was finiſhed in the month of March 1536. Obſerve well, that Theodore Beza aſſures us (24), that Calvin cauſed his Inſtitution to be printed at Baſil, and departed not from Baſil till after the edition of the book (25): Secondly, That he relates ſo many journies which the author made † Libri Inſtitutionum in Anglia in tanto precio ſunt, ut tum Anglicè exactiſſimè verſi in ſingulis Eccleſiis à parochis legendi appendantur, tum in utraque illic Academia, curſu Philoſophico abſoluto, futuris Theologis hi primum ante omnia prælegantur. D. Stapletonius in Promptuario quadrageſimali in feria 4 Hebdomadæ Sanctæ.

(9) Schult. ubi ſupra, pag. 7: he repeats the ſame thing, pag. 487 of the ſecond volume, and in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the third volume.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 18.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 19.

(12) Toto cœlo aberrat. Id. ibid.

(13) Nevertheleſs he ſays, pag. 39, that it contained ſixteen chapters.

(14) He ſhould have added here Ribelium.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 20.

(16) Calvinus in tempore editionum diverſarum & in doctrina Inſtitutionum non ſibi conſtat, ſed modis variis mutavit. Idem, ibid. pag. 19. See alſo the beginning of the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the fourth volume.

(17) Schult. Bibl. Cathol. Tom. i, pag. 19.

(18) Id. ib. p. 7.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 39.

(20) Reliqua Lutheranorum Scripta eſſe dilutiora, hoc acrius mordere & fortius ſtringere. Id. ibid. p. 39, 40.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) See the remark [F], of the article CALVIN.

(23) See the ſame remark of the ſame article.

(24) Beza, preface to the Commentaries of Calvin upon Joſhua, pag. 7.

(25) Edito hoc libro ſuaque veluti præſtita Patriæ fide, Calvinum viſendæ Ferrarienſis Duciſſæ . . . . deſiderium inceſſit. Beza, in Vita Calvini, p. 367, 368. Tom. iii, Operum.

the Heretics cenſured them, and that their coming into England was abſolutely forbidden (d). He died on the twenty-third of April 1604 (e). Mr Konig makes, two authors of him, the one called Conrad Schultingius, the other Cornelius Schultingius.

made from that time till the ſummer of 1536 (26), that Calvin muſt neceſſarily have gone from Baſil ſoon after the date of this Epiſtle Dedicatory. It will be objected, that the Printer has ſet down the year 1536 in the title page, although the book was to be ſold from the month of Auguſt 1535. I confeſs that this way of anticipating upon the following year is frequent among Bookſellers, but generally they do not begin it in the month of Auguſt, and after all, that does not remove the difficulty which I ground upon the date of the month of March 1536, which is to be ſeen in the Geneva copy. I conclude that tho' there be ſome probability that the firſt edition was dated in the year 1536, by the Bookſeller, it is likewiſe probable that it was dated from the year 1535. It is thus that one might expatiate on every ſide in the vaſt field of probability, if there was not a fixed point which determines the whole diſpute in my favour. They are the words of Calvin himſelf, which I have quoted in another place (27), and by which we learn that he went from Baſil ſoon after his book had ſeen the light there. This is a demonſtration that the edition, which was compleated in the month of March 1536, is not the firſt.

II. In the ſecond place I obſerve, that Schultingius was in the right not to reckon for the ſecond and third editions any beſides thoſe which were made upon the reviſals of Calvin. He does well, according to this rule, in giving the ſecond place to the edition of Straſbourg, 1539, but he is in the wrong to reckon that of Geneva, 1545 for the third: for it was preceded by the edition of Straſbourg, 1543, corrected and enlarged by the author.

DATE of the Geneva Catechiſm.

III. His obſervation, that the Geneva catechiſm was added to the third edition, that is, according to his way of reckoning, to the edition of Geneva 1545, may poſſibly be true; for the Epiſtle Dedicatory (28) of that catechiſm is dated the twenty-eighth of November, 1545. Calvin compoſed that Catechiſm in French, in the year 1536, and publiſhed it in Latin at Baſil, in the year 1538 (29). He changed the form of it in the year 1541, reducing it to queſtions and anſwers, for the greater eaſe of children, whereas in the other edition, things were treated by way of ſummaries and ſhort chapters (30). He himſelf made a Latin tranſlation of it, which was printed in the year 1545. It is at the end of the Inſtitution, in the Geneva edition of 1550, and may very well be in that of 1545, as Schultingius obſerves. We have ſeen elſewhere (31), that a learned Dominican has fixed the Æra of that book to the year 1540, both as to the French and Latin editions of it. He miſtakes a little in his calculation.

IV. I cannot allow to Schultingius the chronology he makes uſe of, with reſpect to the edition, which animated Pighius to write againſt Calvin. It was neither that of 1545, nor even that of 1543, but that of 1539. He was no longer alive in the year 1543. His book had appeared ſome time before, and was confuted by Calvin in the beginning of the year 1543.

V. Our canon ſhould have reckoned, according to his hypotheſis, the edition of the year 1559, for the laſt; for Calvin then put the laſt hand to his book, and has neither added nor changed any thing in it ſince. I have the French edition of Geneva, 1566, in folio; it has the ſame preface with that of the year 1559, and if it contains two Indexes (32), which are not in that of 1559, Calvin is not the author of them. Marlorat compoſed them, with a particular care, in the year 1562. He did not truſt to the quotations placed in the margin, and printed before that time: for having ſeen and compared all, he found that many of them were falſe (33), ſeveral omitted, and ſome miſplaced. He reſtored every thing as well as he could, and added what had been left out (34).

VI. I can ſcarce believe that there are editions of the Inſtitution where ſo many things have been changed, added, and retrenched, as Schultingius affirms. The diſcovery and proof of ſuch a thing would be difficult, conſidering the prodigious number of editions that this book of Calvin has undergone.

A CRITICISM on the Eſſais de Literature.

It has been ſo often reprinted, that it is not to be conceived how the author of the Eſſais de Literature could make (35) an article of the Chriſtian Inſtitution of Calvin, without ſaying one word which ſhould make us underſtand that it had been printed oftener than once. He has contented himſelf with obſerving (36) that the author publiſhed it at Baſil about the year 1534. I do not know whether he himſelf perceived this fault, or whether he was told of it; but he corrected it by an addition at the end of his little book. That addition tells us (37), that this book of Calvin is dated from Baſil the firſt of Auguſt 1536; that it was, in ſome reſpect, no more than the firſt draught of a larger performance; that it was then that Paul Tharius (38) compoſed the diſtich which made ſo much noiſe (39); that there has been five editions of this book; that of Baſil, 1535; that of Straſbourg, 1539; the ſecond of Straſbourg, 1543; the third of Straſbourg, in 4to, 1544; that of Geneva, which is the fifth, 1550; and that in the year 1558, the author reviſed his book and divided it into four parts. I wiſh he had corrected the falſe date of the firſt of Auguſt 1536. He was more obliged to it than any other, ſince he was ready to ſay that the firſt edition is of Baſil, 1535. He would be very much puzzled, if he ſhould undertake to prove that Paul Thurius compoſed his diſtich in the year 1535. Nothing is more eaſy than to prove to him that he has been in the wrong to reduce the editions of Calvin's Inſtitution to five. He reckons up ſix himſelf, for undoubtedly he meant, that the reviſal made by Calvin in the year 1558 was followed by a new edition, and it is very certain that it was ſo. People will very juſtly think it ſtrange, that the author of the Eſſays of Literature, having propoſed to himſelf to ſpeak of none but ſcarce books, ſhould have made an article of Calvin's Inſtitution; for no book was ever ſo common as this; it has been ſo many times reprinted, that copies of it are to be found in the very Brokers ſtalls through all the towns of Holland; and unleſs it be a fine edition, and in folio, they do not coſt above three pence or a groat. See the margin (40).

An obſervation has been made which ſhews that this book of Calvin has been ſifted, ſcanned, anatomiſed, in all the different manners poſſible, by the Roman Catholics. They have taken notice that the firſt word is all, and the laſt impiety, and this has appeared very myſterious. The fact is certain in the French tranſlation, but not in the original Latin. Inſtitutionem Calvini obſervarunt quidam hoc verbo omnis incipere & in iſtud impietas deſinere; id tamen præter mentem Authoris, ita divino conſilio contigiſſe cenſent, ut Argumento ſit Librum totius impietatis eſſe quaſi Encyclopædiam, eâque ſola conſtare (41).

The editions of Calvin's Inſtitution, which I have ſeen, are the following: that of Geneva, 1550, in 4to, ex Officina Joannis Gerardi; that of Robert Stephens, 1553, in folio (42). Theſe two are in Latin, and contain no more than twenty-one chapters, divided each into ſeveral ſections. The French edition of Geneva, printed for John Gerard, 1553, in 4to. The Latin edition of Geneva, printed for Francis Perrin, 1568, in folio. Six other French editions of the ſame city: one printed for Conrad Badius, 1560, in folio; one from the Printing-houſe of James Bourgeois, 1562, in 4to; one from the Printing-houſe of Thomas Courteau, 1564, in 8vo; the French edition of Lyons, printed for John Martin, 1565, in 8vo; one printed for Francis Perrin, 1566, in folio: and one from the Printing-houſe of Jacob Stoer, 1609, in folio. I have likewiſe ſeen the Latin edition, publiſhed at Geneva, by John Le Preux, in folio, in the year 1590. It is augmented with the analyſis, and ſome other pieces compoſed by different authors. The editions of Geneva, in 8vo, printed for John Le Preux, 1592, and 1602, are agreeable to this. I add, that the Geneva edition of 1617, in folio, apud Joh. Vignon,

---

(d) See the remark [A] at the end.

(e) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belgic. pag. 164.

(26) Id. ibid. See the remark [U], of the article CALVIN.

(27) In the remark [U] of the article CALVIN.

(28) To the miniſters of Frieſland.

(29) Beza, preface to the Commentaries of Calvin upon Joſhua, pag. 8.

(30) The ſame, pag. 12.

(31) In the remark [B] of the article SPAIN (JOHN OF).

(32) The one of the matters, the other of the places of Scripture.

(33) The Bookſeller of Geneva, who publiſhed the Latin edition of 1550, made an excuſe for having truſted to the edition of Straſbourg, where the greateſt part of the quotations were falſely ſet down in the margin, which he remedied in the Index.

(34) Marlorat, Preface to the Indexes.

(35) In the Eſſays of Auguſt, 1702, p. 96.

(36) Ibid. p. 98.

(37) Pag. 148.

(38) He ſhould have ſaid Thurius.

(39) You will find it in the remark [F] of the article CALVIN.

(40) There is in the Journal of Trevoux, January 1703, edition of Amſterdam, a Memoir touching the Eſſays of Literature, in which there is a cenſure on what concerns the Inſtitution of Calvin.

(41) Vincent. Baronius, Parænet. ad Th. Raynaud. in limine Apologet. Ord. Dominic. folio, quod præcedit folium i.

(42) The printing of it was finiſhed on the fourth of February 1553.

Vignon, Petrum & Jacobum Chouët, makes the ſixth volume of a Latin edition of John Calvin's works. Together with his letters it likewiſe makes a volume of his works in the Amſterdam edition, printed for John-James Schipper, in the year 1667, in folio.

SCHUTZE (JOHN) a Lutheran miniſter in Germany in the XVIth century, publiſhed among other books a piece to which he gave the title of Sacramentarius Diabolus - - - The Sacramentarian Devil. One may judge by this of the rage which animated him againſt the Zuinglians [A]. He likewiſe publiſhed in the year 1579, a book containing fifty reaſons why a man ſhould not embrace the communion of the Calviniſts.

[A] The rage which animated him againſt the Zuinglians.] To the end that one may judge of the piece by the pattern, I ſhall quote a paſſage which I find in George Braunius. We ſhall ſee there, that our Schutze repreſented the Calviniſts as perſons that were the moſt turbulent, ſeditious, and cruel. ‘Hic ſeditionis genius non tantum Lutheranos, ſed & Galainiſtici furoris miniſtros, magis exagitat quod Lutherani in Confratribus ſuis accurate obſervarunt, dum inter varias cauſas, quare Sacramentariam Calviniſtarum Doctrinam acceptare nequeant præcipuam & illam allegent, quod ſeditioſi, & tumultuoſi ſint, pacis publicæ & tranquillitatis politicæ turbatores, quorum hoc unicum inſtitutum eſt, ut ſeditionum factiones, tumultum, diſſidia, ac tandem cædem ac ſanguinis effuſionem procurent. Maxime cum duplici nomine latrones exiſtant, non ſatiati ſi hominum animas Doctrinæ falſitate interimant, verum etiam, omnem quam poſſunt cunque diligentiam adhibeant ut per ſeditiones, latrocinia, & cædes pro nefario ſuo genio in civitatibus inſtituant. Hoc Joannes Schutzius in cauſarum explicatione, & in Sacramentario ſuo Diabolo pagina 354 (1). - - - This ſpirit of ſedition, ſays he, not only poſſeſſes the Lutherans, but rages ſtill more among the furious miniſters of Calvin, which the Lutherans have taken notice of in their brethren; ſince among the various reaſons why they cannot embrace the ſacramentary doctrine of the Calviniſts, they alledge this for the chief, that they are a diſorderly and riotous ſect, enemies to the publick peace and tranquillity, and that their only principles are to beget tumult, diſcord, ſedition, and at length murder and bloodſhed. Eſpecially ſince they are robbers in a double reſpect, as they do not ſatisfy themſelves with killing the ſouls of men by their falſe doctrine, but likewiſe apply their utmoſt diligence to blow up ſeditions, and thereby to fill cities with murder and rapine, for to ſuch things the wicked bent of their genius prompts them. This ſays John Schutze, &c.’

It is to be obſerved, that George Braun, a clergyman of Cologn, here accuſes the Proteſtants of a ſeditious and violent humour, which is a reproach that is caſt upon them by an infinite number of other Popiſh writers, and which is the ſame, that on all occaſions they object to the Romiſh party. Juvenal certainly could not have read this paſſage of George Braun without crying out:

Quis tulerit Gracchos de ſeditione querentes?
Quis cœlum terris non miſceat, & mare cœlo,
Si fur diſpliceat Verri? homicida Miloni?
Clodius accuſet mœchos? Catilina Cethegum?
In tabulam Syllæ ſi dicant diſcipuli tres (2):

. . . . . In vain
The Gracchi of ſediton muſt complain.
'Twould make you ſwear the planets from their ſpheres,
Should Verres peach thieves, Milo murderers,
Clodius tax bawds, Cethegus Cataline,
Or Scylla's pupils, Scylla's rules declince.

TATE.

Be that as it will, let us cite another inſtance of Schutze's rancour. Sacramentariſmus Camerina ac ſentina eſt quædam, in quam multæ hæreſes confluent, ultima Satanæ ire, quam furiis agitatus contra Chriſtum ejuſque Eccleſiam exercet. Et qui Sacramentariorum partes ſequitur, is manifeſtus eſt, atque ejuratus hoſtis Dei & fidei, quàm in Baptiſmo Chriſto dedit, oblitus (3).

This is maintaining that the opinion of the Calviniſts touching the Euchariſt is the ſink of many hereſies, and the utmoſt effort of Satan's rage, and that one cannot adhere to it without becoming the ſworn enemy of GOD, and without forgetting what he promiſed to JESUS CHRIST in his baptiſm. Now to maintain ſuch a thing as this, is it not a downright fit of madneſs. I appeal to the Lutheran miniſters of the preſent time. They are a good deal more moderate than their anceſtors, and they doubtleſs ſee, that the quality of the tenets in which the two Proteſtant communions differ, is not of the ſame kind which they believed formerly, when the ſacramentary war heated their ſpirits too much, and ſpread on both ſides a flood of defamation. That furious ſtorm being calmed by degrees, they have found out at laſt, that the ſubject of the diſpute was not of that importance. How many things of that nature are diſcovered by experience (4)? But alas! how little do we profit thereby! There ariſe very frequent diſputes among divines: they are treated as if the fundamentals of religion were concerned, and they do not remember that they treat as a meer trifle now, what their predeceſſors had looked upon as a debate of the utmoſt conſequence.

(1) Georg. Braunius, in Tremonenſium Catholicorum Defenſione, p. 165, 166.

(2) Juven. Sat. II, ver 24.

(3) Schutzius, Præfat. in Librum 50 Cauſarum, apud Braunium in Tremonenſium Catholicorum Defenſione, pag. 29.

(4) See the remarks [E] and [F], of the article AMYRAULT, and the remark [D] of the article GOMARUS.

SCIOPPIUS (a) (GASPAR) one of the moſt famous writers of the XVIIth century, was a German. His enemies have publiſhed many ſhameful things concerning his family [A]. He ſtudied at Amberg, and then at Heidelberg, and afterwards at Altdorf, at the charges of the Elector Palatine. Having made a conſiderable ſtay at Ingolſtad,

[A] His enemies have publiſhed many ſhameful things concerning his family.] They publiſhed (1) that he was born in a village, where his father was ſexton, hoc veſpillone atque æditui in pago quodam non ignoto, natus eſt Gaſpar Schoppius; That his father one day made a grave too little, and being unwilling to make it longer, he cut off the feet of the dead body. Hiberno quodam tempore, terra firmiter gelu conſtricta, ſepeliendum acceperat cadaver, cui jam ſepulchrum effoderat, ſed menſura breviore quam pro mole; ibi vir fortiſſimus ne tanto in frigore terra deducenda eſſet, pedibus cadaver mutilat, & in foſſam quam ſepulchrum verius recondit (2). That having got ſome money together he went into Poland, where he ſerved a Printer; that afterwards he was a pedlar, and went from village to village, as the Savoyards do, to ſell ſmall wares; that he left off that trade, and liſted himſelf a ſoldier; that he came back into the Palatinate after the death of Frederic III, and obtained there a ſmall employment (3); that he ſold corn, and gained ſomething by it; that he obtained the judicature of a ſmall place, and at the end of the year liſted himſelf for the expedition of Cologn, and was made provoſt of the army; that after the death of the Elector Lewis, he returned to his firſt poſt, and made himſelf a good Miller there; that he was ſent to a town that mutinied, and commanded the ſoldiers there; that he was a Brewer there; that he was there with his wife and his daughter, but would not let them ſee any body. They add, that his wife was a Heſſian, and had followed into Hungary a man who kept her. From the day after he was killed, ſhe lay with Scioppius, who afterwards deſpiſed her ſo much, that he made her work like a ſervant, without either ſeeing or ſpeaking to her. On the contrary, he made his maid eat at his table, and admitted her to his bed from time to time (4). The daughter,

(a) His true name was Schoppius, but he changed it into Scioppius, to bring it to the Italian pronunciation.

(1) See the book intituled, Vita & Parentes Gaſp. Schoppii, printed at Leyden, in 1609, with Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum.

(2) Ibid. p. 138.

(3) In præfectura Burcktreſwiciana, tenue officiolum ac vile obtinuit, quod Notarium ſive Actuarium præfecturæ vocare poſſis. Ibid. pag. 139.

(4) Contra vero, quaſi verſis rerum vicibus ancillæ fortiſſimo Herculi adhærere, cibum una capere, & ſi res ita ferret, thorum genialem occupere. Id. ibid. pag. 141.

Ingolſtad, he returned to Altdorf, and publiſhed ſome books of Criticiſm which made him very proud: he could not ſee without vanity, his great youth joined to a diſtinguiſhed merit in print [B]. It is ſaid that one of the early productions of his pen, was a commentary upon the Priapeia, which drew a great many reproaches upon him, eſpecially, becauſe therein he envied the condition of ſparrows (b). He made a journey into Italy, and after daughter, a faithful companion of her mother in this retired ſtate, married a rogue, who would have been executed for the crime of beſtiality, if he had not fled for it. In his abſence, his wife proſtituted herſelf to another man, who got her with child. She was impriſoned, and if ſhe had not found means to eſcape, they would have puniſhed her in a public manner for her adultery. Hæc ne fratre tali indigna eſſet, ſcelerato nupſit homini, qui (honor ſit verecundis auribus) conſtante matrimonio obbrutuit: cum vacca enim conſueviſſe convictus eſt, & effugiendi cauſa ſupplicii uxore deſerta ſe ſubduxit, quæ ſuperſtite facinoroſo illo ac fugitivo, alteri cuidam ſui copiam fecit, ac mox prægnans facta eſt. Ob id flagitium, cum in carcerem conjecta, ſupplicium vix evaſura eſſet, vinculis perfractis in Auſtriam pervenit, relicta adulterina apud patrem ſobole. In Palatina ſane ditione, deprehenſa ſi fuerit, publicam animadverſionem non evadet (5). To conclude, it is ſaid, that Scioppius bragged he was the baſtard of a gentleman of Franconia, called Munſter, and that he took that name; but that a lady of that noble family, convicted him of being an impoſtor, and forbad him in a threatning manner to uſurp that quality. Quoties ſymbolum amicitiæ in adoleſcentum philothecas, qui mos hodie obtinet, referre ſolebat, totidem literis nomen conſignabat: G. S. à Munſter, addito ad Scaligeri exemplum, FUIMUS TROES. Donec Ingolſtadii à nobiliſſima ejus gentis matrona convictus eſt; cujus tamen minis nondum abſterreri potuit, quin Italis, ad quos poſtea profectus eſt, gentilem hominem, ut Longobardi vacant, ſe Germanum eſſe perſuaderet (6).

It is certain, that Scioppius ſtiled himſelf a gentleman all his life, and that having got intelligence of the calumnies, that the friends of Scaliger had publiſhed, he appeared before the civil judges of the apoſtolical chamber at Rome, to be admitted to prove his nobility, and his good conduct (7); and that the witneſſes which he brought, having been juridically examined, an act ſealed by the apoſtolical chamber was delivered to him, by which it appears that the witneſſes depoſed that he was born a gentleman, and in lawful wedlock. Sibi ex publica fama & multorum, qui id ſcire potuerint, teſtimoniis conſtare, Scioppium legitimè natum & ex nobili familia oriundum eſſe, tametſi majorum nobilitatem paupertatis injuria propè jam extinctam ejus demum pater virtute ſua geſtiſque honoratiſſimis muneribus & officiis rursùs excitârit (8). He dedicated to his father one of his books (9), wherein he ſays nothing elſe of his anceſtors, but that his great-grand father lived 110 years, and his great-grand-mother 105 (10). He made a journey into the Palatinate in 1608, to take poſſeſſion of his father's eſtate, or rather to obtain a replevy; for it is ſaid the magiſtrates had ſeized on it, becauſe of the miſdemeanor of the deceaſed in relation to the taxes of the prince upon beer, and to other duties of the like nature. Patre mortuo ad matrem adeundæ hæreditatis cauſa veniſſe dicitur, quæ à magiſtratu eam ob cauſam ſequeſtrata putatur, quod pater .... publicum vectigal quod de bonis ac cereviſia inferri ærario ſolet, fraudarit, cujus modi ibi fures, aut ſaltem Norimbergæ, ſeveriſſime plectuntur (11). He denied that there had been any ſuch embezzling, and alledged ſome other reaſons why he could not enjoy his patrimony (12).

[B] He could not ſee without vanity his great youth joined to a diſtinguiſhed merit in print.] Mr Baillet, who has placed him with reaſon in the catalogue of famous children, ſpeaks of him thus. ‘We may conſider the love which he expreſſed for learning, and his indefatigable labour, which God did moſt times reward with a good ſucceſs, as an example that deſerves to be propoſed to young people. * Ottavia Ferrari, a Milaneſe, and a famous profeſſor at Padua, ſeems to affirm that he was a very good ſcholar in his younger years; and he adds, that being but ſixteen years of age, he publiſhed ſome books, which deſerved to be admired by old men (13).’ The words of Ottavia Ferrari are theſe: ‘Ab ineunte ætate ita totus literis affixus fuit, ut ſexto decimo anno libros evulgaret quos ſenes admirarentur (14).’ In another ſpeech he beſtows this encomium upon him: ‘Adoleſcentem ac pœne puerum id ingenii, atque eruditionis ſpecimen dediſſe, ut vix tribus luſtris expletis non unum opus publici juris faceret, quod exactæ ætatis judicium, totiuſque antiquitatis ſolidam cognitionem præ ſe ferret (15). - - - That while he was a ſtripling, and almoſt yet a boy, he gave ſuch proof of his wit and learning, that before he was ſcarcely in his fifteenth year he had publiſhed more than one book, which ſhewed his ripe judgment, and his well-digeſted knowledge of all antiquity.’ But it will be better to judge of Scioppius by what he ſays of himſelf. It appears from the following words, that he was near ſeventeen years of age, when he publiſhed his firſt book: It conſiſted of Latin verſes. ‘Extant typis Heidelbergenſibus impreſſa complura Scioppii carmina anno 1593, cum haud etiam ſeptimum decimum ætatis annum compleſſet, antiquaria illa plus ſatis, ſic tamen ut variam eruditionem accurata probatiſſimorum auctorum lectione comparatam paſſim præferant: quo ipſo tempore etiam Dialectica & Rhetorica æquales & convictores ſuos, illuſtres nobileſque adoleſcentes, cum eos à Magiſtris ſuis negligi doleret, docere, auſus eſt (16). - - - - - There are extant ſeveral poems of Scioppius, printed at Heidelberg in the year 1593, when he was not full ſeventeen years of age. They have indeed too much of an antique form, but in ſuch a manner, that they every where ſhew his various erudition, acquired by a diligent reading of the beſt books. At the ſame time he had the courage to inſtruct ſeveral young gentlemen of diſtinction, that were his fellow-ſtudents and companions in Logic and Rhetoric, perceiving them to be neglected by their maſters.’ To know how many books he publiſhed before he was twenty-four years of age, we need only caſt our eyes upon the following liſt. Let us remember that in the year 1593, he was in his ſeventeenth year, as we have been juſt told by himſelf. Veriſimilium libri quatuor. Editi Noribergæ in 8vo apud Paulum Kaufmannum Anno 1595, Diſputatio de Injuriis. Apud eundem in 4to Anno 1597. Suſpectarum Lectionum libri quinque. Apud eundem in 8vo Anno 1597. Commentarius de Arte Critica. Noribergæ in 8vo apud Valentinum Furmannum Anno 1597. Notationes Criticæ in Phædrum cum Ritterſhuſii in eundem ſcriptorem Commentario editæ Lugduni Batavor. in 8vo apud Fr. Raphelengium Anno 1597. Libellus de ſua ad Catholicos migratione (17), deque auctoritate Eccleſiæ in ſacra ſcriptura interpretanda. Editus Romæ apud Zannetum in 8vo 1599. Epiſtola de variis fidei controverſiis ad primarium quendam Germaniæ Juriſconſultum. Ingolſtadii in 4to apud Angermarium Anno 1599 (18).

They ſay that we muſt add to this liſt the commentary upon the Priapeia, whereof the epiſtle dedicatory is dated from Ingolſtad in the year 1595, and that the author did not think fit to mention it in the catalogue of his works, becauſe his enemies cried him down for having commented upon ſuch an obſcene collection of verſes as the Priapeia are. He defended himſelf from that reproach by denying the fact, and maintained, that this commentary was a work of Goldaſtus, who by an egregious fraud had publiſhed it, ſaid he, as the performance of Scioppius (19): However, he alledged in his vindication, that Scaliger had made ſome commentaries upon the Priapeia, and upon Catullus, and that Douza had made one upon Petronius. But he changed the ſtate of the queſtion; for the true ground of the accuſation was, not that he had commented upon obſcene verſes, but that he had ſtuffed his commentary with ſo great a number of filthy particulars (20). Beſides, he complained in that book, that men have not received from nature the ſame ſtrength as ſparrows. His enemies took him up for it, and he was laughed at to ſome purpoſe in the ſatire intituled, Hercules tuam fidem (21). He did certainly deſerve it; here is the paſſage, and his reflexion upon it. ‘Cum Ingolſtadii agerem, vidi è regione Muſæi mei paſſerem coitum vicies repetentem, & inde adeo ad languorem datum, ut avolaturus,

I

(b) See the remark [B].

(5) Ibid. p. 142, 143.

(6) Ibid. p. 141.

(7) See the book intituled, Oporini Grubinii Amphotides Scioppianæ, pag. 28.

(8) Oporinus Grubinius, Amphot. Sciopian. pag. 31.

(9) His Theſes de Injuriis.

(10) Vita & Parentes, Gaſp. Schoppii, init.

(11) Ib. p. 151, 152.

(12) See Amphotides Scioppianæ, p. 190, & ſeq.

* Proluſion. pag. 202.

(13) Baillet, Enfans celebres, num. 69.

(14) Octavius Ferrarius, in Proluſione cui titulus Quo pretio viri principes literas ac literatos habuerint.

(15) Id. in Proluſione cui titulus Literatorum funus.

(16) Oporinus Grubinius, ubi ſupra, pag. 39.

(17) Freherus is therefore miſtaken, pag. 775, of his Theatrum, where he ſays that Scioppius turned Papiſt, in the year 1601.

(18) Theſe titles are taken from the Indiculus of Scioppius's works prefixed to the Amphotides Scioppianæ.

(19) See the Amphotides Scioppianæ, pag. 102, & ſeq, and his letter ad Saulum Mercerum, at the end of the Scaliger hypobolimæus.

(20) Luſus diverſorum in Priapum poëtarum libero commentario illuſtravit, quo poſt hominum memoriam, nihil fœdius ab ullo cinædo aut lubidini omnium proſtituto in lucem editum fuiſſe, omnes fatentur. Vita & Parentes Gaſpar. Schoppii, p. 142.

(21) Pag. 59. See alſo Merici Caſauboni Pietas, pag. 21.

after he had been ſome time at Verona, he returned into Germany, from whence he went again into Italy, and publiſhed at Ferrara a panegyric upon the King of Spain, and Clement VIII. He endeavoured to raiſe himſelf at the court of Rome, and uſed all his induſtry towards it; nevertheleſs his fortune was but mean, and he was not well pleaſed with it, for all the lofty titles he beſtowed upon himſelf (c) [C]. Before he travelled into Italy the firſt time, he plaid Gifanius a trick, which I have mentioned in another place (d). He turned a Roman Catholic about the year 1599. I do not know the reaſon why he was ſo angry with the Jeſuits; but it is certain he was their great enemy, and wrote many ſharp libels againſt them under divers ſuppoſititious names [D]. On the other ſide he inveighed with the utmoſt fury againſt the Proteſtants, and ſollicited the ‘rus in terram decideret. En ſortem iniquam. Hoc paſſeribus datum; negatum hominibus? Næ qui facinus hujuſmodi imitari auſit, faxim ut Picos qui aureos montes colunt, divitiis ille ſolus ſuperet. Præ milite Plautino omnes eum ſectaturas fœminas ſcilicet (22). - - - - While I lived at Ingolſtad, I ſaw oppoſite to my ſtudy, a ſparrow repeating the act of love twenty times, and afterwards ſo faint and weary that he fell to the ground, when he attempted to fly away. Unequal fortune! Why is this given to ſparrows and denied to men? Truly, I will grant that he alone, who can imitate an action of this kind, ſurpaſſes in riches the Pici who live upon the golden mountains.’

Take notice of theſe two things, 1. Thoſe who took his part, denied that he was the author of that commentary on the Priapeia. 2. His reflexion about the pretended happineſs of ſparrows was enlarged upon, and made worſe than it was. To prove the firſt head, I ſhall ſet down the words of the author of a ſmall book, intituled de tribus Capellis: He was a Jeſuit, as I have ſaid in another place (23). ‘De Commentario ſi tibi, Joſephe, Scioppius hoc dicat: Scripſi fateor, commentarium in Priapeia: Sed ſeptenum denum annorum puer, ſed in hereticorum ſcholis inſtitutus, ſed exemplo tuo invitatus. Atque nollem id factum. Et ſi fas dicere (ſed fas) cum illa ſcribebam, Optarem nullas tunc habuiſſe manus. Quid hoc autem, Burdo, dic, tua fide, ad rem attinet? Num tu idcirco Scaligerum te eſſe evinces, quia Scioppius neſcio quid ineptiarum per ludum atque jocum puer verius, quam adoleſcens olim chartis illevit, quod nunc ævi conſiliique maturior, vero vultu damnat & opus. . . . . Hoc igitur tibi ſi dicat ille, non te elinguem protinus, & Burdonem efficiat? Quid ſi autem dicat hoc Scioppius tibi quod dixit jam aliis prius, Non ſcripſi. Scripſit ea vero, inquit: certe vulgavit quidam quem dicere nolo, quia tu illum ignorare non potes (24). - - - If Scioppius ſhould ſay to you, Scaliger, concerning his commentary: I confeſs that I writ the commentary upon the Priapeia: but I was a boy of ſeventeen years of age, but I was brought up in the ſchools of heretics, but I was prompted to it by your example. I wiſh that I had not done it. And if it be lawful for me to ſay ſo, (but it is lawful) I could wiſh that I had had no hands at the time when I writ thoſe things. But tell me truly, you Burdo, what is that to the purpoſe? Will you therefore prove yourſelf to be Scaliger, becauſe Scioppius long ago, whilſt he was yet a boy rather than a young man, writ ſome fooliſh things which, now that his age and judgment are riper, he ſincerely condemns. . . . If therefore Scioppius ſhould ſpeak in this manner to you, would not he preſently ſtrike you dumb like a Burdo as you are? But what if Scioppius ſhould ſay to you, as he has ſaid to others before, I did not write it. But it was written, ſays he, at leaſt publiſhed by a certain perſon whom I will not mention, becauſe you cannot but know him.’ One would think there are ſome oblique expreſſions in thoſe words, that look like an acknowledgment of his fault; but at the bottom, they contain, a plain denial of his being guilty of it. Note, That Scioppius ſet ſo great a value on the tres Capellæ, that he inſerted that peice in one of his books (25). As to the ſecond head, I need only quote the author of the Cenſure de la Doctrine curieuſe of Father Garaſſe; theſe are his words: pag. 705. Garaſſe ſays, that a ſmall book came out without the author's name, written by one of the new dogmatiſts, who conſidering the indefatigable heat of pigeons and ſparrows in their fits of love, made a vow to renounce heaven, if G O D would be pleaſed to change him into a pigeon or into a ſparrow. Garaſſe needs not trouble himſelf about the name of this new dogmatiſt: It is his good friend Scioppius, that wonderful good man, that great wit, who makes this fine and pious wiſh in his commentaries, in Priap. pag. 63 (26). It is certain, that theſe words of Mr Ogier (27) contain a calumny againſt Scioppius; for this vow of renouncing heaven is not to be found in the place quoted by him.

I think I may ſay, that if one of Scioppius's books gave occaſion to have an ill opinion of his morals, all his books in general ſhewed that he was not a debauched man; for if he had loſt his time in making love and drinking, he could not have produced ſo many books. They muſt be the fruit of great labour, and required a continual and ſtrong application to ſtudy, and the converſation of learned men. Accordingly we find, that he calls the profeſſors of Altdorf and Ingolſtad to witneſs, that the life he had led was quite different from that of the youth whom they inſtructed (28). He mentions a poem that he publiſhed to exhort the rector Weſenbecius to ſuppreſs the debaucheries of the ſcholars. Cum Petrus Weſenbecius Juriſconſultus Academiæ Rector creatus fuiſſet, longum Scioppius carmen Noribergæ imprimendum dedit, quo corruptos juventutis mores acerbè deſcribit, ipſumque Rectorem cohortatur, ut diſciplinam reſtituere, frena nimis laxata contrahere, nominatim verò chriſtatorum pileorum uſu & nocturnis commeſſabundæ juventutis concurſationibus interdicere Academicis velit, in contumaces verò & refractatorios ſevere animadvertat (29). He alledges an epiſtle dedicatory, wherein he told us why he had ſo few friends, and why the ſcholars looked upon him as a Miſanthrope: The reaſon of it was becauſe he ſhunned their collations, their walks, and their drinking-bouts, and kept cloſe in his ſtudy all day long. Frequentes iſtas adoleſcentibus compotationes ut fugiam ſuadere mihi poteſt vel valetudinis ratio, quam diligenter cordi habeo, vel conſilium quod à meis præceptoribus neglectus, & ceteroquin ingenio non nimis docili præditus jam olim cepi de ſtudiis ſolidum diem ab uſque mane ad veſperam ſine ullo potu & cibo naviter perſequendis, vel cura denique quam in majoribus meis imitandis ponere decrevi &c. Aliis itaque pro divinitate & facilitate ingenii ſui, ad quæ ego impenſo labore meo & indefeſſo ſtudio adſpiro nihil agendo vel commeſſando conſequuntur, per me quidem potare, plurimoſque ſibi hac comitate ſua amicos parare licet: dum mihi viciſſim hoc non ægre largiantur, ut quam illi ex cauponis ego ex laboribus voluptatem capiam, & laudem continentiæ, ut ego voco, ut illi, Moroſitatis, à majoribus meis acceptam & in me tranſmiſſam, ſtudioſè conſervem &c (30). He was juſtly accounted an ill man; but his faults, like thoſe of ſome other proud, ſatirical, and paſſionate learned men, were not irregularities of the body, but vices of the mind.

[C] The lofty titles he beſtowed upon himſelf.] He was made Patrician of Rome, Knight of St Peter, counſellor to the Emperor, counſellor to the King of Spain, counſellor to the Archduke, Count Palatine (31); and laſtly, he was adorned with the title of Count de Clara Valle.

[D] He wrote many ſharp libels againſt the Jeſuits under divers ſuppoſititious names.] It is affirmed in the book I have quoted ſeveral times (32), that before he changed his religion, he publiſhed ſome verſes, wherein he called their ſociety, Iberam parricidalem cohortem, - - - - a Spaniſh cohort of parricides, and that afterwards he fell violently upon them in a piece that was ſeen at Rome by ſeveral people: Quos petulantiſſimo poſtea ſcripto quod Romæ plurimi viderunt, & è quo nonnulla hic adferri poterant, petivit. Mention is made of a fragment of a letter, importing, that he ſaid long after his apoſtacy, that there were few learned perſons, and very few honeſt men in that order (33). He anſwers as to the Poem, that he ſpoke of the Jeſuits

---

(c) Taken from a book intituled, Vita & Parentes Gaſp. Schoppii à Germano quodam contubernali ejus conſcripta, printed at Leyden, with Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum.

(d) In the remark [F] of the article GIFANIUS.

(22) Scioppius, Commentar. in Priapeia, Carm. xxv, pag. 35, Edit. 1664, in 8*vo.*

(23) In the article MATMAN.

(24) Cornelius Denius Brugenſis, in Capellis, pag. m. 320, 321.

(25) In the Amphotides Scioppianæ, which he publiſhed in 1611. I make uſe of that edition.

(26) Cenſure de la Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 190.

(27) He is the author of the Cenſure de la Doctrine Curieuſe de Garaſſe.

(28) See the Amphotides, p. 40, & ſeq.

(29) Ibid. pag. 40, 41.

(30) Ibid. pag. 43, 44. See below remark [Y].

(31) Vita & Parentes Schoppii, p. 156.

(32) Ibid. p. 146.

(33) Inter Jeſuitas viros eruditos paucos, pauciſſimos bonos reperiri ait. Ibid. pag. 155.

the princes to extripate them by the moſt bloody means [E]. He was not contented to ſuits according to the notions Giſanius had given him of them; but he denies that thoſe verſes had been made public (34). He alſo denies (35) what is charged upon him in the fragment of the letter, and only confeſſes that he does not approve the conduct of the Jeſuits in every thing, and cannot reſolve to court them (36), though he acknowledges that God is the author of their inſtitution, and that their ſociety is not only of great uſe to Chriſtianity, but alſo very neceſſary; ſo that he is ſure that if they carefully obſerve their ſtatutes, Hereſy will be quickly deſtroyed. Tamen Societatis Jeſu inſtitutum ab ipſo deo auctore profectum, totique reipublicæ Chriſtianæ non modo ſummopere utile, ſed omnino etiam neceſſarium eſſe credit, cui ſi convenienter vivant, qui religioſo Sacramento ei ſe obſtrinxerunt, propediem fore confidit, ut ad tibicines mittatur, Hæreſique leſſus fiat, neque cuiquam ſine ſcelere aliter videri poſſe, perſuaſum habet (37). In order to know whether he altered his opinion, we need only read theſe words of Father le Tellier (38). He (39) muſt not pretend to have the honour of being the firſt who formed the deſign of converting the Jeſuits. The glory of it is due a long time ago to his worthy predeceſſor the famous Gaſpar Scioppius, who writ ſo much upon that matter, making it the ſubject of ſeveral libels. It is no wonder that thoſe, who have inherited his implacable hatred againſt the Jeſuits, ſhould be likewiſe acted by the odd and hypocritical zeal of that writer, the moſt furious and infamous calumniator that ever was, as every body confeſſes, and that they ſhould tread in his ſteps to this very day. Mr Arnauld, at whom theſe words were levelled, anſwered many things: I ſhall tranſcribe ſome of them. ‘(40) Are you ſearchers of hearts boldly to decide, that it was through an implacable hatred againſt the Jeſuits, that Scioppius gave an ill character of your ſociety in ſeveral books, and that if he ſhews any zeal for the Church, it can only have been an hypocritical zeal. If this be allowed, what virtue may not be cried down by making it paſs for hypocriſy? . . . . . . (41) I am not concerned in the leaſt for Scioppius's good or bad reputation. But ſince thoſe, who abuſe him moſt, acknowledge that he was a man of great parts, and a very learned Critic and Humaniſt, he deſerves I ſhould ſay ſomething of him, and obſerve that whereas you do now furiouſly inveigh againſt him, you did formerly beſtow great encomiums upon him. Scioppius had three ſorts of enemies, who jointly cried him down as being too ſatirical and paſſionate. The firſt were the Proteſtants, whom he had forſaken to turn Catholic, and particularly Joſeph Scaliger, and his friends, who looked upon that pretended Prince of Verona as the hero of their ſect. They were particularly offended becauſe he had wounded their Scaliger in the moſt ſenſible part, by making his pretended deſcent from the Princes of Verona, paſs for an idle ſtory; and the moſt judicious perſons are now agreed that he was in the right. His ſecond enemies were the men of letters; he fell under their indignation by his too great fondneſs for the purity of the Latin tongue. Perhaps, no man ſince the age of Auguſtus knew better than he the niceties of that language. But he was ſo ſcrupulous that he could not endure any word ſhould be taken in a different ſenſe, from what it had at Rome in the beſt times, or that any other conſtruction ſhould be put upon it; hence it was that he found barbariſms and ſoleciſms in moſt authors of this time, who pretended to write good Latin. He would have been ſerviceable to the common-wealth of learning, had he been contented to obſerve thoſe faults in civil, gentle, and polite terms. But he did it in too harſh and ſhocking a manner, ſo far as to ſay that the taking of a certain word in a certain ſenſe deſerved Naticidium (42). This was, no doubt, very ſcandalous and pedantic; but it was no ſufficient reaſon to give him ſo many hard words, and to call him the moſt cruel of all wild beaſts. For thoſe, who took ſo much pride, as well as he, in ſpeaking good Latin, might have deſpiſed thoſe mean things, and profited by his reproofs. But it is well known that Philologers are a ſort of choleric people, that are very apt to fall into a paſſion for meer trifles; and that they are as much vexed at being reproached with a ſoleciſm, as if an honeſt man was accuſed of having betrayed his friend: and becauſe they know how to give hard words in a very fine ſtyle, they inſpire many people with their paſſions. This is the chief reaſon why Scioppius has been ſo much cried down. His too free and too vehement criticiſms, upon many authors that were the moſt eſteemed for their ſtyle, have ſtirred up againſt him almoſt the whole poſſe of the Latiniſts. You, Fathers, have been his third and laſt enemies. But I muſt obſerve, that whilſt he wrote only againſt the Proteſtants, the Scaligers, and the Philologers, you heaped praiſes upon him. Nay, you forgave him, though he blamed your method of teaching human learning; and you did not take it ill that he was praiſed and eſteemed by Popes, Kings, and Emperors. He publiſhed a ſmall piece in 1636, wherein, to vindicate himſelf againſt thoſe who reviled him, he mentions a brief of Urban VIII, to the moſt Chriſtian King, which is very much to his honour, and ſome other letters of the Emperor Ferdinand II, of his Catholic Majeſty Philip IV, of the Dukes of Florence and Mantua, and ſome very advantageous teſtimonies of Cardinal Bellarmin, and many other Jeſuits, who praiſe him for his wit, learning, eloquence, zeal, virtue, integrity, piety, religion, prudence, wiſdom, and great knowledge of the true ſenſe of the ſcripture; who profeſs to admire him as a man famous all over the world, and call him the king of learned men, Perilluſtri viro Gaſpari Scioppio eruditorum Regi. Do you think, Fathers, you can eaſily make the public believe that a man, whom you have ſo much commended for ſo long a time, is become all of a ſudden the moſt wicked man in the world; and that his zeal for the Church, which you highly extolled, is become an odd hypocritical zeal, becauſe he has declared in ſome of his books what he blamed in your conduct, as ſo many perſons eminent for their piety have done before and after him, ſuch as Arias Montanus, Lanuſa, Lewis Sotelo, Diego Collado, Dom John de Palafox, and many others? If he has been too ſharp, and too paſſionate, if he has mentioned ſome matters of fact too ſcandalous, I do not pretend to juſtify him in that reſpect. But unleſs you give ſeven or eight pregnant inſtances of his falſities, you muſt not expect to be believed, when you call him the moſt furious calumniator that ever was.’

Mr Baillet ſays, that Scioppius appeared in print under many falſe names, that he might attack with more impunity not only ſeveral private perſons of great note, but chiefly the whole body of the Jeſuits, againſt whom he wrote above thirty treatiſes, the very titles whereof are enough to ſtrike us with horror. He promiſes to unmaſk him in his treatiſe of authors diſguiſed under the names of Juniperus Anconitanus, Denius, A Fano Sancti Benedicti, Groſippus, Grubinius, Hay, Krigſoeder, Sotelo, Vargas, and ſome others (43). You will find in Placcius the titles of a prodigious number of books publiſhed or made ready for the preſs by Scioppius againſt the Jeſuits (44).

[E] He ſollicited princes to extirpate the Proteſtants by the moſt bloody means.] You need only read the book he publiſhed at Pavia in the year 1619, with this title, Gaſp. Scioppii Conſiliarii Regii Claſſicum belli ſacri, ſive Heldus redivivus, hoc eſt ad Carolum V. imperatorem Auguſtum Suaſoria de Chriſtiani Cæſaris erga Principes Eccleſiæ rebelles officio, deque veris compeſcendorum Hæreticorum Eccleſiæque in pace collocandæ rationibus. A Lutheran of Straſbourg (45) anſwered it, and his anſwer is worth the reading: it is intituled, Tuba pacis occenta Scioppiano belli ſacri claſſico, Salpiſte Theodoſio Berenico, Norico, hiſtoriarum & patriæ ſtudioſo. See alſo Juſtus Meyerus's (46) treatiſe, intituled, Juris publici capitalis quæſtio, ſint ne Proteſtantes jure Cæſareo heretici & ultimo ſupplicio afficiendi, contra ſanguinarium Caſp. Scioppii Claſſicum. You may ſee likewiſe the book intituled, Cancellaria Hiſpanica, wherein you will find ſome extracts of that book of Scioppius (47). Note, that he boaſts of having been the principal contriver of the Catholic League, which proved ſo prejudicial to the Proteſtants in Germany. Having publiſhed a liſt of his exploits, to let the public ſee in what manner he had improved the talents which God committed to him (48), he reckons in the ſeventh place, ‘Fœdus Catholicum in Germania, cujus primum auctorem &

actorem

(34) Oporinus Grubinius, Amphotides Scioppian. pag. 126.

(35) Ib. p. 129.

(36) Neque etiam ut multum Italis præſertim & Graëtienſibus Jeſuitis blandiatur animum inducere poteſt. Ibid.

(37) Ibid.

(38) Defenſe des nouveaux Chrétiens, Part. i, ch. i, Art. i, pag. m. 5.

(39) That is, the author of the Morale Pratique.

(40) Morale pratique, Tom. iii, pag. 124.

(41) Id. ibid. pag. 125.

(42) See the paſſage quoted below in the remark [F].

(43) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Critiques Gramm. num. 535.

(44) Placcius, de Anonymis, ch. ix, num. 248, p. 67, 68.

(45) Matth. Bereggerus, profeſſor of Hiſtory.

(46) Profeſſor of the Civil-Law at Straſbourg.

(47) Adjecti ſunt ſub finem Flores Scioppiani ex Claſſico Belli ſacri.

(48) Talenta Chriſti Gaſpari Scioppiani ad negotiandum credita.

to vent his rage againſt Scaliger, Caſaubon (e), and du Pleſſis Mornai [F], &c: he attacked even the King of England, without any regard [G]; which was the reaſon why the Ambaſſador of that Prince, at the court of Spain, made uſe of violent means againſt ſuch an inſolent writer, who afterwards boaſted of the wounds [H] which it was thought he had received upon that occaſion. Going through Venice in the year 1607, he had a conference with Father Paul, and endeavoured by promiſes and threatnings to bring him over to the Pope's party. That, and perhaps other reaſons beſides, occaſioned his being impriſoned for ſome days. He was reproached with it, but the circumſtances of his impriſonment were not well repreſented [I]. One of the things which he moſt pretended to, was a fine Latin ſtyle. He found out Barbariſms in ‘ actorem fuiſſe Sciopppium, literis ipſius Cæſaris manu conſcriptis, & Trevirenſis Electoris teſtimonio doceri poteſt: ſicut etiam Comes Tillius in poculi aurati, quod ei donavit, inſcriptione, fœderis illius primum auctorem appellat: qui ſcyphus apud Benedictinos Weingartenſes etiamnum ſervatur (49). - - - The Catholic league in Germany, of which Sciopppius was the principal author and manager, may be proved by a letter, written with the Emperor's own hand, and by the teſtimony of the Elector of Treves; as likewiſe Count Tilli in the inſcription of the gilded cup, which he gave him as a preſent, calls him the chief author of that league: which cup is ſtill preſerved in the convent of Benedictines at Weingart.’

[F] He vented his rage . . . . . againſt du Pleſſis Mornai.] The fury with which he endeavours to turn him into ridicule (50) in his Alexipharmacum Regium felli draconum & veneno aſpidum ſub Philippi Mornæi de Pleſſis nupera Papatus hiſtoria abdito oppoſitum, & Seren. D. Jacobo Magnæ Britanniæ Regi, ſtrenæ Januariæ loco muneri miſſum (51), is ſo exceſſive, that I do not think any thing more ſevere can be written againſt an author. I could, ſays he (52), make a pretty large volume of the ſoleciſms, barbariſms, and other faults of elocution, which I have found in the Myſtery of Iniquity (53); but I will ſpare the Calviniſts the grief of ſeeing their Hector deſerving not only the ferula of Caſaubon, the Prince of Pedants, Alpha Cathedrariorum, but alſo the rod of the meaneſt ſchool-maſter, quem quicunque virgator ubere virgidemia afficiat, & multiplicem jactura natis expiare culpam cogat.

[G] He attacked . . . . . the King of England, without any regard.] See among other books his Eccleſiaſticus auctoritati Sereniſſimi D. Jacobi Magnæ Britanniæ Regis oppoſitus, printed in the year 1611, and his Collyrium Regium Britanniæ Regi graviter ex oculis laboranti muneri miſſum, printed the ſame year. But ſee particularly his Corona Regia (54); for I ſtill maintain that he is the author of that piece (55). Ferrarius, who praiſed him ſo much, reproaches him with, what he reckons a great fault, his having lampooned and criticized upon all ſorts of people, without even ſparing the ſupreme powers, and crowned heads. Cum quæ de ejus ingenio, doctrina, immenſiſque in re literaria laboribus inficiari non poſſet, quæ eſſent totius Orbis teſtimonio comprobata, vertit accuſationem nimiamque ejus ingenii aſperitatem, judiciumque ſubauſterum, omnibuſque infeſtum arguebat. Nam ne ipſis quidem Regibus ſupremiſque poteſtatibus unquam peperciſſe, cum nimia, ac pænè Cynica detrahendi libidine omnes ordines non ſolum multo ſale defricaret, ſed in omnem verborum etiam prætextatorum amaritudinem effuſus, ipſa literarum capita viroſque ſuperum cultu reverendos totis voluminibus concideret, aſperiſque facetiis jocum ac ludibrium faceret (56). He was ſo inſolent as to abuſe King Henry IV, in a moſt outrageous manner in his Eccleſiaſticus; which was the main reaſon why that book was burnt at Paris. See the Continuator of Thuanus's Hiſtory in the fifth book, pag. 314, under the year 1612.

[H] He boaſted of the wounds.] I have already quoted the book, wherein he gives an account how he had employed his talents: we find there, that the ſervants of the Engliſh ambaſſador ſet upon him at Madrid, in the year 1614, and that they cried out, thinking they had killed him, Well, well, we have at laſt made away with that great Papiſt. Sicariorum undecim de familia Oratoris Anglici, qui cùm anno 1614, Madriti Sciopppium multis vulneribus, ut rebantur, confoſſum pro mortuo relinquerent, ita ſibi per vias rem præclarè geſtam gratulantes audiebantur: Euge, jam tandem magnum illum Papiſtam jugulavimus. Qua de re typis deſcripta extat Narratio, quæ Legatus Latro inſcribitur (57). Mr Colomiés has publiſhed a letter, wherein Sciopppius declares that he has been perſecuted by the Proteſtants, and that they have ſhot at him, and given him ſeveral thruſts, ſo as to believe they had killed him; but that, though he had rendered himſelf odious to the Heretics, for having ſtoutly maintained the eccleſiaſtical authority of the Pope, he ſhould think himſelf to be a more pernicious Heretic than Luther and Calvin, if he ſhould write according to Baronius's principles, in favour of the pretended power of the Pope over the temporalities of kings. Io per difender l' Apoſtolato del Papa ho ſcritto tanti libri, quante forſe niſſun altro, e fui perſeguitato da Proteſtanti, che mi tirarono delle archibugiate, e ſtoccate, & mi laſciarono per morto. Ma Dio mi guardi che non mi metta mai à dir una parola ſola in difeſa del Dominato, con che mi farei maggior heretico che Luthero e Calvino, ſi como piu volte con voſtra D. Reverendiſſima mi ſono dichiarato, e ſpero di morir buon Catolico Romano à diſpetto della Corte Romana e di tutti i ſuoi adulatori (58). It appears from the laſt part of this paſſage, that Sciopppius was not well pleaſed with the court of Rome. He had been ſaying (59) that it is very proper Baronius ſhould be diſcredited, as an enemy to ſovereign princes, and to acknowledge that the annals of that cardinal contain many falſities, and that a Benedectine Monk had collected two thouſand of them (60). Sciopppius ſpoke otherwiſe, when he wrote, againſt King James, his Eccleſiaſticus, that was burnt at Paris. He glories in the diſgrace of his book, and ſays that his effigies was hanged in England, in a farce that was acted before the king. Nay, he ſays the Proteſtant league declared, that the public good required Sciopppius ſhould be put to death; which was the reaſon why the ambaſſador of his Catholic Majeſty ſent him to Milan. Here follows the ſixth article of the account which he gives of his adminiſtration. (61) Contemptus mortis: cujus ſpecimen eſt Eccleſiæ & Sedis Apoſtolicæ defenſio. 1. Contra Gallos à quibus Eccleſiaſticus ejus publice crematus fuit, quem tamen librum Cardinalis Bellarminus, aliique magni Theologi ſummis tulerunt laudibus. 2. Contra Regem Angliæ, cujus librum quatuor diverſis libris editis profligavit: qui propterea ſcripto publico remedium ei violentum fuit comminatus, ejuſque libros in foro exurendos curavit. In Mimo tandem, ſeu Comœdiæ ludicro coram ſe acto perſonam ejus induci fecit, hancque in ipſum pœnam ſtatui, ut faucibus fune eliſis animam per inferiorem gutturem exploderet (62): velut in Hæretici Elenchomeni præfatione videre eſt. 3. Contra Principes Proteſtantes fœderis Hallenſis ſocios, qui Rotemburgi in concilio decreverunt, ipſis Sciopppio ſublato omnino opus eſſe: quæ oratori Hiſpanico D. Baltaſari Zunicæ cauſa fuit, ut eum Germania relictâ Mediolanum concedere juberet, Inſubriæque Præſidi ſalutem ejus literis accuratiſſimè commendaret.

[I] He was reproached with it, but the circumſtances of his impriſonment were not well repreſented.] We muſt keep to Brother Fulgentius's narrative. Which is as follows (63): ‘ At the time that thoſe diſputes were adjuſted at Venice, Gaſpar Sciopppius arrived there, a man well known in the world by the many books which he has publiſhed. He came from Rome in his way to Germany, as he ſaid, whither he was going, as it was diſcovered, to carry a book injurious to the Republic, in order to get it printed there, with ſome other pieces full of impious things, as that of a certain Dominican Monk, called Thomas Campanella. . . . . . (64) Whether it was upon that account, or for ſome other unknown reaſon, it is certain, that he fell into diſgrace, and was arreſted by a public order, and detained three or four days, after which they commanded him to depart inſtantly. Before this misfortune happened to him, he had a conference with the Father, in which they diſ-

(e) See the remark [S].

(49) See the book intituled, Gaſp. Sciopppius de pædia humanarum ac divinarum literarum, p. 25.

(50) Among other things for exhorting King James to make war againſt the Pope.

(51) It is a book in 4to of 79 pages, printed at Mentz in 1612.

(52) Pag. 32.

(53) That is, in the Latin edition.

(54) See the article PUTEANUS, remark [F].

(55) See Forerus in Mantiſſa Ant-Anatomiæ Jeſuiticæ, pag. 63.

(56) Octavius Ferrarius, in Literatorum funere.

(57) Gaſp. Sciopppius, Pædia humanarum ac divinarum Literarum, pag. 26.

(58) A letter of Sciopppius to Father Fulgentius, Theologer of the Republic of Venice. It is dated from Padua the ninth of June 1636. Mr Colomiés has inſerted it in his Obſervationes ſacræ, pag. 6, & ſeq.

(59) So bene che egli per ignoranza ed inadvertenza ſcriſſe molte coſe falſiſſime; di tal maniera che un Padre di San Benedetto, mio allievo, dice di haver raccolto due mila errori di ſuoi Annali, ed jo giudico che importi non poco, che queſt' huomo ſia diſcreditato, come nemico della giuridittione di tutti i Sovrani Principi, li quali volſe ancora in temporalibus ſoggettare al Papa, Ibid. pag. 8.

(60) See what Patin ſays in the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres. April 1684, pag. 117.

(61) Sciopppius, Pædia, p. 25.

(62) See Merici Caſauboni Pietas, pag. 23.

(63) Vie du Pere Paul, pag. 191, Leyden 1661.

(64) Ibid. pag. 192.

in the writings of the modern authors, that were the moſt eſteemed for their eloquence, and did not even ſpare the moſt eloquent writers of antient Rome [K]. He deſerved as a Grammarian the odious title that was given to Diogenes as a Philoſopher (f). This is ſaying all. He had got himſelf ſo many enemies, that at laſt he was afraid he ſhould not find a place of ſafety to retire into. It was to no purpoſe that he kept himſelf quiet at Padua, and was taken up with apocalyptical chimeras, wherewith he troubled Cardinal Mazarin [L], he did not for that ceaſe to be in fear of ſome attempt upon his life. This inclines one to believe that there did not want a foundation for ſaying that he turned coursed a long time about learning, and particularly about the doctrine of the Stoics, which he profeſſed that he would retrieve from obſcurity, and ſet it in the faireſt and moſt advantageous light imaginable, as well as many other of his learned reflexions, intermixing therewith a great deal of ſtate-affairs, and particularly ſuch as concerned the Proteſtants of Germany. And then taking the Father aſide, he repreſented to him, that the Pope, as being a great prince, had very long hands, and that therefore ſome misfortune would certainly happen to him, ſince the Pope thought he had been very much offended by him; and that he would have cauſed him to be killed, had he been willing to revenge himſelf in that manner. But that the Pope had no other deſign but to take him alive, cauſing him to be fetched away from Venice itſelf, in order that he might be conducted to Rome. Neverthelefs Sciopppius offered, if he would give him leave, to negotiate his reconciliation, with as much honour and advantage as he could deſire; adding, that he was impowered to treat with the Princes of Germany, even about their converſion. The Father anſwered that he knew nothing he had done at which his Holineſs had reaſon to be offended (65)...... (66) That, as for the reſt, he thanked him for his good affection, but gave himſelf no manner of trouble about his advices, and was reſolved not in the leaſt to depart from the intereſt of the public, ſince he had not undertaken the defence of it till he was fully aſſured of the juſtice of his cauſe. His two propoſitions, of cauſing the Father to be killed, or of carrying him away alive, ſeemed very ſtrange, and almoſt incredible; but by what happened ſoon after, one may eaſily judge that Scioppius knew what he ſaid, and that ſuch deſigns had been formed againſt the Father long before. After he was gone from Venice, he wrote a ſatirical diſcourſe, wherein mentioning his conference with the Father, he declared that he had found him to be a man neither unlearned nor timorous (67).’

It appears from this account, that the friends of Scaliger were groſly miſtaken, when they publiſhed that Scioppius went to Venice ſoon after the ſenate's proclamation againſt thoſe who had endeavoured to aſſaſſinate Father Paul; and that Scioppius was arreſted upon a ſuſpicion that he had a hand in the aſſaſſination. Venetiam profectus eſt. Promulgata erat paulo ante capitalis ſententia in ſicarios aliquos (aſſaſſinos vocant) qui Paulum illum Servitam, cujus ſcriptum pro aſſertione juris Venetæ Reip. in manibus omnium verſatur, aggreſſi fuerant, & vulnera aliquot, quæ tamen lethalia præter mentem eorum non eſſent, inflixerant. Eo ergo in tempore in urbem cum veniret, juſſu magiſtratus in carcerem deductus eſt, quaſi rei hujus conſcius, aut qui alterius eo explorator veniſſet (68). Such a falſity muſt needs have been prejudicial to Scaliger's cauſe; and the more, becauſe he and his friends made it appear upon other heads, that they received bad memoirs concerning Scioppius. Had they conſulted Lingelſheim, they might have known that Scioppius was not arreſted on account of Fra-Paolo's aſſaſſination; but becauſe he had made himſelf ſuſpected, by reaſon of the haughty and threatning words which he made uſe of in a converſation with that Servite (69). Scioppius ſays he was arreſted, upon information that he was the author of a book injurious to the Republic of Venice; and that he was going to negotiate againſt it in the Pope's name, with ſome princes of Germany. Fidem habuerunt Julio Adolpho Weiteriſhemio, homini Saxoni, qui . . . clam ad eos detulit Scioppium auctorem eſſe libri cujuſdam pro Pontifice adverſos ipſos ſcripti & Monachii typis impreſſi, hoc titulo, Nicodemi Macri Romani cum Nicolao Craſſo Veneto diſceptatio, &c. (quod quidem opus perpetuo ſale ut facetia diffluens, & eruditionis varietate admirabile, præ quo Ivo tuus Villiomarus nec hiſcere auderet, multi docti viri non niſi à Scioppio proficiſci potuiſſe perſuaſum habebant) & tunc quoque Pontificis miſſu ad Principes quoſdam in rempublicam ipſorum inflammandos in Germaniam proficiſci (70). It is certain, that Scioppius writ that book: Rhodius and Placcius are miſtaken in aſcribing it to a profeſſor of Bologna called Aſcanius Perſius (71). See the Viſiera Alzata (72) of Peter James Villani of the Academy of the Humoriſti, Geniali, & Infecundi.

[K] He did not even ſpare the moſt eloquent author of antient Rome.] Read theſe words of Balzac ‘The accuſer of Cicero, about whom you deſire to be informed, is the dreadful Scioppius. He has publiſhed a book at Milan, in which he accuſed Cicero of improprieties and barbariſms. There is but one copy of it in France, and Meſſieurs Du Puy lent it me when I was at Paris. This injuſtice done to Cicero would prove a conſolation to Scaliger, if he was to return again into the world. But I expect that the ſame Scioppius will ſhortly put out another book, wherein he will undertake to prove that Cato was a wicked man, and Julius Cæſar a bad ſoldier (73).’ When he was but twenty years of age, he found out that Phædrus ſavoured ſometimes of the barbarouſneſs of Thrace his native country (74). It is therefore no wonder, that he ſhould accuſe (75) Scaliger, Lipſius, Caſaubon, Thuanus, Poſſevin (76), Voſſius, Strada, &c. of incongruity of ſpeech. His criticiſms are ſometimes well-grounded, but not always. See what the learned Borrichius wrote againſt him, in defence of Voſcius and Father Strada (77). A Jeſuit (78) of the college of Rome made an apology for the latter, but I do not know whether it has been printed. Thoſe who affirm magiſterially, that certain phraſes are meer barbariſms and ſoleciſms, venture very much; for how often have the words and expreſſions, which they condemned, been ſhewed to them in claſſical authors? The difficulty that is to be found in ſuch kind of diſputes (79), will plainly appear to thoſe, who will be at the pains to examine the books of John Vorſtius, De Latinitate merito aut falſo ſuſpecta; thoſe of Chriſtopher Cellarius, De Latinitate mediæ & infimæ ætatis, and De barbariſmis & idiotiſmis ſermonis Latini; and thoſe which Voſſius, Borrichius, &c. have publiſhed upon that ſubject. But to return to Scioppius, I muſt obſerve that he promiſed a book, intituled Hercules Coprophorus, wherein he had collected a vaſt number of barbariſms and ſoleciſms: It was there that he was to ſhew (80) the faults of Julius Cæſar Scaliger's ſtile. Obſerve well theſe words of Lambecius; they fully repreſent the cavilling and troubleſome humour of that critic. ‘Homo, ut notiſſimum eſt, ingenii maligni, & oris maledicentiſſimi, qui propter præſtantiſſimorum & de re literaria optime meritorum virorum invidas ac injurioſas calumniationes, merito Canis Grammaticus appellatur (81). - - - A man, as is very well known, of a malignant genius, and of a moſt ſlanderous tongue, who on account of his ſpiteful and injurious way of calumniating men, that are truly excellent and famous for their learning, is juſtly called the grammatical Cur. See the margin (82).

His boldneſs in criticiſing upon the ſtile or the expreſſions of Cicero, will be leſs ſurpriſing, if it be conſidered, that this father of eloquence has been cenſured by ſuch men at all times. Their number is incredible. See the preface to the book intituled, Cicero à calumniis vindicatus, written by Andreas Schottus: It is a very curious piece; the eighth chapter is an anſwer to thoſe who pretend that Cicero is guilty of ſoleciſms.

[L] Apocalyptical chimeras, wherewith he troubled Cardinal Mazarin.] This is a particular not very well known. Naudé, in order to refute thoſe who complained that the cardinal did not anſwer all the letters that

---

(f) See the paſſage of Lambecius in the remark [K].

(65) The words which I leave out contain the paſſage concerning ſelf-murder, which I have ſet down in the article SAINT-CYRAN, citat. (6).

(66) Vie du Pere Paul, p. 195.

(67) See Vita & Parentes Gaſpar. Schoppii, pag. 156.

(68) Ibid. p. 150, 151.

(69) Sciopppium Monaci jam eſſe & in tranſitu jus civitatis Venetæ adeptum biduana carceratione, cum Paulum Servitam inſolentius ac minaciter allocutus ſuſpectum ſe feciſſet. Lingelſheim, Epiſtola lxxx ad Bongarſium: It is dated the ſeventh of November 1607.

(70) Oporinus Grubinius, ubi ſupra, pag. 162, 163.

(71) See Placcius, de Anonymis & Pſeudonymis, in Appendice, pag. 33.

(72) The Journal of Leipſic, for the month of June 1690, pag. 363, mentions it.

(73) Balzac, Letter xii, to Chapelain, bock ii, dated the 22d of April 1637.

(74) See Scheſſerus in the Life of Phædrus. That author is miſtaken in the preface, wherein he calls Scioppius Conrad, inſtead of Gaſpar.

(75) See his Scaliger hypobolimæus, and the Tract de Stilo Hiſtorico.

(76) The Phyſician who wrote a Hiſtory of the houſe of Gonzaga, &c.

(77) It is the Appendix of the book intituled, Olai Borrichii Cogitationes de variis Latinæ Linguæ ætatibus & ſcripto . . . Voſſii de Vitiis Sermonis, printed at Copenhagen 1675, in 4*to*.

(78) Called Pierucci. See Borrichius, ibid. p. 268.

(79) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for May 1701, pag. 517.

(80) See his Alexipharmacum Regium.

(81) Lambecius, apud Magirum, Eponymolog. Critico, pag. m. 740.

(82) Mr Grævius has very well deſcribed the ſatirical humour of Scioppius in his preface to the works of Daniel Eremita, printed at Utrecht in 1701.

turned his eyes toward Holland, and expreſſed ſome deſire of going back to the communion of the Proteſtants [M]. Authors do not agree about the year wherein he died ; that were written to him, ſays (83), ‘That the office of firſt miniſter in France . . . is like a net, in which all mad, melancholy, hypochondriac, and extravagant men are catched ; like a rock, on which the ſhip of fools (navis illa narragonia ſive Stultifera Brentii) ſplits ; and like a load-ſtone, which attracts all the viſionaries that are in the kingdom. So that if the firſt miniſter was obliged to read all the chimerical deſigns, all the extravagant propoſals, and all the ridiculous and impertinent advices of thoſe men, he would not have time enough to read and examine them, though he ſhould lay aſide his moſt ſerious affairs, to mind none but thoſe. . . . (84) I have known within theſe five years (85), three men of great virtue, and extraordinary learning, of whom the firſt, who is Cattius, a canon of the city of Arras, maintains, that there is a mountain of gold in Paleſtine, which the holy ſcripture promiſes to Chriſtians, when they ſhall have conquered the Turks ; and that GOD will have a new temple built for him in the middle of Jeruſalem : He has got the plan of that temple engraved, with all the proofs and explications of his opinion, taken from holy writ. The ſecond, who is Scioppius, a perſon ſufficiently known all over Europe, pretends that no father or doctor of the church did ever underſtand the holy ſcripture better, or by means thereof more certainly know the end of the world, and the myſteries of St John's Revelation than he : and the third, called Dr Colombi, is now buſy to get a general council aſſembled, wherein the pretenſions of the king of France to Navarre and Franche Comté, may be decided in his favour, and has even drawn up all the decrees and canons, which it will be requiſite to make for that purpoſe. As I have ſeen part of the writings which thoſe three men have ſent to the cardinal, with a view to ſupport their chimerical deſigns by his authority ; I am perfectly well aſſured, that if the cardinal had been ſo injudicious as to mind them, they would have cut out more work for him than his beſt ſecretary could have diſpatched. And becauſe every body pretends to be a politician, fooliſh and extravagant men muſt needs be more numerous among thoſe of that profeſſion, than among others : Which does likewiſe multiply the number of advices, counſels, deſigns, memoirs, and ſuch like pieces, which are all equally impertinent, and alike proper to make the miniſters to whom they are addreſſed loſe their time, if they ſhould be ſimple enough to mind them. And yet becauſe they are not ſo, and becauſe their experience and knowledge of affairs enable them to know immediately, quid ſolidam crepet, - - - what things have a ſolid appearance ; thoſe hypochondriac and melancholy gentlemen, thinking themſelves repulſed, take from thence occaſion to blame them, and to ſay, that they do not anſwer letters of conſequence, for they look upon their follies as things of great moment, juxta illud, - - - - according to the ſaying, Quiſquis amat ranam, ranam putat eſſe Dianam.

A frog to him who ſuch a thing eſteems,
No more a frog, but fair Diana ſeems.

That they neglect great affairs, and the certain means of getting money, of making peace, and of ſaving the kingdom, to mind trifling things, and to play with monkeys. And it happens, by reaſon of their many complaints and clamours, that a poor miniſter, whoſe buſineſs ſometimes gives him no breathing time, is accuſed of not diſcharging the duties of his office, of too much indulging his pleaſures, of neglecting the letters and advices he receives, and of being unworthy of ſuch a poſt : In ſhort, if they were to be credited,

Collige ſarcinulas dicet libertus & exi,
Jam graves es nobis.

Pack up your baggage, ſhall the ſteward ſay,
And go, for you are burthenſome, away.’

Several people will doubtleſs blame me for not leaving out what does not belong to Scioppius in this long paſſage ; but I refer them to many other readers, who will be very well pleaſed with the reflexions of Gabriel Naudé which I have quoted.

Such was the fate of Scioppius : After he had ſpent many years in cenſuring, biting, and defaming every body, he applied himſelf to the prophecies of the holy ſcripture ; he looked for the key of them, and flattered himſelf that he found out the key which St Peter left, which no body had diſcovered till then (86). Weary of ſo many engagements, and of the many blows he had given and received, he ſhut himſelf up in that tower, he fixed upon that work and impoſed this upon himſelf for the taſk of his old age. A happy man, if he wholly left off his ſatirical humour, and had no deſire of exciting people to great revolutions, by telling them that the promiſes contained in the Apocalypſe would be ſhortly fulfilled. All thoſe who have concerned themſelves in ſuch an undertaking, did not ſtay, as he did, till they were weary of their ſlanders : On the contrary, ſome made their weapons ſharper by it, and grew more ſatirical ; others deſigned only to excite the paſſions, and to ſtir up the people. You will find the plan of Scioppius's book, in a letter written by him from Padua, the twentieth of February 1642. It appears from it, that great things were to happen in a ſhort time, and that he brought the art of propheſying into a ſyſtem. Quatuor libellos, ſaid he (87), iſtis indicibus ſeu titulis jam confectos habeo. 1. Fons ſapientiæ intento digito monſtratus, hoc eſt, Eclogæ ex Sacra Scriptura & ſanctis Patribus de Sacræ Scripturæ ſtudio, ejuſque ſtudii neceſſitate, utilitate, adjumentis & temporibus. 2. Clavis ſcientiæ ad aperienda regni cœlorum myſteria propediem conſummanda, hoc eſt ; ſpecimen Exegeſeos Propheticæ in Pſal. xlv. 3. Annunciatio regni Chriſti ac populi Chriſtiani in orbem terræ futurum uſque ad noviſſimum annorum & expeditionem Gog & internecionem ejus. 4. Syſtema artis prophetandi, continens ejus artis finem, officia, materiam ſubjectam & inſtrumenta, exemplo Galeni in ſyſtemate artis medicæ.

[M] That he expreſſed ſome deſire of going back to the communion of the Proteſtants.] Mr Arnauld could not believe it. ‘There is one thing that would give a very ill opinion of Scioppius, if it were true : viz. That he had a mind, in his old days, to enter into articles with the Dutch, about his religion, and that accordingly he writ to Leyden, that he would turn Proteſtant if they were willing to receive him. But this is ſo unlikely, that the bare authority of Hornius is not ſufficient to make us believe it. He expreſſes in all his books ſo much zeal for the Catholic religion, and ſo great an averſion for heretics, that it is highly improbable he intended to return to his firſt religion. Beſides, he was a man of ſo great parts, not to mention his noble birth, that if he had been mean enough to entertain ſuch a thought, he would have found but too many Proteſtant princes ready to receive him with open arms, without being obliged to aſk a livelihood of the profeſſors of Leyden, whom he had cruelly offended by his uſage of Joſeph Scaliger, their hero and their idol. This is all that I could ſay, not having Hornius's book by me. But I have juſt now received the whole paſſage of that author, which I have inſerted at the bottom of the page, becauſe the bare reading of it is ſufficient to hinder us from giving any credit to it ; it is ſo full of paſſion and fury againſt the Catholics in general, and Scioppius in particular, accuſing the former of a barbarous deſign of murdering all the Proteſtants, and the latter, of being the promoter of that cruel reſolution (88).’ Here follows the paſſage that was ſent to Mr Arnauld : I take it from the 386th page of George Hornius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (89), continued and commented upon by Mr Leydecker. ‘Nunquam res Evangelicorum in majori poſitæ erant diſcrimine, quam poſt illam Bohemiorum calamitatem. Jeſuitæ enim jam quaſi parta de Univerſa Germania, imo omnibus Evangelicis, victoriâ, inſolenter triumphabant, ac nil niſi cædem Proteſtantium ſpirabant, quodam flagitioſiſſimo Grammatico, & ob ſcelera Altorfi Noricorum commiſſa infami, Gaſpare Schoppio, (83) Naudé Dialogue de Maſcurat, pag. 454.

(84) Ib. p. 455.

(85) That book of Naudé was written in 1649.

(86) Me jam exegeſi ſeu prophetia ſcripturæ (quam S. Petrus vocat) plus quingenta folia expleviſſe, ea ipſa clave ad aperienda ejus myſteria uſum quam idem Apoſtolus nobis reliquit vix tamen à quoquam adhuc intellectum. Scioppius, Epiſt. ad Voſſium. It is the 334th among the letters written to Voſſius, pag. m. 225.

(87) Sciopp. Ep. ad Voſſium, pag. 225.

(88) Morale pratique, Tom. iii, ch. vi, pag. 129, 130.

(89) Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1687. I ſhall obſerve for the benefit of thoſe who have another edition, that this paſſage is to be found numero 6, of the third article of the third period.

died; but I think his death ought to be placed in the year 1649 [N]. It cannot be denied that he was a very learned man; and had he had as much moderation and probity as he had learning and wit, he would be juſtly reckoned one of the heroes of the common-wealth of learning. His application to ſtudy, his memory, the multitude of his books, the quickneſs of his parts, his eloquence, and his aſcendant over his enemies [O], are ſurpriſing things: but his victories coſt him dear, for he was ‘ Schoppio, ex Palatinatu ſuperiore Neagora oriundo, ‘ ſed indigno, qui tam præſtanti nationi apud poſteros accenſeatur, (ſive, ut ſe appellari Italice malebat ‘ Scioppio) homine in apoſtaſiam prolapſo, claſſicum canente & totale excidium Proteſtantium promittente, ‘ ac ſuadente: qui tamen nihil niſi miſerabilis literator ‘ fuit, ut opera ejus inepta & maligna oſtendunt, ac ‘ extrema ſenecta, ſcriptis Patavio, ubi præ Jeſuitarum, vitæ ejus inſidiantium, metu deliteſcebat, Leidam literis, tranſitionem iterum ad evangelicos offerebat, ſi in gratiam reciperetur, ſed rejectus Apoſtata ‘ contemtuſque ob vanitatem fuit. - - - - The affairs of the Evangelics were never in a more dangerous ſituation, than they were after that calamity of the Bohemians. For the Jeſuits, as if they had obtained a compleat victory over all Germany, nay over the whole body of the Evangelics, triumphed inſolently, and meditated nothing leſs than a maſſacre of the Proteſtants; a certain Grammarian of a moſt wicked life, and infamous on account of the crimes which he had committed at Altdorf, I mean Gaſpar Schoppius, born at Neagora in the Upper Palatinate, though unworthy that poſterity ſhould reckon him to be of that noble nation, (or as he rather choſe to be called after the Italian manner Scioppius*) a man that had apoſtatized, ſounding the charge, and promiſing and adviſing the* ‘ total deſtruction of the Proteſtants: who nevertheleſs was no more than a miſerable ſmatterer in learning, as it evidently appears from his fooliſh and ſpiteful ‘ productions; when he was extremely old, he wrote letters to Leyden from Padua, (where he was lurking for fear of the Jeſuits, who had deſigns againſt his life) in which letters he offered to return to the Proteſtants, if he could be received into favour, but the ‘ Apoſtate was rejected and deſpiſed on account of his ‘ vanity.’ I have hardly read any author, who mentions this deſign of Scioppius, without quoting Hornius for it. Which makes me apt to think, that no other authority can be alledged; and I doubt one voucher is not ſufficient in a fact of ſuch a nature. I have heard a learned Lutheran ſay, that Scioppius’s letters, upon that ſubject have been in Boëclerus’s hands. But why then where they not publiſhed; for it is well known, that many people look upon Hornius’s narrative as a meer fable? It is at leaſt an indiſcretion, which deſerved to be cenſured by the academical ſenate. One cannot ſay, that the moſt illuſtrious univerſity of Leyden rejected Scioppius’s offers, without doing them wrong. Such a conduct would have been neither conſiſtent with human prudence nor Chriſtian charity. It would have been a glorious thing for the Proteſtants to regain ſuch a man; beſides, ought not the Church to open her arms at all times to her revolted children? Muſt ſhe not, like the good ſhepherd, go in ſearch of all the ſheep that are gone aſtray? Much more would ſhe be guilty, if ſhe ſhut the door againſt the ſheep, that are willing to return into the ſheepfold. Was it an impoſſible thing for Scioppius to repent? Could it be certainly detemined that his requeſt was a trick? But, however that was, might they not have taken care to prevent his doing any miſchief. Take notice, that he obſerves in his letters to Voſſius, that the prophetical books which he deſired to publiſh, contained nothing contrary to the Church of Rome. He gives plainly to underſtand, that he acknowledges the injuſtice and uſurpation of the court of Rome, but he ſays nothing whereby it appears that he intended to retire among the Proteſtants. ‘ Vix autem ſperare audeo, fore ut quicquam iſtorum in Italia edendi venia mihi detur, non ‘ quod quicquam in eis vel decretis Romanæ Eccleſiæ ‘ de fide, vel bonis moribus adverſetur, ſed quod mores ‘ Curiæ Romanæ omnes Eccleſiæ leges jam olim in ‘ poteſtatem ſuam perduxerint, nec jam cuiquam fas ‘ ſit quicquam tale dicere aut ſcribere, quale ipſi Pontifices in D. Bernardo, Brigitta & Catherina Senenſi ‘ non modo verè recteque dictum faſſi ſunt, ſed etiam ‘ pro ſaluberrimo fidelium dogmate religioſè obſervari ‘ voluerunt (90).’ Obſerve alſo, that this letter contains all ſorts of civilities, and ſeveral marks of confidence with reſpect to Voſſius.

[N] His death ought to be placed in the year 1649 (91).] It will appear from the following words of Mr Baillet, that few people know when Scioppius departed this life. This uncertainty would have vexed him, had he foreſeen it, when he made ſo great a noiſe all over Europe. ‘ (92) I have not been able ‘ hitherto to know preciſely in what year he died. Mr * ‘ Patin, the father, ſays it was in 1649. Mr † Lambecius ‘ tells us he was writing books ſtill in 1652. Others ‘ ſeem to ſay that he lived beyond the year 1660. ‘ Mr ⸸ Galois, ſpeaking of him in 1665, ſays he had ‘ been lately dead. Mr ‡ Conigius writing in 1678, ‘ has theſe words, Paucis ab hinc annis vivere deſiit, - - ‘ he ceaſed to live a few years ago.’ To which I add, that others place his death in the year 1663 (93). Of all thoſe writers, Mr Patin is he who comes neareſt to the truth; for it is certain Scioppius died in the year 1649. Ferrarius ſpeaks of him, as of a man who was no longer alive, in a ſpeech (94) which he delivered in the ſixteenth year of his profeſſorſhip at Padua (95). But he began to be a profeſſor in that univerſity in the year 1634 (96), and therefore he ſaid ſo in 1650. From whence it ought to be concluded that Patin had not been ill informed about the year in which Scioppius died, when he wrote the following paſſage, on the thirteenth of July, 1649. ‘ (97) This ‘ year proves very fatal to men of letters: ſince ‘ Mr Hofman’s and Mr Pietre’s deceaſe, we have alſo ‘ loſt Mr des Yveteaux, who had been the late king’s ‘ preceptor; Mr Juſtel, ſecretary to the king, a learned man, who did formerly belong to the Marſhal ‘ de Bouillon. Beſides, Voſſius and Spanheim are ‘ dead in Holland; Paganinus Gaudentius in Italy, ‘ and likewiſe Gaſpar Scioppius, who wrote about ‘ forty-three years ago a very infamous book againſt ‘ the incomparable Joſeph Scaliger. This Scioppius ‘ was a Lutheran in his youth; he turned Roman ‘ Catholic by reading Baronius’s Annals, as he ſaid. ‘ Afterwards he went to Rome; where he was a domeſtic of Cardinal Madrucio’s. He had a mind ‘ then to turn Jeſuit (98); but the ſociety were of ‘ opinion that it was better for him to remain a layman, and that he could do them greater ſervices, ‘ which he actually did by writing againſt Scaliger. ‘ He made ſome journies for them to Germany and ‘ Venice in diſguiſe (99). Afterwards he had a penſion from the emperor: but at laſt he declared ‘ himſelf an enemy to the emperor and the Jeſuits, ‘ and went to Padua for the ſafety of his perſon, ‘ where he lived ſecure from all his enemies, having ‘ obtained a pardon for his paſt life from the Republic of Venice. He is ſuſpected to be the moſt conſiderable author of many ſmall pieces publiſhed ‘ againſt the Jeſuits within theſe fifteen years, and, ‘ among others, of the Anatomia Societatis, & de Strategematis Jeſuitarum. He formerly told one of his ‘ friends, who is alſo very much mine, that Cardinal ‘ Baronius had ſollicited him by letters, when he was ‘ in Germany, to turn Catholic, and promiſed, in ‘ that caſe, to procure him a Cardinal’s hat (100); ‘ and that Baronius himſelf hoped to be made Pope ‘ after Paul V.’

[O] His application to ſtudy, his memory, the multitude of his books . . . . . his aſcendant over his enemies.] Ferrarius tells us, in the paſſage which I am going to cite, that he ſtudied night and day; that during the fourteen laſt years of his life he kept himſelf ſhut up in a little room, and that his converſation with thoſe that went to viſit him, run only upon learning; that, like another Ezra, he might have reſtored the holy Scripture, if it had been loſt; and that he repeated paſſages of it at a breath for ſeveral hours together with ſuch a memory, that thoſe who heard him was ſtrangely abuſed ; nay, he miſtruſted ſometimes his dreadful pen [P]. He had the whole Bible at his fingers end (g). It is not ture that he would not ſuffer his picture to be drawn [Q]. He left behind him ſeveral manuſcripts which are very

---

(90) Scioppius, Epiſt. ad Voſſium, p. 225, 226: It is dated the 20th of February 1642.

(91) As Mr Witte does, in Diario Biographico.

(92) Baillet, Enfans celebres, Art. 69.

* In his Letters.

† Tom. i, Bibl. Vind. Ceſ. cap. l. lib. i.

⸸ Journal des Sçavans.

‡ Bibl. vet. & nov.

(93) Obiit anno 1663 octogenario major. Pope Blount, Cenſura Auctorum, pag. 692. He would have lived eighty ſeven years if he had lived till 1663.

(94) That which is intituled Funus Literatorum.

(95) Per ſexdecim annos in Patavino Gymnaſio . . . . Rhetoris partes implet. Ibid. circa fin.

(96) Carolus Patinus in Lyceo Patavino, p. 15.

(97) Guy Patin, Letter xv, of the 1ſt edition, and xxii of the 2d, page 96, of the firſt volume, Edit. of Geneva 1691.

(98) Others ſay he was a Jeſuit, and that he left that order. See Mr Baillet, Jugem. on the Critic-Grammarians, num. 535. It is a miſtake. See Ampbot. Sciopp. p. 169.

(99) This ſeems to be falſe: The firſt journey he made into Germany after his turning Roman Catholic, was in the year 1607, when he was arreſted at Venice for ſome days. He appeared in Germany with pomp, and as being in the ſervice of the Archduke Ferdinand. (See Vita & Parentes Gaſparis, Schoppii, p. 155, 156.) Nay he dined at Amberg with the Prince of Anhault, governor of the Palatinate, and was kindly uſed by him. See Ampbot. Sciopp. pag. 129, 130.

(100) See Amphotides Scioppianæ, pag. 169.

him could not ſufficiently admire him, eſpecially conſidering that he drew from them very ſingular doctrines, and ſuch as were unknown to the moſt learned. The number of his books exceeded the number of his years. Ferrarius having mentioned the intereſt he had with the Popes and ſeveral princes, and the public employments beſtowed upon him, goes on thus (101) : Donec inanium pertæſus in ſe ipſum recederet, & partim Mediolani, partim in hac Urbe (102) victuris, æternum libris bona fide poſteritatis negotium tranſigeret. Eos libros in ore famæ in commendatione omnium verſari. Quumque per omnes fere diſciplinas capax ingenium circumtulerit, duo tamen in ipſo ſine exemplo ſatis exprimi, nedum laudari poſſe, judicii vim in aliorum ſcriptis æſtimandis, & ad latinæ orationis cenſuram exigendis miram, atque exactam, tantam vero ſacrarum literarum peritiam, quantam fortaſſe nullus ad hanc diem, quantamque nemo credat, qui illam auribus non uſurparit. Ut, quod olim de Eſdra dictum eſt, deperditos linguæ ſanctæ Codices ſolus reparare potuerit. Scilicet uſque ad extremam ſenectam, nuntio rebus humanis remiſſo, noctu dieque in ſacrarum literarum commentatione incredibili labore verſatum ut ipſum adeuntibus per plures horas uno veluti ſpiritu infinita ſacræ paginæ loca inuſitata memoriæ felicitate ſtupentibus, atque attonitis repræſentaret, atque ex ipſis divinæ ſapientiæ penetralibus arcana etiam doctiſſimis ignorata exprimeret. Nimirum cum rarò alias prodire in publicum ſoleret, extremis temporibus quatuordecim annos domo, ac ferme anguſto cubiculo clauſum diebus noctibus jungentem lucubrare perpetuo ſolitum, cumque à doctis inviſeretur, ne unquam à literis abſcederet variis, ac feſtivis de re literaria ſermonibus profundæ eruditionis fructus uberrimos communicare conſueviſſe, huncque ipſi ludum, hoc otium, hoc laborum levamen ſemper fuiſſe. Nec mirum ſi ætate exacta plures libros à ſe confectos, quam annos numeraret, ejuſque opera vel magnam Bibliothecam inſtruere poſſent, ipſe viva ac perambulans Bibliotheca merito appellaretur.

The aſcendant he had over his adverſaries is a kind of prodigy. I have quoted above a paſſage out of Mr Baillet in his book concerning famous children, wherein that author confeſſes (103), that GOD did almoſt in every thing reward his indefatigable labour with great ſucceſs ; the ſequel of that paſſage runs thus (104) : GOD permitted not that his exceſſive labours ſhould occaſion his death, or prejudice his health ; but was pleaſed to let him live in the world for the ſpace of twenty olympiads, and perhaps more (105), for the execution of his deſigns, and the trial of many people.

[P] For he was ſtrangely abuſed ; nay, he miſtruſted his pen.] Soon after the publication of the Scaliger Hypobolimæus, ſome outrageous pieces came out againſt him. Baudius took Scaliger's part in verſe, and Heinſius (106) in proſe. Another author made a bloody ſatire, intituled, Vita & parentes Gaſparis Schoppii. Scaliger did not remain idle : he publiſhed Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum, under the name of Janus Rutgerſius, which he denoted only by the initial letters J. R. (107). Barthius came in for one, and wrote three ſatires againſt Scioppius, which I have mentioned in another place (108). Here follow the titles of ſome other pieces againſt the ſame man. Alberti de Albertis Lydius lapis ingenii, ſpiritus ac morum Gaſparis Scioppii. Ejuſdem Vindiciæ generales adverſus famoſos Scioppii Libellos in Jeſuitas, at Munich, 1649, in 12mo. Henrici Wottoni Epiſtola de G. Scioppio cui propter argumenti ſimilitudinem etiam alia adjecta ſunt, at Amberg, 1637. One of the chief writers for the Jeſuits againſt him was Father Laurence Forerus, who publiſhed Grammaticus Proteus, arcanorum Societatis Jeſu Dædalus dedolatus, & genuino ſuo vultu repræſentatus : acceſſit auctarium animadverſionum in Gaſparis Scioppii Eccleſiaſticam Aſtrologiam, at Ingolſtad, 1636, in 8vo. Appendix ad Grammaticum Proteum quid de relatione Alphonſi de Vargas ſit ſentiendum, in the ſame place, and in the ſame year, in 8vo. 'The Jeſuits, they are Mr Baillet's words (109), repreſent 'him as the greateſt knave, and the moſt profligate 'man in the world, and as the public peſt of learning 'and of human ſociety. And indeed the greateſt men 'of that time complained of him, almoſt all with 'one voice, Catholics, Heretics, and even the Deiſts, 'and all of them voted for his proſcription, becauſe 'he attacked every body without diſtinction, defamed 'the moſt honeſt men with as much pleaſure as impu'dence, and took a pride in neither ſparing quality 'nor merit.' Ferrarius, who praiſed him ſo much, acknowledges that he was forced to hear very unpleaſant ſtories (110).

I have ſaid that he did not always truſt his pen : the thing is this. A pretender to great matters in the common-wealth of learning took delight in abuſing Scioppius, and placing him in the loweſt rank of men of letters. He even threatened to write a book againſt him, which ſhould convict him in the eyes of the whole world to be nothing but a mere ignoramus. Scioppius ſent him word that he ſhould hold his tongue, and that if he continued to vex him, he would bring himſelf into trouble, not in the court of Parnaſſus, before the Muſes, but before the tribunal of the Magiſtrates ; that Scioppius laying down the weapons of learning, would employ no other writings againſt him, but ſuch as the records of Bologna could afford him ; that he would take care to get a copy of the information and ſentence, whereby that man was convicted of ſeveral crimes. Theſe are, ſaid he, the arms I ſhall make uſe of, if he continues to be troubleſome to me. When the man had been threatned thus, he gave over the deſign of writing againſt Scioppius, but continued to ſpeak ill of him. Nicius Erythræus relates the thing very handſomely ; the reader will be glad to ſee his Latin ; the thing would want ſome of it's principal beauties if I did not give it in my author's own terms. 'Cum de ſingulis, de'trahendi gratia, maledice contumelioſeque loquere'tur, Gaſparem vero Scioppium, qui in literaria Rep. 'in primis ordinibus numeratur, imi ſubſellii virum, 'atque inter literatos proletarios, ut ita dicam, refe'rendum eſſe ajebat ; quem ille Scioppium, quoniam 'in quodam libello ſua tempora, quaſi literatis viris 'non amica, modeſte reprehenderat, cœpit contume'liis omnibus lacerare, atque palam eum infantem, 'rudem, & omnino omnis eruditionis expertem atque 'ignarum aſſerere, minitarique, ſe libro edito ejus 'inſcitiam palam omnibus facturum. At Scioppius mi'ſit illi, qui diceret, ſi ſibi amplius moleſtus eſſet, 'non ſe pugnaturum cum eo eloquentiæ doctrinæque 'armis, ſed dictis teſtium, ac ſententiis judicum, in 'publicas tabulas relatis, quibus Bononiæ, malorum 'facinorum argutus, evictus, ac condemnatus fuiſſet ; 'his ſe armis curaturum, ut ejus projecta ad detra'hendum bonis viris audacia infringeretur, ac retun'deretur. Hic auditis, à ſcribendi contra illum ſen'tentia deſtitit, ſeque tantum intra verba continuit '(111).' This may be looked upon as a very mortifying diſgrace for Scioppius. Properly ſpeaking, Zoilus Ardelio triumphed over him ; for when a man of letters, in a diſpute of learning, has recourſe to magiſtrates, bailiffs, and attornies, it is a ſign he miſtruſts his pen and his knowledge. He changes the ſtate of the queſtion ; he ſhuns the fight, he dares not enter the liſt with his antagoniſt (112).

[Q] It is not true that he would not ſuffer his picture to be drawn.] Thomas Bartholinus ſays, that Scioppius would never ſuffer his picture to be drawn or engraved, tho' his friends deſired it ; and he conjectures that this was owing to his fear of enchantments. But becauſe he is miſtaken as to the fact (113), his conjecture ought not much to be minded. However I ſhall ſet down his words, which contain ſome other examples that are a little more certain (114). 'Adduci nun'quam potuit. Caſpar Scioppius, quanquam ſæpe ab 'amicis rogatus, ut effigiem ſuam vel coloribus picto'rum vel æri cælatorum committeret. Neſcio an 'faſcini metu, quod adverſariorum, quos & magnos '& multos habuit, præſtigias timeret. Hinc maluit 'cum Accio Poëta, voluminum non imaginum certa'mina exercere. Certè nec Palæottus, nec Velſerus (115) 'nec Pinellus, Viri magni ſe vivos depingi voluerunt, 'ſicut Calceolarius in Muſeo prodidit. - - - - - Gaſpar 'Scioppius could never be prevailed upon, tho' he was 'often importuned by his friends, to ſuffer his picture to (g) See Ferrarius's words in the remark [O].

(101) Octavius Ferrarius, in Proluſione cui titulus Funus Literatorum.

(102) That is, at Padua.

(103) Baillet, Enfans celebres, Art. 69.

(104) Ibid.

(105) Mr Baillet, Jugem des Sçavans, ſur les Crit. Gramm. num. 535, ſays he lived above eighty years : it is certain he lived but ſeventy-three.

(106) It is he who made the ſatire intituled, Hercules tuam fidem ſive Munſterus hypobolimæus, and another piece intituled, Virgula divina ſive Apotheoſis Lucretii Veſpillonis.

(107) See Thomaſius, Præfat. in Orationes Mureti, p. 24.

(108) In the article BARTHIUS, rem. [Q].

(109) Baillet, Jugem. des Sçavans, ubi ſupra, num. 535.

(110) Ita multorum in ſe odia concitaſſe ut amaras ipſe quoque hiſtorias audire cogeretur, belliſque pluſquam civilibus Muſarum pacem inquietaret. Ferrar, ubi ſupra.

(111) Nicius Erythræus. Pinacoth. I, p. 241. He ſpeaks of one Zoilus Ardelio. It is doubtleſs a ſuppoſititious name.

(112) Compare with this what ſhall be ſaid in the remarks [D] and [E] of the article THOMAS.

(113) Scioppius, mentions his Print, p. 51, and 150, of his Amphotides Scioppianæ. It may be ſeen in Freherus's Theatrum, pag. 766.

(114) Thom. Bartholin. de legendis Libris, pag. 65, 66.

(115) I ſpeak of it in the remark [G] of his article.

very much commended [R]. I have not been able to find the elogies of Julius Cæſar Capaci, wherein honourable mention is made of him. Two little books have appeared under the name of ANDREAS SCIOPPIUS, Gaſpar's brother [S]. It is a ſuppoſititious name.

If any one deſires to know how earneſtly Sciopius applied himſelf in his youth to get an exact knowledge of the Latin tongue, he muſt read his Scaliger Hypobolimæus folio 401. Being told that the reading of the ancient Poets was dangerous for young people, and being deſirous to learn Latin from the beſt authors, without doing any prejudice to his virtue, he made uſe of a remedy, which deſerves to be mentioned [T].

'be either painted or engraved. I do not know whether 'this proceeded from his fear of enchantments, becauſe he 'dreaded the tricks of his adverſaries, who were both 'many and conſiderable. But he rather choſe, with the 'Poet Accius, to diſtinguiſh himſelf by books than by 'pictures. Certain it is, that neither Palæottus, nor 'Velſerus, nor Pinellus, all three great men, would 'ſuffer their pictures to be drawn, while they were 'alive, as Calceolarius has given an account in his 'Muſeum.' Batholinus might have added to the three examples of Calceolarius, a King of Lacedæmon (116), the Philoſopher Plotinus (117), and a famous Engliſh Divine (118), &c.

[R] Several manuſcripts that are very mucb commended.] Read theſe words of Morhoſius: ' Libri 'Scioppiani ἀνέκδοτοι multi, atque inter illos ejus 'Theſaurus, ſive abſolutiſſimi de linguâ Latinâ Commen- 'tarii apud Joh. Michaelem Pieruccium, Profeſſorem 'Patavinum, latitant, neque hunc in diem lucem, cum 'indignatione eruditorum, vident; de quibus legen-'dus eſt Gregor. Let. Ital. regnante part 3. lib. 3. 'pag. 325. Magna hujus libri expectatio apud litera-'tos eſt, & qui viderunt, ita commendant, ut in illo 'genere nil ſimile à quoquam ſcriptum illis eſſe vi-'deatur (119). - - - Several books of Sciopius are in 'manuſcript, and among them his Theſaurus ſive abſolu-'tiſſimi de Linguâ Latinâ Commentarii, remain in 'the hands of John Michael Pieruccius, profeſſor at 'Padua, and are not yet publiſhed, to the no ſmall in- 'dignation of the learned world. Concerning theſe read 'Gregor. Leti Ital. regnante part. 3. lib. 3. pag. 325. 'Great is the expectation of that book which we have 'mentioned, and good judges, who have ſeen it, praiſe 'it to ſuch a degree, that they think no writing of the 'kind was ever to be compared with it.' This Pieruccius is probably the ſame upon whom Sciopius beſtowed ſo many encomiums in his letter to Voſſius, and who wiſhed he might have been profeſſor of Philoſophy in Holland. Sciopius had taken him into his houſe, and made him his ſole heir (120).

[S] Andreas SCIOPPIUS, Gaſpar's brother . . . . is a ſuppoſititious name.] It is thought (121) that the Jeſuit Garaſſe is the author of two ſatires, one of which is intituled, Andreæ Schioppii Caſparis fratris Horoſcopus Anticotonis, ejuſque Germanorum Martillerii, & Hardivillerii vita, mors, cenotaphium, Apotheoſis (122); and the other, Andreæ Schioppii Caſparis Fratris Elixir Calviniſticum, ſeu lapis Philoſophiæ reformatæ à Calvino Genevæ primum effoſſus, dein ab Iſaaco Caſaubono Londini politus, cum teſtamentario Anticotonis codice nuper invento (123). Mr Baillet (124) does very well obſerve that Gaſpar Sciopius had no brother, that writ any thing; but that, in point of ſatire, the pretended Andreas deſerved to be Gaſpar's brother. The ſon of Iſaac Caſaubon made the ſame obſervation. Peream, ſays he (125), niſi meruerit hic homo quiſquis ſit, ut Gaſparis Schoppii frater credatur eſſe. He had been ſaying, Certum eſt tale illud eſſe ſcriptum ut ipſe Gaſpar Schop. illius author eſſe potuerit: adeo mendaciis & calumniis refertum eſt, adeo plenum maledictis & conviciis, &c. Soon after he ſpeaks of a ſatire written by Gaſpar Sciopius, as Eudæmon-Joannes acknowledges (126). That ſatire is intituled, Holofernis Kriſſæderi Landſperga Bavari reſponſio ad epiſtolam Iſaaci Caſauboni, Regii in Anglia Archipædagogi pro viro clariſſimo Gaſpare Scioppio (127). Caſaubon is accuſed in it not only of being ignorant of the Latin tongue, but alſo of being a pimp, a whoremonger, an adulterer, and a thief, and ſome thing worſe ſtill: Ille meo patri, quem ſcit ipſe ſpectatiſſimæ ſemper integritatis fuiſſe, ſtupra, furta, lenocinia, adulteria, (hæc ipſa enim crimina illi impingit, & alia quoque vel dictu fœda) audet objicere? mirum mihi videtur & incredibile, niſi quod Schoppium cogito (128). The reading of that book, if Sciopius may be believed, threw Caſaubon into a fit of melancholy of which he died (129). Meric Caſaubon (130) refutes this by his father's journal, whereby it appears, under the firſt of the ides of March, that Caſaubon deſpiſed that ſatire. Having read the infamous things that are publiſhed in it againſt himſelf, his father, and his wife, he wrote in his Journal that he gloried in ſuffering with his family all thoſe reproaches for the ſake of JESUS CHRIST. His ſon obſerves in the margin, that there is nothing in that libel of Sciopius againſt his mother. He accuſes that ſatirical writer of Atheiſm, and proves it in the following manner. Sciopius has collected the fineſt paſſages of the ſcripture, wherein we are forbidden to rail at our neighbours; and at the ſame time the tract wherein he has inſerted them is a violent ſatire: his deſign was therefore to let the public know that he laughs at the ſcripture. Quum intenderet alios inaudito exemplo calumniari, & omni convitiorum genere proſequi, congerit præcipuos è S. Scripturis locos quibus vetamur aliis ullam omnino contumeliam facere, aut convitium dicere: nonne ut omnibus palam faciat, quo loco Dei mandata habeat homo perditus, atque Deo ipſi (horreſco referens) illudat (131)? The following words of Mr Baillet may be added to that Latin paſſage. ' Caſaubon † calls him the moſt 'cruel of all wild beaſts, and pretends in another 'book of his ‡ that Sciopius was a profeſſed enemy 'to GOD, and that he had found in one of his books 'execrable blaſphemies againſt the divine authority of 'the holy ſcripture (132).' But it is to be obſerved that thoſe blaſphemies are only ſtrained expreſſions about the authority, which the Roman Catholics pretend the Church has received from GOD to explain the ſcripture. Ducit hodie familiam, they are Caſaubon's words (133), inter hujus generis hæreticos hoſtis Dei certiſſimus Sciopius; in cujus Eccleſiaſtico leviter inſpecto, multas legi ſuperioribus diebus adverſus τὰς θεοπνεύστους Scripturas, blaſphemias longe diriſſimas.

After this digreſſion I return to Father Garaſſe, and I ſay he could not have pitched upon a more proper brotherhood. Mr Baillet (134) obſerves, that there was in the beginning of our century one Andrew SCIOPPIUS, in Saxony, a Lutheran; but I cannot believe, adds he, that he was Gaſpar's near relation. I can ſay nothing upon this ſubject, I only know that our Sciopius calls Conrad Schoppius, a learned man, who was ſtill living in 1633, his couſin (135). He taught Rhetoric at Berne (136), and had been Profeſſor of Eloquence and Poetry at Heidelberg (137). I would not affirm that CONRAD SCHOPPIUS, a Taylor of Francfort (138), one of the chief authors of the inſurrection which happened in that town in the year 1614, and beheaded two years after (139), was not related to Gaſpar. There has been a miniſter, called CONRAD SCHOPPIUS, who publiſhed ſome Latin ſermons (140).

[T] He made uſe of a remedy, which deſerves to be mentioned.] It conſiſted in mortifying his body by a ſtrict diet. He faſted whole days in Germany poring upon his books; and when he was at Rome, he wholly abſtained from wine, meat, eggs, and fiſh: he made but one meal in a day, and eat then nothing but very common things and in a ſmall quantity; half a cabbage, a little rice, a ſmall piece of cheeſe, a pear or an apple; and both in winter and ſummer, he had no other bed than boards, two blankets, and a pillow (141). There is no doubt but theſe are excellent remedies againſt the rage of incontinency, when a man does ſincerely deſire to live chaſte. Thoſe, who pretend that they are not very effectual, and that marriage is the only true remedy, are ſuch as never tried them, or do not much care to reſiſt luxury; and therefore their teſtimony is of no great force: but the affair we are now upon is a relation, not a diſpute. Here follow Scioppius's words (142). ‘Cum primis ineuntis adoleſcentiæ meæ annis veteres ſcriptores, & in primis poëtas legere cuperem, & viros autem doctos audirem, qui arma pruriginis, hoc eſt, obſcena illa poëtarum carmina iſti præſertim ætati propter periculum etiam atque etiam cavenda dicerent; excogitavi rationem, qua cum minimo meo damno aut periculo utilitates, quæ ex lectione iſta peti poſſunt, haurirem. . . . . . Ego qui lubricas illas poëtarum cantilenas tutò, &, ut ait Lucretius, mea ſine parte pericli percipere cuperem, temperantiæ & abſtinentiæ ultrò me colligandum præbui. Nam ut Terentius ait, ſine Cerere & Baccho friget Venus: ſive ut ante ipſum Euripides:

---

(116) AGESILAUS: ſee the end of his article.

(117) See his article, remark [A].

(118) Gataker, ſee the beginning of his Life.

(119) Morhof. Polyhiſt. lib. i, cap. vii, p. 62.

(120) See the letters written to Voſſius, pag. m. 224.

(121) See Mr Baillet, Auteurs deguiſez, Part. iii, cap. iii, §. 2. and in the Catalogue.

(122) Printed at Antwerp for Jerome Verduſſen, 1614, in 4to.

(123) Printed at Antwerp for the heirs of Martin Nutius 1615, in 4to.

(124) Baillet, in Tom. i, of the Anti, Art. 15, §. 1.

(125) Mericus Caſaubonus, in Pietate, p. 18.

(126) Caſtigationum, lib. ii, pag. 125.

(127) Printed at Ingolſtad, 1615, in 8vo.

(128) Mericus Caſaubonus, ubi ſupra, p. 21.

(129) Scribit hic nebulo patrem meum poſtquam legerat hunc ſuum libellum, ex deſperatione vitæ renuntiaſſe, atque inde vivere deſiiſſe. Id. ibid. pag. 24.

(130) Ib. p. 25.

(131) Ib. p. 20.

† Iſaac. Caſaubon. in Epiſtol.

‡ Id. Caſaub. Exercit. i, in Baron. pag. 109. M.

(132) Baillet, Jugemens des Sçavans, ubi ſupra, num. 535.

(133) In Apparat. Baronii, §. xxxiii, pag. 133, Edit. Genev. 1663.

(134) In Vol. i, of the Anti, Art. 15, §. i,

(135) See the 20th letter of the fifth book Suſpectarum Lectionum of Gaſpar Sciopius.

(136) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Freinſhemius's Commentary upon Quintus Curtius.

(137) See the verſes he made for Philip Pareus: they are prefixed to the Lexicon Criticum, of the ſame Pareus.

(138) See the Continuator of Thuanus's Hiſtory, lib. vii, pag. 433.

(139) Idem, lib. ix, pag. 658.

(140) Draudius mentions them in his Bibliotheca Claſſica.

(141) Cubitus . . . aſſeres ſine ulla culcita cervicali tantum duabuſque lodicibus inſtructi. Sciopius, ubi infra, fol. 251.

Ἐν πλησμονῇ τοί Κύπεις, ἐν πινῶντι δ᾽ οὔ.

Saturis adeſt Venus, non eſurientibus.

Monſtrum ſcilicet haberetur libido ſine gula (ait Tertullianus) (143). . . . . . . (144) In libidinem ebullire, res laterum eſt ac virium. Vires autem, ne infirmitas forſan perdat militiam, cibis excitantur. Scitis, ait ille, quid tentare ſoleat humanam ſatietatem. Toto itaque biennio ſic in Germania vixi, ut integros dies aridus, ſiccus ac jejunus in ſtudendo conſumerem, omninoque prandia ignorarem. Veni poſtea in Italiam; ubi cum pleroſque omnes ſcriptores veteres tam Græcos, quàm Latinos, diligenti lectione contriviſſem, excerpſiſſemque ſedulò omnia, quæ ad corrigendos ordinandoſque mores & affectus & ad vitam quàm tranquilliſſimè agendam uſui fore viſa eſſent. . . . . . . Non modo bis, quod in ſiculis ſibi non probari Plato oſtendit, ſed etiam ſemel in die ſaturum fieri, & vino carere nolle, non ſatis eo dignum eſſe deprehendi, qui ſibi legendis ſapientiæ magiſtris illis operæ pretium feciſſe videretur. . . . . . . Quare ne in legendis iſtis oleum & operam perdidiſſem, tamquam germanus Stoicus quique ad vitam potius, quæ didiciſſet, quàm ad diſputationes referenda cenſeret, vinum aqua ex præfluente Tiberi hauſta mutavi, quod ignem ſcilicet, ut Plato ait, igni addendum non putarem: tum carnes in perpetuum à menſa mea proſcripſi, non ſolum † διὰ τὴν νωθρίαν τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς κρεοφαγίας ἐγγινομένην, ſed etiam ἀσκήσεως χάριν καὶ τοῦ μὴ σφειγᾶν περὶ τὰ ἀφροδίσια τὴν σάρκα, ut idem Clemens loquitur, cùm veriſſimè à S. Hieronymo dictum ſit: Eſum carnis eſſe ſeminarium libidinis. Sed etiam piſcibus & ovis culina ac menſa mea interdixi, quod hæc quidem * στυτικὰ plus ſatis experimentis didiciſſem, piſcium vero eſu majorem etiam, quam carnium, voluptatem capere ſolerem: quare dimidiato caule & aliquantulo oryzæ cum piro aut pomo & caſei fruſtillo contentus, ipſas viginti quatuor horas durare ſoleo, eadem opera jentans, prandens, cœnans ac commiſſans. - - - While very early in my youth I had an inclination to read the antient authors, and eſpecially the Poets, and hearing learned men ſay that theſe inſtruments of wantonneſs, I mean the obſcene verſes of the Poets, ought ſtrictly to be guarded againſt at thoſe years, on account of their dangerous conſequences, I thought of a way by which with the leaſt prejudice or hazard to myſelf I might reap the advantages of ſuch reading. . . . . . Deſiring to peruſe theſe dangerous productions of the Poets in ſafety, and without my ſhare in the danger, as Lucretius words it, I frankly bound myſelf over to temperance and abſtinence. For, as Terence ſays, Love languiſhes without good victuals and drink: or, as Euripides before him:

Love thrives with plenty, but with hunger dies.

Luſt without good cheer (ſays Tertullian) would be looked upon as a prodigy. . . . . . . The bubblings of luſt are the effects of a vigorous and healthy body. But this vigour is provoked and ſet on by victuals. You know, ſays he, what temptations a man generally has after a belly-full, &c. . . . . Wherefore like a true Stoic, and one who thought his learning was rather to be applied to his life and manners than to diſputes, that I might not loſe my labour in reading theſe books, I changed my wine for the water of the Tiber, becauſe I was unwilling, as Plato ſays, to add fire to fire. I likewiſe for ever baniſhed meat from my table, not only on account of the heavineſs which is occaſioned by the eating thereof, but alſo for the ſake of exerciſe, and that my fleſh might not have too great an itching to love-affairs, as the ſame Clemens ſays; and as it is moſt truly affirmed by St Jerome: That the eating of fleſh is the nurſery of luſt, &c.’ Take notice that he ſays (145) that before he had read Father Coſter's books, he practiſed moſt of thoſe things only to live in conformity to reaſon, but after he had read theſe, he directed them to God. It is alſo to be obſerved that he believed the reading of ſome books could excite the moſt drowſy tempers. He reckoned among thoſe books ſome commentaries of Scaliger and their text. ‘(146) Vos autem capulares illi, vieti, edentuli, & jam diu Acheronti debiti, ſi jam vos opus perdere & tamquam caballos in clivo non facere pudet, ut Satyrion compendi faciatis, familiaris hujus mei auctores, in eoſdemque notas legite,

- - - - Accendi queis frigidus ævo
Laomedontiades aut Neſtoris hernia poſſit (147).

But ye, decrepit, ſhrivelled, toothleſs old men, whoſe bodies are long ago due to their graves, if ye be not henceforth aſhamed to loſe your labour, and to fumble like worn out jades upon the mountain, inſtead of all provocatives, read the authors of this friend of mine, and his notes upon the ſame,

So full, ſo fierce, ſo vig'rous, and ſo ſtrong
That looking on would make old Neſtor young.

Dryden.

And becauſe he took hold of every opportunity to inſult that great man, he tells him in a reproachful manner that he ſlighted his father's judgment, in commenting upon certain authors. I ſhall ſet down his words, that the reader may ſee that men of great virtue and learning, though belonging to the ſame family, are divided in their opinions about obſcenities. ‘(148) Cum pater tuus obſcenos & immemorabiles Auſonii, Martialis, ſimiliumque poëtarum verſus negarit à Critico cenſendos, atque adeò ne legendos quidem omninò, aut audiendos, ſed deteſtandos & flammis expiandos, & pro ſignis Priapi, adeoque pro libris honori ejus ſcriptis, ſanctorum imagines à nobis habendas eſſe contenderit. . . . . (149) Tu exortus es homo ſanctiſſimus & caſtitatis ac pudicitiæ exemplar atque ſpecimen, qui non modò illum ipſum cenſura patris tui notatum Auſonium, ſed hoc etiam Burdigalenſi Triphallo nihilo deterius mutoniatos Catullum, Tibullum, Propertium, & Priapeiorum verſuum ſcriptores, magna temporis curæque impenſa à te recenſitos, caſtigatos, nec pœnitendis (ut gloriaris) commentariis illuſtratos emittere & adoleſcentibus commendare auderes. Hoc, ſatis ſcio, nullo modo patri tuo probare poſſes. - - - After your father had declared that the leud and infamous productions of Auſonius, Martial, and the like Poets, did not deſerve the remarks of any Critic, and therefore that they were not to be read or heard, but to be deteſted and burnt, and that inſtead of the ſtatues of Priapus, and books written in honour of him, we ought to have the images of the Saints. . . . . . You appeared, a man of eminent ſanctity, forſooth, and a ſingular inſtance of modeſty, who have taken care to publiſh, for the benefit of the youth, not only that ſame Auſonius, whom your father marked with a note of infamy, but likewiſe theſe other maſter-pieces of ribaldry Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and the authors of the Priapeia, after having reviſed and corrected them with great loſs of time and pains, and illuſtrated them, with a commentary of which, as you boaſt, you have no reaſon to be aſhamed. This, I am well aſſured, you could no ways juſtify to your father.’

(142) Idem, in Scalig. hypobolim. fol. 250.

(143) You will find above in the remark [I], num. iv, of the article EREMITA, the ſequel of Tertullian's words, and ſeveral paſſages of the like nature.

(144) Scioppius, ibid, verſo.

† Non ſolum propter hebetudinem, quæ ex carnium eſu generatur, ſed etiam exercitationis gratia, & ne caro nimis perpruriſcat ad Venerem.

* Pruriginem commoventia.

(145) Id. fol. 250, verſo.

(146) Id. ib. fol. 272, verſo.

(147) Juven. Sat. vi, ver. 323.

(148) Scioppius, ibid. fol. 281. verſo.

(149) Ibid. fol. 282.

SCOTUS (MICHAEL) a learned man, and a great lover of Mathematics and Aſtrology, lived in the XIIIth century. He was well beloved by the Emperor Frederic II to whom he dedicated all his books. They have put him in the claſs of Magicians, and they tell us that he frequently invited ſeveral perſons to dinner, without cauſing any thing to be got ready for them, but that having made his gueſts ſit down at table, he forced the ſpirits to bring him meat from all parts, and when it was come he told the company, Gentlemen, this comes from the kitchen of the King of France, and this from the kitchen of the King of Spain; that comes from England, &c (a). Merlinus Coccaius has diverted himſelf with deſcribing his enchantments (b) (§ a). The Poet Dante adopted the common error [A]. We have more reaſon to believe John Bacon, an Engliſh Carmelite, and the Prince of the Averroïſts (c), who quotes (d) Michael Scotus as a great Divine. We have likewiſe more reaſon to believe Pitſeus who commends him very much [B]. However it be, it is ſaid that this pretended Magician foreſaw in what manner he ſhould die, and that he foretold the place where the Emperor Frederick II ſhould loſe his life [C]. I ſhall ſay ſomething of his books [D].

(a) Marcel, ch. viii, of the delectable Folie, pag. 123, Lyons 1650.

(b) Naudé Apolog. des grans Hommes, ch. xvii, p. m. 496.

[(§ a) In his 18th Macaronic. The paſſage begins with, Ecce Michaelis de incantu Regulæ Scoti. REM. CRIT.]

(c) Naudé, ibid.

(d) Part. iii, Sentent. Diſtinct. xxxiii.

[A] The Poet Dante adopted the common error.] Theſe are his words at the end of the XXth Canto of his Hell.

Quell' altro, che ne' fianchi è così poco,
Michele Scotto fù, che veramente
Delle Magiche frode ſeppe il gioco.

He there with meagre ſides was Michael Scot,
Who truly had the art of Magic got.

[B] Pitſeus commends him very much.] He ſays in expreſs words, that though Michael Scot was accounted a Magician by the vulgar and rabble of the ignorant, yet wiſe men have entertained a quite different opinion of him. ' * Prudentum tamen & cordatorum hominum longè aliud fuit judicium, qui potius perſpicax ' ejus in ſcrutandis rebus abditis admirabantur ingenium, laudabant induſtriam, quam reprehendendam ' judicabant curioſitatem, inſpiciebantque hominis ſcientiam, non ſuſpicabantur culpam (1). - - - The opinion of wiſe and ſenſible men was far different. They ' rather admired the quickneſs of his apprehenſion in ' making diſcoveries, and rather praiſed his application ' than blamed his curioſity. In ſhort they conſidered his ' knowledge without ſuſpecting a fault.'

* Pitſeus 1. volum. de rebus Anglicis.

(1) Naudé Apologie des grans Hommes, ch. xvii, pag. 498.

[C] He foreſaw in what manner he ſhould die, and marked the place where the Emperor Frederic II ſhould loſe his life.] This I find in a commentator upon Dante. ' Michael the Scotchman, ſays he (2), lived ' in the reign of the Emperor Frederic II, and foretold to him the place where he ſhould die, which ' he ſaid was Florence. Wherein the ſaid emperor ' was deceived by reaſon of the equivocal name; for ' he did not die at Florence, the chief town of Tuſcany, but in a caſtle of Apulia called Fiorenzola. ' That Magician foreſaw that he himſelf ſhould die ' by the fall of a ſtone, that ſhould break his head. ' Which accordingly came to paſs; for one day being ' at church bare-headed to worſhip the body and ' blood of JESUS CHRIST, the rope faſtened to ' the bell that was ringing, made a large ſtone fall ' upon his head, and immediately he thought he ' ſhould die, which he did ſuddenly.'

(2) Grangier in his French Commentary upon Dante's Inferno, pag. 254, 255.

[D] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his books.] He wrote a treatiſe about Phyſiognomy, and a book containing ſeveral queſtions upon Sacroboſco's ſphere, and a Hiſtory of Animals (3). He ſhould have been mentioned in the great catalogue of Voſſius (4), on account of the ſecond of theſe three books; but I did not find him there. The treatiſe about Phyſiognomy was written at the requeſt of the Emperor Frederic II, I have it in Italian: The title runs thus: Phyſionomia laqual compilo Maeſtro Michael Scotto, à prieghi di Federico Romano Imperatore, huomo di gran ſcienza: & è coſa molto notabile, e da tener ſecreta però che l'è di grande efficacia, & comprende coſe ſecrete della natura, baſtanti ad ogni Aſtrologo: & è diviſo in tre parti. It was printed at Venice per Marchio Seſſa, in 1533. It is a book in octavo conſiſting of ſeven ſheets.

(3) See Naudé, ubi ſupra, pag. 496.

(4) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem.

SCRIBONIUS (WILLIAM ADOLPHUS) a German Phyſician and Philoſopher, and author of ſeveral books [A], was born at Marpurg, and lived towards the latter end of the XVIth century. As he had a great eſteem for the method of Ramus, he publiſhed Logical Expoſitions of ſome of the ſciences, and I believe that he begun with Rerum Phyſicarum juxta leges logicas methodica Explicatio. It is a book of 107 pages in 8vo, printed at Francfort in the year 1577. He was one of thoſe who maintained that witches ought to be puniſhed, and that the proof of water was lawful in this kind of proſecution (a). One may ſee in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (b), that they reprinted in the year 1686 a letter which he wrote upon this ſubject.

(a) See Voëtii Diſputat. Select. Tom. iii, p. 568, 573.

(b) For the month of Auguſt 1686, Art. ii, pag. 890.

[A] Author of ſeveral books.] I have taken notice in the text of what I reckon to be his firſt production. He cauſed it to be reprinted oftner than once, and enlarged it conſiderably, ſo that in the edition of Baſil 1583 he divided it into three books. It was reprinted the ſame year at London with his Iſagoge Sphærica methodicè propoſita, in 8vo. His Phyſics were reprinted at Cambrige cum Animadverſionibus Timothei Bright, in the year 1584 in 8vo. His Idea Medicinæ ſecundum Logicas leges informandæ came out at Lemgow the ſame year in 8vo. He added to it a treatiſe de inſpectione urinarum contra eos qui ex qualibet urina de quolibet morbo judieare volunt. Item de hydrope, de podagra, & dyſenteria phyſiologia corporis. His book de ſagarum natura & poteſtate deque his recte cognoſcendis & puniendis: ubi de purgatione earum per aquam frigidam contra Johannem Ewichium & Henricum Neuwaldum, was printed at Marpurg the year 1588 in 8vo. His Anti-Piſcator Logicus ad Logicas exercitationes Johannis Piſcatoris reſpondens was printed at Baſil the ſame year in 8vo. I do not think that he was an Anti-Ramiſt, as Mr Baillet believed (1) on account of that book. He ſtyles Ramus in an epiſtle dedicatory (2) Philoſophiæ ſinceriores antiſtes, - - - the head of a better Philoſophy. Let us not forget that he procured a new edition of Theſaurus pauperum Petri Hiſpani, and of Theſaurus ſanitatis of Liebault, at Francfort 1578 in 8vo.

(1) Tom. ii, of the Anti, Art. 140.

(2) That of Rerum Phyſicarum juxta leges logicas methodica Explicatio.

SCULTETUS (ABRAHAM) profeſſor of Divinity at Heidelberg, and author of ſeveral books [A], was born at Grunberg in Sileſia on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt

[A] He is author of ſeveral books.] We have ſeen in the text of this article that he taught ſcholars in his room while he was yet a ſcholar himſelf. The lectures he read to them upon Morality and the Sphere

Auguſt 1566 (a), and after he had ſtudied there till the year 1582, he was ſent to Breſlaw to make further improvements. He was quickly recalled from thence, becauſe his father, who had lately loſt all that he had in the great fire of Grunberg (b), was no longer able to maintain him at the college, and deſigned to make him learn a trade. The young man did not like ſuch a propoſal, and in order to purſue his ſtudies went in queſt of a tutorſhip. He found a good one in the houſe of a burgo-maſter of Freiſtad (c); which gave him an opportunity to hear Abraham Bucholcer preach (d). He made a journey into Poland in the year 1584, and the year following went to Gorlitz in Luſatia, where he ſtaid above two years, going conſtantly to the public lectures, and reading private ones to others (e). He acted thoſe two parts in the univerſity of Wittemberg in 1588, and 1589, and then in that of Heidelberg till he was admitted miniſter in the year 1594. He exerciſed his miniſtry, in a village of the Palatinate (f) for ſome months, and then he was invited by the Elector Palatine to be one of his preachers. I ſhall ſpeak of a conference he had with Samuel Huberus [B]. He was choſen miniſter of St Francis's church at Heidelberg in the year 1598, and two years after he was admitted into the Eccleſiaſtical ſenate. He was ſeveral times employed to viſit the churches and ſchools of the Palatinate; and notwithſtanding thoſe avocations, he wrote ſome books which required great labour. He followed the Prince of Anhalt to the war of Juliers in the year 1610, and applied himſelf to ſettling Eccleſiaſtical affairs in thoſe parts, with great prudence and vigilance. He attended the Prince Palatine Frederic V in his journey into England, in the year 1612; and got himſelf acquainted with the moſt learned men of that country. He went to the court of Brandenburg, in the year 1614, the Elector John Sigiſmund, who was ready to renounce Lutheraniſm, having deſired to concert with him the meaſures it was proper for him to follow in this change. He executed well the commiſſions that were given him in ſuch a juncture (g). Being returned to Heidelberg, he, for very good reaſons, accepted of the charge of preacher to the court. He obtained leave to reſign it in the year 1618, when he was appointed profeſſor of Divinity. He was ſoon after deputed to the ſynod of Dort, and endeavoured at firſt to reconcile the contending parties; but perceiving that it was in vain, he ſtoutly maintained the doctrines of the Contra-Remonſtrants. He preached at Francfort the year following, during the ſitting of the electoral diet; for his maſter appointed him preacher to the deputies he ſent thither. He followed that prince into Bohemia, and having retired into Sileſia, after the fatal battle of Prague, he reſolved to return to Heidelberg, in order to diſcharge the office of profeſſor. He was no ſooner arrived there, but all academical exerciſes ceaſed: the enemies being at the gates, moſt of the profeſſors fled away. He retired to Bretten, and then to Schorndorf, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, from whence he went to Embden, in Auguſt 1622. The King of Bohemia, his maſter, had conſented that the city of Embden ſhould offer him a miniſter's place. This call was accepted of (h): but the Profeſſor of Heidelberg at Heidelberg, produced a book which was ſoon after printed and explained in ſome illuſtrious ſchools. In eadem Scholâ meâ privatâ Auditoribus petentibus doctrinam Morum & Siderum explicabam; unde mihi Ethicorum libri duo, Sphæricorum libri tres confecti, qui non ita multò poſt publicati, & in aliquot Illuſtribus Scholis fuerunt enarrati (1). Samuel Huberus being called to Wittemberg, in the year 1593, made an oration de diſſidiis in religione. - - - of diſſentions in point of religion. Scultetus publiſhed a confutation of it without putting his name to it. Scholia & Notas in illam, ſed ſine nomine edidi, in quibus homini craſſos errores in Logica, craſſiores in Grammaticâ, craſſiſſimos in Theologiâ commonſtro (2). He compoſed at the ſame time, 1. An Analyſis of the works of the Fathers, which was printed ſome years after at Amberg, and intituled Medulla Patrum (3). 2. An Iſagoge Hiſtorica in V. T. libros, together with an Analyſis of Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Polybius, Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, &c. He loſt that work and ſeveral others after the battle of Prague, and particularly the Hiſtory of the Reformation (4). He took a journey into Sileſia in 1594, and returning to Heidelberg he went through Gorlitz, where he made a funeral oration on Laurentius Ludovicus (5), which was printed, and afterwards inſerted by Melchior Adam in his lives of the Philoſophers. This Laurence had been Melancthon's ſcholar, and principal of a college at Gorlitz (6). Martin Mylius, who ſucceeded him, deſired Scultetus to pay that duty to his old maſter (7). Scultetus publiſhed in 1611, an expoſition of the goſpels for Sunday, which was tranſlated out of German into ſeveral languages (8), and put into the Index librorum prohibitorum, - - - of prohibited books, at Rome (9). He publiſhed two ſermons he had preached in the ſynod of Dort, two other ſermons preached by him at Heidelberg in the ſecular year of the Reformation, and that which he had preached at Prague againſt idols. Take notice that he did not loſe all his Annals of the Reformation; for he publiſhed the two firſt decads before he went into Bohemia with the Elector his maſter. I find that he wrote Idea concionum in Eſaiam, Epiſtolas D. Pauli ad Romanos & Hebræos & Pſalmos Davidis, & obſervationes Grammaticæ, Logicæ, Hiſtoricæ, & Theologicæ in hiſtoriam Jeſu Chriſti nati, educati, baptizati & tentati, & in hiſtoriam concionum & miraculorum Jeſu Chriſti, & de precatione tractatio logica & Theologica, & Joannes Baptiſta logice deſcriptus. See Freherus's Theatrum (10). He had a hand in the Greek and Latin edition (11) of St Athanaſius, and of the councils of Nice and Epheſus; to which, he added a ſhort Hiſtory of the ſeven univerſal councils, and his tranſlation of twenty Greek ſermons (12). I ſhall ſay nothing of his German books againſt a Jeſuit of Mentz, againſt M. de Neer's apoſtacy, and againſt the confeſſion of Cologn, &c (13). See again Freherus's Theatrum.

[B] I ſhall ſpeak of a conference which he had with Samuel Huberus.] In the year 1606 he was ſent to Newſtad to confer with a mathematician (14), who had been employed to finiſh and publiſh a book of Rheticus (15), and who put off from day to day the publication of that work. He went in the name of the great council, to diſcourſe with him about what was neceſſary to be done, in order to make an end of that edition. He found Samuel Huberus at Spire, in the inn where he lay. That man was preparing a book for the next Francfort fair, and no ſooner knew who Scultetus was, but he propoſed to him a diſpute upon controverſies in religion: It was accepted, and laſted from nine a-clock in the morning till three in the afternoon, in the preſence of the Lutheran miniſters. It turned upon the doctrine of Predeſtination (16). Scultetus came off at laſt by an argument, which was a kind of a perſonal jeſt. ' Tandem abſolvi

---

(a) And not 1556, as Freherus, Theatri, p. 424, affirms. He ſays in the following page that Scultetus died the 24th of October 1625, aged 59 years. It is a wrong calculation.

(b) The 26th of July 1582.

(c) Near Grunberg.

(d) The author of ſome Chronological books.

(e) Publice didici, privatim docui. Abraham Scultetus, ubi infra, citation (h), pag. 16.

(f) Called Schriſheim, near Heidelberg.

(g) Profectus ſum Berlinum ibique rem Chriſti, pro virili ad menſem uſque Octobrem, egi. - - - I went to Berlin, where I exerted myſelf as much as I could in the ſervice of Chriſtianity till the month of October. Id. ibid.

(h) Taken from a book of Abraham Scultetus intituled, de curriculo vitæ . . . Narratio apologetica, printed at Embden 1625, in 4to.

(1) Scultetus, in Narrat. Apologetica de curriculo vitæ, pag. 23.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) That work contains four parts, which came out one after another.

(4) Scultetus, ubi ſupra.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 28.

(6) Id. ib. p. 16.

(7) Id. ib. p. 28.

(8) Id. ib. p. 52.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 67. It was in the decree of the 10th of May 1613.

(10) Freher. Theatrum, pag. 425.

(11) Printed for Commelin 1601.

(12) Scultet. ubi ſupra, pag. 35.

(13) Id. ibid. pag. 24.

(14) Called L. Valentinus Otto.

(15) I think it was Canon triangulorum. See Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 66.

(16) Taken from Scultetus, ubi ſupra, p. 32, 33.

Heidelberg did not enjoy it very long, for he died on the twenty-fourth of October 1625 (i). He was married three times, and left but one daughter behind him [C]. No man was ever more cruelly ſlandered by his enemies [D]. I have ſaid in another place (k), that he did not approve that the Proteſtants ſhould write one againſt another. What ‘ me argumento in ſpeciem quidem ſed reipſa minime jocoſo, quo docui Huberum non eſſe Eccleſiæ veræ filium (17). - - At laſt I got off clear by an argument which ſeemed to be, but in truth was not, a joke, by which I proved that Huberus was not a ſon of the true Church.’ I will prove to you, ſaid he to Huberus, that you do not belong to the true Church: it is certainly either among the Reformed, or among the Lutherans, or among the Roman Catholics. But you have left the communion of the Reformed, you have been expelled from that of the Lutherans, and you write againſt the Roman; therefore, &c. The diſpute went on quietly, for the two chief qualities of a good diſputant met in Huberus; he patiently heard his antagoniſts, tho' never ſo prolix, and meekly bore their hard words. Acta & peracta ſunt omnia tranquillè: Neque enim diſſimulandum eſt: quæ duæ virtutes in Diſputatore primæ ſunt, eas ambas me in Hubero deprehendiſſe, patientiam adverſarium prolixè ſua explicantem audiendi, & lenitatem etiam aſperè dicta perferendi (18). He maintained that all men are elected, and perplexed Hunnius, who denied the election of ſome perſons (19). Primum laudo Huberi ratiocinationem qua Ægidium Hunnium Witembergæ conſtrinxerat, qui nec Huberi generalem, nec Reformatorum ſpecialem electionem agnoſcere voluit (20).

[C] He was married three times, and left but one daughter behind him.] His firſt wife was Catherine Bergia, whom he married at Heidelberg in November 1594 (21). He loſt her the twenty-fifth of March 1605, and continued ſixteen months a melancholy widower(22), ſo ſickly, that he thought his health required he ſhould have ſome body to take care of it (23). He therefore married Catherine Lorichia, the widow of Dr Rhodingus, and having loſt her the twentieth of October 1607, he married another widow the eighteenth of July 1608 (24), by whom he had a daughter, the firſt of December 1609 (25), who, together with her mother, were the companions of his exile at Embden, in the year 1624 (26).

[D] No man was ever more cruelly ſlandered by his enemies.] He expreſſes himſelf thus in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his ‘ Narratio Apologetica. Dentatis ſcriptis, infamibus Theſibus, contumelioſis anagrammatiſmis, picturis, cantilenis, in nomen, in famam, in doctrinam meam involarunt, perindeque omnis generis convitiis in me debacchati ſunt, ac ſi ego unus eſſem qui omnem Iſraelem turbarim & ſolem, quod dicitur, ex univerſo mundo ſuſtulerim. - - - They attacked my reputation and doctrine with ſatirical writings, infamous theſes, contumelious anagrams, pictures, ballads; and they railed at me in ſuch a furious manner, as if I had been the only man that had troubled Iſrael, or who, as the ſaying is, had taken the ſun out of the world.’ I cannot tell whether there was any good ground for thoſe ſlanders, but I believe the free acceſs he had to princes, made him odious to ſeveral people; and that the uneaſineſs of ſome, and the joy of others, after the misfortune of the Elector Palatine in Bohemia, brought to light the ill effects of envy. The court preacher was attacked when thought to be under diſgrace, and the ice being once broken, every body fell upon him; the firſt ſatires made way for others; it was like a ſnow-ball that went always increaſing. He was accuſed (27) of having adviſed the Elector Palatine to accept of the crown of Bohemia: He was made anſwerable for all the calamities which followed that enterprize; it was objected to him, that inſtead of diſcharging the duties of his profeſſorſhip at Heidelberg, he had acted the part of an intriguing man, and an Iconoclaſt in Bohemia; and that he ſhewed himſelf an Atheiſt, by approving the union of the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia: he was blamed for having perſecuted the Roman Catholics, the Lutherans and the Unitarians; and it was given out that he had loſt his maſter's favour, and all his employments, after the battle of Prague. This was diſperſed by word of mouth, and in writing in the courts of princes, and in the univerſities and towns. He was four years without juſtifying himſelf; but at laſt he took up the pen in his own defence, in imitation of St Baſil. ‘ Hæc dicta, ſcripta, decantata per Regum, per Principum aulas, per Academias, per urbes & oppida: Quæ niſi reprimerem, famæ meæ prodigus jure merito haberer. Quod ſi quis quærat: Cur in quartum annum reſponſum, ad tam atroces calumnias diſtulerim? is hoc à me audiat: imitatum me fuiſſe Baſilium illum Magnum, qui cùm undique appeteretur, adeò perturbatus fuit, ut non veritus ſit ſcribere Epiſtolâ ſeptuageſimâ nonâ, parum aliquando abfuiſſe, quin de omnium hominum fide & ſinceritate dubitaret: indixit autem ſibi ipſi ſilentium in tertium uſque annum ne quid præcipitantur effunderet: poſtea varias apologias texuit (28). - - - If I ſhould give no check to theſe ſpeeches and writings that are ſo much talked of in the courts of kings, in the univerſities, towns, and cities, I might juſtly be conſidered as a man prodigal of his reputation. But if any one aſk me why I have delayed making a proper reply to ſuch bitter calumnies for the ſpace of four years, I anſwer that in this I have imitated the great St Baſil, who, when he was attacked from all quarters, in his confuſion, did not ſcruple to ſay, that he was ſometimes ready to call the truth and ſincerity of all men into queſtion: he therefore preſcribed ſilence to himſelf for three years, leſt he ſhould utter any thing raſhly: afterward he compoſed ſeveral vindications.’ Obſerve, by the by, that thoſe words of St Baſil are wonderful. Men are ſo eaſily prepoſſeſſed by ill reports, or ſo blindly adapt their behaviour to the ſervice of calumny, that there is ſometimes ground to believe that equity and uprightneſs are wholly baniſhed from this world. Scultetus anſwers (29), 1. That he had no hand in the deliberation, whether the Elector Palatine ſhould accept of the crown of Bohemia; but he confeſſes, that he preached a ſermon, wherein he congratulated him for having accepted of this preſent of the Bohemians; and encouraged him by the words of the Lord, to behave himſelf valiantly in that enterprize (30). 2. That Frederic Balduinus, profeſſor of Divinity at Wittemberg, who blamed him for leaving his church and his profeſſor's chair (31), had a colleague who went to preach in the country of Brandenburg, contrary to the prince's edicts. This is approving at home what one condemns abroad, though the domeſtic action be much more inexcuſable than that of the foreigner; for, adds Scultetus, I followed my elector's orders with the conſent of the univerſity. Magnum crimen profectò, ac indubiè, Balduino judice, majus longè eo, cui D. Meiſnerus Balduini collega obnoxius: cui è Saxoniâ in Marchiam ire, contra Sereniſſ. Electoris Brandeburgici edictum, in Gynæceum Electorale irripere, ibidem concionari nulla religio fuit. Hæc, quæ nullo colore defendi poſſunt, probat domi Balduinus: foris autem in me culpat: quòd Principem meum, cujus in ſervitio concionatorio adhuc vivebam, volentem, jubentem, conſentiente Academiâ, in Boëmiam ſequutus ſum (32). 3. That (33) the new King of Bohemia promiſed to all his ſubjects a free exerciſe of their religion, and kept his word to them; that he took only for his own uſe, the church of the citadel of Prague, out of which he removed all the idols. Scultetus owns that he adviſed him to it, and that he gave himſelf no reſt till he had obtained it. He maintains, that he acted in that reſpect like a good Chriſtian. He ſays, that as ſoon as the ſermon he had preached upon that ſubject came to be publiſhed, the Lutherans and the Papiſts raiſed a dreadful noiſe every where, which was ſuppreſſed by a learned anſwer of Theophilus Moſanus. 4. That when he ſaid (34), in his ſermon upon the alliance renewed between Bohemia and Hungary, on the fifteenth of April 1620, that this confederacy was acceptable to GOD, ſince all thoſe who entred into it profeſſed the ſame faith; he only meant the Reformed and the Lutherans, and not the Papiſts, Anabaptiſts, and Arians. He complains (35), that Luke Oſiander (36) having read this ſermon, openly maintained in a public diſputation, that Scultetus was an Atheiſt (37), ſince he made no difference between Lutheraniſm, Calviniſm, and Popery. 5. He proteſts that he never excited the king, his

---

(i) Paul. Freher. in Theatr. pag. 425, but according to Witte in his Diarium, it was in 1624.

(k) In the article PITISCUS, remark [B].

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 33.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) See the remark [E] in the article HUNNIUS.

(20) Scultet, ubi ſupra, p. 33.

(21) Id. ib. p. 29.

(22) Id. ib. p. 44.

(23) In viduitate ſedecim menſes vixi, quibus corpuſculum meum cùm non uno morbo attentaretur, valetudinis curatricem quæſivi. Id. ibid.

(24) Id. ib. p. 45.

(25) Id. ib. p. 47.

(26) Id. p. 23. 45.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 76, 77.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 77.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Pro concione Majeſtati ipſius gratulatus, illamque verbis Domini è Joſuâ petitis ad id, quod ſuſceperat, fortiter agendum, cohortatus ſum. Id. ibid. p. 78.

(31) In libello quodam Germanico, quem de idolis ſcripſit, πολυπραγμοσύνης damnat, qui Eccleſiæ & Academiæ Palatinæ obligatus, in Boëmiam cum Rege meo profectus ſim. Id. ibid.

(32) Id. ibid. pag. 78.

(33) Id. ibid.

(34) Id. ibid. pag. 81.

(35) Id. ibid. pag. 83.

(36) Profeſſor of Divinity at Tubingen, and chancellor of the univerſity.

(37) Quibus fundamentis jactis Oſiander publicis theſibus me ATHEUM proclamat. Id. ibid.

What he obſerves in anſwer to a man, who accuſed him of having raiſed a ſacramental war in the Palatinate [E], is a remarkable thing. I ſhould make no difficulty to believe that his maſter, to perſecute the Papiſts and the Lutherans, and that it was falſe to ſay they had been perſecuted. Circumferuntur varii libelli de Reformatione Boëmica, partim Latinâ, partim Germanicâ linguâ ſcripti: quibus ſi fides habenda; in Boëmiâ, me inſtigatore, Pontificii duriter afflicti: Lutherani magno numero ejecti: ipſi proceres Regni de libertate religionis ſuæ ſunt periclitati (38). He refers the reader (39) to a German book, wherein it was plainly made out, That this perſecution was a chimerical thing; and takes advantage (40) of the contradictions of thoſe, who had mentioned that revolution of Bohemia in their writings. He ſpeaks (41) of a letter handed about under the ſuppoſititious name of a man of Antwerp, wherein he was deſired to recommend the doctrine of Ubiquity to the king his maſter. He does not deny (42) that being conſulted about the reformation of the Churches immediately ſubject to the king, he anſwered, That the king's religion might be eſtabliſhed in them, ſince the people deſired it, and the prieſts were not qualified to explain the Scripture. 6. Laſtly, He ſhews, that after the battle of Prague, he did not loſe his maſter's favour, as his enemies had given out. In order to colour that lie, they invented ſeveral reaſons of his diſgrace, and they went even ſo far as to accuſe him of a heinous crime. Unde haud difficulter colligere eſt cujus ſpiritus filii fuerint: qui, me Uratiſlaviâ vix digreſſo, diſſeminare hoc in orbem Germaniæ non dubitarunt: me omni gratiâ Regis excidiſſe; officio motum eſſe. Et ut res colorem haberet; pro ſuâ quiſquam libidine cauſas finxit: alius, conſilia mea de ſuſcipiendo regno Boëmico: alius, demolitionem ſtatuarum & idolorum Pragenſium: alius (quod Deus æternùm averruncaſſit) atrox aliquod crimen (43).

The libellers perſecuted him in his very exile. He was informed from good hands (44), in the year 1624, that the ſecretary of a certain prince had affirmed in the Lower Saxony, and even at the court of the King of Sweden, that Scultetus had departed this life towards the latter end of the year 1623, three days after having publiſhed a book full of abſurd and heterodox opinions, which had obliged the magiſtrates of Embden to ſuppreſs it. Some body writ into the country of Brandenburgh, that he had foreſeen it long ago: and yet there never was any ſuch book. A Dutch piece was publiſhed the year following, which contained a deſcription of the devaſtations made in Eaſt-Frieſland by Mansfeld's troops. The author having employed his ſlander againſt the States-General, and ſome illuſtrious perſons, attacked Scultetus particularly, and accuſed him of having thanked God in the pulpit, for the irruption of thoſe troops. And yet it was a notorious thing, that he had only thanked him for the retreat of thoſe furious ſoldiers; which was atteſted in a book written to confute that libel.

I ſhall make no excuſe for the length of this remark, being perſuaded, that all men of ſenſe will grant, that there are no collections of greater uſe than thoſe which can any ways ſerve to reſiſt two ſuch terrible plagues, as the impudence of libellers, and the credulity of thoſe who read their books. It is of great concern for the pubilck good, to make it appear by many plain inſtances, that there are no lies which paſſionate men are not capable of divulging againſt their neighbour's honour, and which the people is not capable of believing. It ſignifies nothing to confute thoſe ſatirical writers by the abſurdity of their ſtories. and by their contradictions, they perſiſt in their boldneſs, and new calumniators are no ways daunted thereby. It ſignifies nothing to make thoſe bluſh, who have been raſh and ſimple enough to ſwallow down a thouſand fabulous ſtories, maliciouſly and groſly invented. The very next day, they as readily give ear to others. To this kind of writings we may juſtly apply theſe lines,

> Mais ils trouvent pourtant, quoi qu'on en puiſſe dire,
> Un marchand pour les vendre, & des ſots pour les lire (45),

> - - - In ſpite of all that one can ſay,
> Yet ſtill they find a Bookſeller to vend them,
> And fools beſides to read and to commend them, nay, what is worſe, to believe them. One ſhould not therefore be weary of collecting ſtories that reſemble the facts which I have juſt now compiled.

Take notice that I do not pretend to juſtify Scultetus in all reſpects. I make no doubt, that he was guilty of the fault, which a court divine does ſeldom avoid. I fancy, he concerned himſelf too much with political affairs, and brought temporal intereſts too often into his ſermons. He was ſomewhat haſty in adviſing the deſtruction of images, and did not conſider, that his maſter was not ſufficiently ſettled upon his throne, to undertake ſuch an innovation. But how can it be helped? Men are blinded by the firſt favours of fortune; they fancy, that ſince the kingdom of God is concerned in the caſe, one good ſucceſs will follow another, as in the time of Joſhua, and that there is nothing like making haſte.

[E] A man having raiſed a ſacramental war in the Palatinate.] Here follow ſome further ſlanders againſt Scultetus, which he rejects as horrid lies. A certain apoſtate, ſays he (46), has given out, that I excited a ſacramental war in the Palatinate, in the year 1603. No body ever heard of ſuch a war, but only of a little diſpute about euchariſtical phraſes, between the profeſſors of the univerſity, and the miniſters of the church. It is well known, continues he, that the doctrine of the ſacraments was purified from the Romiſh idolatry, and from ſcholaſtical phraſes by Zuinglius and Oecolampadius; and that the loſs which the canton of Zurich ſuſtained in the fight, wherein Zuinglius was killed, broke the league lately concluded between ſome cantons of Swiſſerland, the city of Straſbourg, and the Landgrave of Heſſe. Whereupon Martin Bucer being too timorous, was afraid that the whole party would ſink, unleſs he ſtrengthened, with a new aliance, the towns of the Upper Germany, and particularly Straſbourg, where he taught. He caſt his eye upon the potent Duke of Saxony, and the better to gain him, he endeavoured to make every body believe that Luther's and Zuinglius's opinions concerning the Lord's-ſupper, were the ſame in the main, and that a mere diſpute about words had prevented their agreement. He further ſaid, that it was better to uſe Luther's than Zuinglius's expreſſions, becauſe the latter ſpoke too meanly of the euchariſt, and the other in a ſublime manner. He inſpired the ſame thoughts into John Calvin, who had fled from France to Straſbourg (47). This intrigue of Bucer introduced the Lutheran expreſſions into the towns of the Upper Germany eſpecially after the fatal concordate of Wittemberg. The Divines, who taught in Saxony, under the Elector Chriſtian, uſed themſelves to thoſe phraſes of Conſubſtantiation, Phraſibus illis ſynuſiaſticis aſſueverant; ſo that being expelled after that prince's death, and retiring into the Palatinate, they took the miniſters, who uſed Zuinglius's expreſſions in that country, to be heterodox: which occaſioned a diſſention; but it was ſo happily, and ſo quickly ſuppreſſed, that from that time forward there was viſibly a better underſtanding between the Divines of the univerſity and the reſt. The apoſtate had given out, That the Elector Palatine cauſed a book, written upon that quarrel, to be burnt. Scultetus maintains that it is a lie (48). One may very well preſume, that he ſpeaks truth; for tho' it be a great piece of boldneſs, to affirm that a prince has cauſed ſuch or ſuch a book to be condemned to the fire, when it is falſe; it is ſtill a greater piece of impudence to deny it, when it is true.

A man well acquainted with the ſecret hiſtory of the Church, might inform us that journies and conferences about religion, are generally ſet a foot by ſome temporal motive. Bucer's conduct affords an inſtance of it: I have elſewhere mentioned (49) another like it taken from the ſame Scultetus. We are told that Bucer repented of having mediated the formulary of concord (50). Bucerus dixit ſe pœnas dare quod cauſam publicam homo privatus voluiſſet componere, & tam multa prava dogmata conciliare (51). Peter Martyr, who heard him ſay ſo in England, told Bullinger of it; Daniel Toſſanus had it from Bullinger, and Pezelius from Daniel Toſſanus, in the preſence of Scultetus, who inſerted it in the hiſtory of his life.

---

(38) Id. ibid. pag. 86.

(39) Id. ibid.

(40) Id. ibid. pag. 87.

(41) Id. ibid. pag. 89.

(42) Id. ib.

(43) Id. ibid. pag. 93.

(44) Id. ibid. pag. 99.

(45) Boileau, Satire II, ver. 81.

(46) Scult. ibid. pag. 39.

(47) Hence it was, probably, that Calvin in his Catechiſm and elſewhere, made uſe of phraſes, which ſeem to imply the ſubſtantial preſence of the body of our Lord.

(48) Eſſe autem vel à me, vel ab aliis Miniſtris Palatinis, vel ab omnibus conjunctim ſcriptum aliquod ſuper hac re publicatum, quod Sereniſſimi Electoris juſſu Vulcano fuerit conſecratum; tam ego conſtanter nego, quam id deſperatus Apoſtata petulanter affirmat. Id. ibid. p. 40, 41.

(49) Remark [M] of the article BEZA.

(50) That is to ſay, that of Wittemberg in 1536.

(51) Scultet. ubi ſupra, p. 25.

that he would have cleared himſelf better from the charge of his having induced the Elector, his maſter, to accept of the crown of Bohemia, if that enterpriſe had proved ſucceſsful. In that caſe there would have been no neceſſity for him to deny the fact [F], he would have been loaded with benedictions, and admired for his prudence: men do very ſeldom judge of things any otherwiſe than by the event.

[F] In that caſe there would have been no neceſſity for him to deny the fact.] Certain Critics ſevere, and ſometimes too peeviſh, take delight in exclaiming againſt preachers, who encourage princes to make war, without conſidering that they are the miniſters of the Prince of peace. A preacher will patiently bear this cenſure when the war, which he exhorted to, proves very ſucceſsful: but ſince the enterprize of the Elector Palatine, Frederic V, was attended with great misfortunes; it could not but be an unpleaſant thing for a church-man to be told, in a reproachful manner, that he had engaged him in it. If a Divine, preaching before him, had exhorted him to undertake that war, alledging the moſt proper texts of the Scripture, and particularly theſe words of the Pſalmiſt, Accingere gladio tuo ſuper femur tuum potentiſſime, &c (52). Which may be tranſlated thus:

Gird on thy ſword, moſt mighty prince,
  And clad in rich array,
With glorious ornaments of pow'r,
  Majeſtic pomp diſplay.
Ride on in ſtate, and ſtill protect
  The weak, the juſt, and true;
Whilſt thy right hand, with ſwift revenge
  Does all thy foes purſue.

Such a preacher, I ſay, would have made a merit of it, if the new king well ſettled upon the throne of Bohemia, had ſecured the peace of Germany, and liberty of conſcience from the ill deſigns of the court of Vienna. But that enterprize proved unfortunate, and then no body was willing to confeſs he had adviſed it: ſo much men are afraid of the wrong cuſtom of judging of things by the event. I call it wrong; for on many thouſand occaſions, there is more prudence in thoſe who do not ſucceed, than in thoſe who do. How many ill-concerted enterprizes have proved ſucceſsful? And how many well laid deſigns have proved fatal? Nay, it frequently falls out, that a great deſign carried on according to the beſt rules of policy, ſucceeds by unforeſeen means, and ſuch as no body depended upon. Be that as it will, the poſture of affairs was ſuch in Germany, when endeavours were uſed to beſtow a crown upon the Elector Palatine, that prudence required the venturing a great deal. By running no hazard, there was ground to fear a ſlavery, which includes all ſorts of miſery under the Popiſh domination; but if the revolution of Bohemia could have been ſupported, it would have put the Proteſtants in a condition to give law. It was therefore chiefly on account of his profeſſion that Abraham Scultetus ought to have been aſhamed of the advices which he had given.

SEBONDE (a) (Raymundus) profeſſor of Phyſic, Philoſophy, and Divinity [A] at Toulouſe in the XVth century, was a native of Barcelona. He was eſteemed for his parts and learning, and wrote ſome books, whereof the moſt conſiderable is that which is intituled, Theologia naturalis, ſive Liber Creaturarum. That book muſt certainly not ſavour of the notions of a vulgar author, nor of one that creeps upon the ſurface of prejudices, ſince Montagne ſet a ſingular value upon it [B]. He tranſlated it into French [C], and made an apology for it [D], which is the longeſt chapter of his eſſays.

[A] Profeſſor of Phyſic, &c.] I follow Mr de Mauſſac, who gives him all thoſe titles in his Prolegomena upon Raymond Martini. ‘ Sciendum eſt, ſays he, ‘ Raymundum Sebonde nec Dominicanum, nec in ‘ Hebraicis aliiſque linguis Orientalibus valde verſatum ‘ fuiſſe, quamvis eum ex Judæo Chriſtianum nobis ‘ repræſentet Michael à Monte toto capite Apologiæ ‘ . . . . . Sed tantum Hiſpanum & Barcinonenſem atque in Academia Toloſana Medicinæ Profeſſorem, ‘ Philoſophiæ, ſacræque ſcientiæ, eoque gradu illic ‘ inſignitum. - - - - - We muſt know, ſays he, that ‘ Raymond Sebonde was neither a Dominican, nor well ‘ ſkilled in the Hebrew and Oriental tongues, although ‘ Montagne, through the whole chapter of his Apology, repreſents him as one who, of a Jew, had turned ‘ Chriſtian . . . . but only a Spaniard of Barcelona, ‘ &c.’ I find in the abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque the title of a book (1), which is a dialogue, inter Raimundum Sebundium Artium Medicinæ ac Theologiæ Profeſſorem & Dominicum Seminiverbium. I have juſt now run over that Apology for Sebonde, on purpoſe to know whether the author repreſents him as a Jew converted to Chriſtianity, and I have not been ſo lucky as to diſcover the leaſt hint of it; but becauſe I have not read every line of it, I do not pretend to deny in all reſpects what Mr de Mauſſac affirms. I ſhall only affirm that Montagne ſays little of Sebonde in all that long Apology, except in the beginning. Note, that Geſner calls him Sebeyde, and ſays, in the margin, he is alſo called Sabunde (2). The title prefixed to the prologue of the Liber Creaturarum in the Straſbourg edition, 1496, favours this laſt name: Compoſitus à venerabili viro magiſtro Raimundo de Sabunde in artibus & medicina doctore, & in ſacra pagina egregio Profeſſore.

[B] Montagne ſet a ſingular value upon it.] See the following remark, and the remark [D].

[C] He tranſlated it into French.] I ſhall give an account of this tranſlation: it may help to make Sebonde known. Let us hear what the tranſlator ſays (3); ‘ Peter Brunel (4), a man accounted very ‘ learned in his time, having been for ſome time at ‘ Montagne in my father's company, with ſome other ‘ perſons of his character, preſented him, at his departure, with a book, intituled, Theologia naturalis, ‘ ſive liber creaturarum Raymondi de Sebonde. And becauſe the Italian and Spaniſh languages were very ‘ familiar to my father, and that book is written ‘ in a kind of Spaniſh jargon, dreſſed out with Latin ‘ terminations, he hoped my father might make uſe ‘ of it with a very little help, and recommended it ‘ to him as a book very uſeful, and ſuited to the ‘ time when he gave it him, which was when the ‘ new doctrine of Luther began to be in vogue. . . . . ‘ (5) My father, ſome days before he died, having ‘ by chance found that book, under a heap of uſeleſs papers, ordered me to tranſlate it into French. ‘ It is an eaſy taſk to tranſlate ſuch authors as him, ‘ where there is little to do but to repreſent the matter; but when a book is written with great politeneſs and elegancy, the tranſlation of it is a difficult ‘ undertaking, eſpecially into a language that has not ‘ the ſame force. It was a very ſtrange and new ‘ employment for me; but being then, as it happened, at leiſure, and being unwilling to diſobey ‘ the leaſt command of the beſt father that ever was, ‘ I did it as well as I could; which pleaſed him wonderfully, and he ordered the tranſlation to be printed, ‘ which was executed after his death.’ La Croix du Maine places that impreſſion in the year 1569. Thoſe dialogues concerning the nature of man (ſo he intitles the book of Raymond Sebonde, tranſlated by Montagne) have been printed at Paris for Gabriel Buon, in 1569, and for Giles Gourbin, in the ſame year (6). Du Verdier (7) does not mention the ſame title, nor ſo antient an edition. Theſe are his words: Le livre des creatures. Raymond Sebon is the author of it: that book contains three hundred and thirty chapters, and was eſſays. Few people have known exactly in what time Sebonde lived, or what he was. Montagne wonders how ſuch an author could remain in ſo great an obſcurity: all that we know of him, ſays he (b), is that he was a Spaniard, who made profeſſion of Phyſic at Toulouſe about two hundred years ago. Scaliger ſays in a letter written in the year 1606 (c), that Sebonde lived at Toulouſe two hundred and thirty years before, or thereabouts. This does not very well agree with the Abbot Trithemius (d), who places the death of that Phyſician in the year 1432. I have obſerved in another place (e), the other miſtakes of Scaliger concerning that man. He took him to be a Dominican Monk, and aſcribed to him a book againſt the Jews, intituled, Pugio fidei - - the dagger of faith, of which Raymund Martini is the author. Our Sebonde was not very well known to Gabriel Naudæus, a man of a prodigious memory, and who had a vaſt knowledge of books and manuſcripts; for ſpeaking of what Scaliger ſays concerning Galatinus and Sebonde, he does not obſerve any fault in it (f). What concerns the other writings of our Sebonde will be ſeen in a remark [E].

---

(52) Pſalm xlv.

(a) See the end of the remark [A].

(1) The ſame with Viola Animæ.

(2) Geſner, in Bibliotheca.

(3) Montagne, Eſſays, book ii, ch. xii, pag. m. 184.

(4) It ſhould be Bunel.

(5) Montagne, ubi ſupra, pag. 185.

(6) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Françoiſe, pag. 329.

(7) Bibl. p. 872, at the word Michael de Montagne.

(b) Eſſays, lib. ii, ch. xii, p. 186, of Tom. ii, Paris 1659, in 12mo.

(c) It is the 241ſt.

(d) See Mauſſac's Prolegomena prefixed to the Pugio fidei.

(e) In the remark [C] of the article MARTINI.

(f) Naudæus, in Bibliogr. Polit.

---

printed at Paris in 8vo, for Giles Gourbin, in 1581. I have ſeen, continues he, another tranſlation of the ſame book in very old French. Theſe laſt words ſhew he does not mean John Martin's tranſlation publiſhed in the year 1551 (8). There is another reaſon for it, viz. That John Martin and Montagne did not tranſlate the ſame book. The book tranſlated by John Martin contains ſeven dialogues. But the book tranſlated by Montagne is not written by way of dialogue: it is divided into three hundred and thirty chapters, as du Verdier obſerves; and it is certain there is but one man, who ſpeaks in the book of Sebonde, which contains three hundred and thirty chapters. From whence we may infer that La Croix du Maine does not well quote the title of Montagne's tranſlation, and that the dialogues of Sebonde are only a cold diſh heated again; for it appears from the very title of the tranſlation that it contains the ſame things as the book of the Creatures. The title runs thus: La Theologie naturelle de Raymond Sebond compriſe en ſept dialogues intitulez autrement, de la nature de l'homme (9). See hereafter the titles of the books of that doctor.

(D] He made an apology for it.] He himſelf tells us what moved him to it (10). I thought the notions of 'that author were very fine, the contexture of his diſ'courſe very cloſe, and his deſign very pious. And 'becauſe many people read that book, and parti'cularly the ladies, to whom we ought to be more 'ſerviceable, I have often had occaſion to help them, 'by anſwering two main objections raiſed againſt that 'author. His deſign is noble and bold, for he un'dertakes to eſtabliſh and prove againſt the Atheiſts 'all the articles of the Chriſtian religion, by natural 'and human arguments.' This occaſioned the two objections which Montagne propoſed to anſwer. Some ſaid (11) that the Chriſtians hurt themſelves by pretending to build their belief upon human arguments, ſince it is the work of faith, and of a particular inſpiration of the divine grace. Others ſaid (12), that Sebonde's arguments were weak and unfit to prove what he intends, and undertook to confute them eaſily. Montagne thought himſelf obliged to anſwer (13) the former gently and reſpectfully, becauſe it ſeemed to him that there was ſomething of a pious zeal in their objection: but, ſays he (14), the others ought to be handled more roughly, for they are more dangerous and malicious than the firſt. The method he took, was to wreſt out of their hands the weak arms of their reaſon, by ſhewing them the emptineſs and ignorance of men, and the divine Majeſty, to which alone belongs knowledge. Thoſe, who know Montagne's character, may eaſily gueſs that he gave himſelf a large ſcope. The judgment he makes of the arguments alledged by his author, is too edifying not to be inſerted in this place. To ſpeak the truth, ſays (15), I find, him ſo reſolute and ſucceſsful in eſtabliſhing the articles of the Chriſtian religion by natural proofs, that I think no body can go farther than he upon that ſubject, and that none did ever equal him . . . I aſked formerly Hadrian Turnebus, a very knowing man, what that book might be: he anſwered, that he thought it was a quinteſſence drawn out of Thomas Aquinas; and indeed that vaſt genius, full of an unbounded learning, and of an admirable ſubtilty, was the only man capable of ſuch notions . . . . . I know, Montagne goes on (16), a man of note, bred up a ſcholar, who confeſſed to me, that he had been reclaimed from his unbelief, by Sebonde's arguments. Every body has not ſo good an opinion of that book as Montagne. Father Theophilus Raynaud (17) ſpeaks of it with contempt; and a Lutheran profeſſor (18) laughed heartily at Comenius, for ſaying (19) that Sebonde has ſo demonſtratively proved whatever concerns the knowledge and glory of GOD, and the knowledge and ſalvation of man, that nothing can be alledged againſt it. That profeſſor maintains, that in many things, which are not very obſcure, that Spaniard argues pitifully, and he alledges, as an inſtance of it, the explication of the cauſes which produce diſcord among men.

[E] The other writings of our Sebonde.] His other books are Quæſtiones diſputatæ. Viola animæ per modum dialogi de hominis natura tractans ad cognoſcendum ſe, Deum & hominem, & omne debitum quo Deo obligatur & proximo. Coloniæ apud Henricum Quentel 1501, in 4to (20). The dialogues de Natura Hominis, printed at Lyons in 1568, are probably the ſame book with Viola Animæ; the latter differs from the Theologia Naturalis, only as to the method. This plainly appears from the bare conſideration of the following title: Theologia naturalis, ſive liber Creaturarum, ſpecialiter de homine & de natura ejus in quantum homo, & de his quæ ſunt ei neceſſaria ad cognoſcendum ſe ipſum & deum, & omne debitum ad quod homo tenetur & obligatur tam Deo quam proximo. The author was one of thoſe men, who, when they have publiſhed a book which pleaſes them, or for which they are eſteemed, produce it from time to time under different attires, like thoſe Cooks, who ſerve the ſame meat dreſſed in different ways. I never ſaw any body that did not allow, that the firſt edition of the Theologia Naturalis is that of Paris, 1509: neverthele ſs, I have one of Straſbourg, in folio, printed in a Gothic letter, in the year 1496.

(8) Ibid. p. 720.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Montagne, ubi ſupra, pag. 186.

(11) Ib. p. 187.

(12) Ib. p. 202.

(13) Pag. 187.

(14) Pag. 202.

(15) Pag. 186.

(16) Pag. 201.

(17) Prolegomen. Theolog. Nat. num. 86.

(18) Jacob. Thomaſius, Præfat. LXXVII, Leipſ. 1681.

(19) Comenius, de uno neceſſario, cap. vi, p. 49.

(20) See the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

SEDULIUS (CAIUS CÆLIUS, or CÆCILIUS) flouriſhed in the Vth century [A]. He was a prieſt (a), and wrote a Poem, intituled, Paſchale Carmen, and a book in proſe upon the ſame ſubject, intituled, Paſchale Opus. Theſe two pieces have been (a) See the remark [C] towards the end.

[A] He flouriſhed in the Vth century.] Some think he wrote his Poem under the reign of Theodoſius the younger, and Valentinian III. This is obſerved in the manuſcript of Petrus Pithœus (1), and in another antient manuſcript mentioned by Archbiſhop Uſher (2). According to this way of reckoning he muſt have flouriſhed about the year 430. Father Sirmond found in the beſt manuſcripts of Gennadius, that Sedulius died in the reign of the emperors above-mentioned (3). Neverthe leſs Archbiſhop Uſher places him after the year 470. The reaſon alledged by him, viz. That Sedulius's book was found ſcattered among his papers, and put into a good order, and publiſhed by the conſul Turcius Ruſius Aſterius (4), is not a convincing one; for that Aſterius may very well be the ſame that was conſul with Protogenes in the year 449. And though it were granted to Archbiſhop Uſher, that it is he who was conſul with Præſidius, in the year 494; yet there will be no neceſſity to grant him what he ſays, ſince there might have been ſome years between the death of Sedulius, and the time when his book was put into order, and imparted to the public (5). There is in the

(1) See Father Labbe, Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. ii, p. 329.

(2) Iis conſona exhibet Uſſerius ex Thorneyana Bibliotheca. Id. ibid.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 333, 334.

(4) See Father Labbe, ibid. pag. 325.

(5) See Labbe, ibid. pag. 333, 334.

been preſerved [B]. He is ſaid to have written a commentary upon St Paul's Epiſtles, but it ought rather to be aſcribed to one Sedulius a Scotchman, of a much later ſtanding [C]. We are told that the fault of a tranſcriber, who put the word Hæreticis inſtead of Heroicis, was the cauſe why the Poet Sedulius was hated; and that this hatred did extend to all the Poets [D]. It is allowed that he was a man of parts, and that there the old editions of the Carmen Paſchale, an epiſtle dedicatory in verſe, from which it ſhould be inferred, that this work was dedicated to the Emperor Theodoſius I; but it is very likely that this epiſtle belonged to a more antient Poem, and that it was prefixed to this by a miſtake, on account of the conformity of the ſubjects. This is Archbiſhop Uſher's, and Father Labbe's opinion (6). However it be, it is not doubted but that Sigebert is miſtaken, who ſays, that Sedulius flouriſhed in the reign of Conſtans and Conſtantius; that is, between the year 340, and the year 350. It is alſo thought that Albertus Stadenſis is in the wrong, to place him about the year 378 (7). What is certain is, that this Poem of Sedulius came out before Pope Gelaſius made his decree, and conſequently before the year 496, in which that Biſhop of Rome died: That, I ſay, is very certain; for this piece of Sedulius is mentioned in that decree (8).

[B] Theſe two pieces have been preſerved.] The Paſchale Carmen, id eſt, de Chriſti miraculis libri quinque (9), has been often printed with the epiſtle dedicatory to the prieſt Macedonius and without it. The Paſchale Opus, which is alſo divided into five books, and dedicated to the ſame Macedonius, was publiſhed at Paris by Franciſcus Juretus in 1585, from Pithœus's manuſcript. It is the firſt edition. Note that the prieſt Macedonius exhorted the author to put the Paſchale Carmen into proſe: and therefore Sigebert is miſtaken, who ſays that the proſe was publiſhed before the verſes. Sedulius Epiſcopus ad Macedonium Preſbyterum ſcripſit libros de miraculis Veteris & Novi Teſtamenti, quos poſtea ſub metrica lege redactos prætitulavit Paſchale carmen (10). We have alſo ſome other Poems of Sedulius: the firſt edition of his poetical works is that of Aldus Manutius 1502. The beſt is that of Paris 1624, in the eighth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum. See Father Labbe (11) and Dr Cave (12).

[C] To one Sedulius a Scotchman, of a much later ſtanding.] Mention is made of one Sedulius Epiſcopus Britanniæ, who, together with Ferguſtus a Scotch biſhop, aſſiſted at a council held at Rome in the year 721. Bale, Simler, and ſome others, call that Sedulius biſhop of the Southern Scotch, and ſay he writ the canons of a council held at Rome. The ſubſcriptions in the printed books run thus, Sedulius Epiſcopus Britanniæ de genere Scotorum, & Ferguſtus Epiſcopus Scotiæ Pictus huic conſtituto à nobis promulgato ſubſcripſimus (13). Hepidannus (14) a Monk of St Gall mentions one Sedulius a Scotchman, under the year 818. Sedulius Scotus clarus habetur. It is to him that Father Labbe (15) aſcribes the Collectaneum ſive explanatio in omnes epiſtolas S. Pauli, printed firſt at Baſil in 1528, and then inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. It is nothing elſe but a rhapſody made up of ſeveral extracts from Origen, Euſebius, St Jerom, &c. Aubertin (16) aſcribes it to Biſhop Sedulius, who, together with Ferguſtus, aſſiſted at a council of Rome under Gregory II, or Gregory III. Here follow the reaſons alledged by Father Labbe. That manner of commenting upon the ſcripture, does very much ſavour of the IXth century (17), and it ſeems that the author of that Collectaneum in Paulum, wrote likewiſe the Collectaneum in Matthæum, which is to be found in the library of the Jeſuits of Paris, written upon very fine parchment, and with a very fair hand, above ſeven or eight hundred years old. Were it true that the Collectaneum in Matthæum, and the Collectaneum in Paulum were written by one and the ſame author, it would afford us a convincing proof againſt the learned Uſher, Archbiſhop of Armagh, who pretended that the Collectaneum in Paulum was the work of the ſame Sedulius, who wrote the Carmen Paſchale in the Vth century; for the author of the Collectaneum in Matthæum, quotes not only the Poet Sedulius, but alſo Pope Gregory I, St Iſidorus, Arculfus, and the venerable Bede, who flouriſhed in the VIIIth century (18). If what Mr Du Pin affirms (19), were true, viz. That the author of the Collectaneum in Paulum quotes Pope St Gregory and the venerable Bede; Father Labbe would be very much to blame for not alledging that reaſon againſt Archbiſhop Uſher, and I ſhould very much wonder at Uſher's poſitively ſaying, that the Poet Sedulius wrote the commentary upon St Paul's epiſtles. I do not wonder that he ſaid ſo, though doubtleſs he was not ignorant that the Jeſuit Juſtiniani (20) obſerves, that the author of that Collectaneum in Paulum tranſcribed ſome words from the twenty-firſt chapter of the nineteenth book of St Gregory's Moralia upon Job; for as he knew that this Jeſuit declares, that thoſe words were tranſcribed without naming St Gregory, cujus verba tranſcripſit tacito ejus nomine, he might have thought that Sedulius did not tranſcribe from St Gregory, but that this Pope tranſcribed from Sedulius. He was not obliged to be of Juſtiniani's opinion, who does not think it likely that St Gregory ſhould have borrowed any thing from Sedulius: ‘Nec veriſimile videatur Gregorium ea à Sedulio mutuatum eſſe, cum plane Gregoriani ſtyli ſimplicitatem redoleant qui more ſuo hæc Apoſtoli verba non tam ad ſcribentis mentem, quàm aptè ad mores informandos explicat (21). - - - Nor does it ſeem probable that Gregory borrowed theſe things from Sedulius, ſince they plainly ſavour of the ſimplicity of Gregory's ſtyle, who, according to his cuſtom, in explaining theſe words of the Apoſtle, does not ſo much conſider the expreſs meaning of the author, as how they may be fitly applied to form the manners.’ All this ſerves to ſhew that Mr du Pin is miſtaken.

It would not be ſufficient to know that Sedulius, the author of that commentary upon St Paul, is a different man from Sedulius the Poet; it is further neceſſary to know whether the latter was a Scotchman. Many affirm it, but I do not find they alledge good reaſons for it. The inſcription of an excellent manuſcript in the abbey of Fulde, Sedulii Scoti Hibernienſis in omnes Epiſtolas Pauli collectaneum, which Archbiſhop Uſher alledges as a very good argument, can be of no force, ſo long as one may believe with great probability, that the author of that Collectaneum is not the Poet Sedulius. Trithemius may repeat as often as he pleaſes, that theſe words Sedulius Scotigena, are prefixed to a book of letters, he will never prove the affirmative of this queſtion. It ſhould be proved firſt of all that Sedulius the Poet is the author of thoſe letters. In a word, ſince the antient authors never ſaid that our Sedulius was a Scotchman, we are not at all to mind what the following ages can ſuggeſt to us upon that head. One might lay ſome ſtreſs upon it, if there had been no Sedulius, that was a Scotchman; but ſince it is certain that there has been one or two, it is no difficult thing to apprehend that the Poet has been confounded with one of them. See Father Labbe (22).

It were to be wiſhed that he had made as many diſcuſſions upon each eccleſiaſtical writer, as upon the Poet Sedulius. I obſerve, by the by, that he has very well confuted thoſe, who pretend that this Poet was a Biſhop. He alledges the ſilence of the antients; he ſhews that Gennadius's teſtimony is inſignificant: Gennadius, ſays he, Salvian, Proſper Aquitanus, and ſome others, have been improperly ſtiled biſhops by ſeveral authors. The title of Antiſtes beſtowed upon Sedulius was beſtowed upon prieſts. Dexter's Chronicle, wherein mention is made of Sedulius, Epiſcopus Oretanus in the year 428, is a ſuppoſititious book. Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis would not have ſtiled Sedulius barely a prieſt, if he could have honoured the Spaniſh nation with ſuch a biſhop (23).

[D] The fault of a tranſcriber . . . . was the cauſe . . . . that the Poet Sedulius was hated, and that this hatred did extend to all the Poets.] It is ſaid that Paul II, conceived a great hatred againſt the Poets, by reaſon of that fault of the tranſcribers, and that many Profeſſors of the Canon Law, for the ſame reaſon, looked upon all ſorts of Poems as heretical works. What a ridiculous thing would this be! Let us quote Mr de Boiſſieu. ‘Veteres librarios indiligenter ſcripſiſſe, vel ex Tullii, Strabonis, Hieronymi, & aliorum querelis patet. Unde multi graviſſimorum virorum errores emanarunt: quod hoc duntaxat exemplo probaſſe mihi ſufficiat. Cùm in prima parte Decreti,

A remarkable Story of St Ursula from ye Jesuit Sirmond. Ursula. Undecimilla blundered into, Undecim mille i.e. 11000 —

---

(6) See the ſame, ibid. pag. 333.

(7) See the ſame, pag. 332.

(8) Gratian. Can. Sancta Romana, Diſt. XV, apud Labbe, ibid. pag. 325.

(9) Mr du Pin, Bibl. Tom. iii, Part. ii, p. 75, of the Dutch Edition mentions only four books.

(10) Sigebertus, cap. vi, Catalogi, apud Labbe, ubi ſupra, pag. 328, 329.

(11) Labbe, ibid. pag. 335.

(12) Cave, Hiſtor. Liter. pag. 337.

(13) Taken from Father Labbe, ubi ſupra, pag. 328.

(14) He compoſed ſome ſhort Annals inſerted by du Cheſne, in the third volume of his Collection of the Hiſtorians of France.

(15) Labbe, ubi ſupra, p. 338.

(16) See Labbe, ibid.

(17) Id. ib. pag. 335.

(18) See Labbe, ibid.

(19) Du Pin, ubi ſupra. pag. 175.

(20) Benedict. Juſtinianus in I ad Corinth. cap. vi, ver. 5, apud Labbe, ibid. pag. 337.

(21) Idem, apud eundem, p. 338.

(22) Labbe, ubi ſupra, p. 330.

(23) Ex eodem, pag. 331, 332.

there is ſomething great and noble in the turn of his Poem, that his thoughts are Poetical, and his verſes tolerable (b) [E]. What Moreri ſays of him wants to be new moulded from the beginning to the end.

(b) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. iv, pag. m. 75.

‘ Decreti, diſtinct. 15. c. 3. hæc Gelaſii Pontificis verba, Item venerabilis viri Sedulii Paſchale opus, quod heroïcis verſibus deſcripſit, inſigni laude præferimus, depravata eſſent, & pro heroïcis, librariorum incuria, legeretur, hæreticis, mendum hoc, Paulum ſecundum, Pontificem maximum ad Poëtarum capitale odium perduxit, & plurimis aliis, Legum Profeſſoribus, impoſuit, ut omnia poëmata, quamvis ſacra, hæretica eſſe duxerint; ut Pierius Valerianus, in oratione pro Sacerdotum barbis ſcriptum reliquit. O rem ridiculam, Cato, & jocoſam (24). - - - The complaints of Tully, Strabo, Jerom, and others make it very plain that the old tranſcribers wrote incorrectly; from whence proceeded the errors of many great men. It will be ſufficient for me to prove this by one example. Whereas in the firſt part of the decree, theſe words of Pope Gelaſius, We likewiſe honour and praiſe very much the Paſchal performance of the venerable Sedulius, which he wrote in heroic verſe, were corrupted, and through the careleſſneſs of the tranſcribers the word Heretic was written inſtead of Heroic, this error induced Paul II, &c. . . . . as Pierius Valerianus has written in his Oration, &c. A merry ſtory indeed! Others apply this to Pope Hadrian VI. Read the following paſſage, and compare it exactly with Boiſſieu's words. Unum adhuc addam, unde pateat, quæ damna plerunque depravati Codices afferant. In Canonibus à Gratiano digeſtis, diſt. 15. Ubi recitatur inſigniter ſalutare Decretum Gelaſii, hæc ſententia eſt: Venerabilis viri Sedulii Paſchale opus, quod heroïcis deſcripſit verſibus, inſigni laude proferendum. Ibi vulgata ante hac exemplaria pro heroicis, hæreticis habuêre. ‘ Quod bonis quibuſdam Canoniſtis ſuſpicionem movit, Poëmata omnia eſſe hæretica, Poëtaſque inter pios, etſi ſacra tractent, neutiquam annumerari.’ Id quod Hadriano illi Batavo, qui Caroli V. Præceptor fuerat, adeò perſuaſum fuit, ut nullum hominum genus majori proſequeretur odio, quàm Poëtas. ‘ Et adhuc aliqui, ut Pierius clariſſimus affirmat, non mali alioqui præſules, depravata illius loci lectione inducti, neminem ſacerdotio dignum arbitrantur, qui unquam in Parnaſſo ſomniarit (25).’ By comparing thoſe two paſſages one with another, there is ground to ſuſpect that one of thoſe two authors quoted Pierius Valerianus without reading him; for if what concerns Paul II (26), is to be found in that writer, how comes it that Philippus Carolus ſays nothing of it? Why does he only mention Hadrian VI? Take notice that what he ſays of this laſt Pope does not prove that the word hæreticis inſtead of heroicis made him hate the Poets. He only ſays occaſionally that Hadrian VI, being fully perſuaded that they were unworthy to be numbered among pious men, hated them to the higheſt degree. And therefore I do not pretend to prove by the teſtimony of that author, that what Boiſſieu ſays of Paul II, is applied to Hadrian VI. The proof I bring for it is a paſſage probably occaſioned by a careleſs and haſty reading of Philippus Carolus's words. ‘ Ajunt eum (Hadrianum) nullum hominum genus majore proſecutum fuiſſe odio quam poëtas, eo quod in antiquis exemplaribus Canonum à Gratiano digeſtorum legatur decretum Gelaſii in hæc verba: Venerabilis viri Sedulii Paſchale opus, quod hæreticis deſcripſit verſibus, &c. cum ibi heroicis legi debere jam pridem monuerint viri eruditi (27). - - - They ſay that he (meaning Hadrian) hated no ſort of men more than the Poets, becauſe in the old copies of the Canons, digeſted by Gratian, the decree of Gelaſius was thus worded: Venerabilis viri, &c.’

I ſuſpect the truth of this account, and am apt to take it for a ſtory forged by the Italian Humaniſts, on purpoſe to ridicule the enemies of good literature. Nevertheleſs I do not deny that the fault of a tranſcriber may have frequently produced diſorders both in the heart and underſtanding. But I know that Paul II, and Hadrian VI, had ſome other reaſons for hating the Poets; and I cannot apprehend that ignorance ſhould be able to make one and the ſame perſon act ſo contrary to good ſenſe as to hate the Poets for the reaſon alledged here, and yet to reverence Pope Gelaſius: for it ought to be obſerved that the decree into which the word hæreticis had crept inſtead of heroicis contains an encomium upon Sedulius's Poem. It is alſo to be obſerved that we are not told that this miſtake did leſſen in the leaſt the veneration that Pontif was in.

[E] It is allowed that he was a man of great parts, and that there is ſomething noble in the turn of his Poem, &c.] I ſhall add to this teſtimony of Mr du Pin Borrichius's own words, whereof Mr Baillet gives us the ſenſe (28). ‘ Dictio Sedulii facilis, ingenioſa, numeroſa, perſpicua, ſic ſatis munda (ſi excipias proſodica quædam delicta) (29). - - - Sedulius's ſtyle is eaſy, harmonious, elegant, perſpicuous, and correct enough, (if you only except a few errors in the proſody).’ Venantius Fortunatus beſtows pretty large encomiums upon our Poet.

Quod tonat Ambroſius, Hieronymus atque coruſcat,
  Sive Auguſtinus fonte fluente rigat,
Sedulius dulcis, quod Oroſius edit acutus,
  Regula Cæſarii linea nata ſibi eſt (30).

In thunder Ambroſe does his mind declare,
Jerom in words that ſwift as light'ning are;
Sedulius is ſweet, Oroſius ſowre,
And Auſtin waters like a ſummer ſhow'r:
The rule of great Cæſarius is a line
Made for himſelf, and perfectly divine.

And in another place:

Majeſtatis opus metri canit arte Juvencus,
Hinc quoque conſpicui radiavit lingua Seduli (31).

The learn'd Juvencus in heroic verſe
Does the great work of majeſty rehearſe.
Hence too Sedulius choſe his radiant theme,
And grew conſpicuous in the book of fame.

See ſome other encomiums in Father Labbe (32).

(24) Dionyſ. Salvagnius Boeſſius, Not. ad Poëm. Ovidii in Ibin, pag. m. 127.

(25) Philippus Carolus, in Diſſertat. de Criticis, pag. 17, 18. It is prefixed to his notes upon Aulus Gellius, printed at Nuremberg, in 1663.

(26) I have conſulted the diſſertation of Pierius Valerianus, pro Sacerdotum barbis, and I have found in pag. 24, of the Paris edition 1531, apud Chriſt. Wechel, the ſenſe of the whole quotation of Philippus Carolus, but nothing concerning Paul II.

(27) Autor anonymus Notar. ad Sannazarii Poëmata, Epig. IV, lib. iii, pag. 237, Edit. Amſtel. 1689.

(28) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, num. 1192.

(29) Borrich. Diſſert. de Poëtis, pag. 76.

(30) Venant. Fortunatus, Epig. I, lib. viii, apud Phil. Labbe, de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. ii, pag. 326.

(31) Id. initio, lib. i, de Vita Sancti Martini, apud eund. ibid.

(32) Labbe, ibid. pag. 327.

SEGLA (WILLIAM DE, SIEUR DE CAIRAS) was counſellor in the parliament of Toulouſe towards the beginning of the XVIIth century. It was he, who made a report of a criminal proceſs, which has been placed among the Tragical Hiſtories of that time [A], and for the clearing up of which Mr de Verdun, firſt preſident in the parliament

---

[A] Among the tragical Hiſtories of that time.] There is an account of it in the Mercure François (1). Violante de Bats, a native of Spain, and a very leud woman, conſented to the aſſaſſination of her huſband, being angry with him, becauſe he would not allow her the liberty ſhe deſired of receiving her lovers, the chief of whom was an Auguſtin Monk, Profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Toulouſe. His name was Peter Arias Burdeus, and he was born at Granada in Spain. He, and a counſellor in the Seneſchal's court were the chief contrivers of the aſſaſſination. That woman's huſband was killed with ſeventeen wounds, in the month of July 1608. Burdeus being convicted of adultery and murder was condemned to be beheaded and quartered, which was executed in the month of February 1609. Violante was likewiſe put to death with ſome others of her ruffians. Burdeus's adultery ‘ was proved againſt him by a ſufficient number of witneſſes, viz. by a woman who maintained in the preſence of him and Violante, that ſhe had ſeen them in the very fact in the wood of the farm of Launaquet, belonging to a convent of Nuns; and by another, who affirmed that ſhe had ſeen them going into the ſaid wood by themſelves. There were alſo parliament of Toulouſe, took all poſſible pains. The parties accuſed were at laſt convicted, and puniſhed according to their deſerts: and becauſe William de Segla was thoroughly acquainted with that cauſe, the firſt preſident (a) exhorted him to publiſh it. The Latin letter he received from him was prefixed to the book which he put out, wherein you find, beſides an account of the proceedings, a hundred and thirty one obſervations full of learning [B]. The family of Segla is ſtill in being at Toulouſe, where they hold places in the parliament.

(1) Tom. i, fol. 325 verſo, & ſeq. ad ann. 1609.

(a) In 1611, Mr de Verdun was then firſt preſident in the parliament of Paris.

‘ſome other particular witneſſes, one of which had ſeen them kiſs one another in a laſcivious manner, while they were ſitting at table in his garden in one of the ſuburbs of the town. The other had ſeen them twice in a chamber for the ſpace of two hours. . . . . That crime was alſo called a ſacrilege, there being ſome ground to ſuſpect that he had lain with Violante in a confeſſionary in St James's church; for two witneſſes depoſed that he had been two full hours in the ſaid confeſſionary with a pretty tall gentlewoman, ſuch as Violante was. Beſides, there was a ſpiritual inceſt and adultery in the caſe, becauſe Violante was his daughter by confeſſion, whom he owned to have confeſſed two or three times in our Lady's chappel in the cloyſter of the convent of the Auguſtins. As for what concerns the murder the common report, &c (2).’

[B] Obſervations full of learning.] They are intermixed with the moſt curious paſſages of the antient authors, according to the faſhion of that time. Thoſe, which concern the diſorders occaſioned by love, and the artifices of courtezans, have not been forgotten. That book was printed at Paris in the year 1613, in 8vo, Corras, a counſellor in the parliament of Toulouſe, who made a report of the proceſs of the man, who through an impoſture, pretended to be Martin Guerre, had before publiſhed a like commentary upon a proceſs and a ſentence.

SEYMOUR (ANNE, MARGARET, and JOAN) three ſiſters illuſtrious for their learning in England in the XVIth century. They compoſed a hundred and four Latin diſtichs upon the death of Margaret de Valois Queen of Navarre, and ſiſter to Francis I, which were ſoon after tranſlated into Greek, French, and Italian, and printed at Paris in the year 1551, with this title, Tombeau de Marguerite de Valois Royne de Navarre. Nicolas Deniſot (a), who had been tutor to theſe three learned Engliſh ladies [A], made a collection containing the tranſlations of their diſtichs, and ſome other verſes both in their praiſe, and upon the death of the Queen of Navarre, and dedicated it to Margaret de Valois Ducheſs of Berry, ſiſter to Henry II [B]. The little

(a) He ſtyled himſelf d'Alſinois, Alcinous Comes in Latin, as chancellor de l'Hôpital calls him.

[A] Deniſot . . . . had been tutor to theſe three learned Engliſh ladies.] Ronſard deſerves to be heard upon this head, tho' his phraſes ſavour of the barbarouſneſs, that was ſtill in the French language when he wrote.

Denizot ſe vante heuré
D'avoir oublié ſa terre,
Et paſſager, demeuré
Trois ans en voſtre Angleterre,
Et d'avoir cogneu vos yeux,
Où les Amours gracieux
Doucement leurs fleſches dardent
Contre ceux qui vous regardent:
  Voir & d'avoir quelquefois
Tant levé ſa petiteſſe,
Que ſous l'outil de ſa vois
Rabota voſtre jeuneſſe,
Vous ouvrant les beaux ſecrets
Des vieux Latins & des Grecs,
Don't l'honneur ſe renouvelle
Par voſtre Muſe nouvelle (1).

Denizot vaunts that he was bleſt
  For having left his native ſhore,
And lived in England as a gueſt
  Full ſix and thirty months; - - - or more.
'Twas there he knew your eyes ſo well,
Where all the graceful cupids dwell,
And ſoftly let their arrows fly
At every gazing ſtander-by.
For this he likewiſe did rejoice,
  Accounting it his higheſt praiſe,
That you allow'd his humble voice
  Your tender ſentiments to raiſe,
While it diſcloſed unto your view,
All that the Greeks or Romans knew,
Whoſe honour is reviv'd again
By your ſweet Muſe's rival ſtrain.

The ode, that contains theſe verſes, was printed in the collection of the diſtichs; but Ronſard made many alterations in it afterwards. I make uſe of the laſt editions.

[B . . . He dedicated the whole to Margaret . . . ſiſter to Henry II.] The Chancellor de l'Hoſpital did not forget that circumſtance in the following verſes, which he made on that learned princeſs.

Et tibi judicium, tibi doctas Delius aures
Præbuit ac regale referſit pectus honeſtis
Artibus: eximiam raramque in Principe laudem.
Tantum nulla decus tulit unquam regia virgo.
Innumeros hæc cauſa viros, ut condere carmen
Utque ſuos vellent tibi conſecrare labores
Impulit: hæc fuit iis ſcribendi cauſa poëtis,
Virginibuſque tribus veſtigia preſſa terendi.
Atque hic longinquis ſua cœpit prima Britannis
Aureus incrementa liber ſermone Latino.
Inde per Eurypos & formidabile nautis
Invadens ſpatium Belgas devenit & urbem
Pariſiam, novus hoſpes iit perque ora manuſque.
Res placuit noſtris argumentumque poetis:
Continuoque alii maternâ vertere linguâ.
Grecâ alii, atque Itala, mox & nova jungere verſis
Collibuit, juſtique voluminis addere formam.

Phœbus your judgment and your ear refin'd,
With noble arts repleniſhing your mind:
High praiſe indeed! But ſuch a praiſe as we Moſt ſeldom due to your high ſtation ſee.
No royal virgin ever did poſſeſs
True fame to ſuch a glorious exceſs.
Hence is it that ſo many authors do
Inſcribe and conſecrate their works to you:
From hence inſpir'd the chearful poets ſing,
And the three virgins to their chorus bring.
Far off in Britiſh land this golden book
In Latin verſe it's firſt beginning took.
It was tranſported into Belgium next,
Paſſing the formidable ſpace betwixt.
To Paris laſt the welcome ſtranger came,
Was read by all and praiſ'd. The noble Theme

---

(2) Segla, Hiſt. tragique, p. 14, & ſeq.

(1) Ronſard, ubi infra, pag. 618.

little exactneſs of thoſe, who have mentioned this collection [C], occaſioned my affirming in the project of this Dictionary, that the diſtichs were a different work from the epitaphs on the Queen of Navarre. I mend that fault now, and I do ingenuouſly confeſs that I have diſcovered the falſity of my conjectures by reading the epitaph of that queen. Which ſhould teach us, that a man ought to be very cautious in making conjectures about matters of fact. It is much better for him to ſuſpend his judgment till he has ſeen all the writings concerning it. I retract what I have ſaid againſt Mr Joli, and Moreri (b); and I do particularly acknowledge that they are excuſable, for calling thoſe three ſiſters PRINCESSES, for they may poſſibly have ſeen that title prefixed to the collection publiſhed at Paris by Deniſot; but I maintain ſtill that they were not princeſſes. They have been praiſed by divers authors, particularly by Ronſard [D], and Nicolas de Herberai Sieur des Eſſars [E], ſo well known by his French tranſlation of Amadis de Gaule. It is ſomewhat ſtrange that they ſhould be ſo little known at this day [F].

In all our Poets rouz'd the like deſire,
Some quickly cloth'd it in a French attire:
By ſome it was tranſlated into Greek;
And others made it in Italian ſpeak.
Many did furniſh it with new ſupplies,
To make the volume of a proper ſize.

[C] The little exactneſs of thoſe who had mentioned this collection.] Ronſard calls the diſtichs of thoſe three ſiſters a Chriſtian ſong. Richelet, who commented upon him, obſerves, that they were Chriſtian diſtichs. Neither of them ſays any thing, whereby it may appear that thoſe diſtichs concerned the deceaſed Queen of Navarre. Neither does Chancellor de l'Hoſpital intimate any ſuch thing. Who therefore would have thought that they were epitaphs upon a queen? What do poets commonly put into ſuch pieces but extravagant flatteries? Can any thing be more remote from Pibrac's Quatrains, or Michael Verin's diſtichs, than the tears of Poets upon the graves of great perſons? I thought therefore (2), that thoſe diſtichs ſtiled Chriſtian were moral ſentences, and not funeral elegies, and laviſhed incenſe. It would have deceived better judges than I am. But ſince I have ſeen that work, I muſt acknowledge that there are more chriſtian and moral reflections than poetical phraſes, in ſome verſes of thoſe illuſtrious ſiſters.

[D] They have been praiſed particularly by Ronſard.] His ode on thoſe three Engliſh ladies (3), contains this praiſe among others, that if Orpheus heard them, he would be their ſcholar.

Mais ſi ce harpeur fameux
Oyoit le chant des Serenes,
Qui ſonne aux bords eſcumeux
Des Albionnes arenes
Son Luth Payen il fendroit,
Et diſciple ſe rendroit
Deſſous leur chanſon Chreſtienne,
Dont la voix paſſe la ſienne.

. . . . .

La ſcience auparavant
Si long tems Orientale
Peu à peu marchant avant,
S'apparoiſt occidentale;
Et ſans jamais ſe borner
N'a point ceſſé de tourner,
Tant qu'elle ſoit parvenuë
A l'autre rive incogneuë.
Là de ſon grave ſourcy
Vint affoler le courage
De ces trois Vierges icy,
Les trois ſeules de nôtre âge.
Et ſi bien les ſceut tenter,
Qu'ores on les oit chanter
Maint vers jumeau, qui ſurmonte
Les noſtres, rouges de honte (4).

If that harper ſo renown'd,
Could theſe charming ſyrens hear
From the ſhores of Albion ſound,
Wonder would perplex his ear.
He would break his pagan lyre,
And their ſcholar turn'd deſire
Their ſweet Chriſtian ſong to know
Which his own ſurpaſſes ſo.

. . . . .

Learning, for ſo many years
To the Eaſt confin'd before
In the Weſt at length appears,
Still advancing more and more.
No where did ſhe make a ſtand
'Till ſhe reach'd that unknown land
Of the noble virgins three,
Theſe three wonders of our age,
Whoſe extreme affection ſhe
Came on purpoſe to engage.
Them ſhe has inſtructed well,
As their many diſtichs tell.
Ours, as far as they have gone,
Bluſh to ſee themſelves outdone.

I ſhall occaſionally obſerve that Richelet, who made a Commentary upon Ronſard's odes, did not underſtand the laſt verſe but one of the quotation. It is plain, that maint vers jumeau, - - - many twin-verſes, ſignifies the hundred diſtichs of thoſe three ladies, or thoſe verſes which they coupled two and two together, in imitation of Cato and Michael Verin: And yet the Commentator found himſelf here very much in the dark. He thinks that jameau, (twins) ſignifies like one another; becauſe, ſays he, they are ſiſters; or, it is an alluſion to the tops of mount Parnaſſus, which are double, whither the Poets go to learn how to make well a verſe, which he calls jumeau, as if one ſhould ſay Parnaſſian. You may judge whether the Commentators upon the antients Poets do not frequently deceive us, ſince thoſe who undertake to explain the Poets of their own time, and of their own country, are liable to ſuch miſtakes. I could eaſily ſhew, that Muret, who commented upon ſome poems of Ronſard, did not always rightly underſtand his French words.

[E] . . . and by Nicolas de Herberai Sieur des Eſſars.] The praiſes he beſtows upon the three Engliſh ſiſters are contained in a letter he writ to them, which was prefixed to the collection of epitaphs upon Queen Margaret.

[F] It is ſtrange that they ſhould be ſo little known at this day.] I aſked ſome Engliſhmen very learned and well verſed in the knowledge of books and authors, what thoſe three famous Engliſh ladies were, telling them at the ſame time the little I knew of the matter: They anſwered me, that they were abſolutely unknown to them. I had the ſame anſwer from Paris, tho' I conſulted ſome perſons, who are hardly equalled by any body elſe in the knowledge of ſuch things. Theſe three illuſtrious Engliſh ladies muſt needs have fallen into oblivion, ſince Mr Juncker ſays nothing of them in the catalogue of learned women, lately publiſhed by him (5). He quotes Pitſeus ſometimes; and therefore ſince he does not ſpeak of the three ſiſters Seymour, it is a ſign Pitſeus does not ſpeak of them neither. A friend of mine had aſſured me before, that neither Bale nor Pitſeus, who have ſo fully treated of the writings of that learned nation, ſay any thing of theſe three ſiſters.

(b) All theſe faults have been acknowledged in the extract of a Letter dated the 23d of March 1693, inſerted in the Courier Galant for April 1693.

(2) See the project of this Dictionary, pag. 364, 365.

(3) It is the third of the fifth book.

(4) Ronſard, book v, of his Odes, pag. m. 617.

(5) It is an Appendix to the book de Ephemeridibus ſive Diariis Eruditorum, publiſhed by him at Leipſic in 1692 in 12mo.

SELEMNUS, a river of Achaia, had been a very handſome young ſhepherd. The nymph Argyra fell ſo paſſionately in love with him, that ſhe uſed to come out of the bottom of the ſea to go and lie with him. But when the prime of Selemnus's beauty vaniſhed away by age, the nymph left off going to him. The young man died of grief for it, and was metamorphoſed into a river by the goddeſs Venus. That change did not cure him of his paſſion: Venus was obliged to interpoſe; ſhe granted him the favour of forgetting that nymph. It is ſaid that from that time the river Selemnus had an admirable virtue; which was that the perſons of both ſexes who bathed themſelves in it, no longer remembered the object of their love (a). Pauſanias is in the right to ſay, that if the water of that river had ſuch a virtue, it would be more valuable than great ſums of money [A].

[A] If it's water had ſuch a virtue, it would be more valuable than great ſums of money.] We muſt not believe all that the Poets and writers of romances make amorous people ſay; the deſcriptions of their ſufferings are hyperbolical: however, it muſt be granted, that love is an inexhauſtible ſource of miſeries and diſorders. It is a very neceſſary paſſion upon earth for the preſervation of animals: It is the ſoul of the world with reſpect to them; nay, it is certain, that the Divine Providence has annexed a thouſand charms and pleaſures to ſo neceſſary a paſſion; but, on the other hand, it is attended with a thouſand troubles. How many people can neither eat, nor drink, nor ſleep, and loſe their health and wits upon that account? The number of thoſe who die of it is greater than it is thought: Thoſe who hang themſelves for it, are indeed few; nevertheleſs, there are ſome. This concerns thoſe whoſe love is not anſwered. As for thoſe who are as much beloved as they love others, they pay dear for their pleaſures; for not to ſay, that their reaſon is diſordered, and that their paſſion is frequently contrary to their true intereſt, whereby they are expoſed to a vaſt number of troubles; does not bare jealouſy, which commonly attends their paſſion, make them ſufficiently unhappy? Can there be a more lamentable, melancholy, and dreadful condition than that of jealous people? Let their jealouſy be well or ill-grounded, it is all one; their torment is equally great; they are not the leſs perſecuted by the chimeras and phantoms of their imagination; the fire wherewith they are waſted and conſumed, is not more tolerable for it: and therefore it may be ſaid, that if there was a river in the world which could cure lovers, it would be more valuable than gold. Εἰ δὲ μέτεστιν ἀληθείας τῷ λόγῳ τιμιώτερον χρημάτων πολλῶν ἐστὶν ἀνθρώποις τὸ ὕδωρ τοῦ Σελέμνου. Quod niſi commentitium eſſet, quantavis pecunia videri poſſet ea Selemni aqua pretioſior (1). Of this water one might truly ſay, ἄριστον μὲν ὕδωρ, Water is an excellent thing. But then gold ought not to be mentioned afterwards without being placed far beneath it (2). See the margin. Zuccolo makes a very natural deſcription of the fury of jealouſy, when he introduces in his dialogues, a man extremely greedy of the ſweet pleaſures of love, and yet determined to renounce them, provided his beloved object be not kind to any body elſe. ‘Non ‘hò già cuore di sì gagliarda lena, che baſti a reſiſtere
‘a quel reo veleno di Geloſia,

Che, mentre con la fiamma il gelo meſce,
Tutto il Regno d' Amor turba, e contriſta.

‘Siami altiera e ſdegnoſa la mia Dellia, purche non ‘rivolga corteſe, e pia lo ſguarde ſoave altrove: mi
‘ſia ſcarſa de ſuoi favori: avara delle ſue gratie, che ‘tuttavia,

- - - - Un più gentile
Stato del mio non è ſotto la Luna,
Si dolce è del mio amaro la radice.

‘Ma non poſſo già ſoffrire, che i begli occhi ſereni,
‘i quali acceſero nel mio petto fiamma ineſtinguibile
‘d' Amore habbiano a riſchiarare il foſco d'Horatio
‘co'i raggi della lor luce,

Si nieghi a me, purche a ciaſcun ſi nieghi;
Che, purche altrui non ſplenda il mio bel Sole,
Ne le tenebre ancor vivrò beato (3).

‘I have not a heart of ſuch impenetrable ſtuff as can ‘reſiſt the black poiſon of jealouſy,

Which, intermixing ice with flame, confounds,
And ſhakes love's empire to it's utmoſt bounds.

‘Let my Delia be haughty and diſdainful to me, pro- ‘vided that ſhe do not, in the height of her courteſy
‘and compaſſion, beſtow her ſweet glances elſewhere:
‘let her be ſparing of her favours to me; niggardly of ‘her graces, yet ſtill,

A more delightful ſtate than what I feel,
Not the broadfield of fancy does contain,
So ſweet the root is of my bitter pain.

‘But I cannot bear that thoſe bright and beautiful eyes,
‘which have kindled in my breaſt an unquenchable fire
‘of love, ſhould illuminate the darkneſs of Horatius with ‘their beams of light.

If that fair ſun do not to others ſhine;
Although he never chear theſe eyes of mine,
Yet ſhall I live in darkneſs happy ſtill.

But becauſe he cannot even promiſe to himſelf this melancholy comfort, he gives himſelf up to deſpair, and eaſes his grief only by curſing jealouſy as a monſter come out of hell. ‘Ma, ſe il mio male ‘rimane affatto ſenza rimedio, non mi ſi tolga alme-
‘no, ch'io ſfoghi in qualche modo il mio cordoglio
‘co'i lamenti, e co'i pianti.

O ſorella di morte, onde veniſte,
D'invidia figlia, fiero, horribil moſtro,
Che fai miei giorni lagrimoſi, e triſti;
Tornati à l'infernale, oſcuro chioſtro,
Che troppo co' tuoi morſi il ſen m'apriſti,
Onde il venen, la piaga, e'l dolor moſtro (4).

‘But if there be no remedy left for my misfortune, at ‘leaſt let me not be hindred from diſcharging ſome
‘part of my bitter anguiſh in lamentations and com- ‘plaints.

Siſter of death, whence art thou come? - - Away
Thou child of envy, and thou beaſt of prey,
By whom in ſorrow all my days I tell;
Return black monſter to thy native hell.
Too deep thy tuſks are in my boſom found,
For ſee, the poiſon feſters in the wound.

I have read in a certain book which was printed with the ſatire upon the hermaphrodites (5), that a lady having ſung with a melancholy tune (6), and made it appear by her looks (7) that her heart was ſorrowful; ſome body aſked her what made her ſo melancholy; and that inſtead of giving any anſwer to the queſtion, ſhe ſpoke the words of Ludovico,

Che dolce piu, che piu giocondo ſtato,
Saria, di quel, d'un amoroſo core:
Che viver piu felice, & piu beato,
Che ritrovarſi in ſervitu d'amore,
Se non foſſe ciaſcuno ſtimulato,
Da quel ſoſpetto rio, da quel timore,
Da quel martir, da quella freneſia,
Da quella rabia detta gelozia.

What joys ſo pure could any mortal find
As thoſe which harbour in a love-ſick mind.

(a) Ex Pauſania, lib. vii, p. 229.

SOME conſiderations upon jealouſy.

(1) To underſtand this, one muſt read theſe verſes of Pindar, Od. I Olymp. Ἄριστον μὲν ὕδωρ· ὁ δὲ χρυσὸς, αἰθόμενον πῦρ ἅτε διαπρέπει νυκτὶ μεγάνορος ἔξοχα πλούτου. Optima quidem eſt aqua: & aurum, velut ignis noctu ardens, coruſcat eximie inter ſuperbificas divitias.

(2) Pauſanias, lib. vii, p. 229.

(3) Lodovico Zuccolò, Academico Filopono di Faenza, Dialogo, della Geloſia, p. 129, 130.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 137.

(5) See the remark [C] in the article SALMACIS, at the end.

(6) Diſcours de Iacophile à Limne, pag. 96.

(7) Ibid.

What life could to our ſweet experience prove
More happy than the ſervitude of love;
But that there is a ſting in every breaſt
Of curs'd ſuſpicion, enemy to reſt,
A ſpark of frenzy which poſſeſſes all,
And which the rage of jealouſy we call.

Doubtleſs, it was the torments of jealouſy which obliged a Poet of the ſame country to make a ſonnet (8), wherein he tells his confeſſor, If you deſign to puniſh me for the faults which love has made me commit, enjoin me to fall in love again, for there is no greater torment than that.

Se pur brami punir l'anima errante,
Fa ch'io torni ad amar, che fra mortali
Non v'è pena maggior ch' eſſer' amante.

If you would puniſh me for errors paſt,
Then bid me love again. What can be worſe?
To be a lover is the greateſt curſe.

(8) It is to be found in page 548, of Chevreau's Oeuvres Meſlées.

SELVE (JOHN DE) firſt preſident in the parliament of Paris, in the reign of Francis I. See his article in Moreri's Dictionary. I ſhall only add to it three or four particulars, imparted to me by Mr Baluze, whereby it may be rectified and improved. It is not true that this preſident was originally from the Milaneſe: he was born in the Limouſin; and it is very likely that he and his anceſtors were natives of the city of Tulle [A]. They father upon him a book which he did not write [B], and it is without any good reaſon that an Hiſtorian charges him with having corrupted the memoirs of Philip de Comines [C]. His true name was John de SALVA [D]. Thoſe, who made the elogies of the firſt preſidents of Paris ‘place his death in Auguſt 1529. But John Bertaud, who made and printed his epitaph in that ſame year, informs us, that he was buried at St Nicolas du Chardonnet the eleventh of December. That epitaph is not upon his tomb, but another very modern (a).’

(a) Memoir communicated by Baluzius.

[A] He was born in the Limouſin, and it is very likely that he and his anceſtors were natives of the city of Tulle.] My reaſons for it are theſe. I ſhall uſe the very words of the learned man, who has done me the honour to furniſh me with ſome memoirs for this article. ‘(1) John de Selve was a native of Limouſin: There is no difficulty in it. Clear proof of it may be ſeen at the beginning of the treatiſe de Beneficio; beſides, the ſame is confirmed by Gabriel Lurbæus, in his book concerning the illuſtrious men of Aquitain. But it is not known from what town or place of the Limouſin he came. There is reaſon to believe he was born at Tulle, the chief town of the Lower Limouſin. What makes me think ſo is, that I find in an old record of the year 1431, John de Salva, named among the chief inhabitants of that town; and his poſterity continues ſtill there; but they go by the name of la Selve. It is very likely then, the reputation of John de Selve, firſt preſident of the parliament of Paris, made the authors in that family who live ſtill at Tulle, change their name into that of Selve become famous by that firſt preſident. Beſides this conjecture, which is very probable, I find in the inqueſt of nobility of Chriſtopher de Leſtange, Biſhop of Carcaſſonne, and commander of the king's order, made in the year 1617, that the firſt preſident was the ſon of John de Selve, which perfectly agrees with John de Salva, mentioned in the year 1431, ſince there are a hundred full years from that year to 1529, when the firſt preſident died. Beſides the ſame inqueſt informs us, that Margaret de Selve his ſiſter, was married to Peter de Juyé an inhabitant of Tulle.’

‘From whence it is eaſy to infer, that the genealogy of the family of Selve, printed in the elogies of the firſt preſidents of Paris, is not exact, particularly in ſaying, that the grandfather of the preſident, was a gentleman of the Milaneſe.

[B] A book of which he is not the author, is fathered upon him.] ‘He is commonly ſaid to be the author of the treatiſe de Beneficio. But John Bertaud (2) informs us, that it is not he, but his brother, who is the author of it. Adde ſe. recor. Do. Joannem de Salva ſenatus Parrhiſini principem: cujus frater Joannes de Salva inter reliquos quum primis honoris, ſicuti probitatis ſuæ facile dedit documentum quum de beneficio inſignem tractatum edidit (3).’

[C] It is without any good reaſon that an hiſtorian charges him with having corrupted the memoirs of Philip de Comines.] ‘What Belcarius biſhop of Metz, advances in his hiſtory, book vii. chap. x. is not likely, viz. That the firſt preſident de Selve, who, ſays he, was ignorant of the tranſactions in the reign of Lewis XI, and Charles VIII his ſon, corrupted and curtailed in ſeveral places, the memoirs of Philip de Comines. For the firſt edition of thoſe memoirs came out in 1524. But the firſt preſident was hardly at leiſure then to print books, and particularly other peoples works. Beſides, the editions agree with ſeveral antient manuſcripts, as it has been obſerved by M. Godefroy in his preface to thoſe memoirs (4).

[D] His true name was John de SALVA.] ‘So he is called in the epiſtle dedicatory to John Raulin's epiſtles printed at Paris in the year 1521. Robertus Raulin Joanni de Salva Pariſienſis ſenatus primo præſidi. And in the epiſtle, alluding to his name, he ſays among other things, te natura Salvum fecit, ut alios abſque improperio ſalvos faceres. And in the epigram printed next to the epiſtle dedicatory:

‘Aſtruit ante obitum nullum cenſura Solonis
‘Salvum. Te talem primulus ortus habet.

‘In the relation of the conference held at Madrid in the year 1525, in order to get Francis I. releaſed; he is called John de Salva, in a copy made at that time which I have by me. It is true, that the word Salva has been daſhed out ſince, and the word Selve has been put into the margin.

‘In the treaty of marriage between Hercules d'Eſte, the ſon of Alphonſus Duke of Ferrara, with Renata of France, made at St Germain en Laye, on the nineteenth of February 1527, that preſident, who was Renata's attorney, is called Johannes de Salva, in an old copy of that time, which I have likewiſe by me.

‘John Bertaud a native of Perigord, publiſhed in the year 1529, three books, de cognatione ſacerrimi Joannes Baptiſta; wherein making an enumeration of the famous Canoniſts and Civilians, particularly of thoſe of Aquitain, he ſays, Adde ſe. recor. Do. Joannem de Salva ſenatus Parrhiſini principem. And in the epiſtle to Francis de Marſillac, firſt preſident in the parliament of Rouën, who had married a daughter of the firſt preſident de Salva, he ſays; fideliſſima uxor tua Magdalena à Salva. The ſame made an epitaph upon the firſt preſident de Salva, wherein making an abridgment of his life, he begins with theſe verſes:

‘Salva domus dedit hanc, qui Salvos fecit utique ‘Oppreſſos miſera conditione reos (5).

---

(1) A Memoir communicated by Baluzius.

(2) In the book mentioned at the beginning of the laſt paragraph of the remark [D].

(3) The ſame Memoir.

(4) The ſame Memoir.

(5) Ibid.

SENGEBERE (Polycarp) a Civilian in the XVIIth century, was a native of Brunſwic. He wrote a book againſt Salmaſius [A]. 'He diſputed with one Macquin for a profeſſorſhip of the Civil-Law in the univerſity of Angers (a).' Menage, who had been his diſciple, did not forget to ſerve him on that occaſion; but Macquin was preferred to him, becauſe he was more learned. Nevertheleſs, by reaſon of his merit, and becauſe he was a man of parts, the magiſtrates of Angers beſtowed upon him a yearly penſion of an hundred crowns to keep him in their town; and Mr de Boileſve, jointly with ſome others, gave him as much, ſo that he had ſix hundred livres a year. He was accuſed of having bribed his judges; but Mr Menage made his defence. Thoſe, who have publiſhed ſome memoirs for Menage's life (b), ſay that he pleaded ſeveral cauſes in the parliament of Paris, one, among others, for M. Sengebere, who had a mind to divorce his wife on account of adultery (c). It is very ſtrange that he ſhould ſay nothing of it ſpeaking of that proceſs [B]; for the occaſion ſeemed neceſſarily to require, that he ſhould not forget to

[A] He wrote a book againſt Salmaſius.] Here follows a piece of Menage's converſations. 'Sengebere, my maſter in the Civil-Law, wrote againſt Salmaſius's book de Mutuo: The ſheets were ſent to Salmaſius as they were printing, and he wrote to me, that Sengebere gave him no hard words, but that his railleries were as ſharp as injurious words. He acquainted me, at the ſame time, that he would anſwer that book. But Sengebere cleared the matter better than he, and he made no anſwer (1).'

[B] It is very ſtrange that he ſhould ſay nothing of it, ſpeaking of that proceſs.] He ſpeaks of that proceſs with great ingenuity, and without any deſign of concealing the weak ſide of his maſter. 'Sengebere, doctor of the Civil-Law at Angers, having accuſed and convicted of adultery his wife, who was a very handſome woman, got her confined to a convent, and took a concubine in her place. A jeſter happening to be in a company where they were diſcourſing of his caſe, ſaid in a pleaſant manner: ſince he wanted a whore, he might as well have kept his wife (2).' If Menage pleaded for the huſband upon that occaſion, one can hardly apprehend why he did not ſay ſo, when he related that Sengebere carried the cauſe. He did not forget to ſay that he had been his defender upon a leſs important ſubject (3), viz. when Sengebere was charged with having bribed the judges of the diſpute about a profeſſorſhip. This is not very intelligible, for he had been caſt. Is it cuſtomary for thoſe, who carry the cauſe, to accuſe the perſon who loſes it, of having bribed the judges? Would not ſuch an accuſation reflect upon the judges, rather than the perſon accuſed of having bribed them? Is not a judge, who ſuffers himſelf to be bribed, more guilty than the briber? That paſſage of the Menagiana ought therefore to be rectified; and inſtead of theſe words, he was accuſed of having bribed the judges, it ſhould be, that he was accuſed of having endeavoured to bribe them. The judges would not have been intereſted in that cauſe; they would not have been forced to ſide with Sengebere: and it may very well happen that a man, who caſt his adverſary, is willing to carry his triumph further, and load him with a new confuſion, by proving that he intended to have recourſe to fraud and bribery.

I have ſaid in another place (4), that ſome wiſhed this pleading of Menage had been printed. He was an advocate very well qualified to ſucceed in ſuch a cauſe. He might have ſaid many things fitly applied and handſomely turned: and ſince the wife was convicted, and her beauty, though ever ſo great, could not ſave her; it is to be preſumed, that the proofs of the huſband were as ſtrong as his advocate could have wiſhed. But it was a great advantage for his advocate, and a circumſtance the more favourable, becauſe it afforded a character of ſuperiority very proper to confound the common topics, alledged by the wife's advocate. When a cauſe about adultery is doubtful, the advocate who pleads againſt the huſband, ſpeaks in an inſulting manner, and ridicules him unmercifully; at which the advocate, who pleads againſt the wife, is not a little embarraſſed. But why do I ſay, when ſuch a cauſe is doubtful? I ſhould have ſaid even when it is not at all doubtful (5). I ſhall quote Mr Chevreau for it, who gives us the following account of an antient gentleman, who had married a young woman. 'Ever ſince ſhe found herſelf miſtreſs of the beſt part of his eſtate by virtue of that donative, ſhe minded nothing but fine clothes and good cheer, and expreſſed a great contempt or indifference for all the careſſes of her old huſband.

> 'Hinc dolor, hinc lachrymæ,
>
> 'Hence grief, hence tears.

But there is ſomething more afflicting for the good old man, and if you deſire to know it in a few words, it is that for men of his age

> 'Eſt indeclinabile cornu.
>
> 'Horns are unavoidable.

In reality, he had as undeniable proofs, as any geometrical demonſtrations can be, that ſhe made him a cuckold, and that his wife, whom he uſed to call his treaſure, was only a treaſure of iniquity. Whatever reaſons his relations could alledge to induce him, for their own credit, not to make the cauſe of his vexation public, he only conſulted his anger, being reſolved to get her confined to a nunnery, by the ſame ſentence that ſhould make the donative void. He has powerfully carried on the proſecution, and produced many writings againſt her, and even mortgaged a fine eſtate in land in order to execute his project. The lady pitched upon an advocate, who expreſſed himſelf with a wonderful eaſineſs; and is not covetous in the leaſt, being as rich as he is voluptuous; and it is ſaid, he never pleads a great cauſe for a handſome lady, but he has an enjoyment for it. He mightily exaggerated the noble birth, and the perſonal merit of that lady; her virtue, which appeared in her very looks; the intolerable jealouſy of her huſband grounded upon dreams; and the loathſomeneſs and ridiculouſneſs of old age. It was alſo ſaid, this pleading was that of an advocate, who was to be paid by enjoyment and love, and that his fair client rewarded him accordingly. The cauſe had been twice heard, and was put off till the month of September after the feſtival of St Martin. The two parties are gone, the gentleman to his village, and the lady to the houſe ſhe is poſſeſſed of by the contract of her marriage. In the mean time, a nephew of the old gentleman gave him a viſit to know the particulars of his law-ſuit, of which he had been informed only by imperfect and partial accounts, although he had been told that the young lady's advocate had abuſed him in a moſt inſulting manner (6).' The nephew adviſed him to put an end to that ſuit by a good reconciliation, and even told him, that it had been better if he had not begun it. He alledged himſelf for an example, and did not forget his brother's conduct. 'My brother, and I, ſaid he (7), do not much care to dive into things, that would vex us, if we ſhould find them out; nor does it appear to us that the greateſt happineſs of a huſband conſiſts in being a ſhrewd diviner. We only aim at a quiet life; and it is our opinion, that a man who continually watches his wife, muſt needs take an ill courſe. The remonſtrances of a jealous huſband are ſuſpected; his prohibitions frequently exaſperate a wanton woman, prepoſſeſſed with this opinion, that ſtolen waters are the ſweeteſt: And we could never apprehend, that a tutoring huſband proved more acceptable than a tyrannical one. Violent means betray a brutiſh temper; and whoever has recourſe to the law, muſt expect to be laughed at by the judges,

---

(a) Menagiana, pag. 94, of the firſt Dutch edition.

(b) They are prefixed to the continuation of the Menagiana.

(c) See remark [C] of the article MENAGE.

(1) Menagiana, pag. 287, of the firſt Dutch edition.

(2) Ibid. pag. 137.

(3) See the text of this article.

(4) Remark [C] of the article MENAGE.

(5) This is not repugnant to what I have ſaid; for it will be true ſtill, that the wife's advocate is leſs to be feared, when the huſband's right is more evident.

(6) Chevreau Oeuvres meſlées, pag. 52, & ſeq.

(7) Ibid. p. 57.

to mention the ſervice he had done to his maſter.

‘who are wiſer in a like caſe, and take care that a court of juſtice ſhould not ring with their wives gallantry, which they conceal even from their confeſſors. Indeed, if the judges were to take cognizance of all ſuch diſorders, the parliaments, preſiduals, bailiwicks, and inferior courts would not be ſufficient for it; beſides, ſuch proceedings are very chargeable, and lawyers and attorneys would quickly grow the richeſt men in the kingdom at our coſt.’ Here follows part of the reply. ‘(8) I muſt needs tell you, replied the uncle, that the laſt pleading of my unfaithful wife's advocate broke my heart: had he been credited, I ſhould have been accounted the moſt fooliſh and the moſt wicked man in the world. I muſt further tell you, that I was no ſooner come out of the court, but I heard a confuſed voice of Bookſellers and Shopkeepers aſking me whether I would buy, The curious impertinent; or, the imaginary cuckold; and Horncombs: Nay, the wretched ſhop-boys would follow me to the loweſt ſteps of the great court, playing, thro' a ſilly alluſion, upon a Cornemuſe (a bag pipe), when I came there, all the Shop-keepers cried out with a common conſent, Horn-combs; and I was forced to bear a thouſand ſilly jeſts (9).’ The nephew dextrouſly uſed thoſe circumſtances to perſuade the huſband to a reconciliation; and becoming mediator between him and his wife, he happily put an end to their quarrel (10). Perhaps, the old man would not have been ſo lucky as Sengebere, who got his wife confined to a nunnery. His demands muſt have been very juſt, and doubtleſs his right was very plain, ſince he carried the cauſe. But if we conſider the puniſhment inflicted upon his wife fully convicted of adultery, it will appear ſo ſlight, that one may cry out as in Juvenal's time (11), ubi nunc lex Julia? dormis? - - - What is become of the Roman laws, the laws of Auguſtus (12), Conſtantine, and Juſtinian? The firſt was leſs ſevere than the ſecond; for the lex Julia did not condemn adulterers to death: but by the law of Conſtantine, that puniſhment was inflicted upon them. Juſtinian moderated it as to women, being contented to condemn them to be whipped and ſhut up in a nunnery: Nay, he allowed huſbands to take them again at two years end; and if they died before that time, or were not willing to have them again, their wives were condemned to be ſhaved, and to take the monaſtical habit, and to ſpend the remaining part of their lives in that condition. ‘(13) Primus Conſtantinus capitis pœna adulterii crimen vindicandum conſtituit †, . . . Capitalem autem pœnam Juſtinianus in maſculis probat, mulierem verò verberibus cæſam in monaſterium detrudi præcipit, data poteſtate marito intra biennium, ſi hoc exiſtimaverit, eam inde revocandi, quo tranſacto, aut viro præmortuo, eam raſo capite, monaſtico habitu amiciri, & illic omni vitæ tempore manere ‡ jubet. - - - Conſtantine was the firſt who decreed a capital puniſhment for the crime of adultery . . . Juſtinian approved that men ſhould ſuffer death, but that women ſhould be whipped, and then ſhut up in a monaſtery, giving power to their huſbands to take them thence within two years; which if not done, he ordered her to be ſhaved, cloathed in the monaſtic habit, and there to remain during life.’ That ſeverity was abated by degrees, and in ſome provinces (14) an adultereſs was allowed one half of the eſtate purchaſed by her huſband. Pope Honorius III, reformed that ſcandalous cuſtom. ‘Apud Rupellanos . . . jam olim invaluere nonnullæ conſuetudines, quarum duo capita à jure, & honeſtate publica abhorrentia damnavit Honorius III. P. in Epiſtola decretali ad Majorem & Burgenſes de Rupella. Primum fuit . . . . Alterum fuit, ut mulier ob adulterium non amitteret lucrum mediæ partis omnium bonorum per virum quæſitorum conſtante matrimonio: conſuetudinem emendavit Pontifex, quoad proderat mulieribus adulteris (15). - - - With the Rochellers . . . . ſome cuſtoms had long prevailed, of which two that were inconſiſtent with juſtice and common decency, were condemned by Pope Honorius III, in a decretal epiſtle to the magiſtrates and inhabitants of Rochelle. The firſt was . . . . The other was, that a woman for adultery ſhould not loſe her privilege of enjoying half her huſband's eſtate, which was acquired during the marriage. Theſe were aboliſhed by the Pope, as to the privilege of adulterous women.’

It is to be obſerved that the jeſt, mentioned by Menage (16), is faulty, as moſt witty ſayings are: if it be ſtrictly examined, it will be found to imply a falſity; for, in mens opinion, the unfaithfulneſs of a wife is the diſgrace of the huſband. The keeping of a concubine is not liable to ſuch a conſtruction, and does not require that a man ſhould have the ſame regard for her as for a wife; and therefore Sengebere's choice was not attended with like inconveniences, as the jeſter ſuppoſed.

(8) Ibid. p. 58.

(9) Compare what you will find citat. (14) of the article SAINT-CYRE.

(10) Chevr. ibid. pag. 60.

(11) Juven. Sat. II, ver. 37.

(12) The Lex Julia de Adulteriis is aſcribed by ſeveral learned men to Auguſtus and not Julius Cæſar.

(13) Barnabas Briſſonius ad legem Juliam de Adulteriis, pag. 150.

† L. quamvis 2. C. de adulter.

‡ Nov. ut nulli judic.

(14) Rochelle for inſtance.

(15) Alteſerra Rerum Aquitanic. lib. iii, cap. xviii, pag. 227.

(16) I think he repeated it upon another occaſion; for methinks he ſays in another place of the Menagiana (I cannot find the page again) that a gentleman having parted with his wife, and taken a concubine, his man ſaid, Ah ſir, ſince you could not be without a . . . . . why did not you keep your lady?

SENNERTUS (DANIEL)

SENNERTUS (DANIEL) an eminent Phyſician, was born the twenty-fifth of November 1572 at Breſlaw, where his father was a Shoe-maker. He was ſent to the univerſity of Wittemberg in the year 1593, and there made a great progreſs in Philoſophy and Phyſic (a). He viſited the univerſities of Leipſic, Jena, and Francfort upon the Oder, and then went to Berlin in the year 1601, to practiſe Phyſic; he ſtaid not long there but quickly returned to Wittemberg, where he took his degree of Doctor of Phyſic the tenth of September in the ſame year, and at a year's end he was made profeſſor of the ſame faculty: He was the firſt, who introduced the ſtudy of Chymiſtry into that univerſity; and he acquired a great reputation by his works [A], and by his practice [B]. He had three wives, and had no children by the two laſt; but he had ſeven by the firſt. He died of the plague at Wittemberg the twenty-firſt of July 1637 (b). He got ſome adverſaries by the liberty he took to contradict the antients; but none of his opinions was leſs approved than what he advanced concerning the origin of ſouls. He

(a) In ſtudiis philoſophicis eos progreſſus fecit, ut anno 1597 die 3 menſ. Apr. . . laurea philoſophica inter 58 candidatos quarto loco ornatus ſit. Vita Sennerti, in limine Operum.

(b) Taken from his Life, at the beginning of his works. See alſo his funeral Oration ſpoken by Auguſtus Buchnerus. It is in Witte's Memoriæ Medicorum, pag. 88, & ſeq.

[A] He acquired a great reputation by his works.] They are many, and have been often printed in France and Italy. The laſt edition, if I am not miſtaken, is that of Lyons, 1676, it is divided into ſix volumes in folio. The foregoing editions were only divided into three volumes (1).

[B] . . . . and by his practice.] Sick people had recourſe to him from all parts, and he denied no body his aſſiſtance. He took what they gave him for his fees, and exacted nothing; nay, he reſtored to the poor what they gave him (2). The plague raged at Wittemberg above ſeven times whilſt he was a profeſſor in that town; but he never went away, and never refuſed to aſſiſt ſick people. The Elector of Saxony, whom he cured of a great ſickneſs in the year 1628, made him one of his Phyſicians in ordinary, and yet allowed him the liberty of living at Wittemberg. Several dukes, princes, counts, and gentlemen, uſed, with ſucceſs, his advice and preſcriptions in their ſickneſſes. Nicolas Sapieha, great ſtandard-bearer of Lithuania, not knowing what to do to recover his health, applied himſelf to the Phyſicians of Padua. They adviſed him to put himſelf into Sennertus's hands (3). Accordingly he took a journey to Wittemberg, and went home again perfectly recovered. ‘Polonus . . . . non vidit tantum atque coram admiratus SENNERTUM eſt; ſed mactus ingenti beneficio etiam, cùm vidiſſet, diſceſſit. Ut intelligeret, nil ſupra verum narraſſe famam: & pauciora propemodum retuliſſe: expertus noviſſimè opitulatorem feliciſſimum; quem Medicæ eruditionis principem ſalutaverat ante (4). - - - - The Polonian . . . . not only ſaw and admired Sennertus; but after having received wonderful benefit by him, departed, well ſatisfied that fame had not ſaid more, but rather leſs of him than what he deſerved, having found in him a moſt happy aſſiſtance, whom before he had called the prince of Phyſicians.’

(1) See Mercklinus in Lindenio renovato.

(2) Pauperibus honoraria afferentibus ea reſtituit. Vita Sennerti, in limine Operum.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Auguſtus Buchnerus, in Orat. funebri Sennerti, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. p. 97.

He believed that the ſeed of all living creatures is animated [C], and that the ſoul of that [C] He believed that the ſeed of all living creatures was animated.] The difficulties he found in other opinions made him embrace this. The common doctrine of the ſchool-men ſeemed to him abſurd (5), viz. That ſubſtantial forms are not produced; for they ſay, the attribute of being produced belongs to a natural compound, and not to it's parts: He was not ſatisfied with the opinion of Avicenna, that there is a celeſtial intelligence appointed for the formation of ſouls, which makes uſe of ſeeds only as of an inſtrument. ‘ Avicennas animas viventium non à parentibus, ſed à quadam formarum datrice, ſeu ut Scaliger Exerc. 97. loquitur, formarum promaconda intelligentia quam Colcodeam nominat, provenire ſtatuit, docetque cœleſtem hanc mentem uti ſemine tanquam inſtrumento ad producendam animam vegetantem & ſentientem (6). - - - Avicenna maintained, that the ſouls of all things living proceeded not from the parents, but from a certain giver of forms, or, as Scaliger ſpeaketh, from an intelligence which is the diſpenſer, or, as it were, the ſteward of forms, which he called Colcodea ; and he taught, that this celeſtial mind uſed the ſeed as an inſtrument to produce the vegetative and ſenſitive ſouls.’ Nor did he more approve Fernelius's opinion (7), that the heavens form human ſouls, and ſend them into a well prepared matter. He derided, not without reaſon, the common opinion of the ſchool-men, that ſubſtantial forms are taken out of the power of matter, educuntur è potentia materiæ. He rejected the plaſtic virtue, which ſeveral authors have aſcribed to the ſeed (8). He therefore believed that there was a neceſſity to follow the opinion of ſome antient and modern authors, that the ſoul is in the ſeed before the organization, and is that which forms that admirable machine, we call a living body. He quotes (9) two fine paſſages; one out of Galen (10), and the other out of Titelmanus (11), which contain a deſcription of the art that is obſerved in plants and animals. The laſt of theſe two authors takes the uſual way of generations, to be a more amazing thing than the firſt production of animated beings; and indeed, one may more eaſily conceive that GOD immediately produces plants and animals, than one can conceive that the ſeed ſhould have the virtue to produce an organized body, a machine ſo induſtriouſly contrived, that in compariſon of it, all the works of the Mathematicians are but mean and childiſh inventions. ‘ Quod hæc humani corporis diſpoſitio ex operatione eſt virtutis, quæ latet in paterno ſemine (fœdiſſima, & vix nominanda ſubſtantia, quam abſque abominatione nemo conſpicit) quodque in eo tam præclara lateat virtus, corpus tam admirabile ſic efficiendi ac fabricandi, quòd tota iſtius admirabilis diſpoſitionis efficacia in illo realiter inexiſtat, id nobis merito in immenſum aggravat pondus conſiderationis noſtræ, id prorſus ſtupidos & attonitos reddit, cogitque exclamare nos, & voce apertâ confiteri, quod non ſolùm ipſe magnus ſit in ſemetipſo, neque ſolum magnus in magnis, ſed & in abjectiſſimis, contemptibiliſſimiſque & minimis glorioſus (12). - - - - That this diſpoſition of the human body, is, by operation of the power lying concealed in the parent's ſeed, and that ſo excellent a virtue ſhould be therein of making, and framing a body ſo admirable, this does juſtly perplex our conſideration, render us utterly aſtoniſhed, and make us cry out, and plainly confeſs, that he is not only great in himſelf, and his great works, but glorious even in the moſt abject, contemptible, and meaneſt productions.’ Galen could not apprehend what is the ordinary cauſe of ſuch an excellent work; but Sennertus fancies that the ſouls contained in the ſeed have, each of them in it's kind, the faculty and induſtry of the organizing matter. ‘ Etſi vero Galenus cauſſam, unde illa omnia fiant, ſe invenire poſſe deſperavit, nihilque hac in re vel probabile reperire ſe potuiſſe, atque ideò magnâ triſtitia affectum eſſe teſtatur, lib. de fœt. format. cap. 6. tamen ſi conſideraſſet, iſtas operationes animæ cujuſque ſpeciei proprias eſſe, non ita difficulter cognoſcere potuiſſet, ab anima in ſemine latente iſtas operationes provenire (13). - - But altho' Galen deſpaired of ever finding the cauſe of all theſe things, and confeſſeth that he could not, in this matter, diſcover even a probability, for which he was exceedingly grieved, notwithſtanding if he had conſidered that theſe operations are proper to the ſoul of every ſpecies, he might, without ſuch difficulty, have perceived, that theſe operations proceed from the ſoul, which lies concealed in the ſeed.’ I had rather ſay, as Galen does, that we are altogether in the dark about it, than aſcribe to a ſoul, hid in a ſmall egg, the ability that is requiſite to form the body of an ant, the body of a chicken, &c. Sennertus does very well confute the hypotheſes different from his; but he admits of certain things, which cannot be underſtood. He ſays (14), that human ſouls have no quantity, and that they are indiviſible, and yet that each of them can produce it's kind; that is, that the ſoul of a dog can produce many other ſouls of dogs. This would be a true creation, and a more difficult work than the converſion of the ſeed into an organized body. Had he known the hypotheſis, which has been invented ſince he he died, I believe he would have heartily embraced it; it is the hypotheſis mentioned by me before (15), which has afforded many fine hints to the illuſtrious Mr Leibniz: It is that of modern Natural Philoſophers, who having diſcovered, with the help of microſcopes, that there are animals in the ſeed, think that living bodies are organized before they are born, and probably from the beginning of all things. Which leads them to this thought, That ever ſince the firſt original of things, the ſouls have been united to the ſame organized bodies, and that generation or birth is only the extenſion or growth of the individuum, which is the primitive and continual ſubject of the ſoul; that this ſubject is not deſtroyed by death; that it loſes only the particles of matter wherewith it was enlarged; that it recovers new ones in another birth, &c. This hypotheſis removes the great difficulties that occur in aſſigning the cauſe of organization. To have recourſe to GOD as to the immediate cauſe, is not to philoſophize. To have recourſe to the general laws of the communication of motion is but a poor ſolution; for ſince it is agreed by all ſects, that thoſe laws cannot produce, I will not ſay a mill, or a clock, but the coarſeſt tool that is in a Smith's ſhop, how ſhall they be able to produce the body of a dog, or even a roſe and a pomegranate? To have recourſe to the celeſtial bodies, or to ſubſtantial forms, is a pitiful ſhift. We want, in this caſe, a cauſe which has an idea of it's work, and knows how to form it: thoſe two things are requiſite in thoſe who make a watch, and build a ſhip; much more are they neceſſary in the cauſe of the organization of living bodies. It is certain the celeſtial bodies have no idea of a human body, and that they know not how it ought to be formed. The Peripatetics own that the ſubſtantial forms of plants and beaſts know not how matter ought to be modified, to give it the organs that are in a tree or in a chicken; and therefore they are not the cauſe of that organization. Thoſe who ſay they are the cauſe of it, tho' they know not the contrivance of that work, are a thouſand times more abſurd than thoſe, who ſhould ſay that a man can make a clock without thinking of it, without having even had any idea of it, and without knowing what he does, or what he deſigns. This objection ſhews the falſity of Sennertus's opinion; for he would not have ſaid that the ſouls he admitted in the ſeed of plants and animals, had an idea of all the organs of plants and animals, and knew how to frame and place them in their proper places. And therefore it had been a great help to him, if he had been told that there are organized individuums in the ſeed; for it is more eaſy to conceive that a ſoul united to ſuch individuum's may be the cauſe of their growth, than it is to apprehend that it can organize a drop of liquor, and change it into the body of a dog.

WHETHER the general laws of motion are ſufficient for the organization of bodies.

I know ſome underſtanding men, who pretend to comprehend that the general laws of the communication of motion, tho' never ſo ſimple and ſo few, are ſufficient to make a fœtus grow, provided it be already organized. But I confeſs my own weakneſs; I cannot well apprehend it. It ſeems to me, that a ſmall organized atom cannot become a chicken, a dog, a calf, &c. unleſs an intelligent cauſe directs the motion of the matter that makes it grow; a cauſe, I ſay, which has an idea of that little machine, and knows how to extend and increaſe it according to it's due proportions. I think it will be granted me, that it is not more eaſy to conceive that the laws of motion may be the only cauſe of the building of a little houſe; than

(5) Toletus, Conimbricenſes, & alii, apud Sennertum de Generat. viventium, cap. i, pag. 123, Tom. i, Edit. Lugd. 1676.

(6) Sennert. ibid. cap. ii.

(7) Fernelius, lib. i, de abdit. rerum cauſis pluribus in locis, acriter defendit omnem animam à cœlo proficiſci, & à cœlo animam omnem in materiam præparatam & idoneam immitti, Id. ibid. pag. 124.

(8) Vide Jacobum Schegkium, lib. i, de plaſt. ſeminis facultate, apud Sennert. Ibid. cap. v, pag. 127.

(9) Ibid. p. 130.

(10) Galen. lib. iii, de Uſu Part. cap. x.

(11) Franc. Titelmanus, lib. viii, Phyſ. cap. xi.

(12) Titelmanus, ibid. apud Sennertum, de Generat. vivent. cap. i, pag. 130, Tom. i.

(13) Sennert. ibid.

(14) Sennert. ibid. pag. 132, col. 1, 2.

(15) In the article RORARIUS remark [H].

that ſeed produces organization. He was accuſed of blaſphemy and impiety on pretence that he taught that the ſouls of beaſts are not material [D]; which was ſuppoſed to be the ſame thing as if he had taught that they are no leſs immortal than thoſe of men. He than it is to conceive, that they can change it into a large palace, in which each room, each door, each window, &c. keep the ſame proportions obſerved by the builder of the little houſe (16). If thoſe two things are equally difficult, why ſhould we believe that the laws of motion, which cannot organize a ſmall particle of matter, will be able, if it be organized, to change it into an animal a thouſand times bigger, all the proportions being duly obſerved in an almoſt infinite number of organs of different nature; ſome of which are ſoft, others fluid, others hard, &c.? I ſhould therefore think it probable that the growth of a fœtus, tho' organized ever ſince the beginning of the world, is directed by a particular cauſe, which has an idea of that work, and knows how to enlarge it; as an Architect has an idea of a building, and knows how to enlarge it, when he executes a plan ready made, which he lays upon his table. A great many people will grant me that animals have their parts unfolded in the womb; that they are there nouriſhed; and receive their growth by the direction of a providence; but they will ſay that GOD directs all thoſe things (17). I declare to them that they go from the queſtion; for we do not enquire here into the firſt cauſe, the general author of all things; we enquire into the ſecond cauſe, and the particular reaſon of each effect. To aſſign no other cauſe than GOD in this enquiry, does not become a Philoſopher. Tell me, I pray, ſuppoſe there were rational inhabitants in the planets, and they ſhould come down into one of our houſes, and diſcover the uſe of rooms, of windows, of bolts, &c. and at laſt they ſhould be contented to admire the providence of GOD, who has raiſed ſuch a convenient building for men, would they not be rightly accounted ignorant? They would not know that this houſe was built by men, and that a human Architect directed the ſituation of the ſtones, boards, &c. according to the uſes he deſigned them for. It is true, man receives that knowledge from GOD; but GOD is not the next, natural, and immediate cauſe of that building. The ſame ought to be ſaid of the machine of trees and animals, they depend upon the particular direction of ſome ſecond cauſe, which has received from GOD the knowledge and induſtry that are requiſite for ſuch a work. The difficulty lies in aſſigning that ſecond cauſe. Some will have it that the ſubſtantial form of each mixed body is a ſpirit, on which GOD has beſtowed the knowledge that is neceſſary to produce the temper, and effects, of that mixed body (18). Dr Henry More, who believed the pre-exiſtence of ſouls (19), was of opinion, that being united to matter, they themſelves frame an organized body to reſide in it. That hypotheſis may be confuted by our ignorance of what ought to be done, in order to put together nerves, veins, bones, &c. It might be anſwered, that the ſoul forgets all thoſe ideas, as ſoon as her lodging is finiſhed, becauſe the coarſeneſs of the organs of a human body breaks the communication ſhe had before with very ſubtile occaſional cauſes. But I had rather ſuppoſe that the ſoul itſelf does not direct the motions neceſſary for the growth of it's own fœtus; I had rather aſcribe that direction to another ſpirit. If any one had a mind to rectify the ſuppoſitions of Avicenna (20), he might ſay that there is a created intelligence, which preſides over the organization of animals, and makes, as it were, a kind of a general manufacture of them; that it has an infinite number of workers under it's direction, ſome for the bodies of birds, others for the bodies of fiſhes, &c. juſt as in our towns we ſee great variety of tradeſmen; ſome make watches, others make cloaths, &c.

[D] He was accuſed . . . . . of impiety, becauſe he taught that the ſouls of beaſts are not material.] He rejects (21) the opinion of thoſe, who maintain that they are not of a more noble nature than the elements; and he ſays, that they are by their nature as immortal as the ſouls of men; ſo that if the latter do not periſh with their bodies, as the others do, it is through a ſpecial favour of the Creator (22). He could not deny that he aſcribed an incorporeal nature to the ſouls of beaſts; for he acknowledged that they are not produced from matter, and he laughed at the ſchoolmens eduction: but he would not ſay that they are immortal. Freitag (23), who writ againſt him with great fury, did not fail to object to him that his doctrine was impious and blaſphemous: which was the reaſon why a book was publiſhed (24) in his vindication with this title. De origine & natura animarum in brutis ſententiæ clariſſ. Theologorum in aliquot Germaniæ Academiis, quibus ſimul Daniel Sennertus à crimine blaſphemiæ & hæreſeos à Joh. Freitagio ipſi intentato abſolvitur. Freitag giving the alarm, applied himſelf to all the univerſities in Chriſtendom, and to all the lovers of orthodoxy, earneſtly exhorting them not to ſuffer thoſe pernicious innovations. He aſked the Divines, whether they would bear that impious opinion, which aſcribed immortality to the ſouls of beaſts, which revived the doctrine of the Tranſmigration of ſouls, &c. ‘Admittent ne Theologi impiam illam de actu formarum entitativo, quo animis brutorum talis aſſignatur eſſentia & ſubſtantia, quâ extrà propriam quam informant materiam, alibi ſubſiſtere & exiſtere poſſint, opinionem? quâ Metempſychoſis reducitur, Palingeneſia adſtruitur, & pecudum animabus immortalitas comparatur. Ferentne commentum de generatione formarum corruptibilium ex nihilo, è diametro ſacræ ſcripturæ adverſum & inimicum (25) - - - - - Will Divines agree to that impious opinion concerning the eſſential act of forms, whereby ſuch an eſſence and ſubſtance is aſcribed to the ſouls of beaſts, that they can ſubſiſt and exiſt ſeparate from their proper matter which they inform? whereby the tranſmigration of ſouls is revived, their regeneration eſtabliſhed, and immortality attributed to the ſouls of brutes. Can they bear the fiction concerning the production of corruptible forms from nothing, diametrically oppoſite and contrary to the ſacred Scripture?’ He ſuppoſes that the greateſt part of the profeſſors of Wittemberg were willing to ſtifle thoſe monſters, but that the great intereſt of their colleague prevented their riſing up againſt him. Non ignoro Reverendos & celeberrimos Theologiæ in Academiâ Witebergicâ Profeſſores, cæteroſque Clariſſimos Profeſſores & Philoſophos, paucis de fæce Sennertiana, qui ab ipſius auſpiciis dependent, & ſputa Sennerti lingunt, quod ejus promotione gaudeant, exceptis, non tantum diſſentire, ſed & omni conatu id velle, ut errores hi in ipſâ herbâ ſupprimantur, verùm ita cohiberi quod adverſus iſtum Væjovem Sennertum magnatum quorundam favore fultum ſubnixumque vix mutire & hiſcere auſint (26). Sennertus complained that Freitag imputed to him ſuch conſequences as he did not acknowledge. ‘Malitia verò eſt, ſays he (27), quòd paſſim opiniones mihi affingit, quæ mihi nunquam in mentem venerunt. Inter quas non poſtrema eſt, quòd ſcribit, me ſtatuere beſtialium animarum immortalitatem. Pro bono Viro Freitagium non habebo, donec monſtraverit locum, in quo ſtatuerim, animam canis, equi, bovis, leonis, anſeris, anatis, corvi, & ſimilium brutorum eſſe immortales, & poſt mortem ſupereſſe. Conſequentiæ verò, quibus id è meis opinionibus extorquere vult, nullæ ſunt. Etſi enim inſectorum, & ſponte natorum formæ corpore organico ad ſenſum diſſoluto in materia inſtar ſeminis ſeſe habente aliquandiu conſiſtere poſſint: tamen immortales non ſunt, ſed ſuo tempore abolentur. Neque ideò animæ brutorum ſunt immortales, quia ex nihilo à Deo creatæ ſunt. Neque enim immobilis, ut putat regula eſt, quod aliquid quod ſemel fuit, in nihilum redigi nequeat. Longe rectiùs J. C. Scaliger, exerc. 307. ſect. 20. ſcribit, &c. - - - But it is from malice, that he every where imputes to me opinions which never came into my mind. Among which it is not the leaſt, that I maintain the immortality of the ſouls of brutes. I ſhall not take Freitagius for a good man until he point out the place, in which I have affirmed, that the ſoul of a dog, horſe, ox, lion, gooſe, duck, raven, and the like brutes, are immortal, and remain after death. And there are no conſequences whereby that can be extorted from my opinions. For altho' the forms of inſects, and things beginning naturally, the organical body, as to ſenſe, being diſſolved, may, for ſome time, remain in a matter reſembling ſeed: yet they are not immortal, but periſh in their uſual time. Neither are the ſouls of brutes therefore immortal, be-

---

(16) Note, that I own there is this difference between the enlarging of a houſe and the growth of a fœtus, that the organs of a fœtus are moulds, thro' which a new matter may be filtrated and diſtributed. A little houſe has no ſuch thing.

(17) Alphonſus Caranza, a Spaniſh Civilian, in the firſt chapter of his tract De partu natur. & legitimo, having rejected all the cauſes that are alledged of the formation of our bodies, aſcribes it to God. Sennertus, ubi ſupra, cap. xii, p. 144. confutes him.

(18) See remark [M], of the article MORIN (J. BAPT.)

(19) Henr. Morus, de Anima, lib. ii, cap. iv.

(20) See above citation (6).

(21) Sennert, ubi ſupra, cap. ix, pag. 137.

(22) Abs qua divina voluntate & peculiari erga homines gratia ſi fuiſſet, formæ humanæ non minus perituræ eſſent quam brutorum. Ibid. cap. xiv, p. 147.

(23) A Phyſician and profeſſor of Philoſophy at Groningen.

(24) At Francfort 1638, in 8*vo*, See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 237.

(25) Joh. Freitagius, in Apolog. ad Orbis Chriſtiani Academias, p. 18. It is prefixed to the book intituled, Novæ Sectæ Sennerto Paracelſicæ recens in Philoſophiam & Medicinam introductæ, quâ antiquæ veritatis oracula, & Ariſtotelicæ ac Galenicæ doctrinæ fundamenta convellere & ſtirpitus eruderare moliuntur novatores, Detectio & ſolida Refutatio, printed at Amſterdam 1637, in 8*vo*.

(26) Joh. Freitag. in Apolog. ad Orbis Chriſtiani Academias, pag. 18.

(27) Sennertus, Epiſt. ad Joh. Sperlingen, in Libro cui Titulus, Defenſio Tractatus de origine formarum pro D. Daniele Sennerto, contra D. Johannem Freitag. Auctore M. Johanne Sperlingen, Phyſ. Prof. P. at Wittemberg. 1638, in 8*vo*.

He rejected that conſequence; he durſt not ſay, as others do, that the ſouls of brutes ſubſiſt after the death of the ſubjects which they had animated [E]. His opinion about the ‘ cauſe they are created of nothing by GOD. For it is ‘ not, as he thinks, an unchangeable rule, that any thing ‘ which once exiſted, cannot be reduced to nothing. Much ‘ better does J. C. Scaliger write, &c.’ It is not impoſſible but that Sennertus, tho’ a man of great parts, might not perceive that the conſequences aſcribed to him, did naturally reſult from his principle; but it is ſtill more likely that he perceived them, but durſt not own them, propter metum Judæorum, - - for fear of his enemies. And therefore he rather choſe, by diſowning theſe conſequences, to be accounted a man, who did not argue well, and propoſed a confuſed ſyſtem, than to expoſe himſelf to all the conſequences of the doctrine of the immortality of beaſts. However it be, any Philoſopher, who pretends to argue conſequentially, will always chuſe rather to ſay, that he knows not what the ſouls of beaſts are, than to maintain, on the one ſide, that they are produced out of nothing, independently upon matter, and on the other, that they are not created beings, and that they are annihilated as ſoon as the brute ceaſes to live. Such was the confuſed opinion of Sennertus. His apologiſt (28) poſitively declares, that the ſouls of beaſts are made out of nothing, and yet that they are not produced by creation. He quotes Dannhawerus (29), who alledged the ſpecies intellectuales, to ſhew whatever is made out of nothing, is not a created being. He quotes Thummius (30), who alledged the habits of the ſoul to prove the ſame thing. Thus the Peripatetics elude every thing with arguments ad hominem. Freitag does continually object to Sennertus, that he believes the immortality of the ſouls of beaſts; he falls into a Poetical enthuſiaſm to exhort all manner of beaſts to ſhout with joy and triumph; he pretends that our Phyſician revives the idle fancies of Paracelſus, who taught, that all ſouls returned again into the world from time to time. ‘ Plaudite ait, oves & ‘ & boves, lupi & ſcarabæi, & veſpæ & quicquid ‘ uſpiam crabronum eſt.

Vita equidem veſtris animis à funere reſtat,
  Reſtat & in corpus poſſe redire novum.
Fœlices animæ quod ubivis eſſe poteſtis,
  Dum triplicis mundi flamma reſolvat opus.
Dicite quæ vobis ſtatio & fortuna ſuperſit,
  Cum ruat in priſcum machina trina Chaos?

‘ Subjicit. Hi ſcilicet ſunt fructus floreſque novæ ‘ doctrinæ à Paracelſo profectæ, quam Chriſtiani etiam ‘ (proh pudor!) ferè amplecti non erubeſcunt, qua ‘ ſtatuitur formas rerum præter humanam corruptibilium, officio informationis functas, eſſentiam & ‘ exiſtentiam ſuam ſervare, ubi Paracelſus addit eas ire ‘ ad Orcum & Iliadum ſuum, & quotannis aut certis ‘ temporibus redire in mundi theatrum, & aſſumpto ‘ fabricatoque corpore perſonam ſuam pro ævo ſibi ‘ deſtinato ſuſtinere, eaque depoſitâ viciſſim ad ſuos ‘ ibi avos & proavos immortali quiete beatos redire (31). - - - - Rejoice, ſays he, ye ſheep and oxen, ‘ wolves and beetles, waſps and all hornets. Your ‘ ſouls live after death, and may return into a new body. ‘ Happy ſouls! that may be where you will, whilſt ‘ flames conſume the triple world. Say what place and ‘ fortune you can have, when the threefold machine ‘ ſhall tumble into it’s antient chaos. He adds. Thoſe, ‘ forſooth, are the fruits and flowers of the new doctrine ‘ of Paracelſus, which even Chriſtians, alas! are not ‘ aſhamed to embrace, which teaches, that beſides the ‘ human ſoul, the forms of things periſhable do preſerve ‘ their eſſence and exiſtence, where Paracelſus adds, ‘ that they go into their place of reception, and yearly, ‘ or at certain times, return upon the ſtage of the world, ‘ and having aſſumed and framed a body, act their part ‘ for the time appointed, and quitting it again, return to ‘ their grandfathers and anceſtors happy in an immortal ‘ reſt.’ Sperlingen anſwers in few words, That it is neither his nor Sennertus’s doctrine (32): He therefore tacitly confeſſes, that they know not how to draw from a principle the conſequences ariſing from it, and that they aſcribe a very ſtrange conduct to GOD, viz. That he has ordered an almoſt infinite number of incorporeal ſubſtances to be created, which he is to abolish and annihilate in a ſhort time after. Heat produces every year an infinite number of little animals, which live no longer than the heat laſts. What diſorder is it in nature, that ſo many ſpiritual ſouls ſhould be annihilated, becauſe there happens ſome alteration in the organs of animals? It is to be obſerved that the ſchool Philoſophers have uſed againſt the Carteſians the ſame cunning which Dannhawerus and Thummius did uſe. They brought in ſome inſtances to ſhew, that ſome things are produced out of nothing, and yet are not properly created. The accidents of matter afforded them thoſe inſtances; but the Carteſians anſwered, that thoſe accidents are not beings diſtinct from the ſubject which they modify: and therefore the arguments made uſe of to prove that ſubſtantial forms would be created beings, cannot be retorted. The Carteſians reduce all the alterations of matter to local motion, and maintain that the motion of a body is the body itſelf, as it receives exiſtence with new relations. They muſt therefore acknowledge that matter, conſidered as being in motion, is created, and that GOD alone can produce motion; for none but GOD can create. This might paſs, if the ſchoolmen had not recourſe to other examples; but they aſk whether the free acts of a man’s ſoul are diſtinct from the ſoul. If they are diſtinct from it, they are beings produced out of nothing, and yet not created; nothing then hinders but it may be ſaid that ſubſtantial forms are not created. If they are not diſtinct from it, a man’s ſoul, conſidered as willing a ſin, is created: and therefore it is not the ſoul that forms that act of her will; for ſince it is not diſtinct from the ſubſtance of the ſoul, and ſhe cannot be the cauſe of her own exiſtence, it plainly follows, that ſhe cannot be the cauſe of any of her thoughts. She is not therefore anſwerable for willing ill things hic & nunc, no more than for exiſting hic & nunc. The Carteſians know not how to anſwer that objection: the perplexity they are in brings in again the doctrine of ſubſtantial forms, and all the chimera’s of the ſchools, becauſe the arguments alledged by them prove too much. Such is the fate of diſputes: they ſpring again out of their own aſhes; the party ready to lay down their arms find at laſt ſome retorſion, whereby they recover their ſtrength, and the ground they had loſt, and diſpute it as before.

[E] He durſt not ſay, as others do, that the ſouls of brutes ſubſiſt after the death of the ſubjects which they had animated.] Joannes Scotus Erigena maintained not only that they are not material, but alſo that they continue to live after the death of the brutes. John Lippius, profeſſor of Divinity at Straſbourg taught the ſame thing (33). Dr Henry More, a Cambridge Divine, aſſerts, that they ſubſiſt out of the body, and thinks it probable enough that they continue to live in that ſtate, but dares not affirm it; only he alledges the reaſons pro and con (34). I have verified what a profeſſor of Leipſic aſcribes to him (35). Morus & ſuperſtites (animas brutorum) & in corpora alia remeare tradit, cap. 5. (36). That profeſſor tells us a curious thing, viz. That a certain man had taught, a few years before, that if man had not ſinned, brutes had never died, and that they ſhall be raiſed with men, to be tranſported into Heaven: which is the opinion of the Turks. Abſurdiſſime omnium M. B. Semigentilis & ſemi Chriſtianus ante paucos annos cum monſtroſis opinionibus aliis etiam hanc protulit, bruta niſi peccaviſſet homo, moritura non fuiſſe, atque eadem tamen licet nunc moriantur, cum hominibus olim reſuſcitanda, & ab hoc centro mundi ad liberiora cœli ſpatia transferenda; quod ſomnium olim Muhammedis à Turcis hodie credi, teſtis eſt Joh. Andreas in libro de Confuſione Sectæ Muhammeticæ (37). He obſerves, that according to Taurellus, the ſouls of beaſts are ſpiritual, and yet die with their bodies (38). Perhaps Taurellus argued inconſiſtently for fear of expoſing himſelf; he rather choſe to prejudice his reaſon than his fortune. Or perhaps he and Sennertus came to believe, out of a principle of religion, that GOD deſtroys the ſouls of beaſts, that none might ſubſiſt for ever but thoſe of men. Perhaps this was the opinion of the moſt eminent Rabbi that hath flouriſhed in the XVIIth century; for endeavouring to prove that the ſouls the cauſe of metals and minerals was ſomewhat ſingular ; he believed they were formed by intelligent and ſpiritual Beings [F].

---

(28) Sperlingen, pag. 182, of the book, the title of which I have juſt now ſet down,

(29) Dannhawerus, in Collegio Pſych. Diſput. VI.

(30) Thummius, in Diſputat. de traduce.

(31) Sperlingen, Defenſio Tractatus, &c, p. 206, 207.

(32) Mendacium eſt, brutorum animas nobis immortales & poſt mortem ſuperſtites eſſe. Mendacium eſt, nobis animas illas ubique eſſe, & abſque omni in mundo vagari materia. Mendacium eſt, nobis ortum ac interitum hominum & brutorum unum eundemque eſſe. Mendacium eſt, nobis bruta & homines formâ ſimiles & materiâ pares eſſe. Ibid. pag. 210.

(33) Subſtantiam incorpoream docuerunt Joannes Scotus Erigena, lib. iii, de diviſione naturæ, n. 41 . . . . Joan. Lippius . . . . in Metaphyſica magna lib. ii, cap. i, pag. 386 . . . . ille, adverſus Baſilium & Gregorium Nyſſenum diſputans, vitam ſeparatas à corpore non amittere; hic, quoque ſejunctas in aëre exiſtere atque modo aliquo operari opinatur, forte cum univerſo olim in nihilum redigendas. Joan. Cyprianus, Hiſtor. Animal. Continuat. pag. 24.

(34) Henr. Morus, de Anima. lib. ii, cap. vi, num. 105, pag. m. 106.

(35) Joan. Cyprianus, ubi ſupra.

(36) He ſhould have added lib. ii, pag. 90.

(37) Cyprian. Hiſt. Animal. Continuat. pag. 24.

(38) Subſtantiam incorpoream docuerunt . . . . Nicolaus Taurellus . . . . . in libello de vita & morte quæſt. altera, propoſit. IV. . . . . brutorum animas à morte ſupereſſe negat. Id. ibid.

ſouls of brutes do not ſubſiſt after this life, as mens ſouls do, he does not alledge any reaſon taken from the internal conſtitution, or from the eſſence of thoſe ſouls. He merrily thus argues : We often dream, ſays he, that we ſee people that are deceaſed ; but we never ſee in a dream any animal after it's death, tho' it has been familiarly bred in our houſes. Spizelius has reaſon to reject this Logic, he ſhould likewiſe have denied the fact. A great many people may diſprove the Rabbi ; they dream a thouſand times of their dead dogs and horſes. Satis ineptè Menaſſe Ben Iſrael lib. I. de Reſurr. Mort. cap. IX. contendit, Animam hominum, non brutorum eſſe ſuperſtitem ex eo, quod ſæpe de illis ſomniemus qui jam diu è vita exceſſere, nunquam tamen ſomniemus de ulla beſtia, quæ mortua ſit, etiamſi nobis familiaris ac domeſtica fuerit (39). Obſerve, that the pretended blaſphemies charged upon Sennertus, by a Phyſician and profeſſor of Philoſophy at Groningen, were not looked upon as an ill doctrine by the German Divines. ‘ Non negandum eſt, poſt Franzii librum hunc (40) aliquoties editum Theologos Lipſienſes, Roſtochienſes, Baſileenſes, Regiomontanos quinquagintâ abhinc annis de animâ beſtiarum interrogatos, inclinaſſe magis in Danielis Sennerti opinionem, cui aſſerenti animas brutorum olim ex nihilo creatas, & hodie etiam alterius quam elementaris naturæ eſſe, blaſphemiam & hæreſim Johannes Freitagius Profeſſor Medicus Groningæ intentaverat. Enim verò & eoſdem nominatos Theologos legimus in Reſponſis ſuis candide diſceptationem de naturâ elementari ejus animæ à ſe ad Philoſophos devolviſſe, eorumque libertati permiſiſſe (41). - - - It is not to be denied, that after ſome editions of this book of Franzius, the Divines of Leipſic, Reſtock, Baſil, Konigſberg, and others, being about fifty years ſince conſulted about the ſoul of beaſts, inclined more to the opinion of Daniel Sennertus, whom John Freitag, Profeſſor of Medicine at Groningen, had charged with blaſphemy and hereſy, for aſſerting that the ſouls of beaſts were at firſt created of nothing, and even at this day are not of an elementary nature. For we read that theſe ſame Divines did fairly refer to the Philoſophers the controverſy concerning the elementary nature of theſe ſouls, leaving them to their freedom of thought therein.’

I ſhall make a reflexion before I conclude this remark. Tho' Sennertus was pleaſed to ſay, that the ſouls of brutes do not ſubſiſt after this life, as human ſouls do, he laid down a doctrine, whereby it plainly appears, that the ſouls of beaſts are of the ſame ſpecies with thoſe of men. The difference of their fate, as to duration, does not proceed from the difference of their perfections, but from the free will of the ſupreme maſter, who is a cauſe wholly external. Medals and money, which princes order to be ſtamped, are an image of the conduct which that Phyſician aſcribes to GOD. Medals are ſtamped to laſt for ever : money is coined to laſt till a new order to the contrary ; for after a certain time it is cried down, and melted, and converted into other forms : and medals and money are made of the ſame metal. According to Sennertus, a human ſoul is like medals, and the ſoul of a brute is like money. This is a dangerous opinion ; it would follow from thence, that we cannot be ſure of the immortality of our ſouls but by revelation. Honoratus Fabri, the Jeſuit, who uſes Sennertus with the utmoſt contempt, and taxes him with grounding his doctrine upon frivolous objections and anſwers, maintains that this opinion is ſomewhat impious (42). ‘ Ad rationes n. 2. & 3. adductas nonnulla reponit, (Sennertus, Hypomen. 4. c. 10.) quæ nemo ſapiens refellere dignetur : v. g. vult, animam rationalem ex natura & indole ſua immortalem non eſſe, ſed tantum ex voluntate ac decreto Dei ; ſed contrarium demonſtravi, & hoc nonnihil impietatis ſapit : præterea vult ſemen deciſum divina benedictione carere, ac proinde animam, quæ ipſi inerat, interire ; ſi hæ nugæ non ſint, nuſquam invenies . . . . . Denique quod adducit ex ſcriptura creſcite & multiplicamini . . . . (43) pluſquam inane eſt . . . . ſed hæc mittamus, ſinamuſque hominem, ut egregium medicum, ita vix mediocrem Philoſophum, & prorſus Catholicum (44). - - - - To the reaſons mentioned n. 2. and 3. Sennertus gives ſome anſwers, which no wiſe man would vouchſafe to refute ; for inſtance, he ſays, the rational ſoul is not, of it's proper nature and diſpoſition, immortal, but only by the will and decree of GOD ; but I have demonſtrated the contrary, and it ſavours ſomewhat of impiety : moreover, he will have the ſeparated ſeed to be without the divine benediction, and therefore the ſoul which was in it dies ; if this is not trifling, nothing is. . . . Finally, what he brings from Scripture, be fruitful and multiply . . . . is moſt inſignificant . . . . . but we will let theſe things paſs, and let the man alone, who though an excellent Phyſician, was ſcarcely an indifferent Philoſopher, and altogether uncatholic.' But notwithſtanding his great contempt for the Philoſophy of that Phyſician, he takes his objections againſt the common opinion of the ſchool-men, concerning the ſouls of brutes, to be unanſwerable. He forſakes theſe men, and all the hypotheſes oppoſed by Sennertus ; and all that he ſays comes to this, that the ſouls of beaſts are not produced anew, that they are not abſolute beings, but a reſultance of a certain mixture of the four elements (45). This is an abſurd opinion, which would lead us to ſay the ſame thing of human ſouls.

[F] He believed that metals are formed by intelligent and ſpiritual Beings.] He did not ſay what his antagoniſt imputed to him, that a ſtone produced another ſtone, and a piece of gold another piece of the ſame metal ; but he ſaid that ſome ſpirits, whoſe abode was unknown to him, and who keep only in certain places, inſinuate themſelves into mines and quarries, and there produce the ſeveral ſorts of foſſiles that are to be found in them. Let us ſee how he expreſſes himſelf : he invented not this opinion ; many learned men have had the ſame thought. ‘ Malitioſè & illud mihi affingit ; quaſi ſtatuam in lib. de conſenſ. & diſſenſ. cap. 9. quod lapis lapidem, gemma gemmam, metallum metallum generet. Neque enim tam ſtultus ſum, ut credam, hunc adamantem, hanc cryſtallum, hoc aurum generare alium adamantem, aliam cryſtallum, aliud aurum, ſicut planta una aliam, aut bos bovem (hæc enim generatio ſolum viventium eſt) generat. Hæc verò mea, Anſhelmi Boëtii, & aliorum doctorum Virorum mens eſt, omnia metalla, lapides, gemmas, quæ hactenus è terra eruta ſunt, & adhuc eruuntur, omnia in prima creatione ſecundum individua creata non eſſe, ſed fodinas gemmarum & metallorum quod alleg. loc. pluribus hiſtoriis probavi, iterum repleri : & eſſe quoſdam ſpiritus formam architectonicam metallorum & gemmarum in ſe continentes, qui in terra, quiſque ſecundum ſuam ſpeciem, producant metalla, lapides, gemmas, iiſque figuram, colorem, & alia propria accidentia tribuant, & hos ſpiritus in fodinas & matrices gemmarum & metallorum ſeſe diffundere, atque iſta metalla & gemmas producere. Idque eſſe formas metallorum multiplicari, dixi. E quibus autem ſedibus & locis ſpiritus illi proveniant, nobis ignotum eſt, utpote ignorantibus quænam globi terreni in terra conſtitutio ſit. Hoc certum eſt, ſpiritus iſtos non ubivis terrarum reperiri, ſed in quibuſdam ſaltem locis (46). - - - - He maliciouſly alſo and falſly repreſents me ; as if I had ſaid, that a ſtone generates a ſtone, a metal a metal. For I am not ſo fooliſh as to believe, that this diamond, this cryſtal, this gold, begets another diamond, another cryſtal, another gold, as one plant produces another plant, or one bull another ; for this manner of production is only of things that have life. But this is not my opinion only, but is alſo that of Anſhelm, Boëtius, and of other learned men, that all metals, ſtones, gems, which hitherto have been, and ſtill are, dug out of the earth, were not every individual formed at the firſt creation, but that the mines of gems and metals, are again repleniſhed, as I have proved in the places above-mentioned by many Hiſtories : and that there are certain ſpirits that have in them the architectonic forming of metals, and gems, which produce in the earth, every one according to it's ſpecies, metals, ſtones, gems, and give them figure, colour, and other proper accidents ; and that theſe ſpirits diffuſe themſelves into the mines and veins of gems and metals, which there they produce. And this, I ſaid, was to multiply forms of metals : but from what ſeats or places theſe ſpirits come, is to us unknown, being ignorant of the internal conſtitution of the terreſtrial globe. This is certain, that theſe ſpirits are not be found every where, but

---

(39) Spizelius, in Scrutinio Atheiſmi, pag. 125.

(40) That is, Hiſtoria Animalium ſacra, written by Wolfgang Franzius Doctor of Divinity, where theſe words are to be found, cap. ii, pag. m. 14. Sciendum eſt animum bruti non eſſe ſpiritum incorporeum, qualis eſt noſtra mens inviſiblis & immortalis, alias quoque bruta eſſent immortalia.

(41) Joh. Cyprianus, ubi ſupra, pag. 27.

(42) Honoratus Fabri, de Generat. Hominis, lib. vii, Propoſit. L, pag. 535, Edit. Norimberg. 1677.

(43) He ſays in another place, Bonus Sennertus fruſtra ſe torquet & recurrit ad ſuum Creſcite & multiplicamini ; fruſtra alios ignorantiæ accuſat, rerum iſtarum Philoſophicarum ſatis imperitus. Idem. lib. v, de Gener. Animal. Propoſit. lxvi, pag. 178.

(44) I think it ſhould be Acabolicum.

(45) See his fifth book, de Generat. Animalium, Propoſit. lvi, & ſeq. pag. 164, & ſeq.

(46) Daniel Sennertus, Epiſtola ad Joh. Sperlingen : It is in Sperlingen's tract intituled, Defenſio Tractatus de origine formarum.

‘ only in certain places.’ This ſeems to be abſurd; but if it be conſidered, 1. That a good Philoſopher muſt aſſign another cauſe of the phænomena than God's will. 2. That neither the earth, nor the elementary qualities of foſſils, nor their ſubſtantial forms, ſeem capable of any effect, that requires a certain diſpoſition of parts, a choice, a knowledge of what is proper: I ſay, if this be conſidered, and beſides that one cannot apprehend that the laws of motion ſhould be able to place the particles of matter exactly as they ought to be in order to make gold, a diamond, an emerald, &c. or to chuſe thoſe that are fit for it, that opinion of Sennertus ſeems to have ſome probability in it (47). Can the virtues of bodies, and the general laws of motion, make any thing in our ſhops and laboratories without our direction? Could they make a ſhoe, a glove, a needle, if men did not meddle with them? How then can one believe that they produce, without any direction, a vaſt number of things, a thouſand times more difficult than our clocks?

(47) Compare what is ſaid remark [M] of the article MORINUS, (J. BAPT.)

SENNERTUS (ANDREW) profeſſor of the oriental languages in the univerſity of Wittemberg his birth-place, publiſhed a great many books [A], which ſhew, that he learnedly and worthily diſcharged the duties of his profeſſorſhip. He exerciſed it fifty one years (a), and died the twenty-ſecond of December 1689 (b), being eighty-four years of age. He learned the Arabic tongue of Golius at Leyden, and found out a very good method to teach it (c). Dr Pocock, who underſtood it admirably well, gave him that encomium (d). He was commended for ſeveral other things in his funeral oration, and particularly for this, that the purity of his morals, and the temperance always viſible in his conduct, procured him the advantage of attaining to a great old age, with the vigor of body and mind, that is neceſſary to bear the fatigues of ſtudy, and the cares of a profeſſor (e).

(a) Witte, Diar. Biograph. Tom. ii, pag. 172.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Conradus Samuel Schurzfleiſchius, Orat. funeb. Andreæ Sennerti, pag. 91, Edit. Witt. 1697.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 95.

[A] He publiſhed a great many books.] You will find a catalogue of them in the ſecond volume (1), of Witte's Diarum Biographicum, out of which I ſhall only tranſcribe the following lines. Athenæ & inſcriptiones Wittenbergenſes. Diſſertatio de quatuor linguæ Ebraicæ ætatibus. Scrutinium religionum, de religionum varietate, & una ſola Chriſtiana & vera. De principio religionis in genere, & Chriſtianæ in ſpecie. De punctorum vocalium Ebr. neque cum literis, neque cum verbo Dei coævitate; de Urim & Tummim.

(1) Pag. 172, 173.

SERBELLONE, an Italian family, which has afforded ſeveral men of note, as will appear hereafter. According to fabulous genealogies, it derives its original from Cerdubellius, the head of the Spaniards in the time of Scipio Africanus (a). We are told, that ſome ages ago, it was divided into three branches, becauſe three brothers left Burgundy, where their family flouriſhed, and one of them went to the kingdom of Valencia, the other to Naples, and the eldeſt to Milan. The Spaniſh branch removed long after into Sardinia, where it continues to this day. That of Naples is extinct, or has been re-united to that of Milan, which made a greater figure than the reſt, and is ſtill conſiderable (b). The perſons I am going to ſpeak of deſcended from it.

(a) Gio-Petro de Creſcenzi nel ſuo Amfiteatro Romano, apud Prioratum, Scena d'Huomini illuſtri.

(b) Priorato, Scena d'Huom. illuſtri; and obſerve that his book was printed in 1659.

SERBELLONE (JOHN PETER) was the father and uncle of ſeveral illuſtrious perſons. He married in the year 1506, Elizabeth Rainoldi, a woman of a noble and ancient family in Milan, and aunt of John Baptiſt Rainoldi, preſident of the ſenate of that town. He had by that marriage five ſons and two daughters: one of the two daughters was a nun; the other was married to the Count de Macagno. GABRIEL his eldeſt ſon, was a very great captain. I ſhall beſtow an article upon him. The ſecond, whoſe name was JOHN BAPTIST, took orders, attached himſelf to the court of Rome, was made Biſhop of Caſſano in Calabria, where he did not reſide, becauſe he was employed in ſeveral important intrigues at Rome, and was appointed by Pope Pius IV, governor of the caſtle of St Angelo during his whole pontificate. The third ſon of Peter Serbellone was called FABRICIUS: I ſhall alſo beſtow an article upon him. The fourth ſon was called JOHN ANTONY, who was Biſhop of Foligno, and then of Novara, and the firſt cardinal whom Pope Pius IV made in the year 1560. He was governor of ſeveral towns in the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate, legate of Peruggia and Romagna, Biſhop of Oſtia and Velletri, and died Dean of the ſacred college in the year 1591. He was a cunning Polititian, who had a hand in the moſt ſecret negotiations of the court of Rome, under the Popes Pius IV, Pius V, Gregory XIII, and Sixtus V. Being couſin to Pius IV, he eaſily obtained ſome very conſiderable privileges for the college of Doctors at Milan. He found it more difficult to get them confirmed by Sixtus V, who had reſolved to ſuppreſs them; but at laſt he carried his point, and even got thoſe privileges enlarged. The laſt ſon concerned himſelf only with his domeſtic affairs. Our Serbellone had a ſiſter called CECILIA, who was married in the year 1485, to Bernard de Medicis [A]. From this marriage came ſix ſons and ſeven daughters (a) [B].

(a) Taken from Count Gualdo Priorato, Scena d'Huomini illuſtri.

[A] Cecilia . . . was married to Bernard de Medicis.] Priorato ſeems to approve thoſe, who ſay that this Bernard was of the family of Medicis, which has obtained the ſupreme power at Florence (1); but many other writers call the family of Pius IV, by the name of Medequin, and not by that of Medicis.

[B] . . . . From this marriage came ſix ſons and ſeven daughters.] John James the eldeſt ſon, was the famous Marquis de Marignan, one of the greateſt captains of his age. The ſecond, who was made cardinal by Paul III, was elected Pope in 1559, and took the name of Pius IV. Two other ſons of Cecilia Serbellone, were ſucceſſively Marquiſſes of Marignan, after the death of their eldeſt brother. Their brother Gabriel ſerved in the armies of Charles V with great courage: The youngeſt brother died a child. Of the ſeven daughters, none but two, viz. Margaret and Clara, remained in the world; the other five were made Nuns.

(1) Bernardo della nobiliſſima famiglia de Medici, che ſi era traſferito ad habitare da Fiorenza in Milano come ſcrive Bernardino Cario.

Nuns. Margaret was married to the Count Gilbert Borromeo, and was the mother of St Charles Borromeo. Clara was the wife of Count Mark d'Altaemps (2). I have mentioned in another place (3) a cardinal who proceeded from this marriage.

(2) Taken from Count Gualdo Priorato, Scena d'Huomini illuſtri.

(3) In the article ALTAEMPS.

SERBELLONE (Gabriel) eldeſt ſon of the foregoing, was a warrior of great repute in the XVIth century. He was knight of Malta, and grand prior of Hungary. He gave proofs of his valour when he defended Strigonia againſt the Ottoman forces, and ſignalized himſelf (a) at the famous paſſage of the Elbe, and at the battle that was fought ſoon after, in which Charles V, obtained a victory over the Duke of Saxony. He was Lieutenant-general of the imperial army. He had the ſame poſt in Italy in the army of the Marquis de Marignan his couſin, during the war of Siena, and it was to him that this place ſurrendred at laſt. He had before ſubdued (b) Saluſſes in Piedmont for the Emperor Charles V. After the taking of Siena, he took ſeveral other towns in Tuſcany, which refuſed to acknowledge the houſe of Medicis; and being made general of the holy Church, both by ſea and land, under the pontificate of Pius IV, he recovered Aſcoli, he built ſeveral fortreſſes in the Ecceſiaſtical State fortified the caſtle of St Angelo, re-built Civita Vecchia, and performed ſeveral other things of that nature; for he was a very good engineer, which was the reaſon why, after the death of Pius IV, the King of Spain ſent him into the kingdom of Naples, and into Sicily, to take a view of all the places, and order what he ſhould think fit. Being gone occaſionally into the iſle of Malta, he there drew the plan, and laid the foundations of the new town (c). The Duke of Alva took him with him in the famous expedition of the Netherlands (d). Serbellone was general of the artillery, and went conſtantly before to make the ways ready; ſo that he had a great ſhare in the glory of that famous march, one of the moſt remarkable operations that ever was ſeen in that kind. Though the engineer Paciotti, whom the Duke of Alva obtained of the Duke of Savoy, directed the conſtruction of the citadel of Antwerp; yet it is certain, that Serbellone was the chief ſuperviſor of that work (e). He returned ſome time after into Italy, and was at the battle of Lepanto, where he acquired great glory. He was there Captain-general of the artillery (f), and commander of a ſquadron of Spaniſh gallies. He was ſo much for giving battle, that he made Don Juan of Auſtria reſolve upon it. The year following he commaded in Sicily, and was made viceroy of Tunis. The Turks having taken Gouletta, beſieged him with ſo many troops in Tunis (g), where the citadel he was building was not yet finiſhed, that after they had been repulſed in fourteen ſeveral aſſaults, at laſt they took the place ſword in hand. He was made priſoner, and carried to Conſtantinople. He was exchanged for thirty-ſix Turkiſh officers taken at the battle of Lepanto [A]. When he arrived at Milan, his birth-place, in 1575, that city publickly expreſſed their joy for his arrival. He was Lieutenant-general to the Marquis d'Aimonte, governor of the Milaneſe, the two following years, that is, he governed that country alone; for the governor durſt not ſtay in it by reaſon of the Plague. Afterwards Serbellone received orders to repair to the Netherlands, to command there immediately under Don Juan (h). He brought thither two thouſand men raiſed in the Milaneſe. That prince had a great eſteem for him, and gave him the title of father. He entruſted him with the care of haſtening, as much as he could, the conſtruction of the citadel of Namur (i); but they fell ſick both of them [B], which put a ſtop to the work. Don Juan, who was only in the thirty-third year of his age died of his ſickneſs: Serbellone, though above ſeventy years old, recovered of his (k). He had a great ſhare in the taking of Maeſtricht [C]; and returned into Italy towards the latter end of the year 1579. He had been choſen to command the army which Philip II, intended to ſend into

(a) In 1547.

(b) In 1552.

(c) Ex Priorato; Scena d'Huomini illuſtri.

(d) In 1567.

(e) Ex Strada, de Bello Belg. I. Dec. lib. vi, vii.

(f) In 1571.

(g) In 1574. See Thuanus, lib. lviii,

(h) Ex Priorato, ubi ſupra.

(i) In 1578.

(k) Ex Strada, ubi ſupra, Dec. I, lib. x.

[A] He was exchanged for thirty ſix Turkiſh officers, taken at the battle of Lepanto.] Gregory XIII made that exchange. ' Nec multo ante redierat Gabriel ' Serbellonius ex Tunetana captivitate in libertatem aſ- ' ſertus à Gregorio XIII, commutatione captivorum ' qui navalis victoriæ reliqui Adriana mole attinebantur, charum in primis Auſtriaco ac partibus caput, ' exactæque non magis ætatis quam diſciplinæ militaris exemplum (1). - - - - Not long before this Gabriel Serbellone returned from his captivity at Tunis, ' being ſet at liberty by Pope Gregory XIII, in exchange ' for the priſoners, who remaining after the naval victory, were kept at Caſtle-Angelo, a man exceeding dear ' to Don Juan of Auſtria, and both an example of ' honourable old age, and a pattern for military diſcipline.'

[B] They fell ſick both of them.] Strada (2) obſerves upon this occaſion, that the ſymptoms being the ſame, all the Phyſicians excepting that of the Duke of Parma (3) affirmed, that Don Juan would recover, and that Serbellone would die. And yet the latter was on the mending hand that day the other died; whereupon Pennoni was as much admired as he had been laughed at. Three things might have made him be looked upon as an inconſiderate man; the old age of Serbellone, of whoſe life he did not deſpair, and the youth and quality of Don Juan, whom he gave over; but ſince the Duke of Parma was to ſucceed Don Juan, Pennoni's freedom is not much to be wondered at.

[C] He had a great ſhare in the taking of Maeſtricht.] Priorato ſays, it was Serbellone that took that town, and was the firſt that got into it. I durſt not ſay ſo much, the thing being not likely, conſidering the age of that great captain. It ſhould have been the action of an adventurer; for we muſt remember that Maeſtricht was taken by ſtorm. Priorato is guilty of a ſurpriſing omiſſion; for he ſays nothing of Serbellone's firſt journey into the Netherlands; and tho' he aſcribes to him the conſtruction of the citadel of Antwerp, which was built in his firſt journey, it plainly appears that he did not know that the Duke of Alva brought with him Gabriel Serbellone; he mentions the citadel of Antwerp only, after having mentioned Serbellone's journey in 1577, and the taking of Maeſtricht

Thuanus mentions one Count Cernellone (§ a), knight of Malta, and Prior of Hungary, who is the ſame with our Gabriel Serbellone, and yet he diſtinguiſhes them: for having ſaid, that the Duke of Alva cauſed the citadel of Antwerp to be built, being adviſed to it by Chapin Vitelli and Count Cernellone, who had taken

(1) Strada, lib. x. Dec. I.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Hippolitus Pennonius.

[(§ a) An error of the preſs corrected, letter C, of the Index of Thuanus, Rem. Crit.]

into Portugal, to ſeize on that kingdom as ſoon as Cardinal Henry ſhould die; but he had not time to crown his glorious life with that great exploit. He died in January 1580, being ready to go into Spain (l). One of his ſons was killed at the ſiege of Tunis (m).

(l) Ex Priorato, ubi ſupra.

(m) Thuan. lib. lviii, pag. 76.

taken a view of that place, he obſerves that the firſt who commanded in the citadel was Gabriel Serbellone. ‘ Cum arcis cuſtodia primo cum idoneo præſidio attri-‘ buta eſſet Gabrieli Serbellonio Mediolanenſi ſpecta-‘ tæ virtutis Duci, cujus aliquoties à nobis ſupra facta ‘ mentio eſt (4). - - When the defence of the caſtle had been ‘ committed to Gabriel Serbellone the Milaneſe, a gene-‘ ral of approved valour, whom we have mentioned be-‘ fore.’ It is certain he means two perſons, and that he, who the Duke of Alva conſulted, and ſent to ſee the place, was Gabriel Serbellone: ‘ Antuerpiæ ‘ arcem fundabat, Paciotti Machinatoris ingenio, Ser-‘ bellonii judicio (5). - - - - He built the citadel of ‘ Antwerp, by the contrivance of the engeneer Paciotti, ‘ and the advice of Serbellone.’

(4) Thuan. lib. xli, pag. 830.

(5) Strada, lib. vii.

SERBELLONE (Fabricius) brother to the foregoing, was general of the Pope's troops in the country of Avignon, during the Civil wars in the reign of Charles IX. He was at firſt captain of an independant company, and governor of Pavia for the Emperor Charles V. Afterwards he exerciſed the office of Commiſſary-general of the army in Piedmont, and in the year 1560 he was appointed governor of the ſtate of Avignon, by Pope Pius IV, and general of his armies (a). He violently ſided with the Catholics againſt the Proteſtants, and was horribly hated and dreaded by the latter, by reaſon of the cruelties he exerciſed in Orange [A], wherein he was furiouſly ſeconded by the commanders of the French troops [B]. Pius V continued him in the ſame poſts his predeceſſor had beſtowed upon him in that country; but Serbellone did not long enjoy them: he went home in 1566, and being gone to Rome towards the latter end of the ſame year, to take upon him the chief command of the Pope's troops, he died in the houſe of the cardinal his brother. He had married Frances Maleſpina ſiſter to the Marquis de Malgrado (b).

(a) Priorato, Scena, d'Huom. illuſtri.

(b) Ibid.

[A] The cruelties he exerciſed in Orange.] Having promiſed in another place (1) to ſpeak of thoſe cruelties in this article, the beſt thing I can do is to ſet down the words of an author who is accounted a good Catholic (2). He informs us that Fabricius Serbellone, a gentleman of Milan, of an antient family, and of great experience, who gave himſelf over to moſt vices that prevail among his countrymen, as he was endowed with their virtues, joined with the Catholics of Provence, whom the Counts de Sommerive, de Suze, de Carces, &c. had gathered together, and perſuaded them (3) to make an attempt upon Orange. He inveſted that town when the whole garriſon was gone out, and taking advantage of that favourable juncture, he gave an aſſault as ſoon as his battery had made a ſufficient breach. During the aſſault the Catholics, that were left in Orange, opened one gate to him. He went in thro' it, and his men were contented at firſt to kill every body they met in arms; but afterwards, they renewed the examples of the moſt refined cruelty invented formerly by tyrants. They employed their ingenuity in contriving how to make thoſe, who had been ſo unhappy as to eſcape their firſt fury, feel themſelves die, and killed them gradually. Some were thrown headlong upon ſtakes, halberds, ſwords, and pikes. Some were hung in the chimnies, and burnt with a ſlow fire. They took delight in cutting the privy parts; and their fury ſpared neither children, nor old and ſick people, nor the reapers, tho' the latter had no other arms than their ſickles. Women and maids did not come off with the loſs of their honour, and with being proſtituted to the rabble; for they were ſet for a mark to be ſhot at, and after hung upon the windows. The boys were kept to compleat the abomination; and to add deriſion to their outrage, the ladies, who rather choſe to die than to ſatisfy the leudneſs of the victors, were expoſed ſtark naked for a publick mockery, with horns thruſt into thoſe parts, which modeſty does not permit to name. Some of both ſexes were larded with ſlips of paper cut out of the Geneva Bibles. The very Catholics, who opened the gate, were not ſpared: For after a place had been appointed for them, and they had been told that they would be ſafe in it with their wives and children, they were all cut to pieces. There were only a hundred and nine ſoldiers in the caſtle, who not being ſufficient to defend it, deſired to capitulate. All they propoſed was granted them; but as ſoon as they came out, they were ſurrounded; and thoſe who were not thought worthy of being killed by the ſoldiers, were thrown headlong from the top of a rock. After the plunder had been ſecured, the victors employed themſelves in demoliſhing the walls of Orange; and Serbellone thinking that it would be a piece of madneſs to leave ſo near the country of Avignon a conſiderable town, the ſovereign whereof was a Calviniſt, ſet fire to it, which quickly conſumed the biſhop's palace, and three hundred houſes with thoſe, who had concealed themſelves in them. The burning had gone on, had it not been for an extraordinary rain, which put it out in a moment, and diſappointed thoſe who ſtirred the fire.

D'Aubigne had ſaid long before, that the Catholic hiſtorians had related what he ſays of the cruelties exerciſed at Orange (4). Doubtleſs he meant Thuanus, who relates (5) the whole matter as fully as related in the paſſage taken from Varillas, and as fully as Theodore Beza had related it (6). He meant, I ſay, Thuanus; but he had ſome reaſons not to name him. It will be granted me that the hiſtorian, whoſe words I have tranſcribed, is a writer of greater authority, ad hominem, conſidering the time he wrote in.

[B] He was furiouſly ſeconded by the commanders of the French troops.] It is obſerved in the relation of the ſacking of Orange (7), that the caſtle, the biſhop's palace, and ſeveral other places, were ſet on fire, and part of the walls pulled down at the ſollicitation of the Count de Suze. He ſatisfied his avarice as well as his cruelty; for he took part of the beſt booty, and furniſhed his houſe with it. Theſe are the men, on whom we poor private people beſtow ſo many panegyrics, upon account of their pretended zeal for religion and the glory of God: The Monlucs, the Tavannes, the Suzes, and the Guiſes will be praiſed for ever among the votaries of the Church of Rome; but what did they do for their religion but get wealth, plunder, and domineer? Was this a ſervice done to God, for which they deſerved to be rewarded? O curas hominum, ô quantum eſt in rebus inane (8)! - - - O empty toils! O vanity of things.

(1) Remark [C] of the article BEAUMONT.

(2) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charl. IX, Tom. i, pag. 202, 203.

(3) The ſixth of June 1562.

(4) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, p. 204.

(5) Thuan. lib. xxxi, pag. m. 627.

(6) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. xii, pag. 262.

(7) Ibid.

(8) Perſius, Sat. I, initio.

SERBELLONE (John) the ſixth ſon of John Baptiſt Serbellone, Count de Caſtillon, and Lord of Romagnano, was a great commander in the ſervice of the King of Spain in the XVIIth century. He was a native of Milan. He performed his firſt military exploits in the year 1616. Being informed at Rome of the preparations that were making in the Milaneſe againſt the Duke of Savoy, he immediately repaired to Count John Peter his brother, colonel of horſe, and general of the artillery, and governor of Gattinara. He applied himſelf ſo diligently to the ſervice, that he made it appear he was born for the war, and would raiſe himſelf in time. His brother having been killed at Verceil, as he was taking a view of that place, he had his regiment given him. He increaſed in that poſt the eſteem he was in. He was wounded with a muſket ſhot at the ſiege of Verceil, and loſt his regiment ſome time after (a); but the ſame Duke of Feria, who had diſbanded that regiment, gave him another of three thouſand foot in 1620, during the troubles of the Valteline. The Proteſtants and the Catholics being come to blows in that country, our Count Serbellone was ordered to go and ſupport the Catholics; and it is likely he did not uſe the Proteſtants too gently, ſince the governor of Milan was well pleaſed with his zeal and conduct, and gave a good character of him to the court: this implies it ſufficiently. Notwithſtanding which, his regiment was diſbanded, when the Valteline was depoſited into the hands of Gregory XV; but the troubles beginning ſoon again in that country, Serbellone was ſent thither a ſecond time, having the ſame poſt (b), and fuller commiſſions; and gave great ſatisfaction by his manner of oppoſing the French troops [A]; as it appeared by the offices beſtowed upon him: he was made counſellor in the ſupreme council of Spain in the year 1625, commiſſary-general in the Milaneſe in 1627, general of the artillery and governor of Montferrat in 1628. He ſerved under the Marquis of Spinola at the famous ſiege of Caſal; and ſome years after (c) he went into Germany to ſerve in the quality of Captain-general of the artillery under the Duke of Feria. From the death of that Duke till the arrival of the Cardinal Infant, he had the chief command of the army in Alſace. He performed wonders at the battle of Nortlingen [B], which the Swedes loſt the ſixth of September 1634; and having followed the Cardinal Infant into Flanders, he ſettled winter quarters in the biſhopric of Liege, and the next ſpring (d) obtained leave to go home. He did great ſervices to the King of Spain againſt the Duke of Rohan in the Valteline [C], whilſt they were raiſing in Germany the army he was deſigned to command. It was thought more proper to ſend him into Catalonia, where he commanded the horſe [D] in the year 1637. He formed a very noble deſign, which was to beſiege Leucate, the taking

(a) In 1618.

(b) In 1624.

(c) In 1633.

(d) In 1635.

[A] His manner of oppoſing the French troops.] I do not follow my author in every thing, to avoid advancing falſities. Priorato will have it, that the following things happened in 1624, and 1625. 1. Serbellone's regiment was ſet on foot again. 2. He ſo diligently guarded the poſts he had been truſted with in the Valteline, that the Marquis de Cœuvres, who commanded the French troops, could never get an inch of ground on that ſide. 3 Serbellone being ſent againſt the Duke of Savoy, beſieged and took Nice de la Paglia. 4. He returned to his former poſts in the Valteline, where Colonel Papenheim (1) had commanded in his abſence. 5. The Duke of Rohan ſucceeded the Marquis de Cœuvres, and could make no progreſs any more than he by reaſon of Serbellone's vigilance. 6. Serbellone being recalled to Milan upon more urging buſineſs, left the command to Guaſco colonel of horſe. 7. The Duke of Rohan being informed of that change, advanced as far as Gravedone. 8. Serbellone was immediately ſent back to ſtop him, and obliged him upon the news of his return to ſet fire to the palace of the Duke d'Alviti, and to retire for fear of engaging ſo brave a captain. The hiſtorian, having mentioned all theſe things, adds, that for an acknowledgment of all thoſe ſervices, Serbellone was made counſellor in the ſupreme council of Spain in July 1625. It is certain, that there are ſome falſities in this account. The Duke of Rohan did not command in the Valteline at that time. The Marquis de Cœuvres was there ever ſince France employed her forces there in 1624, till the execution of the treaty of peace in 1627. The Duke of Rohan was then buſy enough in France, being engaged in the wars of religion. As for what concerns Serbellone's reſiſtance, which was ſo great, according to Priorato, that the Marquis de Cœuvres could never get an inch of ground; I will not alledge againſt it, the hiſtories which mention that Marquis's progreſs; for I might be anſwered, that Priorato does not mean the whole Valteline, but only a certain part of it, into which poſſibly, the French troops could not penetrate. But to ſpeak the truth, this would be but a poor ſhift, and not much warranted by the author's expreſſions (2). I can convict him by his own words, of having confounded the time: And indeed, when he relates in another work (3) what happened in the Valteline, he places the Duke of Rohan's excurſion to Gravedone in the year 1636. He is in the right as to that.

[B] He performed wonders at the battle of Nortlingen.] He was poſted upon a riſing ground, which the council of war, held the day before the battle, took to be of the greateſt importance for the ſucceſs of that great day. The Swedes had the ſame opinion of it, ſince they uſed their utmoſt endeavours to poſſeſs themſelves of that poſt; but they were always vigorouſly repulſed by Serbellone. Therefore he had the ſatisfaction to hear the Cardinal Infant ſpeak theſe words to him, in the preſence of the King of Hungary; Conde, por Dios y vos tenemos la vittoria (4). - - - - God and you have given us the victory.

[C] He did great ſervices . . . againſt the Duke of Rohan, in the Valteline.] This belongs to the year 1635, and 1636. The author is in the right, with reſpect to that time, to ſay that the Duke of Rohan and Count Serbellone acted in the Valteline; But I doubt whether he gives a faithful account of what they did; for he ſuppoſes that there being three bodies of troops for France, the Duke of Rohan, who commanded one of thoſe bodies, always endeavoured to join the two others, which might have proved very prejudicial to the Spaniards; but that the count prevented that junction. This is ſtill falſe, if we depend upon the hiſtory of the Duke of Rohan (5). Therein we are told, that he had all his troops by him; but that he was ſo poſted, that he had the Germans on one ſide, and the Spaniards on the other. Fernemont (6) commanded the Germans; Serbellone commanded the Spaniards. The Duke beat the Germans three times one after another; and then attacked Serbellone, who was advantageouſly intrenched at Morbeigne, and beat him. Of this Priorato ſays nothing at all. But it can hardly be doubted, conſidering that this hiſtory of the Duke of Rohan, eſpecially what concerns the exploits in the Valteline, is all grounded upon memoirs, which ſeem to be very good. But what need we have recourſe to memoirs. Does not Priorato in another book (7) mention the defeat of the Germans? And does not he ſay, that Serbellone was ſoundly beaten at Morbeigne? His own teſtimony is ſufficient to confute whatever he ſays in his encomium upon Serbellone with reſpect to the Duke of Rohan. I muſt not forget what he ſays concerning Fornemont, viz. that he fell out with Serbellone, becauſe he did not give him his due titles in a letter (8).

[D] He commanded the horſe.] Not that he commanded that army in chief; for it is certain he was under the Duke of Cardonna. It is true, the preſence of that duke did not leſſen his authority, as general of horſe, during the ſiege of Leucate, for he was not there in perſon; and there was a French account, wherein to confute thoſe who had given out that he had been killed in the field of battle, it was poſitively ſaid, he had not been in the

(1) He who was killed at the battle of Lutzen.

(2) Governava il Conte Sorbellone con tanta prudenza, accuratezza, e vigilanza tutti i Forti DI QUELLE PARTI, che non quanti tentativi faceſſe il Marcheſe di Coure Generale allhora di Francia IN QUELLE PARTI, non pote mai auvanzar ne pure un palmo, tanto erano ben cuſtoditi i detti poſti.

(3) Hiſtor. delle Guerre di Ferdinando, &c. lib. xi.

(4) Priorato, ubi ſupra.

(5) Printed at Paris in 1666, and in Holland in 1667, in 12mo.

(6) Others call him Fornemont.

(7) Hiſtor. delle Guerre di Ferdinando, &c.

(8) Ibid. lib. x. pag. m. 337.

taking whereof would have made France very uneaſy; but he was forced to raiſe the ſiege. He received many wounds as he was diſcharging the duties of a good general; and he was hardly recovered from his wounds, when he fell ſick without any hopes of recovery. He died at Perpignan the twenty-firſt of February 1638. He had married Donna Luiſa, daughter of the Marquis John Jerome Marin, deſcended from Thomas Marin Duke of Terranova. He had ſeveral children by her: the eldeſt was made Marquis de Romagnano by his Catholic Majeſty (e).

(e) Ex Gualdo Priorato, Scena d'Huomini illuſtri.

the battle, and that in imitation of the Catholic Kings, he was contented to be the ſpiritual and inviſible head of that army, reſerving to himſelf the title of General, but leaving the functions of that office to Serbellone (9). Priorato does not expreſs himſelf clearly enough: Any body would infer from his expreſſions (10), that the count had none above him but the court of Spain.

(9) Merc. François, Tom. xxi, pag. 502.

(10) Fu chiamato dal Re in Iſpagna, e fatto Maſtro di Campo Generale dell' eſercito di Catalogna. Nel paſſar d'Italia in quelle parti hebbe il commando ſopra tutti i Generali e capi da guerra di quell' eſſercito . . . . . benche prima del combattimento haveſſe fatta inſtanza per altri ſei mila huomini, o almeno quattro, fu dal Conte Duca Privato del Re mantenuto con lettere affeuttoſe in ſperanze grandi, ma non mai ſoccorſo d'un ſolo fantacino. Scena d'Huom. illuſtri.

SERRONI (HYACINTHUS) firſt Archbiſhop of Alby, lived in the XVIIth century. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (a), but correct two faults in it [A]. See alſo Moreri's Dictionary.

(a) For January 1687. p. 113.

[A] Correct two faults in it.] You will find in that book that this Prelate was born the third of Auguſt: it ſhould be the thirtieth. You will find alſo there that the Biſhop of Pamiers was his nephew; which is not true. The author ſhould have ſaid the Abbot de Camps, inſtead of that biſhop. That abbot is a perſon of great learning, and merit, who has made a very fine collection of the moſt curious medals that can be found. This appears by the book, intituled, Selectiora Numiſmata in ære maximi moduli è Muſeo Illuſtriſſimi D. D. Franciſci de Camps, Abbatis S. Marcelli, & B. Mariæ de Siniaco, conciſis interpretationibus per D. Vaillant D. M. & Cenomanenſium Ducis Antiquarium illuſtrata. It was printed at Paris in the year 1693, in 4to. Mr Vaillant, who is ſo famous for his great ſkill in medals, ſpeaks of that abbot in the following manner at the beginning of that book. ‘Nummos veteres ex omni materia, omnique modulo ſummâ curâ multiſque ſumptibus collegit undique multis ab hinc annis Illuſtriſſimus ABBAS DE CAMPS, tàm proſpero ſucceſſu, ut rei nummariæ ſtudioſis omnibus, Principibus etiam non paucis opulentior in eâ re tandem evaſerit: hi ſiquidem nummos habent permultos, ille verò numiſmata maximi moduli mole, cælaturâ, raritate, eximia, in quibus Imperatorum ſeriem, ſi paucos excipias, cernere licet, ut & res ab eis præclarè geſtas, & quidquid in hiſtoriâ Romana legitur auguſtius. Ab amicis ſæpe invitatus, ut quæ privatæ ſtudens, tùm utilitati, tùm voluptati ſibi comparaverat, in publicum commodum transferret, annuit comiter votis amicorum, ipſe tamen diverſis negotiorum generibus implicatus ea in ære priùs, prout extant in ipſis exemplaribus, accuratè inciſa, explicanda mihi poſtmodùm tradidit. - - - The moſt illuſtrious ABBOT DE CAMPS, with the greateſt care, and at the greateſt charge, many years ago, made a collection of antient coins, of every matter and ſize, from all parts, ſo ſucceſsfully, that at length he became more rich in this reſpect than all that were curious in coins, yea even than many princes: theſe, it is true, may have much money, but he has medals of greateſt rarity for their ſize, engraving, and rarity, wherein is to be ſeen the ſeries of the emperors, their moſt noble atchievements, and whatever elſe worthy of admiration is read in the Roman hiſtory. Being often deſired by his friends to communicate to the public what he had purchaſed for his own particular uſe and pleaſure, he conſented, and being himſelf taken up with variety of buſineſs, after he had cauſed them to be engraved in braſs, delivered them to me to be explained.’ If you conſult the Abbot de la Roque (1) in the extract of a diſſertation of the Abbot de Camps upon a Greek medal (2) of Antoninus Caracalla, you will find the following words in it: ‘The curious of Rome and France have taken great pains to explain it, and have been divided in their opinions about the truth and ſingularity of the games repreſented upon it. The Abbot de Camps, who has a greater ſkill in medals than one would think, conſidering his age, and his great occupations, is of opinion that it is a ſhew of Funambuli, or Rope-dancers: whereupon he propoſes his conjectures full of wit, and of a profound learning (3). . . . . Having thus explained, with great wit and learning, the true ſenſe of the reverſe of that medal, he examines why they are Funambuli on the reverſe of a medal of Caracalla, and what reaſon moved the Cyzicenians to preſent them to him (4).’ We are told elſewhere, that he had ſearched, with great care, the rareſt manuſcripts, we are told this, I ſay, on occaſion of a Canon Burdigalenſis ex M. S. Codice vetuſtiſſimus, which is in his hands (5). ‘This council was never before publiſhed by any. We are obliged for it to the Abbot de Camps, who making a diligent ſearch into every thing that may illuſtrate the hiſtory of the ſuffragancy of Alby, which he is writing, has inſerted it at length in that hiſtory. He took it out of a manuſcript of councils and tracts of antient Fathers, whoſe antiquities, &c (6).’ It is not to be doubted that he undertook to write the hiſtory of the ſuffragancy of Alby on account of our Hyacinthus Serroni, with whom he was in great favour, but not his relation. In the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres I went upon a hearſay, which I believed to be true the more readily, becauſe I had read (7) that the abbot had the honour to be related to that archbiſhop, which was the reaſon why I was miſtaken in this particular. Whilſt I mend that fault, I am glad it appears that notwithſtanding my miſtake, I aſcribed nothing to the Abbot de Camps, but what the archbiſhop, his patron, thought him worthy of. This is the ground of my commentary upon this article.

(1) In the Journal des Sçavans of the 29th of November 1677, pag. 309, Dutch Edition.

(2) Which repreſents on the reverſe ſome ſpectacles and public games, very ſingular, and hitherto little underſtood. Id. ibid.

(3) Journal des Sçavans, of November 29, 1677, pag. 310.

(4) Ibid. p. 312.

(5) Journal des Sçavans of the 20th of November 1679, pag. 317, Dutch edition.

(6) We find in the Mercure Galant, for the month of May, 1678, pag. 105, Holland edition, an Elogy of the Abbot de Camps.

(7) In the Mercure Galant, ibid. pag. 106.

SERVILIA, ſiſter by the mother's ſide to Cato Uticenſis (a), was married, firſt to Marcus Junius Brutus, by whom ſhe had Brutus, who murdered Julius Cæſar; and after to Decimus Julius Silanus (b), who was conſul in the year of Rome 691. She did not behave her ſelf like a virtuous woman; for ſhe was not only Julius Cæſar's miſtreſs, and improved that opportunity to enrich herſelf with the ſpoils of unhappy people; but beſides, ſhe proſtituted one of her daughters to her lover [A]. Her brother Cato

(a) Plut. in Catone minore, init. p. 759.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 769. See alſo Cicero in Bruto, pag. m. 354.

[A] She was Julius Cæſar's miſtreſs, and improved . . . . to enrich herſelf . . . . but beſides, ſhe proſtituted one of her daughters to her lover.] See the remark [A] in the article PORCIA, and the article CASSIUS (1), to which add theſe words of Suetonius: ‘Ante alias dilexit (Cæſar) M. Bruti matrem Serviliam:

(1) Citation

Cato was very much ſurpriſed when they made him read a letter written by her [B]. She pretended to be deſcended from Servilius Ahala (c), who had killed Spurius Melius who had raiſed ſome factions at Rome in the year 316.

(c) Plut. in Bruto, ibid. pag. 984.

‘ Serviliam: cui & proximo ſuo conſulatu ſexagies H. S. margaritam mercatus eſt: & bello civili ſuper alias donationes, ampliſſima prædia ex auctionibus haſtæ minimo addixit. Cum quidem pleriſque vilitatem mirantibus, facetiſſime Cicero, Quo melius, inquit, emptum ſciatis, Tertia deducta eſt: exiſtimabatur enim Servilia, etiam filiam ſuam Tertiam Cæſari conciliare (2). - - - - Above others Cæſar loved Servilia, the mother of M. Brutus: for whom, in his next conſulſhip he purchaſed a pearl for ſixty ſeſterces: and in the civil war he gave her large manors, which he purchaſed at an eaſy rate. When moſt people were admiring their cheapneſs, Cicero very wittily replied, Quo melius emptum ſciatis, Tertia deducta eſt; playing upon the ambiguity of the words, which may either ſignify, That you may the better underſtand how cheap they are, a third was abated, or ſhe gave her own daughter (whoſe name was Tertia) to Cæſar's embraces.’

[B] Cato was very much ſurpriſed when they made him read a letter written by her.] Plutarch having ſaid that Julius Cæſar gave orders to prevent Brutus's being killed in the battle of Pharſalia (3), adds the following words: ‘ And this he is believed to have done out of a tenderneſs to Servilia, the mother of Brutus; for Cæſar had, it ſeems, in his youth, been very intimate with Servilia, and ſhe paſſionately in love with him: and foraſmuch as Brutus was born about that time, in which their loves were at the higheſt, Cæſar believed that he was begot by him. There goes a report too, that when ſome great and weighty matters, concerning the conſpiracy of Catiline, which had like to have been the deſtruction of the common-wealth, were debated in the ſenate; Cato and Cæſar, tho' differing in their opinions, were placed near to one another. In the middle of the debate, a paper was brought to Cæſar, which he took and read to himſelf. Upon this Cato cried out aloud, and blamed Cæſar for holding correſpondence, and receiving letters from the enemies of the common-wealth. Upon which ſeveral of the ſenate murmured. Wherefore Cæſar delivered the note, as he had received it, to Cato, who reading it, found it to be a leud love-letter from his own ſiſter Servilia; wherefore he threw it back again to Cæſar, with theſe words, Keep it to yourſelf, you ſot, Which being done, he reſumed his diſcourſe, and went on to tell his opinion, as before; ſo public and notorious was Servilia's love to Cæſar (4).’

(2) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. l.

(3) See the article BRUTUS (MARC JUNIUS), in the text over againſt citation (f).

(4) Plut. in Bruto, pag. 986. See alſo the ſame author in Catone minore, p. 770.

SERVILIA, ſiſter to the foregoing, and wife of Lucullus, was yet more leud than ſhe. See the remark [A] of the article of PORCIA. Lucullus, who had divorced Clodia, a woman diſſolute to the laſt degree, and infamous for her inceſt with her brothers, was not much better for marrying Servilia; for, except the inceſt, ſhe was not in the leaſt inferior to leud Clodia [A]. Her huſband bore it as well as he could, out of reſpect to his brother-in-law (a); but at laſt he could bear his wife no longer, and divorced her.

(a) Cato Uticenſis.

[A] Except the inceſt, ſhe was not the leaſt inferior to leud Clodia.] Plutarch uſes the moſt ſevere expreſſions that can be employed to ſignify a diſſolute life. Τῆς δὲ Κλωδίας, ἀπηλλαγμένος οὔσης ἀσελγοῦς καὶ πονηρᾶς, Σερουϊλίαν ἔγημεν, ἀδελφὴν Κάτωνος, οὐδὲ τοῦτον εὐτυχῆ γάμον· ἓν γὰρ οὐ προσῆν αὐτῷ τῶν Κλωδίας κακῶν μόνον, ἡ τῶν ἀδελφῶν διαβολή. τἄλλα δὲ βδελυρὰν ὁμοίως οὖσαν καὶ ἀκόλαστον ἠναγκάζετο φέρειν αἰδούμενος Κάτωνα. τέλος δὲ ἀπεῖπεν. Repudiata autem Clodia, laſciva & improba muliere, Serviliam duxit Catonis ſororem: quæ item nuptiæ parum fauſtæ fuere. Una enim carebat ſola Clodiæ macularum infamia ex fratribus: cætera pariter flagitioſam & impudicam ut ferret Catonis reverentiâ vim intulit ſibi. Poſtremò tolerare eam non valuit (1). - - - But having divorced Clodia, who was a moſt laſcivious and wicked woman, he married Servilia the ſiſter of Cato; nor was this a happy marriage: for only one thing was wanting in her of the wickedneſs of Clodia, the criminal converſe with her brothers. But otherwiſe being equally incontinent and flagitious, he bore with her out of regard to Cato. But at laſt put her away.

(1) Plutarch. in Lucullo, p. 517.

SEVERUS (CORNELIUS) a Latin Poet in Auguſtus's reign. I mention him only that I may correct ſome miſtakes of la Popeliniere, Andreas Schottus, &c [A].
See

[A] Some miſtakes of la Popelinere, Andreas Schottus, &c.] La Popeliniere confounds that Poet with the Orator Caſſius Severus, for which he was cenſured by Voſſius (1); but Voſſius ſhould not have quoted him in ſua Hiſtoria: he ſhould have ſaid in ſua Hiſtoria Hiſtoriarum, to prevent the ambiguity; for the thing in queſtion is to be found in the Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires (2), - - - hiſtory of hiſtories, and not in the hiſtory of the civil wars: tho' one might eaſily ſuſpect that la Popelinere committed that miſtake in this laſt book, ſince the modern Hiſtorians make ſometimes digreſſions, or reflexions, which give them occaſion to ſay what they know of antiquity. La Popeliniere is not exact in what he ſays of Cornelius Severus: he tells us that he had three different profeſſions, that of an Hiſtorian, of a great Orator, and of an Epic Poet, The antient writers repreſent him as a Poet, but they ſay nothing of his being an Hiſtorian or an Orator. It is true, ſome of his verſes are to be found among the fragments taken from ſeveral pieces of Oratory (3); but he who collected all thoſe fragments, ſays nothing whereby it appears, that Cornelius Severus made profeſſion of Rhetoric, or the art of Oratory. Nevertheleſs this very thing, if I am not miſtaken, led Crinitus into that error, and then la Popeliniere, who had it from him. Crinitus (4) gives it as a certain thing, that Cornelius Severus ſpent ſeveral years in making declamations, whilſt Aſinius Pollio, Pompeius Silo, Aſelleius Fuſcus, Sextilius Hena, Cæſtius Pius, Porcius Latro, and Aufidius Baſſus exerciſed the ſame profeſſion. They are part of thoſe mentioned by Seneca, who has collected their rhetorical flouriſhes. La Popeliniere names four of thoſe declaimers with Cornelius Severus, going upon the ſame ground, viz. That Seneca has inſerted ſome verſes of that Cornelius in his Cento's.

Andreus Schottus, the Jeſuit, is partly guilty of the ſame miſtake, for in his tract De claris apud Senecam Rhetoribus, he mentions Cornelius Severus as one of them. Nay, he has committed a fault in the very beginning of his account of Severus, for he applies to him what ought only to be underſtood of Sextilius Hena, a Spaniſh Poet in Seneca. That Spaniſh Poet had made a poem, which began with this verſe, Deflendus Cicero eſt, Latiæque ſilentia linguæ.

Cornelius Severus gave a better turn to that thought by ſaying,

Abſtulit una dies ævi decus, ictaque luctu
Conticuit Latiæ triſtis facundia linguæ.

Whereupon Seneca ſays he will not commend his countryman for having made a very good verſe upon Cicero's death, ſince there was a much finer one, viz.
that

(1) Voſſius de Hiſtor. Latinis, pag. 109.

(2) Pag. 304.

(3) In Seneca the father, Suaſor. ii, & vii.

(4) De Poët. Lat. cap. lvii.

See Moreri's Dictionary (a), I ſhall alſo obſerve ſome of his miſtakes [B].

that of Cornelius Severus. On the contrary, Father Schottus makes him ſay, that he will not commend his country-man Cornelius-Severus, for having made, &c. ſince it had produced a much finer one, viz. that of Cornelius Severus: which would be odd, and is not the author's meaning. Beſides, it is not true that Cornelius Severus was a Spaniard; nor has that Jeſuit placed him in the catalogue of the antient writers of his nation (5).

Voſſius, in one of his books (6) ſays, that the old ſcholiaſt upon Perſius (7) quotes this verſe of our Severus, Pinea frondoſi dum murmurat Apennini; but in another book (8) he aſcribes it to the antient ſcholiaſt upon Horace, which is a miſtake.

[B] See Moreri's Dictionary, I ſhall alſo obſerve ſome miſtakes.] I. Quintilian ought never to be quoted in French by the name of Fabius: It is an ambiguous and barbarous way of quoting him. II. The two Seneca's ſhould not have been confounded. He, who wrote the Controverſiæ is the father of the author of the letters to Lucilius; and yet Moreri quotes them as being one and the ſame perſon. III. Moreri ſhould have quoted the lxxixth letter of Seneca, and not the lxixth. IV. He ſhould have quoted the Suaſoriæ, and not the controverſy of Seneca. V. He ſhould have ſaid Severus and not Severo, in the verſe of Ovid quoted by him. VI. This quotation of Seneca, in Contr. ſua 6. is faulty in three reſpects. He ſhould have put a full ſtop after ſua, and have quoted the viith Suaſoria, and not the vith (9), and Contr. ſhould have been left out. But this is requiring too many things of Moreri; he took little care to enquire whether there is any difference between Seneca's Controverſiæ and Suaſoriæ. But however that be, the reader, who ſhall believe him, will not doubt that one of Seneca's books is intituled, Controverſiæ Suaſoriæ; a miſtake which may be eaſily known, by the bare looking into good editions.

SEVERUS (SULPICIUS) flouriſhed towards the beginning of the Vth century. He was illuſtrious for his birth, and eloquence, and more ſtill for his virtue [A]. After he had appeared with great luſtre at the bar, he married very advantageouſly (a), and ſoon after loſt his wife, whereupon he quitted the world and became a Prieſt [B]. It is certain he was a native of the province of Aquitain [C]; but it may be doubted whether he was born in the dioceſe of Agen (b). The firſt edition of his works is little known [D]. An account of his life may be ſeen in Moreri's Dictionary, and in Mr du Pin's Bibliotheque; and therefore I ſhall not dwell upon it.

He has been cenſured for ſome things by Poſſevin (c), but much leſs than Sigonius who commented upon him. Guibert, Abbot of Gemblours, is very much miſtaken in ſaying, that after St Martin's death, our Sulpicius Severus was promoted to the biſhopric of [A] He was illuſtrious for his birth . . . . and more ſtill for his virtue.] Read theſe words of Gennadius, 'Vir genere & litteris nobilis, & paupertatis atque 'humilitatis amore conſpicuus (1). - - - A man illuſtrious by his birth and learning, and eminent for his 'love of poverty and humility.' But particularly read theſe verſes of Paulinus, Biſhop of Nola;

Teſtis adeſt docto mirabilis ore Severus,
Et totâ Chriſtum cordis virtute ſecutus
Inſignis mundi titulis, ſed clarior illâ
Quâ mundum tempſit ſanctæ virtute fidei,
Nobilitate potens, ſed multò extentius idem
Nobilior Chriſti cultu, quàm ſanguinis ortu (2).

[B] And ſoon after loſt his wife . . . . whereupon he became a prieſt.] This appears by a letter Paulinus writ to him. 'Tu frater dilectiſſime, ad Dominum miraculo majore converſus es, quia ætate florentior, laudibus abundantior, oneribus patrimonii levior, ſubſtantia facultatum non egentior, & in ipſo adhuc 'mundi theatro, id eſt fori celebritate diverſans, & 'facundi nominis palmam tenens, repentino impetu 'diſcuſſiſti ſervile peccati jugum, & lethalia carnis & 'ſanguinis vincula rupiſti. Neque te divitiæ de matrimonio familiæ conſularis adgeſtæ, neque poſt conjugium peccandi licentia, & cœlebs juventus ab anguſto ſalutis introitu, & arduo itinere virtutis, in 'mollem illam & ſpacioſam multorum viam revocare potuerunt (3). - - - - But you, my dear brother, 'were more wonderfully converted to the Lord, inſomuch 'as amidſt all the ſecular advantages of blooming youth 'and wealth, and eloquence, in pleading before the 'courts of juſtice, you ſuddenly threw off the ſlaviſh yoak 'of ſin, and broke the deadly bonds of fleſh and blood. 'Neither could youth, nor increaſe of riches, by marrying with a noble family, turn you from the ſtrait and 'arduous path of virtue and ſalvation to the ſpacious and 'eaſy way of the multitude.'

[C] It is certain he was a native of the province of Aquitain.] Gennadius ſays ſo (4); but the thing is ſtill more certain from theſe words of Sulpicius Severus: 'Sed dum cogito me hominem Gallum inter Aquitanos 'verba facturum, vereor ne offendat veſtras nimium 'urbanas aures ſermo ruſticior (5). - - - - But when I 'conſider that I a Gaul am to ſpeak before the Aquitainians, I am afraid leſt my unpolite language ſhould offend 'your nicer ears.' This paſſage is taken from a dialogue, the interlocutors whereof are Poſthumianus, Sulpicius Severus, and Gallus. Take notice of the compliment of this laſt; he tells the two other interlocutors, that he is afraid, being a Gaul, that his language will appear harſh and barbarous to the nice ears of the Aquitainians. He looks upon himſelf as a gooſe among ſwans (6). That modeſty, that humility, was ſuited to the ſtate of that time: the Aquitainians were then the flower, the ornament, and the glory, of all the Gauls, in matter of wit and eloquence. The beſt Poets, the beſt Rhetoricians, and the moſt excellent Orators of the Roman empire were to be found in Aquitain. I except the Greeks, and I ſpeak only of thoſe, who wrote in Latin. See the catalogue of illuſtrious Aquitainians, collected by Alteſerra (7).

[D] The firſt edition . . . . is little known.] The abbreviators of Geſner, Father Labbe, Dr Cave, Mr du Pin, &c. who mention ſo many editions of that author, ſay nothing of the firſt. It was publiſhed by Matthias Flacius Illyricus, who put to it only the firſt letters of his name; which was the reaſon why a Catholic writer beſtowed thoſe praiſes upon him, of which he afterwards repented, when he came to know that he was a Lutheran. This I find in a ſatirical piece of Father Vavaſſeur againſt Biſhop Godeau. 'Iſto ferme pacto, ſays he (8), quamvis minùs turpiter, utpote unus ac privatus, atque in cauſa leviore, 'clariſſimus ſe ſcriptor deceptum ſenſit, & doluit. 'Cum enim mirificis laudibus extuliſſet eum, qui primus perelegantes Sulpitii Severi libros edidiſſet in 'lucem, neque theſaurum hunc, quem teneret ſolus, 'invidiſſet diutius literatis ac doctis; eumque cùm 'propter tantum beneficium, tum maximè modeſtiæ 'nomine ſuſpiceret, quòd celaſſet nomen, literas modo, M. & F, adſcripſiſſet: intellectum eſt poſteriùs, 'Matthiam Flaccium eſſe ejuſmodi, hominem non 'ſolùm non modeſtum, qui hoc modéſtiæ cauſa non 'feciſſet, ſed etiam impurum & nequam hæreticum, 'qui in centurias Magdeburgenſes multa de ſuo, non 'tacito nomine, contuliſſet. Ut dictum nollet præpoſterus laudator, & eum bonæ, ſed falſæ de altero 'opinionis, & ridiculæ credulitatis ſuæ pœniteret. - - - 'Much after the ſame manner, though leſs ſhamefully, 'as being only a ſingle and private perſon, and in a 'ſmaller matter, a very famous writer found himſelf 'miſtaken, and was vexed at his miſtake. For having 'mightily

(a) At the word Severus.

(5) Bibliothecæ Hiſpanicæ, Tom. ii.

(6) Voſſius de Poëtis Latinis, pag. 33.

(7) That Scholiaſt quotes this verſe, ad Sat. I. ver. 95.

(8) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 109.

(9) Voſſius, de Poëtis Lat. pag. 33, quotes the vith.

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) He ſays that Phœbadius, Biſhop of Agen, was his biſhop: which does not prove that he was born in that dioceſe.

(c) Poſſev. Bibl. Select. Tom. i, pag. m. 202.

(1) Gennadius, de Scriptor. Eccleſ. cap. xix.

(2) Paulin. lib. v. de Vita Sancti Martini.

(3) Idem, Epiſt. vii.

(4) Severus Preſbyter cognomento Sulpicius Aquitanicæ Provinciæ. Gennadius, ubi ſupra.

(5) Sulpit. Severus, de Vita S. Martini, lib. iii.

(6) Argutos inter ſtrepere anſer olores. Virgil. Eclog. IX, ver. 36.

(7) Ant. Dadinus Alteſerra, Rerum Aquitanicarum Libri quinque.

(8) Paulus Romanus Candido Heſychio, Antonius Godellus Epiſcopus Graſſenſis, an Elogii Aureliani Scriptor idoneus, p. 33.

of Beziers, notwithſtanding his reluctancy to it. It is certain he roſe no higher than to the degree of prieſthood. There has indeed been one Sulpicius among the biſhops of Beziers; but that biſhop was raiſed to that ſee one hundred and ninety years after St Martin's death (d).

(d) Ex Alteſerra, Rerum Aquitanic. lib. v, cap. viii, pag. 336.

‘ mightily extolled the man who had firſt publiſhed the moſt elegant works of Sulpicius Severus, and had no longer detained from the ſtudious and learned, this treaſure which he had alone poſſeſſed, and having greatly eſteemed him, both for ſo great a benefit, but chiefly on account of his modeſty in concealing his name, and putting only two letters M and F; he afterwards underſtood that Matthias Flaccius was the perſon, a man not only immodeſt, but likewiſe a foul mouthed and wicked heretic, who had put into the Centuriæ Magdeburgenſes many things of his own, without ſuppreſſing his name. So that he wiſhed his prepoſterous praiſes had not been given, and repented of his good but falſe opinion, and of his ridiculous credulity.’

The largeſt Commentary we have upon our Severus's Hiſtoria ſacra, is that of Chriſtian Schotanus, printed in folio at Franeker, 1664.

SFORZA, an illuſtrious family, derives its original from a peaſant of Cotignola (a), who became one of the chiefeſt and moſt valiant captains of his age: his name was Giacomuzzo [A]; but according to the cuſtom of the peaſants of thoſe parts, the two firſt ſyllables of his name were left out, and he was only called Muzzo. He left the plough and liſted himſelf, and quickly got the reputation of a reſolute ſoldier. He ſpoke of nothing but of devaſtations and ranſackings, and would get by force whatever he had a mind to. Which was the reaſon why he was ſirnamed Sforza (b), which became afterwards the proper name of the family deſcended from him (c). I muſt not forget that he was alſo ſirnamed Attendolo (d). See the firſt remark of this article. The famous Braccio was his fellow-ſoldier, under the General Alberic de Barbiano. At firſt they loved one another, as if they had been brothers; but their emulation or jealouſy, which aroſe inſenſibly in their familiar converſation, turned at laſt into enmity. From that time they always embraced contrary parties, ſo that when one of them was made general of the troops of any prince or any republic, the other had the like imployment in the ſtate that (a) A ſmall town of Romagna between Imola and Faenza.

(b) Some ſay that Alberic de Barbiano gave it him, after he had ſeen him boldly revenge an injury that was done him.

(d) Taken from Leandro Alberti, Deſcrittione di tutta Italia, fol. 317, verſo & 318, Venice edition 1561, in 4*to*.

(c) Collenuccio, Hiſt. Neap. lib. v, pag. m. 409, ſays that Queen Joan ordered it ſo. Voluit ut in illius memoriam omnibus deinde qui illo genere naſcerentur, Sfortiæ cognomen inderetur.

[A] A peaſant of Cotignola ... his name was Giacomuzzo.] That name is made up of two chriſtian names, James Muzzo contracted into one: His ſirname was Attendolo. It is not agreed on all hands that he was a peaſant's ſon: Sanſovino ſays he was the grandſon of a gentleman called John Attendolo, father of Michelin, a captain in the ſervice of the Republic of Venice. He adds, that Michelin the father of our Sforza, married Polyxena de Sanſeverino, and that he had two ſiſters, one of which was the wife of Ugolin Count de Centona, and the other was married to Martin Caraccioli Count de Santangelo, brother to the great Marſhal of Naples (1). We read in Paulus Jovius, that Sforza was a man of a good family, honeſta familia (2). But Leandro Alberti going upon the teſtimony of a writer, a native of Cotignola (3), ſays that Giacomuzzo was a peaſant, and actually digging the ground, when he began to conſider whether he ſhould liſt himſelf, as ſome of his companions adviſed him. He flung his ſpade upon a tree, and ſaid he would be a ſoldier if it lodged there. It ſtaid on the tree, and he liſted himſelf. Muzzo lavorando la terra con la zappa indotto da alcuni compagni, la gittò ſopra un'albero, promettendogli, che ſe la rimanea ſopra quello, d'andar con loro alla guerra, la qual vi rimaſe, & coſi andò con loro, come dinota Pietro M. Caranto con molti altri ſcrittori (4). The ſame author obſerves (5), that ſome writers, to ingratiate themſelves with the Sforzas, pretended that neither Giacomuzzo nor Muzzo was the true name of that man; but that he was called Mutio, and was deſcended from Mutius Scævola; and they deny the whole ſtory of the ſpade. Theſe were flatterers, who had a mind to gain the favour of Giacomuzzo's poſterity. This is what Leandro Alberti ſays. Auvenga che alcuni cercando di acquiſtar gratia, ſcrivono altrimente (6). I do not know whether I am miſtaken, but I imagine that ſome flatterers, even in the life-time of our Sforza, extolled his birth, and denied what was the common report; for tho' it be infinitely more glorious to be raiſed to a great fortune by noble exploits, notwithſtanding the meanneſs of extraction, than to attain by the ſame means to the higheſt dignities with the help of a noble birth; yet moſt people are unwilling to be upbraided with the obſcurity of their original. Moſt of thoſe, who raiſe themſelves from the loweſt to the higheſt degree, are at laſt more willing not to be accounted ignoble, than to be looked upon as men, who have overcome by their perſonal merit the obſtacles of a mean extraction (7). They are very glad when they are ſaid to be deſcended from very illuſtrious anceſtors, and when care is taken to make every body forget the mean condition they were born in. They are ſeldom of Agathocles's mind, who being made king, would be ſerved at a table not only in plate, but alſo in earthen-ware, to let every body know that he was a potter's ſon (8).

Fama eſt fictilibus cænaſſe Agathoclea regem,
Atque abacum Samio ſæpe oneraſſe luto,
Fercula gemmatis quam poneret horrida vaſis,
Et miſceret opes pauperiemque ſimul.
Quærenti cauſam, reſpondit: Rex ego qui ſum
Sicaniæ, figulo ſum genitore ſatus (9).

He pretended with good reaſon to heighten his glory, by ſhewing that he was the artificer of his own fortune. There are ſome Panegyriſts in our days, who acknowledging on one hand, that their hero was a man of a moſt noble extraction; obſerve, on the other, that this luſtre of his family did not contribute to his high preferments. So true it is, that the recommendation of relations is thought to weaken the proofs of the merit of thoſe who are raiſed by that means. Here follows a paſſage of the funeral oration of Francis de Harlay Archbiſhop of Paris (10). ‘Such noble talents could not be buried in obſcurity, and there was no occaſion to aſk, how came he that was born ſo great to arrive at greatneſs. He was not beholden to favour for his elevation. His family, though never ſo noble, and ſo much reſpected, was not then in the happy circumſtances of thoſe houſes, wherein the ſtar of living fathers ſends down favourable influences upon children; wherein children, born with merit, have the advantage of diſcovering it ſooner than others, and of being more worthily rewarded for it; and wherein thoſe, who are leſs favoured by nature than fortune, need only have a good conduct to receive the favours, which the credit of their families cannot fail to procure to them. But the ſucceſſive preferments of the perſon we ſpeak of, were not owing to ſuch fortunate anticipations. Being more animated by the example of his relations to deſerve dignities, than helped by their intereſt to attain to them; he muſt himſelf have been the author of his fortune.’ However it be, I fancy Giacomuzzo was not much inclined to imitate Agathocles, and

(1) Taken from Franceſco Sanſovino dell' origine delle Caſe illuſtri d'Italia, fol. m. 10, verſo & 11.

(2) Jovius, Elog. viror. bellica virtute illuſtrium, lib. ii, pag. m. 192.

(3) Pietro M. Caranto.

(4) Leandro Alberti, Deſcrittioni di tutta Italia, fol. m. 318.

(5) Id. ibid. fol. 317, verſo.

(6) Id. ibid. fol. 318.

(7) Compare this with what is ſaid in the remark [A] of the article AMIOT.

(8) Plut. in Apophthegm. pag. 176.

(9) Auſonius, Epigr. VIII, pag. m. 9.

(10) Delivered in the Metropolitan church of Paris, by Father Gaillard a Jeſuit, the 23d of November 1695. See pag. 16, 17, of the Dutch edition.

that was at war with that prince, or that republic. They ſold their ſervices very dear, and took care to keep up the war [B]; it was the beſt way they could pitch upon to ſatisfy their exorbitant ambition. Sforza commanded the troops of Queen Joan in the Kingdom of Naples, whilſt Braccio commanded thoſe of Alfonſo of Arragon. Both of them died in that war. Sforza marching to relieve the town of Aquila, beſieged by Braccio, was drowned at the paſſage of the river Aterno [C]; and Braccio was killed ſome time after in the fight, wherein he was engaged near Aquila, againſt Queen Joan's troops, commanded by a ſon of Sforza, and againſt the Pope's troops. Sforza's body was not found. His rival was not much more fortunate with reſpect to burial; for the Pope ordered that the body of Braccio, who was excommunicated, ſhould be buried without the walls of Rome in a prophane place (e). Sforza had been Gonfalonniere of the Holy Church, and created Count of Cotignola by Pope John XXIII. He was put in poſſeſſion of Cotignola for the payment of the money the church owed him, which amounted to fourteen thouſand ducats (f). He left a numerous family behind him; his poſterity continues to this day [D]. He was a very ſtrong man, and plain, and minded not delicious fare [E]. It is ſaid he was one of thoſe who lay with the Queen of Naples (g). FRANCIS SFORZA who is the ſubject of the following article, was the chief and that his deſcendants were ſtill leſs willing to glory in the advantages that might accrue to them, by deriving their original from a man, who, notwithſtanding the meaneſt of conditions he was in, found the way to become ſo great a man. What makes me think ſo is, that ſome writers, in order to make their court, publiſhed very pompous genealogies. But I am apt alſo to believe that ſome made it their buſineſs to repreſent the extraction of our Sforza meaner than it was. People run into extreams upon ſuch an occaſion (11).

[B] They took care to keep up the war.] Paul Jovius hath very well obſerved this part of the character of thoſe two famous generals, and hath very juſtly ſaid, that it was a baſe trick, and a perfect trade. ‘Qui ab initio fraterna charitate inter ſe conjuncti, pari ſpe, parique induſtria, & paribus inſignium, laciniarumque coloribus militantes, uſque adeo inclaruere, ut fatali demum ambitione atque ſuperbia diducti, diverſas militiæ ſectas de nomine conderent, ac æmulatione gloriæ atque potentiæ, ex amicis hoſtes facti, ex adverſo ſemper arma tractarent; qua diſſentione potius quam ſimultate opimis ſtipendiis ſummiſque honoribus clari, atque opulenti evadebant; quum ſeſe infami aſtu, promercalique militia principibus Italiæ & liberis civitatibus venditarent, bellaque alere quam finire mallent; quod uterque de fortuna ſua immodicè ſperandum putaret, & nihil impervium vividæ virtuti, generosè & fortiter agentibus arbitrarentur (12). - - - Being at firſt united in brotherly love, fighting with the ſame hope and equal diligence, under the ſame banners, they became ſo famous, that when they were afterwards ſeparated by a fatal ambition and pride, they ſet up two military parties with different names, and of friends becoming enemies in emulation of glory and power, always engaged in oppoſite ſides; by which diſſention rather than hatred, they became famous and opulent, by means of their high commands and great pay, having by an infamous artifice ſet to ſale their mercenary ſervice in the wars, to the Princes and free States of Italy, endeavouring rather to protract the war, than put an end to it; for both of them conceived vaſt hopes of their good fortune, and believed nothing impoſſible to the vigorous induſtry of ſuch as act with courage and generoſity.’ This ambitious and mercenary ſpirit is the fault of moſt generals, who are not ſovereigns; but when they are ſoldiers of fortune, and in the pay of a prince whoſe ſubjects they are not, they are more apt to be guilty of that ſort of honourable treaſon, which conſiſts in not depriving a vanquiſhed enemy of all reſources, and to build him a bridge of gold, that the war may be kept up (13). They hope no peace will be made, whilſt neither of the parties get a conſiderable advantage, or ſuch as is not deciſive; and therefore they leave ſomething behind to do, and contrive the matter ſo, that the enemies do quickly make up their loſſes.

[C] Was drowned at the paſſage of the river Aterno.] This is the ancient name of that river; now called Peſcara. That General periſhed in it the third of January 1424, at fifty-four years of age, if we believe Collenuccio (14), and ſeveral other hiſtorians; but I have ſeen in a genealogy of the houſe of Sforza (15), that he was drowned the third of January 1426, being fifty-ſix years old.

[D] He left a numerous family behind him; his poſterity continues to this day.] He was married three times; firſt to Antonia Salimbeni, widow of the Lord de Cortona, who brought him Montegione, Montenegro, Ripa, Bagno, and Cluſi. His ſecond wife was ſiſter to Pandolfo Alopo, a Neapolitan, great chamberlain of the Kingdom of Naples. His third wife was Mary de Marciano, daughter of the Count de Seſſa. He left fifteen children behind him. CHARLES, one of his ſons, was Archbiſhop of Milan. Another called ALEXANDER married Conſtantia, daughter of Galeazzo Malateſta, and was Lord of Peſaro. Another named BOSIO married Eleonora Aldobrandini, Counteſs de Santa Fiore (16). The latter was Sforza's ſon by his firſt wife, and all the Sforzas that are now alive, are deſcended from him. The head of that family was made knight of the orders of St Michael and the Holy Ghoſt, in the year 1675, and married by proxy in the month of October 1678, Louiſa Adelaïde de Damas, daughter of the Marquis de Thiange, and neice to Madam de Monteſpan (17). He was ſixty-four years of age: his wife was but nineteen, and ſet out from Paris the twenty-ſeventh of April 1679, to go to him in Italy. The following paſſage relating to him, is to be found in the Mercure Galant (18). ‘The bridegroom is well-ſhaped, tho' ſomewhat advanced in years. He is a man of an agreeable humour, and of a ſound and ſolid wit. He is Duke of Onano in the patrimony of St Peter, and of Segni in the Campana di Roma, Count de Santa Fiore, in the territory of Siena, and ſovereign of Caſtel Arquato in Lombardy, and of Sforzeſca in the ſame patrimony of St Peter. Beſides all thoſe eſtates, the Duke Mario Sforza, father of the preſent duke, poſſeſſed the Duchy of Valmontone in the Campagna di Roma. He ſold it to the Lords Barberini for eleven hundred thouſand Roman crowns.’ As for the other children of our Sforza, I need not ſpeak of them, if you except him who became Duke of Milan, on whom I ſhall beſtow an article. Take notice that ALEXANDER SFORZA, Lord of Peſaro, was the father of Conſtantio who ſucceeded him. JOHN ſon (19) of the latter was poſſeſſed of the lordſhip of Peſaro, and married Lucretia Borgia, daughter of Pope Alexander VI, and afterwards the daughter of Matthew Tiepoli, a Venetian ſenator. Francis Mario della Rovere, Duke of Urbino, ſucceeded this John Sforza in his eſtates (20).

[E] He was a very ſtrong man, and plain, and minded not delicious fare.] He was very different in all this from his rival Braccio. Therefore we find that Paul Jovius ſets them in oppoſition as to theſe things. ‘In Braccio aſtuti & efficacis ingenii vis ardens eminebat; in Sfortia autem naturæ ſimplicitas, nullo fuco, nulloque literarum ſubſidio ſubnixa; apertique animi conſtans, & indomitus vigor laudabantur; in robuſto præſertim corpore ad ferendos labores geſtandaque arma prævalido. Braccius habitu corporis proximus delicato, ſplendore vitæ rerumque omnium apparatu ſumptuoſo, mirè gaudebat, utpote qui vel cum injuria alienæ pecuniæ appetens & profuſus eſſet. Ex adverſo Sfortia ad delitias rudis & agreſtis, frugi

---

(e) Taken from Paul Jovius in Elogiis Virorum bellica virtute illuſtrium, lib. ii, pag. m. 152, & ſeq.

(f) Taken from Leandro Alberti, ubi ſupra.

(g) See the remark [E].

(11) See the remark [A] in the article TOUCHET.

(12) Paulus Jovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 192, 193.

(13) Compare what is ſaid in remark [B] of the article CESAR, between citat. (13) and (14), and the remark of the article GONTAUT (ARMAND DE).

(14) Pandulphus Collenucius Hiſtor. Neapolit. lib. v, pag. 408. Edit. Latinæ Dordrac. 1618, in 8vo.

(15) It is in the Mercure Galant, for November 1678, page 164, of the Dutch edition.

(16) Taken from Sanſovino, ubi ſupra.

(17) See the Mercure Galant for November 1678, pag. 164, in the genealogical table.

(18) Ibid. pag. 165.

(19) Not his lawful but his natural ſon, as Leandro Alberti obſerves, Deſcrit. d'Italia, folio 318, verſo.

(20) Taken from Sanſovino, ubi ſupra.

chief heir of his valour (b) and fortune. He had him by a woman of pleaſure, who followed the army (i); her name was Lucia Terzana (k).

(b) This muſt not be underſtood, as if none of the reſt had been warriors. Varillas, who ſays, ubi infra, that none of them had a martial inclination, is miſtaken.

(i) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louïs XI. livr. ii, pag. 134. Dutch edition.

(k) See the Genealogical table of the houſe of Sforza, p. 164, of the Mercure Galant for November 1678, Dutch edition.

‘frugi diſciplina, convictu ſubitario & planè militari, contemptuque prorſus omnis luxuriæ lætabatur; utpote qui valida potius quam decora arma, proceros & peracres generoſæ ſobolis equos, vir equitandi peritiſſimus, vera imperatoriæ dignitatis inſtrumenta eſſe putaret, nec quicquam ad inanem ſpeciem exquiſiti ornatus oſtentare conſueſſet (21). - - - - In Braccio, the lively force of a crafty and prevailing wit was conſpicuous; but in Sfortia ſimplicity of nature, without craft, without learning, a conſtant and undaunted vigour, of an open mind, eſpecially being joined to a robuſt body fitted for the fatigues of war. Braccio, being of a more delicate habit of body, took great pleaſure in living ſplendidly, and in ſumptuous proviſions of all ſorts, being profuſe and covetous, even to injuſtice, of what was the property of others. On the contrary, Sfortia, being unacquainted with nice living, and frugal, was pleaſed with eaſily provided military fare, utterly deſpiſing all luxury, for he judged ſtrong rather than beautiful armour, tall and high mettled horſes of a generous breed, to be the proper furniture of martial dignity; nor had he ever uſed exquiſite ornament for an empty ſhew.’ Perhaps, ſome will think that Sforza's plain way, and his averſion for luxury, may be alledged to ſhew the falſity of the ſlanderous reports that have been ſpread of his and the Queen of Naples amours; but this would be an ill-grounded imagination, ſince it is otherwiſe certain he loved women, and was of ſignal ſtrength of body, which was no ſmall bait for that princeſs (22). She loaded him with favours. ‘Coſtui . . . fondò la grandezza della ſua famiglia, non ſolamente col nome, chiamandola Sforza, mai col Stato; percioche fatto Generale de gli eſſerciti di Giovanna 2. Regina di Napoli, con laquale ſi dice, che hebbe da fare, hebbe in dono da lei, Benevento, Manfredonio, Baroli, & Trani con più di 20, caſtella (23). - - - Being made general of the army of Joan II, Queen of Naples, with whom he is ſaid to have had an amorous correſpondence, he was preſented by her with Benevento, Manfredonia, Baroli, and Trani, and more than twenty caſtles. See the Margin (24).

(21) Paulus Jovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 192.

(22) See before the remark [I], of the article NAPLES (JOAN II, QUEEN OF.)

(23) Sanſovino, ubi ſupra.

(24) We read in pag. 88, of the Ritrati & Elogii, di Capitani illuſtri, edition of Rome, 1646, that after he had overcome near Aquila, the troops of Antognaccio and of James Caldora, and then made Caldora and the Count de Monte Riſo priſoners, and forced ſeveral barons to take an oath to Queen Joan, ſhe made him High Conſtable of the kingdom.

SFORZA (Francis) natural ſon of Giacomuzzo Attendolo, who is the ſubject of the foregoing article, made ſtill a more ſplendid fortune than his father. He was created Count of Tricarico at thirteen years of age, by Ladiſlaus King of Naples (a), and was early accounted a great warrior. He defeated the troops commanded by Braccio, which diſputed the paſſage of the Peſcara (b): but that advantage proved of no uſe to him; for his father having been drowned in that river, the deſign of raiſing the ſiege of Aquila was laid aſide. Francis Sforza was then but twenty-three years of age (c). He was confirmed by Queen Joan in all the dignities, and in the poſſeſſion of all the lands ſhe had beſtowed upon Giacomuzzo, and he received orders from that princeſs to make himſelf ready for the ſiege of Naples. He very much contributed to the reduction of that town (d), and then to the victory obtained near Aquila over the troops of Braccio, the ſecond of June 1425 (e). Pope Martin V ſent him againſt Nicolas Trincio, Lord of Foligno, and he forced him to accept of a peace upon the conditions he propoſed to him. Afterwards he ſerved the Duke of Milan both againſt the Florentines and the Venetians, and ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions (f). He did alſo many ſervices to Queen Joan; and when ſhe died, which happened in 1435, he applied himſelf, to Renatus d'Anjou, whom ſhe had made her heir. That prince was unhappy, and obliged to yield to his ill fortune. But Sforza, who had no leſs induſtry than courage, never wanted means to ſupport himſelf. He made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places in the March of Ancona, and even uſurped ſome ſtates belonging to the Church. Whereupon he was excommunicated by Pope Eugenius IV (g) [A], who, not ſatisfied to have ſtruck him with the ſpiritual thunder-bolt, had recourſe to temporal arms and confederacies, whereby Francis Sforza loſt the March of Ancona in 1444 (h). He quickly recovered himſelf by gaining a battle, in which the ſon of Picenini and Cardinal de Fermo, the Pope's legate, were taken priſoners (i). I ſhould be too long, if I was to give a particular account of all the wars wherein he was engaged; and therefore I ſhall only ſay, that by the treaty of peace concluded the twenty-ſecond of November 1441, it was agreed that he ſhould marry the natural daughter of the Duke of Milan (k). Accordingly he married her, which made way for a great fortune; for he became Duke of Milan after the death of his father-in-law [B]. That ſucceſſion did belong to a prince of the houſe of France (l), and yet it fell to Francis Sforza, who was favoured therein by Lewis XI (m). He poſſeſſed this ſtate till he died, and governed it with great moderation, and was accounted one of the greateſt princes of Italy. It has been ſaid of him

(a) Sanſovino, dell' origine delle Caſe illuſtri d'Italia, folio 11.

(b) Jovius, in Elogiis Viror. bellica virtute illuſtrium. lib. ii, pag. 195.

(c) Collenucius, Hiſt. Neapol. lib. v, pag. m. 409, Mr Varillas, Hiſtoire de Louïs XI, livr. ii, p. 134, ſays he was only 20.

(d) It was ſubdued for the queen in January 1425.

(e) Ex eodem Collenuc. ibid. pag. 409, 410.

(f) See the book intituled Ritratti & Elogii di Capitani illuſtri, pag. 131, edition of Rome 1646.

(g) Spondanus, ad ann. 1442, num. 11.

(h) Vianoli, Hiſtoria Veneta, Tom. i, pag. 598.

(i) Id. ibid. pag. 599.

(k) Id. ibid. pag. 590.

(l) See Varillas, Hiſt. de Louïs XI, book ii.

(m) Id. ibid.

[A] Whereupon he was excommunicated by Pope Eugenius IV.] This was a great alteration; for the ſame Pope had given him formerly the keeping of the March of Ancona, the dignity of Gonfaloniere of the Church, and a commiſſion to make war againſt Nicolas Fortebraccio, who had ſeized upon ſeveral places in the Eccleſiaſtical State. Sforza did very well diſcharge that commiſſion, and defeated the troops of Fortebraccio at Tivoli. Note, that afterwards this Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines, gave him the command of their troops, when they declared war againſt the Duke of Milan (1).

[B] He became Duke of Milan after the death of his father-in-law.] Philip Maria Viſconti, who poſſeſſed that duchy, died in the month of Auguſt 1447, leaving no other child behind him, but a natural daughter married to Francis Sforza. Many laid a claim to that ſucceſſion. The Emperor Frederic III maintained that this duchy was devolved to the empire, ſince the laſt duke had left no lawful iſſue. Alfonſo, King of Naples, him that no uſurper was ever a better ſovereign (n). He was certainly endowed with ſeveral good qualities, and though he had never ſtudied, yet he promoted learning, and ſpoke with as much eloquence as an Orator [C], and argued about political affairs with a wonderful ſtrength of wit and judgment. The animoſity wherewith he went about to deſtroy the whole faction of Braccio, was thought to be exceſſive [D]. He died the eighth Naples, alledged the laſt will of that duke, who had made him his heir. The Duke of Orleans alledged his being related to him, for he was the ſon of Valentina, ſiſter to that duke. Francis Sforza grounded his pretenſion upon the duke's adoption, to which he added the right of his wife (2). During thoſe contentions, the Milaneſe thought they had a favourable opportunity to erect themſelves into a Republic. Wherefore they elected twelve magiſtrates, whom they called the conſervators of liberty (3), and tore the laſt will of the late duke, and gave the command of the troops to Francis Sforza, to continue the war with the Venetians (4). This laſt point of their conduct was very impolitic, and inconſiſtent with their deſign of eſtabliſhing a republican government. They were not ſenſible that there is nothing more favourable to thoſe, who have a mind to ſway a ſcepter, than to put the ſword into their hands (5). That captain-general of the Milaneſe gained great advantages over the Republic of Venice. His reputation was more and more increaſed by it; and doubtleſs it was the reaſon why the Milaneſe deprived him of new occaſions of ſignalizing himſelf: they divided his army, and leſſened his troops that he might not form any conſiderable enterprize. He underſtood the meaning of it, and found out an expedient which did very much favour his ambition. He made a propoſal of peace to the Republic of Venice. ‘Doppo queſti auvenimenti moſtrò inclinatione lo Sforza à reconciliarſi coi Veneti; moſſo à ciò principalmente dai trattamenti che riceveva dai Milaneſi troppo aſpri; e come di geloſi della di lui potenza ingrati, e ſpiacevoli, mentre con la diviſione delle ſue genti, e con lo ſcemamento dell' eſercito gli andavano tarpando l'ali per impedirgli il volo alla Ducale altezza; onde fù ſpedito da eſſo à Venetia Clemente Tealdino Secretario, che ſi trovava prigione con Almorò Donato nella Rocca di Cremona à proporre la trattatione della pace (6). - - - After theſe events, Sforza appeared inclined to make his peace with the Venetians, being chiefly induced to it by the harſh uſage he met with from the Milaneſe, who being jealous of his power, and afterwards ungrateful to him and diſſatisfied with him, endeavoured, by dividing his troops and reducing his army, to ſtop him in his progreſs to the ducal honour. Whereupon he diſpatched to Venice the ſecretary Clemente Tealdino, who was then priſoner in the caſtle of Cremona with Almoro Donato, to propoſe a treaty of peace.’ His propoſals were approved of, and a treaty was concluded, whereby the Republic engaged to aſſiſt him with men and money, in order to make himſelf maſter of the town and duchy of Milan; and it was agreed upon, that all the conqueſts, as far as the river Adda, ſhould belong to the Republic of Venice (7). As ſoon as the Duke of Savoy heard of that confederacy, he reſolved to aſſiſt the Milaneſe, but the troops he ſent them were cut to pieces by Francis Sorfza before they joined thoſe of Milan; and then he made it his buſineſs to ſtreighten that great city (8). The Venetians being apprehenſive that he would ſubdue it, broke with him, and confederated with the Milaneſe. Nevertheleſs he purſued his point; he made an agreement with the Duke of Savoy, and confirmed the alliance between him and the Florentines. He hindered the Venetians from ſuccouring Milan: a famine, and the diviſions of the Milaneſe, and their ſpite againſt the Venetians, brought that great affair to an end; they ſubmitted to him, and received him into their town the twenty-ſixth of February, 1450 (9), and acknowledged him for their duke (10). Thus the meaſures that city and ſeveral other neighbouring towns had taken to ſet themſelves at liberty, after the death of Philip Maria Viſconti, vaniſhed into ſmoak. Spondanus rightly obſerves, that many towns in Italy fell at that time into ſlavery, becauſe they were too fond of avoiding it; for ſeveral factions ſtarting up, they were ſometimes for one form of government, and ſometimes for another; and when one of the factions was uppermoſt, they cruelly treated the contrary party. Was not this making way for ſlavery? Mediolanenſes ſervandæ per ſe libertatis impotentes erant; & ut in his fieri mos erat civitatum Italicarum, illam tueri quærentes, mutuis diſſenſionibus, ac diverſis regiminis mutationibus, crudelitatibuſque faciliorem ſervituti viam ſternebant (11). That annaliſt obſerves, that the populace of Milan killed the Venetian ambaſſador, having mutinyed, becauſe the ſuccours promiſed by the Republic had not entered the town; and he adds, that the Venetians did cunningly put off the relief of it, in hopes to oblige the Milaneſe to ſubmit to their domination (12).

(1) Taken from the Rittratti & Elogii di Capitani illuſtri, pag. 131, 132, edition of Rome 1646.

[C] He was endowed with many good qualities, and tho' he had never ſtudied, yet he promoted learning, and ſpoke with as much eloquence as an Orator.] He expreſſed, upon ſeveral occaſions, his great grief for his want of learning: his liberality towards learned men proceeded from his great deſire that they ſhould write his actions, and immortalize his name. He took care to procure that honour to his father, by the pen of a famous writer; but his own Hiſtorian was more famous ſtill, and went about that work with an extream diligence. I mean John Simoneta, who wrote the hiſtory of Francis Sforza in thirty-one books, and declares he advances nothing but what he had ſeen, or was very ſure of. His work was printed at Milan in 1479, and reaches from the year 1424, to 1466 (13). Here follows a paſſage of Paul Jovius, which proves the text of this remark. ‘In hunc hominem præter invictum corporis atque animi robur, ſumma etiam dona, quæ tribui poterant, natura contulerat perſonæ ſcilicet dignitatem eximiam; os probum, & in omni congreſſu aſpectum ſine ſuperbia ſuis pariter atque hoſtibus venerabilem, ſic, ut cuncti in eo ſæpius concionante facundiam abſoluto oratore parem admirarentur, eoque plenius, quòd nullas attigiſſet literas; & nihilo ſecius in omni civili militarique negocio, efficacis prudentiæ, divinique judicii vim expeditam & incredibilem afferret. Sed literarum decus, quum ſeſe ejus expertem ingenuo pudore ſæpe dolens fateretur, liberaliſſimè tuebatur. Juſtæ ſiquidem & veræ laudis, quæ viventi ornamento eſſet, & tranſiret ad poſteros, erat avidiſſimus. A Joanne Simoneta namque inſigni hiſtorico, & à Philelpho poeta percelebri res ſuas bello paceque geſtas perſcribi celebrarique jubebat, ſicuti etiam patris vitam Leodorix Cribellus ejus juſſu antea perſcripſerat (14). - - - - Upon this man, beſides an invincible ſtrength of body and mind, nature had beſtowed all manner of gifts; namely, a ſingular dignity of perſonage; an excellent feature, and, on all occaſions, an aſpect without pride, reſpected by friends as well as enemies, ſo that all admired the eloquence of his frequent ſpeeches equal to that of a compleat Orator, and ſo much the more, as being unlearned; yet nevertheleſs in all civil and military affairs, he exerted a ready and wonderful ſtrength of a prevailing prudence and a ſublime judgment. But he would often acknowledge, ingenuouſly and with regret, his want of learning, of which he was a very liberal encourager. He was moſt deſirous of a juſtly deſerved praiſe, which might be his ornament whilſt alive, and after paſs to his poſterity. He ordered his tranſactions in war and peace to be recorded, and publiſhed by John Simoneta, an eminent Hiſtorian, and by Philelphus, a very famous Poet, in like manner as Cribellus, by his command alſo, had written the life of his father.’ He had been ſaying that Francis Sforza governed the Milaneſe for the ſpace of ſixteen years, with ſo much wiſdom, juſtice, and mildneſs, and kept himſelf ſo free from all manner of vice (15), that he was accounted the beſt prince of that time. But Nauclerus ſays, that the love of women made him commit ſome injuſtices in his old age (16).

[D] The animoſity, wherewith he went about to deſtroy the whole faction of Braccio was thought to be exceſſive.] He had ſubdued it, but being afraid that the ſon of Picininus might revive it again, he reſolved to deſtroy him; and the better to ſucceed in it, he pretended to love him, and married him to one of his daughters. Afterwards he delivered him to Ferdinand, King of Naples, who, contrary to his word given, and all the rights of hoſpitality, cauſed him to be beheaded in priſon.

(n) Varillas, ibid. pag. 140.

(2) See Spondanus's Annals. ad ann. 1447. num. 7.

(3) Leand. Albertus, Deſcript. Italiæ, pag. 678, Edit. Latinæ 1657, in folio.

(4) Vianoli, Hiſtor. Veneta, Tom. i. p. 604.

(5) Ben convenendozi la ſpada à quella mano che vuole ſcettro. Vianoli, ubi ſupra.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 605, 606.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 606.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 607.

(9) Vianoli, ſays 1449.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 613, 614.

(11) Spondanus, ad ann. 1449, num. 7, p. m. 9.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 625.

(14) Jovius, in Elogiis Viror. bellica virtute illuſtrium, lib. iii, pag. 222.

(15) Adverſus omnem vitiorum intemperiem. Id. ibid. p. 221.

(16) Hic etſi cunctos prudentia & felicitate principes ſui temporis excelluiſſet, in ſenectute tamen mulierum ardore deceptus nimium prævaricatus eſt. Nauclerus, Generat. XLIX, pag. m. 970.

eighth of March 1466, aged ſixty-five years (o). He left fifteen children behind him, ſome lawfully begotten, and others not; but his poſterity was wholly extinct in 1535 [E]. The condition, which he required in treating of the marriage of his ſon with the daughter of the Marquis of Mantua, has ſomething ſingular in it [F]: I ſhall make a remark priſon. This was an horrid crime: Paul Jovius condemns it in very ſtrong words. Fuere qui ei (Franciſco Sfortiæ) inexorablis odii notam inurerent, quòd perſequendæ Bracciacæ factionis nunquam oblitus, Jacobum Piccinini filium ſummæ ſpei ducem, ſub quo Bracciana arma refloreſcere poſſe viderentur, nequaquam ſyncera fide in generum aſciverit; ſcilicet ut eo vinculo pignoreque deceptum, ad teterrimam necem Ferdinando Neapolitano regi proderet. Ab eo enim rege contra fidem refricata veterum offenſionum memoria, vir impiger in carcere per Æthiopem ſervum averſa ſecuri mactatus eſt, ſingulari quidem cum infamia tantorum principum, qui vindictæ libidinem ſacroſanctæ fidei & hoſpitalis menſæ religioni prætuliſſent (17).

(o) Spondanus, ad ann. 1466, numb. 6, pag. m. 109.

[E] He left fifteen children (18) behind him, ſome lawfully begotten, and others not; but his poſterity was . . . . extinct in 1535.] His firſt wife was Polyxena Ruffa, whoſe dowry made him lord of three towns and above twenty caſtles. His ſecond wife, as has been ſaid above, was the only daughter of the Duke of Milan. The ſon who ſucceeded him was called JOHN GALEAZZO MARIA SFORZA (19). I have ſaid in another place (20) how he was killed. His ſon JOHN GALEAZZO SFORZA, who ſucceeded him, was then but four years of age, and LUDOVIC SFORZA his uncle, ſon of Francis, took care of his education. You may ſee in another place (21), how he periſhed in the year 1494. His ſon was excluded from the ſucceſſion by the intrigues of Ludovic Sforza, who got himſelf declared Duke of Milan, and thereby obtained the imperial inveſtiture, which his predeceſſors could never obtain: that inveſtiture extended to natural children, in caſe the lawful iſſue ſhould fail. Is poſtquam à Maximiliano Imperatore novi principatus auctoritatem obtinuiſſet, magna cum ſolemnitate totiuſque civitatis gratulatione Ducatus inſignia cepit, die qui D. Theodoro martyri feſtus habetur, anno à C. N. MCCCCXCV. Primus ex Sfortia gente Mediolanenſis Ducatus titulum ac dignitatem jure nactus eſt, quoniam anteriores auctoritatem principatus ab Sacro Imperio Romano hactenus impetrare non potuerant. Fuit autem in formula Ludovici non ſolum de filiis juſtis ut invicem ſibi ſuccedendi jus haberent, comprehenſum, ſed etiam de nothis, uti ego vidi, ſi juſtos non extare contingeret (22). He was deprived of his ſtates in the year 1499, by Lewis XII King of France, grandſon to Valentina Viſconti, daughter of John Galeazzo, Duke of Milan. He raiſed ſome troops in Swiſſerland, and the year following returned into the Milaneſe, and recovered moſt places of that duchy; but the Swiſs delivered him to the French, and from that day till his death, which happened in the year 1508, he was kept in priſon. Lewis XII poſſeſſed the Milaneſe for ſome years following; but loſt it in 1512, and MAXIMILIAN SFORZA Ludovic's ſon, recovered it. He could not keep it after the victory which Francis I. obtained over the Swiſs in the year 1515, at the battle of Marignan, and was forced to ſurrender himſelf. He was ſent into France, where he died. FRANCIS SFORZA, his brother, was eſtabliſhed in 1522, Duke of Milan, by the power of a league, which had overcome the French. He did not enjoy that ſtate quietly, nor without interruption, being ſometimes expelled by the French, and then reſtored by Charles V, and ſometimes alſo ill uſed by that emperor, who at laſt admitted him into his favour in the year 1530. From that time he peaceably enjoyed his ſtates till the year 1535, in which he died. He was the laſt of all thoſe who deſcended from Francis Sforza, firſt of that name (23). Charles V then poſſeſſed himſelf of the Milaneſe, and he inveſted his ſon, Philip II, with it the twelfth of December 1549. The terms of the inveſtiture take in Philip II and all his poſterity, both males and females for ever, according to the order obſerved in the hereditary ſucceſſions of ſtates, that may fall to women.

[F] The condition which he required in treating of the marriage of his ſon to the daughter of the Marquis of Mantua, has ſomething ſingular in it.] I have ſaid in another place (24), that according to the agreement between him and Lewis Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua, his ſon Galeazzo was to marry Dorothy, that Marquis's daughter, provided it ſhould appear that ſhe had no crooked back, nor any other imperfection in her body, at fourteen years of age. By virtue of that agreement, he ſent ſome Phyſicians to inſpect the naked body of Dorothy; but the Marquis would not ſuffer it. A very learned Civilian being conſulted about that queſtion, maintained, that Francis Sforza was in the right. Many people were ſurprized at the anſwer of that advocate. Read the following paſſage of Camerarius in his hiſtorical meditations. 'Many wonder 'how Franciſcus Aretinus, a famous Civilian, under- 'took to prove that Francis Sforza Duke of Milan, 'was in the right to require that Dorothy daughter 'of Ludovic Marquis of Mantua, contracted to Ga- 'leazzo the ſon of that duke, ſhould be viewed naked 'by ſome Phyſicians he had ſent for that purpoſe, 'to know whether there was any deformity in her 'body: That on the contrary, the Marquis was in 'the wrong to refuſe ſuch an inſpection, offering only 'to ſhew them his daughter dreſſed in the peticoat, 'which Galeazzo had ſent her (25).' Camerarius had read this particular in a book of Tiraquellus, whom he quotes. I ſhall ſet down Tiraquellus's own words, whereby it will appear that Philip Decius, a famous Civilian, approved the opinion of the Advocate Aretinus. 'Proinde non recte fortaſſis pleriſque videbitur 'conſuluiſſe vir alioquin doctiſſimus autorque graviſſi- 'mus Fran. Are. conſ. 142. ex facto proponitur quòd 'illuſtris in tertio, & iterum in quarto dubio ejuſdem 'conſ. cum omnibus nervis contendit probare Fran- 'ciſcum Sfortiam Ducem Mediolani jure petiiſſe, ut 'Dorothea filia Ludovici Marchionis Mantuæ Galea- 'tio ipſius Ducis filio deſponſata, nuda à quibuſdam 'Medicis à ſe miſſis conſpiceretur, ut hinc detegere- 'tur, ſi qua puellæ eſſet deformitas: contra Ludovi- 'cum hoc ipſum injuria recuſaſſe, ſed tantum filiam 'obtuliſſe videndam, Cotta (ſic enim appellat) quam 'ad eam Galeatius ipſe miſerat, coopertam. Cujus 'tamen conſilium probat Philip. Dec. in d. ca. pro- 'poſuiſti in 2. notab. An tamen bene uterque ſen- 'ſerit, aliorum ſit judicium (26). - - - Wherefore it 'will poſſibly be thought, that a right advice was not 'given by the Counſellor Francis Aretin, otherwiſe a 'moſt learned perſon and grave author, in maintaining 'that Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan, was in the 'right to demand, that Dorothea daughter of Lewis 'Marquis of Mantua, betrothed to Galeazzo the Duke's 'ſon, ſhould be viewed naked by ſome Phyſicians ſent on 'purpoſe, to ſee if there was any defect in her. On the 'other hand, that Lewis was in the wrong to refuſe it, 'and only to offer his daughter to be ſeen in a petticoat, 'which Galeazzo himſelf had ſent. Whoſe advice was 'notwithſtanding approved by Philippus Decius. But 'whether they both were in the right, or not, let others 'judge.' You ſee that Tiraquellus durſt not decide whether thoſe two Civilians were in the right; and yet he comments in that very place upon a law, which he reduced to theſe terms, Let the betrothed couple diſcover their deformities one to another; however, let them not ſtrip themſelves ſtark naked, and particularly let the woman forbear doing it. Suam quiſque deformitatem futuro marito, aut uxori detegito. Ne tamen ſe propterea, præſertim fœmina, nudato (27). He had been ſaying, that if women have any bodily imperfection, that is not known, they ought to acquaint with it thoſe whom they are to marry, verbally only, but not by ſhewing it. (28) Illud fœminas ipſas monemus, ut ſi qua in eis ſit occulta deformitas, ei certe cui nubere velint, non re quidem, id eſt corporis nudatione, ſed verbis adaperiant, propter eam maxime rationem (29) quæ à nobis dicta eſt cum de viris in hujus capitis initio loqueremur. It ſeems therefore, that to avoid contradicting himſelf, he ſhould have altogether condemned the opinion of the Civilian Franciſcus Aretinus. It may be anſwered in his vindication, that there are ſome particular caſes, or ſpecial agreements which diſpenſe with the law, and that therefore he would not interpoſe his judgment about the conduct of Francis Sforza, and the Marquis of Mantua. He might have thought that there were ſome circum-

(17) Jovius, in Elog. Virorum bellica virtute illuſtrium, lib. iii, pag. 222, 223.

(18) Sanſovino, dell' orig. delle Caſe illuſtri d'Italia, folio ii, verſo.

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) In the article LAMPONIANO.

(21) In the article ARAGON. (ISABELLA OF)

(22) Leand. Albertus, in Deſcript. Italiæ, pag. 680.

(23) Taken from Leander Albertus, ubi ſupra,

(24) Above, remark [C] of the article ARETIN (FRANCIS).

(25) Camerarius, Meditat. Hiſtoriques, Tom. i, book ii, ch. xiv, pag. m. 168.

(26) Tiraquellus in Legem IV, connubial. num. 28, pag. m. 85.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 87.

(28) Id. ibid.

(29) See that reaſon towards the latter end of this remark.

remark on it.

circumſtances in the caſe, which made the thing problematical. It is very likely Francis Sforza meant by the words of his agreement with Dorothy's father, that ſhe ſhould be ſearched, but that it was not in expreſs words ſaid, ſhe ſhould be ſeen ſtark naked. Had this clauſe been expreſſed, the Marquis of Mantua would have broke his word by refuſing what the Duke required; and if it was not expreſſed, he might ſay he never meant that his daughter ſhould be inſpected after the manner the Duke would have it. Wherefore the reaſons pro and con might have been ſpecious, and hindred Tiraquellus from attempting to decide the matter. He was not ignorant that it was more neceſſary for ſovereign princes than for private perſons, to know whether there are any concealed imperfections, that may make one fear a woman's barrenneſs. Francis Sforza deſigned to marry his ſon to the daughter of Lewis Gonzaga; and therefore it highly concerned him that ſhe ſhould want nothing: And it is well known, that there are many cuſtoms contrary to the common practice in favour of princes. See what I have ſaid before (30) concerning the cuſtom of the Muſcovites. It affords another reaſon for the doubting of Tiraquellus, and ſhewing that he does not contradict himſelf.

I ſhall occaſionally obſerve, that he alledges a great number of things upon this ſubject, and is ſometimes miſtaken. He is in the wrong to ſay (31), that in antient times, maids that were to marry, went to the temple of Fortuna Virilis, where they pulled off their clothes, that it might be known whether there was any concealed imperfection in their bodies. Mr Du Boulay gives a better account of that cuſtom. He ſays, that on the firſt day of April, ‘the Roman ladies being crowned with myrtle, offered a ſacrifice to Venus, after they had well waſhed themſelves under the myrtle. Ovid mentions the cauſe of that cuſtom in the fourth book of the Faſti; He ſays, that Venus one day drying her wet hair upon the banks of a river, the ſatyrs perceived her ſtark naked as ſhe was, of which ſhe was ſo aſhamed, that immediately ſhe covered herſelf with myrtle, which was conſecrated to her ever ſince, and this occaſioned the celebration of that feaſt. Upon that ſame day the maids that were ready to be married, ſacrificed to Fortuna Virilis with a little perfume and frankincenſe, and there ſtripped themſelves ſtark naked before the goddeſs, ſhewing her all the imperfections of their bodies, and beſeeching her not to diſcover them to their future huſbands (32).’ He has omitted one circumſtance, viz. That the ladies before they waſhed themſelves, ſtripped the goddeſs Venus, and waſhed her. Here follow the words of the Roman Poet, who informs us of all thoſe ceremonies.

Rite Deam Latiæ colitis matreſque nuruſque;
Et vos, quis vittæ longaque veſtis abeſt.
Aurea marmoreo redimicula ſolvite collo:
Demite divitias: tota lavanda Dea eſt.
Aurea ſiccato redimicula reddite collo:
Nunc alii flores, nunc nova danda roſa eſt.
Vos quoque ſub viridi myrto jubet illa lavari:
Cauſſaque, cur jubeat, (diſcite) certa ſubeſt.
Litore ſiccabat rorantes nuda capillos.
Viderunt Satyri turba proterva Deam.
Senſit, & appoſita texit ſua corpora myrto.
Tuta fuit facto: voſque referre jubet.
Diſcite nunc, quare Fortunæ thura Virili
Detis eo, calida qui locus humet aqua,
Accipit ille locus poſito velamine cunctas;
Et vitium nudi corporis omne videt.
Ut tegat hoc, celetque viros, Fortuna Virilis
Præſtat: & hoc parvo thure rogata facit (33).

That cuſtom of the Roman virgins, ſo ill related by Tiraquellus, was a trick and a fraud, wholly contrary to the ſincerity he recommends to women, in the preliminaries of marriage. They applied themſelves to Fortuna Virilis, as others made their addreſs to the goddeſs Laverna, and begged of her that ſhe would render inviſible the faults they were guilty of.

Pulcra Laverna
Da mihi fallere, da juſtum ſanctumque videri,
Noctem peccatis & fraudibus objice nubem (34):

Good, good Laverna, grant me aid
For ſuch a cheat, let all believe me good;
Let me ſeem juſt and honeſt to the croud,
And o'er my cheats and forgeries caſt a cloud.
CREECH.

In a word, that practice of the Roman ladies was a very bad one, tho' it was not ſo abominable as that of the Egyptian women, who ſhewed their nakedneſs to the ox Apis, for the ſpace of forty days. That ox was the chief deity of the Egyptians. Ἐν δὲ ταῖς προειρημέναις τετταράκονθ' ἡμέραις μόνον ὁρῶσιν αὐτὸν αἱ γυναῖκες, κατὰ πρόσωπον ἱστάμεναι, καὶ δεικνύουσιν ἀνασυράμεναι τὰ ἑαυτῶν γεννητικὰ μόρια. Per XL. illos dies fœminæ duntaxat ipſum (Apis) vident, ante faciem ejus conſtitutæ, elevatiſque peplis inguina oſtentant (35). What an abominable notion had they of the gods, whom they made the ſpectators of ſuch things! This was not only a ſin offending againſt modeſty, but alſo an impious thing; and I make no doubt, that all the Romans, who knew the rules of a modeſt education, condemned the ceremonies practiſed on the firſt day of April. One may, without reading St Jerom, approve what he ſays, to ſhew that we ought to be aſhamed of our own nakedneſs. ‘Scio præcepiſſe quoſdam, ne virgo Chriſti cum eunuchis lavet, nec cum maritatis fœminis: quia alii non deponant animos virorum: aliæ tumentibus uteris præferant fœditatem. Mihi omninò in adulta virgine lavacra diſplicent, quæ ſe ipſam debat erubeſcere, & nudam videre non poſſe (36). - - - I know ſome have taught, that a Chriſtian virgin ought never to go into a bath with an eunuch or married women, becauſe thoſe have not laid aſide their maſculine inclinations; and the others, by their big-bellies may ſhew what is unſeemly. As for my ſelf, I am of opinion, that a virgin that is marriageable, ſhould not go into a bath, who ſhould even bluſh, and be averſe to behold herſelf naked.’ It is not enough to condemn the impudent practices authorized by the laws of Lycurgus (37), we ought alſo to condemn the anniverſary cuſtoms mentioned by Ovid: and if the difference between the Duke of Milan, and the Marquis of Mantua was to be decided, it were much better to praiſe the conduct of the Marquis than that of the Duke. The complaints of Cieco d'Hadria ought only to be looked upon as witticiſms. He exclaims againſt the vaſt difference between all other purchaſes and marriage. If a man buys a houſe, he will ſee every nook and corner of it from the cellar to the garret; and yet he does not confine himſelf to it for his life: He may ſell it again, or let it, if he does not like it. It is the ſame with all other merchandiſe. The only thing, ſays Cieco d'Hadria, a man cannot part with, when he has purchaſed it, is that about which he ſtrikes a bargain without examining it. ‘Tutte le coſe ſi conſiderano prima che ſi comprino. Le caſe ſi mirano, gli ſtromenti ſi odono, le popone ſi annaſano, il vino ſi guſta, il panno ſi tocca, le fuſa ſi maneggiano, le caraffe ſi palpano d'ogni parte ſe ſon intere, i leuti s'abbraciano, le ſtringhe ſi ſtendono, i legni ſi miſurano, le ſcarpe ſi calzano, i cavalli ſi cavalcano, le vacche ſi ſcegliono, e in ſomma tutte le coſe ſi provano con quei ſenſi, con cui le habbiamo à goder prima, che ſi conchiuda il mercato. Le mogli ſole, che non ſi poſſano mai più rifiutare in vita, con cui biſogna ſtar ſempre fino alla morte, ſi prendono à chiuſi ochi, à gatt' orba, e come ſi dice, gatta in ſacco. Ne pur ſi provano, perche non riuſcirebbono al paragone. Ne pur ſi moſtrano, perche ſe ſi vedeſſero ſi ſprezzerebbono prima, che ſi pigliaſſero (38). - - - We examine every thing, before we purchaſe it. We view a houſe, try a muſical inſtrument, ſmell a melon, taſte wine, feel a piece of cloth, turn a ſpindle, view every ſide of a flaſk, to know if it is whole. We ſound a lute, wind up ſtrings, meaſure wood, try on ſhoes, ride horſes, chuſe out cows; and in ſhort we prove every thing in the manner we are to uſe it, before we make the bargain. Women alone, whom we can never return

---

(30) Citation (64), of the article FULVIA.

(31) Sed & legimus olim in templum Fortunæ virilis ventitare mulieres ſolitas quæ nuptui dabantur: & corpore nudato, num quo vitio aut labe eſſent affectas explorari ſolere. Tiraquell. ubi ſupra, num. xi, pag. 82.

(32) Du Boulay, Threſor des Antiquitez Romaines, pag. 516.

(33) Ovidius, Faſtor. lib. iv, ver. 133.

(34) Horat. Epiſt. xvi, lib. i, ver. 60.

(35) Diodorus Siculus, lib. i, pag. m. 54, cap. lxxxv. See the Hexameron Ruſtique, pag. m. 91.

(36) Hieronym. Epiſtola ad Lætam de inſtitut. filiæ, Epiſtol. lib. ii, pag. m. 264.

(37) See before the remarks [C], [D], and the following, of the article LYCURGUS. See alſo the article QUELLENEC, citation (41). Note that Montagne in book iii of his Eſſays, ch. v, pag. m. 129, & ſeq. ſeems willing to excuſe Lycurgus.

(38) Lettere famigliare del Cieco d'Hadria, pag. m. 35. See above the remark [C], of the article LYCURGUS.

‘turn as long as we live, and whom we muſt keep till we die, are taken blindly, like a pig in a poke. They are not tryed, becauſe they would not anſwer the teſt. neither do they ſuffer themſelves to be viewed, becauſe if they were ſeen, they would be ſlighted before they went off.’ How comically they talk. He would introduce into our contracts of marriage, either the cuſtom of the Taxites, an antient nation among the Indians (39), or that of the old Romans when they bought ſlaves; a cuſtom which the Emperor Auguſtus made ſubſervient to his unlawful love, as has been ſeen before in the article of Fulvia, citation (64).

I have promiſed above (40) to mention the reaſon alledged by Tiraquellus, why a man and a woman, who deſign to marry, ſhould diſcover their bodily imperfections to each other. A huſband, ſays he, who does not declare them in due time, runs the hazard of being hated by his wife when ſhe comes to know them: It is in vain for him to hope that ſhe will not perceive them; people that lie together in the ſame bed muſt needs find them out. Contempt, hatred, and horror, will be the conſequence of ſuch a diſcovery; and then the wife will think of other men. Si vir quiſpiam qui ſe matrimonio velit addicere, quicquam latentis vitii aut deformitatis in corpore habeat, id in primis uxori quam ducturus eſt, detegat, ne ſi jam conſummato matrimonio reſciſcat (neque enim illam qua cum dies nocteſque verſaris diu latere poteſt . . .) te contemnat, deteſtetur, abhorreat: proindeque alios petulanter ſectetur (41). Let no man fancy (Tiraquellus goes on) that he will have a wife like that, who being married to one that had a ſtinking noſe, did not complain of it, becauſe ſhe thought all men had the ſame defect (42). There are but two ſuch inſtances mentioned by antient authors; and none but a madman will expect ſuch a thing now a-days. Et ſane futurum adeo neminem inſanum reor qui noſtris præſertim temporibus, ſpem concipiat uxorem ſe his ſimilem inventurum, eaque ſpe ductus ſuum illi vitium non patefaciat (43). This is what he ſays to perſuade a man to conceal none of his imperfections, and to imitate the good example of the Philoſopher Crates (44), and of the father (45) of the Emperor Galba. He uſes the ſame arguments as to women, which he confirms by this, that marriage is a kind of purchaſe, and that juſtice requires the buyer ſhould be informed of the latent faults of what he buys (46). He proves all this by ſeveral authorities.

I do not know what was the iſſue of the difference between the Duke of Milan and the Marquis of Mantua about Dorothy's marriage. I cannot tell whether any expedient was found out to ſatisfy the father of the betrothed; but I find in Sanſovino (47), that John Galeazzo Maria, the ſon of our Francis Sforza, had two wives: One of them was Suſanna de Gonzaga, and the other Bonna of Savoy. The Abbot de Marolles affirms that Suſanna de Gonzaga, the daughter of Lewis Marquis of Mantua, was married to Galeazzo Maria Sforza Duke of Milan (48). The ſame Sanſovino ſays in another place (49), that Dorothy Gonzaga, daughter of Lewis Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua, was married to Galeazzo Maria Sforza Duke of Milan. It is very likely, that thro' a miſtake he is frequently liable to, he calls the ſame perſon Suſanna in one place, and Dorothy in another. From whence it ought to be inferred that, according to him, the ſon of Francis Sforza was married to a daughter of the Marquis of Mantua; which would prove that the difference, concerning which Francis Aretin was conſulted, was made up, and the marriage accompliſhed. But then it might be ſaid, that Sanſovino, who is no exact writer, ſpeaks of a mariage in general, tho' the thing went no farther than a betrothing.

(39) Strabo, lib. xv, pag. m. 491, ſays, that among them, when a man could give no portion to his daughter, he carried her to the market-place, and gathered the people together by ſound of trumpet. If any body offered to marry her, ſhe ſtripped herſelf firſt backwards to the ſhoulders and then forwards.

(40) Above, citation (29).

(41) Tiraquellus, ubi ſupra, num. i, pag. 79.

(42) See above remark [D] of the article DUELLIUS.

(43) Tiraquellus in Legem IV, connubial. num. ii, pag. 80.

(44) See the remark [A] in the article HIPPARCHIA.

(45) He pulled off his gown, to ſhew a rich and handſome lady, who courted him, that he had a crooked back. See Suetonius in Galba, cap. iii.

(46) See citation (f) of the article ABDAS.

(47) Sanſovino, ubi ſupra, fol. 11, verſo.

(48) Marolles, Memoires, pag. 428.

(49) Fol. 359, verſo.

SFORZA (CATHERINE) grand-daughter of the foregoing, was a lady of great courage; but ſhe did an action which ſavoured much more of a man's boldneſs, than of a woman's modeſty. Her ſubjects having made themſelves maſters of the caſtle of Rimini, ſhe gave them her children as hoſtages to recover it; and then ſhe threatned with death thoſe, who had occaſioned the inſurrection; they anſwered her, that they would kill her children; thereupon ſhe turned up her ſhift, and ſaid, here is wherewithal to get others [A]: barbarouſly, deſtroy the innocent hoſtages that are in your hands; I conſent to it, provided my juſtice inflict upon you ſuch a puniſhment as your wickedneſs deſerves (a). She was the natural daughter of Galeazzo Maria Sforza, and was (a) Taken from Balthaſar Bonifacius Hiſtoriæ Ludicræ, lib. v, cap. iv, pag. 127. He quotes the eighth book of Michael, Brutus's Hiſtory of Florence.

[A] Here is wherewithal to get others (1).] There could not be a more modeſt tranſlation of the following words. ‘Illa magno & virili animo ſublata veſte nudatoque ventre, En inquit, quo poſſim liberos iterum procreare. - - - - She with a great and manly courage, taking up her garment, and uncovering her belly, Behold, ſays ſhe, that whereby I can have more children.’ The author, from whom I have this, and whom I have quoted in the margin of this article, had been relating the action of a Lacedemonian woman, who ſeeing her ſons run away from a fight, ſhewed them her nakedneſs, and aſked them whether they would get in again into the ſame belly out of which they came when they were born, or whether they expected ſhe ſhould put them under her gown, that the enemies who purſued them, might not ſee them. She added to this queſtion ſuch a ſmart reprimand for their want of courage, that they returned to the fight and got the victory. He quotes the Apophthegms of the Lacedemonian women, collected by Plutarch; but all theſe circumſtances are not to be found in that author: He only ſays, that a woman of Lacedæmon ſhewed her belly to her ſons when they ran away, and aſked them whether they had a mind to get into it again (2). The other particulars are a fabulous addition of Balthazar Bonifacius. I call it fabulous, tho' it is to be found in Juſtin, with reſpect to other women, viz. the Perſian women, when Cyrus engaged in a deciſive battle againſt Aſtyages king of the Medes. ‘Pulſa itaque cum Perſarum acies paulatim cederet; matres & uxores eorum obviam occurrunt: orant in prælium revertantur: cunctantibus, ſublata veſte, obſcœna corporis oſtendunt, rogantes num in uteros matrum vel uxorum velint refugere. Hac repreſſi caſtigatione, in prælium redeunt: & facta impreſſione, quos fugiebant, fugere compellunt (3). - - - - The Perſian army being worſted, began gradually to give ground, they were met by their mothers and wives: they pray them to return to the fight: but delaying, they lift up their garments, ſhew their ſecret parts, aſking if they would again take ſhelter in the wombs of their mothers or wives. Being checked by this reproof, they return to the battle, and charging afreſh, put to flight thoſe from whom they were flying.’ A commentator (4) obſerves, that Tacitus mentions a thing like this concerning the women of Germany; which is not true: The difference between that fact, and that of the Perſian women, is great enough to make it a different thing. The women mentioned by Tacitus uſed only intreaties, and ſhewed nothing but their breaſts. ‘Memoriæ proditur, quaſdam acies inclinatas jam, & labantes à feminis reſtitutas, conſtantia precum & objectu pectorum, & monſtrata cominus captivitate, quam longe impatientius feminarum ſuarum nomine timent: adeo ut efficacius obligentur animi civitatum quibus inter obſides puellæ quoque nobiles imperantur (5). - - - - It is recorded, that armies giving ground and ready to fly, have been reſtored by women, inceſſantly intreating, ſhewing their breaſts, and telling them what ſlavery they were to undergo; which they dreaded ſo much the more upon account of their women. So that thoſe cities are moſt effectually kept in ſubjection, by which amongſt the hoſtages noble virgins are delivered up.’ It were an unjuſt thing to ſay that I am a rambling commentator, and that I make digreſſions to fill up my page; for I only take notice of ſuch miſtakes as I meet in my way, after having cenſured Balthaſar Bonifacius for advancing a falſity. His book, and thoſe of innumerable other authors, are full of ſuch liberty; therein you will find a thouſand things, which the authors quoted by them ſay nothing of. If I had a mind

(1) Compare this with the anſwer of the Egyptians, in the remark [D] of the article PSAMMITICHUS.

(2) Plut. in Apophthegm. Lacænarum, pag. m. 241.

(3) Juſtin. lib. i, cap. vi, p. m. 20. See alſo Plutarch, de Virtutibus Mulierum, pag. 246.

(4) Bernegger on Juſtin, lib. i, cap. vi, pag. m. 20.

(5) Tacit. de Germ. cap. viii.

was married to Jerom Riario [B], Lord of Forli, and of Imola (b), by whom ſhe had, among other children, Octavio Riario, who was lord of the ſame ſtates, which he held of the holy ſee (c). She had the government in her hands, as being her ſon's guardian (d), and knew well how to advance her intereſt, during the tumults occaſioned by the French expedition into Italy in 1494, and the years following. She defended herſelf with great courage in the fortreſs of Forli, againſt the Duke of Valentinois ſon of Alexander VI, in the year 1500; but not being able to reſiſt the violent aſſaults of his troops ſhe was made a priſoner and ſent to Rome, where ſhe was confined to the caſtle of St Angelo (e). It was upon this occaſion, if we may believe ſome writers, that ſhe ſhewed her nakedneſs; but they are miſtaken [C]. She was ſet at liberty ſoon after, by the incerceſſion of Ives d'Allegre (f), and was privately married to John de Medicis (g) [D]; which was one of the reaſons why ſhe did great ſervices to the Florentines, and to Ludovic Sforza Duke of Milan, who was well affected towards the Medicis (h). A French Hiſtorian commends her very much: he ſays (i) ſhe was very handſome, and a widow at twenty-two years of age, having one only ſon (k) in the cradle, and that the inhabitants of Imola and Forli were ſo happy under her adminiſtration, that they had no occaſion to lament the loſs of her huſband. He obſerves that this only ſon of her's was but fourteen years old in 1494 (l). He enlarges upon the military qualities ſhe diſcovered during the ſiege of Forli. Take notice that ſhe did never recover her ſtates. The Duke of Valentinois was inveſted with them, and they were re-united to the holy ſee after the death of Alexander VI (m). I ſhall make a reflexion upon the ſcruples, which hindred the continuator of Moreri's Dictionary from mentioning the immodeſt action of that lady [E]; and I ſhall obſerve an error of the tranſlator of a book of Lewis mind to ſwell my compilation by bringing in things by head and ſhoulders, ſhould I forget to cenſure the ſame Bonifacius, for mentioning the action of Catherine Sforza, in a chapter wherein his buſineſs was only to bring ſome proofs of the phyſical virtues of the muliebre pudendum (6). Is that action well connected with the other accounts heaped up by him, and which concern I know not what faculty of driving away hail, laying ſtorms, and frighting lions? I ſuſpect he is guilty of a much greater blunder; I think he falſifies the main parts of the narrative of the hiſtorian quoted by him: it is quite different in the Supplement to Moreri's dictionary (7).

[B] She was married to Jerom Riario.] She brought him the Lordſhip of Imola for her portion; Galeazzo Sforza her father, had made himſelf maſter of it, by taking advantage of the quarrels, which aroſe in 1472, between Tadeo Manfredi Lord of Imola and his ſon. Jerom Riario, nephew to Sixtus the fourth, did very much embelliſh that town (8).

[C] It was upon this occaſion, if we may believe, ſome writers . . . . . but they are miſtaken.] Thomas Porcacchi confutes thoſe authors in his marginal notes upon Guicciardin's hiſtory: he ſhews, that the lady did that action when her huſband was killed. Theſe are his words: ‘ Hanno ſcritto alcuni, che Madama ‘ Caterina trovandoſi aſſediata nella Rocca di Forlì ‘ dal Valentino, & havendo egli, per indurla ad arrenderſi, minacciato d'a mazzarle i figlivoli, ſe non ‘ ſi arrendeva; ella con animo coſtante alzataſi i panni ‘ dinanzi; gli moſtrò le parti vergognoſe, dicendo ‘ d'haver le forme da ſtamparne de gli altri: il che ‘ pero ſi vede diſcordar da queſto autore, che dice come ‘ la Rocca fu preſa incontinente, che dentro ella vi ‘ fu ritirata: & è chiaro, che non hora, ma quando ‘ fu da Lodovico Panſecco amazzato il Sig. Girolamo ‘ Riario marito di lei, ella fece queſto atto (9). - - - ‘ Some have written, that when Valentine beſieged Catherine Sforza in the caſtle of Forli, and, in order to ‘ force her to ſurrender, threatned, that if ſhe did not ‘ he would immediately put her children to death; Catherine, with a reſolute mind, pulled up her coats, and ‘ ſhewed him her privy parts, telling him that ſhe had ‘ the mould for caſting more. This however ſeems to ‘ diſagree with what that author ſays, viz. that the ‘ caſtle was taken as ſoon as ſhe entred it: It is plain, ‘ that ſhe did this action, not at that time, but when ‘ her huſband Girolamo Riario was murdered by Ludovico Panſecco.' The good Father Hilarion de Coſte durſt not relate the thing, as it happened: He leaves out all the impudence of that action, to the end, queſtionleſs, that he might not let ſlip the opportunity of increaſing the number of his heroins. But he is miſtaken as to the circumſtance of time, if Porcacchi is in the right. That Minime expreſſes himſelf thus (10): ‘ Catherine Sforza, the wife of John de Medicis, the moſt courageous and valiant lady that ever ‘ was ſeen in Italy, gave her (11) the name of Catherine, ‘ when ſhe was chriſtened. That magnanimous heroin, the worthy god-mother of Queen Catherine, ‘ gave a proof of her valour and courage, when ſhe ‘ was beſieged by Cæſar Borgia Duke of Valentinois ‘ in the fortreſs of Forli; for being threatned by that ‘ cruel tyrant and monſter of nature, with the loſs and ‘ deſtruction of her children, if ſhe refuſed to ſurrender, ‘ ſhe boldly appeared upon the walls, and laughed at ‘ the rodomontades of that captain, laying her hand ‘ upon her gown, and telling him that ſhe was young ‘ enough to get others.'

[D] She was privately married to John de Medicis.] That marriage was known in time. Catherine Sforza had by that ſecond huſband John de Medicis, who was the Father of Coſmo de Medicis, the firſt great Duke of Tuſcany. Boccalini has a witty conceit about it. He feigns that Catherine Sforza having declared, that ſhe had the courage to ſhew the mould wherein ſhe took upon herſelf to form other children (12), deſired, that ſince ſhe had been very much commended by all hiſtorians for that action, Apollo would be pleaſed to aſſign her a proper place upon Parnaſſus. The judges were divided in their opinions; ſome of them looked upon it as a brutiſh piece of leudneſs. Ad alcuni atto di ſfacciatezza, e di bruta impudicitia parve quello, che coſi nobil ſignora haveva raccontato (13). Apollo judged that a regular obſervation of modeſty did belong to private women; but that princeſſes were obliged upon ſome occaſions to ſhew their virility. A counſellor gave his opinion in this manner: The place, out of which John de Medicis, father of the great Coſmo, came, did certainly deſerve to be expoſed to the public view. Ben degno di eſſer veduto da ogn' uno era quel luogo, donde era uſcito il famoſo Campione Giovan de Medici padre di quel gran Coſimo, &c (14).

[E] The ſcruples, which hindred the continuator of Moreri's Dictionary, to mention the immodeſt action of that lady.] He hath coloured over the matter with an affected preciſeneſs, which infinitely ſurpaſſeth that of the Monk; for he ſays, that lady was contented to anſwer that ſhe might make up the loſs of her children, and that it would bring an unavoidable calamity upon the rebels. Do what you can, and ſet it in what view you will, you will never be able to ſhew that he has diſcharged the duty of an hiſtorian, and that he has not neglected it in ſuch a manner as is inexcuſable; for we can diſcover in his words no ſhadow or footſtep of what was done by Catherine Sforza; and yet it was an action ſo ſingular and ſo extraordinary, that it ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence. Perhaps, it will be ſaid, that the thing was ſo impudent, that chaſte ears would have been offended at it; and that inſtead of repreſenting her as a moſt illuſtrious woman, ſhe would have been expoſed to the contempt of every reader.

(b) Thomas Porcacchi, in his notes upon Guicciardin, lib. i, fol. 29, verſo.

(c) Guicciardin, lib. i, fol. 20, verſo.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid. folio 126. See alſo Thomaſi's Life of Cæſar Borgia, pag. 270.

(f) Guicciardin, ibid.

(g) Idem, lib. iv, fol. 104, verſo.

(h) Id. ibid.

(i) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles VIII. book iii, p. 242.

(k) He is miſtaken; ſhe had more than one ſon. See Guicciardin, book iv, fol. 126.

(l) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louïs XII, book i, pag. 55, 56.

(m) Volaterranus, lib. iv, pag. m. 135.

(6) It's title is de vi muliebris pudendi.

(7) In the article SFORZA (CATHERINE).

(8) Leand. Albert. in Deſcript. Ital. pag. 493.

(9) Porcacchi, notes upon Guicciardin, lib iv, fol. 126.

(10) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames, Tom. i, pag. 224.

(11) That is, to Catherine de Medicis, who has been Queen of France.

(12) In tanto non ſi ſpaventò punto, che anzi alzatoſi le veſti, e loro moſtrando le parti vergognoſe diſſe, che de ſuoi figlivoli faceſſero à voglia loro, che à lei rimaneva la ſtampa di rifarne de gli altri. Boccalin, Ragguagli di Parnaſſo, Centur. I, cap. xxxv, pag. m. 102.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Ibid. pag. 103.

Lewis Guicciardin [F].

reader. I anſwer, that thoſe two excuſes are inſignificant: that if the firſt was a good one, a vaſt number of words ſhould be ſuppreſſed in our language; we ſhould never be allowed either to ſpeak or to write naked, nakedneſs, adultery, fornication, and a thouſand more which excite unavoidably obſcene ideas. At this rate the Bible ſhould be corrected, and the writers inſpired by God, would be liable to cenſure; for they mention the nakedneſs of Noah (15), and of the Apoſtles (16), and did not ſcruple to expreſs themſelves naturally, and without circumlocution, upon ſuch occaſions, wherein one ſhould have a regard to chaſte ears, according to the principles I confute. Thoſe, who underſtand the Hebrew tongue, are not ignorant that Moſes made uſe of a very vulgar word (17), to denote the mortal blow the Midianitiſh woman had received. Tu fortaſſe, ut ſunt ferè hypocritæ, verbis tetrici, rebus obſcœni, ne ipſum quidem Moſen iſtâ noxâ immunem abs te dimiſeris; cùm alibi ſæpius, tum etiam ubi Phineæ haſta, quâ parte mulierem transfixerit, ſiqua fides Hebræis, apertè narrat (18). The ſecond excuſe is worſe ſtill, and would be of no uſe but to a writer of Romances. I confeſs that if ſuch an author pitched upon Catherine Sforza to be his heroine, and the ſubject of an hiſtory, like ſo many ſorry pieces that come out every day, which contain a thouſand fables and chimeras, grafted upon real fact; I ſay, ſuch an author might paſs over in ſilence the faults of that lady: But an hiſtorian ought not to do it, he is obliged to repreſent the ill qualities of people: juſtice requires that what is blameable ſhould be actually blamed, and whoever conceals the faults of perſons, or extenuates them, impoſes upon the world in ſeveral reſpects (19). Are we not thereby deprived of a knowledge that belongs to us, and induced to miſapply our approbation. If our Catherine committed a fault, is it not reaſonable ſhe ſhould ſuffer for it in ſome meaſure, by the judgment which the readers will paſs upon it? And if all hiſtorians imitated the writer I ſpeak of, would not men be exempted from the fear of being condemned by poſterity, which is a mighty curb to keep them to their duty, and one of the greateſt advantages that can be reaped from hiſtory? Will you ſay, that there was a neceſſity to paſs over in ſilence ſuch a piece of impudence, leſt it ſhould be imitated by others? But for the ſame reaſon all the leud and diſorderly actions of mankind ſhould be omitted by hiſtorians: and they would not be allowed to write but in the ſtile of panegyriſts. The profeſſion of an hiſtorian ſhould be ranked amongſt the arts prohibited, and all nations obliged to uſe it as the Jews did painting. All hiſtorians ſhould be ordered to confine themſelves to the enquiry of natural things, and not to meddle with human life. Pliny would not have been much againſt ſuch an order; for the care that was taken to write annals in order to make a diſcovery of crimes, whilſt the works of nature remain unknown, was looked upon by him as a very pernicious thing. Mira humani ingenii peſte, ſanguinem, & cædes condere annalibus juvat, ut ſcelera hominum noſcantur mundi ipſius ignaris (20). Perhaps, it will be ſaid, that the author of the Supplement thought he was to expreſs himſelf, as if he had told a ſtory in the preſence of the moſt virtuous women in the world. I anſwer, this is a wrong notion: Thoſe, who maintain that every word, which cannot be ſpoken before a virtuous women, ought to be baniſhed from a book, are miſtaken. It is a maxim of over-nice and preciſe women; which you will eaſily grant, if you conſider never ſo little the difference between a converſation and a book. An honeſt woman will be juſtly offended, if any one tells her an obſcene ſtory; but ſhe will not blame an hiſtorian for relating it, provided he abſtain from filthy words: An hiſtorian ſpeaks to the public, and not to ſuch or ſuch a woman in particular; and therefore what he ſays is not offenſive, as it would be, if it was ſaid in a converſation or in a letter. In theſe two laſt caſes he would have no very favourable notion of the modeſty of thoſe to whom he ſpeaks or writes; and that is it that gives offence. They would apply the conſequence perſonally to themſelves; but none applies to himſelf in ſuch a manner what concerns only the public. We are obliged to hear what we are told, or to read the letters that are written to us; but every body may read or lay aſide a printed book. In fine, I obſerve that of all writers, thoſe of dictionaries ought leaſt to be over ſcrupulous, ſince ſuch works are deſiged to give a clear and preciſe explication of things.

[F] I ſhall obſerve an error of the tranſlator of a book of Lewis Guicciardin.] I do not know that tranſlator's name; but I know that he has tranſlated ſeveral Italian books into French. He himſelf ſays ſo in his preface to the tranſlation of l'Hore di ricreatione di M. Lodovico Guicciardini, Patritio Fiorentino. Theſe hours of recreation of Lewis Guicciardin are a collection of ſtories, ſentences, and witty ſayings. He did not there forget the action of our Catherine Sforza. Guicciardin ſays ſhe did what I have related above in the citadel of Forli, when her huſband had been killed. ‘Ma la conteſſa animoſa non mutando faccia, ‘alzataſi toſtamente i panni davanti con fiero ſguardo ‘diſſe loro: Et non vi pare egli ſtolti ch'io habbia le ‘forme di farne delli altri?’ The tranſlator renders thoſe Italian words thus: ‘But the courageous counteſs, ‘without altering her countenance, ſuddenly turning up ‘her coats, told them with a proud look, Do not you ‘think, you fools, that I have ſtill beauty enough to get ‘others (21)? Nothing can be more abſurd than to make her ſay upon ſuch an occaſion I have ſtill beauty enough. If it was ſaid in the foregoing words, that ſhe unmaſked herſelf to ſhew her face, there would be ſome coherency and juſtneſs in her diſcourſe; but there is none at all if it be compared with what ſhe had been doing. The author cannot be excuſed upon account of preciſeneſs or modeſty; for had he acted on ſuch a principle, he would have omitted or wrapped up that action, inſtead of relating it as plainly as he does. His miſtake proceeds from not knowing that the word forme in that place ſignifies moulds. This ignorance has occaſioned a ſtrange diſorder in the ſequel of the diſcourſe.

---

(15) Geneſ. ix.

(16) John xxi. 7.

(17) Num. xxv.

(18) Miltonus, in Defenſione pro ſe contra Alexandrum Morum, pag. m. 75.

(19) See the remark [A], in the article DOMITIA.

(20) Plin. lib. ii, cap. ix, pag. m. 152.

(21) L'Hore di ricreatione di Lodov. Guicciardini, folio 290, verſo, edition of Paris, 1624, in 12mo.

SFORZA (Iſabella) may be placed among learned women. She lived in the XVIth century. Some of her letters may be ſeen in the collection publiſhed at Venice by Hortenſio Lando in the year 1549 [A]. And among others a letter of conſolation,

[A] The collection publiſhed at Venice by Hortenſio Lando, in the year 1549.] Chriſtofano Bronzini has recourſe to that collection, being obliged to confute one of the interlocutors of his dialogues, who ſays, that few women were capable of writing two words. His anſwer is (1), ‘Sono ſtate tante, che paſſano le ‘centinaia; e tanto degne di lode, che ſe voi vedeſte ‘le lettere loro (che con tanto ſudore, con tanta diligenza, e ſpeſa furono raccolte dal Sign. Hortenſio ‘Lando; & à perſuaſione, e preghiere di Ottavian ‘Raverta, eletto poi Veſcovo di Terracina) date in ‘luce, e ſtampate da Gabriel Giolito, l'anno 1549, ‘vi chiarireſte, con quanta eloquenza, con quanto artificio, con quanta oſſervanza, & bella maniera di ‘dire, elle ſapeſſero porre in carta altro, che quatro ‘parole. - - - - There have been ſo many, that we ‘may reckon more than a hundred, and ſo worthy of ‘praiſe, that if you ſaw their letters (which were ‘collected with great labour and diligence, and at great ‘expence by Hortenſio Lando; at the perſuaſion and intreaty of Ottaviano Raverta, afterwards made Biſhop ‘of Terracina) publiſhed and printed by Gabriel Giolito in the year 1549, you would know with how ‘great eloquence, art, propriety, and beautiful elocution, ‘they were able to write more than four words.’ He is not contented in general to refer to that collection, he alſo took ſome letters out of it, and inſerted them in his work; particularly with reſpect to our Iſabella Sforza. You will find there the letter ſhe writ to Bobbia. For the reſt, ſuch a work as that of Hortenſio, conſolation, which ſhe wrote to Bonna Sforza, widow of the King of Poland, who was lately dead and that which ſhe writ to Margaret Bobbia in vindication of Poetry.

---

(1) Chriſtofano Bronzini, della dignita e Nobilta delle Donne, Giornata quarta, pag. 40.

tenſio Lando, did very well deſerve I ſhould mention ſome circumſtances of it; and therefore I hope the moſt ſevere critics will excuſe me for taking the liberty to ſet down Bronzini's words ſomewhat at large.

SICYON, a town of Peloponneſus, and the moſt antient kingdom that ever was in Greece. Ægialeus is ſaid to have been the firſt King of Sicyon, and we are told that he began to reign ſeventy-four years before the birth of Abraham (a). Zeuxippus was the laſt king: he was the twenty-ſixth, and reigned thirty-two years. The form of the government was changed after his death: the prieſts exerciſed the ſupreme authority. That kingdom laſted nine hundred and ſixty two years [A]: it ended when Eli was High-prieſt and judge of the Jews (b). The worſhip which the Sicyonians paid to Bacchus, was not one of the leaſt ridiculous parts of the Pagan religion [B].

(a) Euſebius, in Chron. pag. 11. ſuppoſes that Abraham was born the 22d year of the reign of Europs, ſecond king of Sicyon, who ſucceeded Ægialeus, whoſe reign had laſted 52 years.

(b) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. lib. xviii, cap. xix.

[A] That kingdom laſted nine hundred and ſixty-two years.] It laſted three years leſs, if we believe St Auguſtin (1). A commentator upon that Father (2) has committed two faults in few words. He ſays, that according to Euſebius, that kingdom laſted eight hundred and ſixty-two years; and he adds, that if the years be caſt up, they will amount to nine hundred and ſeventy-two. It is certain Euſebius (3) mentions a duration of nine hundred and ſixty-two years, and that the addition of the years of each king of Sicyon makes but nine hundred and ſixty-two years. Euſebius reckons from Abraham's birth, and ſuppoſes that Patriarch was born in the twenty-ſecond year of Europs, the ſecond king of Sicyon, who ſucceeded Ægialeus, and reigned fifty-two years; and that the Kings of Sicyon failed in 889 (4). Add the numbers, and you will find the ſecond fault I have cenſured.

[B] The worſhip which the Sicyonians paid to Bacchus was not one of the leaſt ridiculous parts of the Pagan religion.] They worſhipped Bacchus under ſuch an obſcene name, that none but very impudent people can pronounce it in a free converſation. It is the name that ſuch impudent people at this day give to midwives. Clemens Alexandrinus does juſtly blame the Heathens for ſuch a turpitude. Διόνυσον δὲ ἤδη σιωπῶ τὸν χοιροψάλην. Σικυώνιοι τοῦτον προσκυνοῦσιν ἐπὶ τῶν γυναικείων τάξαντες τὸν Διόνυσον μορίων ἔφορον αἰσχους καὶ τῆς ὕβρεως σεβάζοντες ἀρχηγόν. Bacchum enim jam taceo pudendi contrectatorem. Eum adorant Sicyonii, qui Bacchum membris præficiunt muliebribus tanquam turpitudinis ac fœditatis inſpectorem, & quaſi libidinis colant præfectum (5). ---- The Sicyonians, ſays he, worſhip Bacchus as the inſpector of the ſecret parts of women: they have allotted to him theſe parts as his demeſn, his juriſdiction, and his province. Mr Coſtar writing in proſe, took a more than poetical liberty, when he made uſe of thoſe words of Clemens Alexandrinus to explain ſome verſes of Horace. Such a liberty did not go unpuniſhed; Mr de Girac did ſeverely banter him for it under the following irony (6). 'I will not imitate him in 'his ill humour; on the contrary, I find he has been 'very ſucceſsful in his explication of theſe verſes of 'the ſame Poet (7),

Bacchum in remotis carmina rupibus
Vidi docentem, credite Poſteri,
Nymphaſque diſcentes, & aures
Capripedum Satyrorum acutas.

Born out by an unuſual rage,
I ſaw (believe it future age)
Where Bacchus taught the nymphs a ſong,
In diſtant vales; from ev'ry wood
With prick'd up ears the ſatyrs ſtood,
And ſmiling fauns compos'd a liſt'ning throng.

Creech.

'I did not think fit, ſays Mr Coſtar (8), to write to 'you a pleaſant thing concerning Bacchus's ſcholars, fear- 'ing my letter might fall into other hands than your's. 'But here I will be bolder, becauſe I fancy this paper 'will be more ſecret. I have read in Clemens Alexan- 'drinus, that Bacchus was worſhipped among the Sicyo- 'nians under the name of χοιροψαλῶν *, which ſigni- 'fies . . . . . If it be ſo, do not aſk me what he was 'doing in remotis with thoſe beautiful nymphs. Certainly, 'none of them could come off. He felt them all one after 'another; and this was the fine leſſon he gave them. I 'think, Sir, they wanted no pocket-book to write it 'down. Pray, let me know by the firſt opportunity what 'you think of it, &c. I am ſorry I was not there, for I 'fancy this Bacchus was a jolly doctor, and that it was 'worth one's while to ſee him act ſuch a part. He had 'an honeſt fellow for his tutor, a man of good example, 'who ſets forth very fine moral reflexions in Euripides's 'Cyclopes. I do not aſk Mr Coſtar what he would 'have done with thoſe nymphs: but if he had lived 'at that time, we ſhould not have known ſuch fine 'things. However, I hope he will excuſe me for 'leaving out two or three words, which none can be 'ſo impudent as to write or utter, excepting Bacchus's 'maſter, or his diſciple, I mean, Silenus, and Mr Coſtar.' Mr Menage knowing that the Latin word Porcus, and the Greek word χοῖρος, ſignified that part of a woman, which modeſty does not permit to name, made uſe of that erudition to give us the etymology of the epithet, under which Bacchus was worſhiped at Sicyon (9).

Iſaac Voſſius advances an etymological conjecture grounded upon the obſcenities over which Bacchus preſided. Non ab hoc Orthagora (10), ſays he (11), nomen Orthagoriæ eſt arceſſendum, ſed vero à numine ſalaciſſimo, ut exiſtimo. Nullus dubito quin Bacchus ipſe aliquando dictus ſit Orthagoras. Antequam enim ille hortorum cuſtos Lampſaci naſceretur, notum eſt Bacchum comiteſque ejus curam locorum muliebrium habuiſſe. Hinc fit ut non tantum ἰθύφαλλον ipſum vocarint, verum etiam idem ſignificantibus vocabulis, ὄρθον, ὀρθανὴν, & ὀρθάγοραν. Sane apud Ariſtophanem ἐκκλησιαζούσαις, cum juvencula hortatur anum prurientem, ut vocet Orthagoram, id non niſi de hoc dæmone peculiato videtur intelligendum, uti ad illum locum fuſius oſtendemus.

(1) Auguſtin. de Civitate Dei, lib. xviii, cap. xix.

(2) Leonardus Coqueus in hunc locum Auguſtini, pag. 605, Editionis Francof. 1661.

(3) Euſeb. in Chron. ad ann. 889, pag. m. 96.

(4) That is, reckoning from Abraham's birth.

(5) Clem. Alexand. Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 25.

(6) Girac, Replique à Coſtar, §. iii, pag. 26.

(7) Horat. lib. ii, Od. XIX.

(8) Note, that this is not to be found in the printed books of that author. He wrote it to Balzac: his letter came into Girac's hands, who inſerted in this part of his reply, ſo much of it as he thought fit.

* Mr Coſtar is miſtaken; it ſhould be χοιροψάλας.

(9) Quinde χοιροψάλης. Cunni contrectator, cognome di Bacco preſſo à Sicionii, ſecondo lo teſtifica Clemente Aleſſandrino nell' Ammonizione alle genti: il qual cognome viene anche da Eſchilo attribuito à Bacco. Menag. Origini della Lingua Italiana, in Voce Potta, pag. 383.

(10) An Hiſtorian mentioned by Strabo, Ælian, and Philoſtratus.

(11) Iſaacus Voſſius, in Pomponium Melam, lib. ii, cap. ii, pag. m. 133.

SILANION, a famous Sculptor, flouriſhed in the time of Alexander the Great, about the CXIVth Olympiad (a). He was an Athenian (b), and got a great ſkill in his art without being taught by any body (c). The ſtatue of Sappho (d), that of one Satyrus, who had often carried the prize at the Grecian games (e), that of another champion called Demaratus (f), and that of Apollodorus a Sculptor, who could not be pleaſed with his own works [A], were accounted his chief pieces. He wrote a tract, wherein (a) Plinius, lib. xxxiv, cap. viii, pag. m. 110.

(b) Pauſan. lib. vi, cap. iv, pag. 461.

(e) Pauſanias, ubi ſupra.

(f) Pauſanias, ubi ſupra, pag. 487.

(c) Plinius, ubi ſupra. (d) See the end of the text of the article SAPPHO.

[A] That of Apollodorus, a Sculptor, who could not be pleaſed with his own works.] What Pliny ſays upon this is very remarkable, and ſhews Silanion's great ſkill in his art. Silanion Apollodorum fudit, fictorem & ipſum, wherein he explained the rules of Symmetry if we may believe Vitruvius (g).

ipſum, ſed inter cunctos diligentiſſimum artis, & inimicum ſui judicem, crebro perfecta ſigna frangentem, dum ſatiari cupiditate artis non quit, & ideo inſanum cognominatum. Hoc in eo expreſſit, nec hominem ex ære fecit, ſed iracundiam (1). Theſe words have been well enough underſtood by du Pinet; but he is ſtrangely miſtaken in the ſequel of this paſſage. His tranſlation runs thus: ‘Silanion made the ſtatue of Apollodorus, who was alſo a Sculptor, and very much eſteemed. But he was ſo intent upon improving himſelf in his art, that he never liked his own work; ſo that very often, he broke very noble pieces out of anger, after he had made an end of them, thinking he could never do a thing well enough: which was the reaſon why many called him a madman. Silanion intending to ſhew it, made a ſtatue of Anger, in a woman's cloaths, inſtead of Apollodorus.’ I think there is a miſtake in theſe words of the tranſlator, in a woman's cloaths inſtead of Apollodorus. I do not believe this is Pliny's meaning; but only that Apollodorus's ſtatue appeared ſo paſſionate and choleric, that one would have taken it to be the very figure of Anger. See the epigrams of the Anthologia, quoted by Father Hardouin (2), upon a thought like that of Pliny. This miſtake of du Pinet is inconſiderable, if compared with thoſe that follow. Read firſt the Latin words of Pliny (3). Et Achillem nobilem. Item Epiſtaten exercentem athletas: Strongylion Amazonem, quam ab excellentia crurum Eucnemon appellant, ob id in comitatu Neronis Principis circumlatam. Item fecit puerum, quem amando Brutus Philippenſis cognomine ſuo illuſtravit (4). Du Pinet renders them thus: ‘He made alſo an Achilles very much eſteemed, and Epiſthates, who exerciſed the wreſtlers. He alſo made Strongylion an Amazon, which he ſirnamed Eucnemos, that is, fine-legged; which the emperor Nero eſteemed ſo much, that he had it commonly carried along with him. He alſo made a ſtatue of a young boy, ſo beautiful, that Brutus of Philippopolis in Romania, was ſo much in love with it, that he called it by his own name.’ You ſee he aſcribes to Silanion all the works mentioned in the paſſage from Pliny, whereas he ſhould only have aſcribed to him the two firſt. The two others belonged to a famous ſtatuary, whoſe name was Strongylion. He is mentioned in the firſt and ninth books of Pauſanias (5): the tranſlator took Strongylion for the name of an Amazon, whoſe ſtatue had been made by Silanion. Beſides, he was in the wrong to think that that ſtatue was ſirnamed Fine-legged, by the Sculptor that made it; this is not what Pliny means. Laſtly, if he had a mind to be underſtood, he ſhould not have mentioned one Brutus of Philippopolis in Romania, but Brutus, who periſhed at the battle of Philippi, the ſame who murdered Julius Cæſar.

That the remark contained in this article, may ſerve as a ſupplement to the collections I have made in another place (6), concerning thoſe who are never pleaſed with their productions, and ſpoil them by much reviſing them; I ſhall add to what Pliny ſays of Apollodorus, the words of the ſame author, wherein he does ſo well expreſs the ſame fault of the Sculptor Callimachus. ‘Ex omnibus autem maxime cognomine inſignis eſt Callimachus, ſemper calumniator ſui, nec finem habens diligentiæ, ob id Cacizotechnos appellatus, memorabili exemplo adhibendi curæ modum. Hujus ſunt ſaltantes Lacænæ; emendatum opus ſed in quo gratiam omnem diligentia abſtulerit (7). - - - But of all, Callimachus was the moſt noted becauſe of his ſirname, always blaming himſelf; nor ever ſetting any bounds to his care, for which he was called, Cacizotechnos, Spoil-work, a memorable example for preſcribing bounds to our diligence. The Lacedemonian dancers are his work, a finiſhed piece, but deprived of all it's graces by his too great care.’ Protogenes, amongſt the Painters, was affected with the ſame diſeaſe, as Callimachus and Apollodorus among the Sculptors. We have ſeen (8), in another place, what judgment Apelles made of him; and we may add here, that this judgment was approved by Cicero. I ſhall ſet down his own words, becauſe they may ſerve as an inſtruction to the writers, who are never weary of mending their compoſures: they know not that every thing ought to be kept within certain bounds. ‘In omnibus rebus videndum eſt quatenus. Etſi enim ſuus cuique modus eſt, tamen magis offendit nimium, quàm parum. In quo Apelles pictores quoque eos peccare dicebat, qui non ſentirent, quid eſſet ſatis (9). - - - - In all things it is to be conſidered what is enough. For ſeeing every thing has it's meaſure, too much is no leſs diſpleaſing than too little. Whereupon Apelles ſaid, that thoſe Painters were to be blamed, who never perceived what was ſufficient.

SYLVIUS (FRANCIS) profeſſor of Eloquence, and principal of Tournay-college at Paris, towards the beginning of the XVIth century, was a native of Amiens, where his father Nicolas du Bois was a Camblet-weaver (a). This Nicolas had fifteen children, eleven ſons, and four daughters. Francis was the third; and being bred up a ſcholar, he became a learned man and ſettled at Paris. He Latinized his family name according to the cuſtom of thoſe times. He ſent for two of his brothers, and inſtructed them very well in Claſſical learning: one of them called JOHN was made canon of Amiens, and curate of Monceaux; the other, whoſe name was JAMES, became a very learned Phyſician, as we ſhall ſee in the following article. Francis Sylvius found great barbariſms in the colleges; but he made it his buſineſs to reſtore the uſe of good Latin, and was one of the greateſt promoters of polite learning in France. He directed the ſcholars to the beſt Latin authors; and ſo earneſtly recommended to them the reading of Cicero, that it was not his fault if that Roman Orator was not made the only model of a good ſtyle (b) [A]. It is true, that before he gave ſuch advices, he himſelf had been taught bad Latin (c), as it appears from ſome of his compoſures. He publiſhed ſeveral books [B]. I muſt not forget one thing that is very glorious to him: he

[A] It was not his fault, if that Roman Orator was not made the only model of a good ſtyle.] Renatus Moreau expreſſes this in very fine words, in the life of James Sylvius. I ſhall not ſet them down, but as to the epigram made upon Sylvius, by Gilbert Ducheri, I ſhall tranſcribe it entire, as I find it in the ſame life.

FRANCISCI SYLVII RHETORIS TUMULUS.

Quod nunquam potuit multorum exercitus olim
Barbariem Francis finibus exigere;
Illud militibus ter centum Sylvius egit,
Quo duce habet regnum lingua Latina ſuum.
Rem vero aggreſſus majorem, ut clarior eſſet
Romani princeps Tullius eloquii.
O mortem properam, Lacheſiſque breviſſima penſa!
Re prope confecta Sylvius oppetiit.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Progymnaſmatum in artem Oratoriam Centuriæ tres. A Commentary upon twenty-one Orations of Cicero; upon his tract de Senectute, and his Paradoxes; and upon the Letters of Politian, and ſome other illuſtrious men (1). This laſt work has been reprinted ſeveral times. The third edition is of the year 1526. He dedicated it to Euſtachius,

---

(g) Vitruvius, Præf. lib. vii.

(1) Plinius, lib. xxxiv, cap. viii. pag. m. 126.

(2) Harduin. in Plin. Tom. v, pag. 126.

(3) Plinius, ubi ſupra.

(4) Martial, Epigram. lxxvii, lib. ii, & Epig. li, lib. ix, & Epig. clxxi, lib. xiv. mentions that ſtatue of a boy which Brutus loved.

(5) Pauſan. lib. i, pag. 97, & lib. ix, pag. 767, Edit. 1696.

(6) In the article LINACER remark [F], (where you will find in citation (17) the words of Pliny, concerning Protogenes) and remark [G] of the article MALHERBE.

(7) Plin. ubi ſupra, pag. 326.

(8) Above citation (17) of the article LINACER.

(9) Cicero de Oratore, cap. xxii,

(a) Cilicii panni & undulati hiſto. Renatus Moreau, in Vita Jacobi, Sylvii.

(b) Ex eod. Ibid.

(c) See the remark [C].

(1) Geſner. in Biblioth.

he procured an edition of Martial cleared from many obſcenities in that Poet [C], that the youth might improve themſelves by the reading of him, without endangering their morals.

ſtachius de Croy, Biſhop of Arras, whom he had taught for the ſpace of four years at Louvain; from whence it may be inferred, that he had ſome ſchool in that univerſity.

[C] He procured an edition of Martial, cleared from many obſcenities.] Father Vavaſſeur would not deprive our Sylvius of the glory of being the firſt, who curtailed Martial, tho' the ſame thing was objected to the Jeſuits, and he might have turned it to their advantage. Theſe are his words: ‘Quod utinam feciſſemus primi rem tantam, tam utilem omnibus, tam neceſſariam juventuti, eaque nobis ſolida & integra laus & propria maneret, cœpiſſe vel ſic de virtutis ac morum diſciplina bene mereri. Sed eſt qui hanc nobis lauream præripuerit, antequam etiam nati, ut ſic dicam, eſſemus. Anno enim ſuperioris ſæculi decimo quarto Franciſcus quidam Sylvius, Ambianus, in Academia Pariſienſi qui tum degeret ac literas publice profiteretur, quaſi Augiæ ſtabulum purgaturus, hunc ſe laborem Herculeum ſuſcepiſſe declarat, horrida quidem & inſolenter ac barbarè ſcripta epiſtola, facile ut appareat potiorem ei curam fuiſſe morum quam Latini ſermonis; ſed ex qua tamen intelligatur, &c (2.) - - - I wiſh we had been the firſt who did a thing ſo great, ſo profitable to all, ſo neceſſary to youth; and that the whole praiſe of having ſo well deſerved, for inſtruction in virtue and good manners had belonged to us. But there is one who carried off the prize, even before we were born. For in the fourteenth year of the laſt century, one Francis Sylvius of Amiens, who then taught in the univerſity of Paris, declared he had undertaken that Herculean taſk, in an unpoliſhed and barbarous epiſtle; ſo that it plainly appeared, he regarded more the purity of manners, than of his Latin ſtile; whereby nevertheleſs may be known, &c.’ Afterwards he gives us the title of that edition. M. Valerii Martialis Epigrammaton lectoris caſtimonia dignorum liber: ubi omnia Veneris illius deſpuendæ quaſi irritamenta, quibus paſſim ſordidatus lectorum nares corrugabat, accurata Franciſci Sylvii Ambianatis diligentia deletili ſpongia deterſa ſunt & eluta. He alſo gives us the title of the Epiſtle Dedicatory. Reverendum in Chriſto Patrem D. Nicolaum Couſturanum; & D. Hadrianum Henoncurium, Horeſteæ amicitiæ ferrumine conferruminatos Franciſcus Sylvius Ambianas ſalute plurima impertitur. He tells us that this Epiſtle Dedicatory is written in a very barbarous ſtile, and very different from that which the author acquired ſome time after. Reſpondet inſcriptioni fœda & ridicule etiam informis quæ ſequitur epiſtola, quem ſermonem tamen ſuum Sylvius, quod vix credas, Montauſeri (3), aliquot poſt annis ita emendavit, ut à ſe totus diverſus & alius planè ſcriptor eſſe videatur. The concluſion of that epiſtle runs thus: Sylvio veſtro qui literarum haſce bonas ſegetes ab illis officium linguæ turpitudine multa ſuperantibus diſcriminavit, plauſibiliter adplaudite. Laſtly, he ſays that Martial was not ſufficiently purged, and that he has ſeen ſome very obſcene words in that edition. Vidi ego hunc ipſum librum à Jacobo Kerverio, Chriſti anno 1535 publicatum, hac inſcriptione quam modo poſui, hac epiſtola quæ caſtiſſima & ſanctiſſima omnia promitteret, nudis tamen & prætextatis aliquot vocibus ſpurcum atque infamem.

(2) Vavaſſor, de Epigrammate, pag. 255, & ſeq.

(3) Father Vavaſſeur ſpeaks to the Duke of Montauſier thro' the whole book.

SYLVIUS (JAMES) brother to the foregoing, was one of the moſt famous Phyſicians of the XVIth century. He was born at Amiens in the year 1478, and went through his ſchool learning at Paris under Francis Sylvius his brother. He learned in that ſchool, and taught in Tournay-college the Latin tongue with much greater purity, than it had been taught for a long time; which was the reaſon why his writings were ſo much taken notice of becauſe of the elegance of the ſtyle. Having an inclination to the ſtudy of Phyſic, he was contented to learn ſome Hebrew under the famous Vatablus, and reſolved to learn Greek and Latin perfectly, in order to qualify himſelf for that ſtudy. It is true, he applied himſelf very diligently likewiſe to the Mathematics, and made ſo great a progreſs in that ſcience, that he invented ſome machines, which he preſented to the Provoſt of Merchants, and to the Echevins of Paris. When it was time for him to apply himſelf wholly to Phyſic; he ſtudied it in the original authors, and ſo far engaged in the reading of Hippocrates and Galen, that he ſpent all his time in examining and tranſlating thoſe two authors. This made him ſenſible of the uſefulneſs of Anatomy; and he applied himſelf to it ſo earneſtly, that his ſkill in it was as great as the age he lived in could permit. He ſtudied Pharmacy with no leſs application, and made ſeveral journies to ſee the remedies produced by different countries in the places which produced them. Being retuned to Paris, he betook himſelf to read lectures, whereby he got a great deal of money, of which he was too greedy [A]. He explained in two years time, a whole courſe of Phyſic taken from Hippocrates and Galen; and his reputation was ſo great, that people reſorted to him from all parts of Europe. But before he was ſo well known, he

[A] Of which he was too greedy.] A prodigious avarice obſcured the ſplendor of many bright and fine qualities of our James Sylvius. He had ſo many ſcholars, that he ſhould not have narrowly minded whether each of them paid him; and yet he was ſo rigid about it, that he made a horrid noiſe, when they did not pay him exactly five pence (1) per month a-piece, which was his pay. He fell once into ſo great a paſſion, becauſe one or two of his ſcholars had not brought him his monthly money, that he ſwore he would leave off reading lectures, if the other ſcholars did not turn them out, or force them to pay him (2). He lived a moſt ſordid life; he gave nothing but bare bread to his ſervants, and had no fire all the winter. Two things he uſed as a remedy againſt cold; he played at foot-ball, and carried a great log upon his ſhoulders from the loweſt part of the houſe to the garret; and he ſaid, the heat he got by ſuch an exerciſe was more advantageous for health than a fire. It is no wonder if he got a great deal of money, living ſuch a ſordid life, and if he hid his gold under ground. He had a houſe in St Marceau's ſuburb, where, it was ſaid, he had hid five hundred Ducats: Some maintained they had ſeen them in a red purſe; which was confirmed by a magician, who deſired to have one half of that treaſure for his pains of directing to it: But tho' they ſearched and dug the ground, they did not find a penny. When the houſe in which Sylvius had lived, in St James's ſtreet, was pulled down (3), in order to be re-built, the Maſons found ſome piſtoles in it, and it was thought many more had been hid in it (4). Buchanan made a diſtich by way of epitaph, when Sylvius was ſo angry, that he was for turning out the two poor ſcholars who had not paid him (5). We are told (6), that on the funeral day, that diſtich was poſted up to the church-door (7) by ſome of his hearers. It runs thus:

(1) Henry Stephens, Apologie d'Herodote, pag. m. 168. Says it was a teſtoon.

(2) Henry Stephens, ibid. Says he was preſent at that action.

(3) In 1616.

(4) Ex Renato Moreau, in ejus Vita.

(5) Henry Stephens, Apologia d'Herodote, pag. 168.

(6) Scæv. Sammarthanus, in Elogiis, pag. m. 27.

(7) Moreri ſays, on the door of his houſe, he did not mind the words in ipſis templi valvis of Sammarthanus, which he quoteth.

he was very much thwarted by the Paris Phyſicians, who took it very ill, that a man who had taken no where his doctor's degree, ſhould undertake to teach Phyſic in the Metropolis of the kingdom. Whereupon he went to Montpellier in 1530, to take his degree. He was there for ſome time, and then left the place in order to return to Paris, without being admitted doctor. His avarice allowed him not to be at the neceſſary charges [B]. Going by Lyons, he publiſhed there, at the requeſt of two Phyſicians (a), a Diſputation de vini exhibitione in Febribus. It is the firſt book he printed. Being come to Paris, he endeavored to reconcile himſelf with the Phyſicians, that he might have leave to teach; and he publiſhed a French Grammar, a work which coſt him a great deal of pains, and was to be followed by another, which never came out, wherein he treated of the origin of the French tongue. He was admitted Bachelor of Phyſic in June 1531 [C], and it appears by the records of the Faculty, that in the year 1535, he taught in Tricquet-College, whilſt Fernelius taught in Cornwall-College; but the latter had few auditors, whereas Sylvius had a great many [D]. The reaſon of which was becauſe he made diſſections, and taught Botany, and the preparation of remedies, which Fernelius did not do. Vidus Vidius, profeſſor of Phyſic in the Royal College, being invited into Italy in the year 1548, none was thought better qualified than Sylvius to fill his place. He was unreſolved for the ſpace of two years, whether he ſhould accept of that employment; but at laſt he accepted it in 1550, and continued in it until his death, which happened the thirteenth of January 1555. It was the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his life (b) [E]. He was buried in the burying-place of poor ſcholars [F]. He never was married, and even had an averſion to women. He took more care to clear his ſtyle from the barbariſms that prevailed in the ſchools, than to leave off his rough and wild way [G]. He was ſo addicted to Galen's opinions, that he obſtinately maintained his errors. Judicial Aſtrology was the only thing wherein he departed

Sylvius hic ſitus eſt, gratis qui nil dedit unquam,
Mortuus & gratis quod legis iſta, dolet.

Henry Stephens tranſlated it into French verſe, thus (8).

Ici git Sylvius auquel onq en ſa vie
De donner rien gratis ne prit aucun' envie,
Et ores qu'il eſt mort, & tout rongé de vers,
Encores ha depit qu'on lit gratis ces vers.

Here lies Sylvius in his grave,
Who when alive nought gratis gave,
And even grumbles now he's dead
That you theſe verſes gratis read.

Another ſatirical piece was publiſhed againſt him, wherein he was taxed with avarice in a pleaſant manner: Moreau aſcribes it to Henry Stephens. That libel was a dialogue, intituled Sylvius ocreatus, and the author of it took the name of Ludovicus Arribavenus Mantuanus. It is matter of fact, that Sylvius called for his boots a little before he died, and put them on, to ſit by the fire ſide, and expired booted. Whereupon the author of the ſatire feigned that Sylvius had put on his boots to croſs the Acheron without a boat, and without paying any thing for the ferriage. He was alſo bantered in that book, for loving to talk, in a Shoemaker's ſhop; which was ſomewhat ſtrange for a man ſo learned, and ſo little ſociable. One of his ſcholars, called John Melet, wrote an anſwer to that ſatire, under the fictitious name of Claudius Burgenſis (9).

[B] His avarice allowed him not to be at the neceſſary charges.] Renatus Moreau heard an old Phyſician of Montpellier ſay, that Sylvius promiſed the profeſſors of that univerſity to bring a vaſt number of ſtudents from all parts of the kingdom, if they would admit him into their ſociety gratis; and that his propoſal not being accepted, he reſolved to return to Paris, to deſire the Faculty to give him leave to teach.

[C] He was admitted Bachelor of Phyſic in June 1531.] The records of the Faculty, which prove this fact, irrefragably confute thoſe, who would maintain, after Ranchin (10), that Sylvius was a Phyſician at Montpellier; for ſince he was made bachelor of Phyſic after his journey to Montpellier, it is undeniable, that he was not admitted doctor at Montpellier, before he returned to Paris: Beſides, it is certain he did not leave Paris after he took his bachelor's degree in that univerſity (11).

[D] Sylvius had a great many.] He publiſhed for the uſe of his ſcholars, the practice of Mark Gattinaria: it is ſaid that nine hundred copies were ſold off in one or two days, and that the Bookſeller was obliged to make a ſecond edition (12). A Poet (13) who made his epitaph, ſays, that a thouſand eyes were fixed upon him, when he read his lectures:

Quem certa methodo medicis de rebus agentem,
Aſſiduè in ludo totius principe terræ,
Mille acri aſſiduè ſpectabant lumina viſu.

Moreau underſtands it of five hundred auditors, and quotes Sylvius himſelf, who ſays, he had but four hundred, auditoribus circiter quadringentis (14). If it be ſo, Moreau ſhould not have ſaid that Sylvius's ſchool might be compared with that of Theophraſtus (15), who had two thouſand ſcholars. Henry Stephens (16) ſays only that Sylvius had two or three hundred ſcholars.

[E] He died the thirteenth of January 1555. It was in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his life.] Renatus Moreau quotes five authors for it, viz. Mizaldus, Paſchalis Gallus, Arrivabenus (17), Claudius Burgenſis, and la Croix du Maine. But he obſerves, at the ſame time, that Sammarthanus (18), and Geſner (19) ſay, that he lived only ſixty-three years; that Du Breul (20) places his death on the firſt day of February 1554; and that according to Nancelius and Rouville, he flouriſhed in 1557, and 1560. My edition of Du Bruel of the year 1639 in quarto, places Sylvius's death in the ſixty-third year of his life, and on the tenth of January 1554. Moreri, Merklinus (21), and Freherus (22) have committed the ſame miſtake with Sammarthanus.

[F] He was buried in the burying-place of poor ſcholars.] He ordered it ſo by his will. That burying-place is before Montaigu-college. The funeral was performed with great pomp; all the univerſity were preſent at it, and the Phyſicians put on their ſcarlet gowns, the name of that burying-place puts me in mind of a tract written by Sylvius in favour of poor ſcholars: It is intituled, De victus ratione facili ac ſalubri pauperum Scholaſticorum. He preſcribes them a diet, which, ſaid he, GOD had put into his heart to publiſh; and he enters upon ſuch a detail as would make the men of our age laugh, who are leſs tractable than thoſe of Sylvius's time. He adviſes the ſcholars, who awake in the night, to cough and ſpit ſtoutly, and gives them ſeveral little expedients for keeping themſelves from being cold in bed. 'Ut citius incaleſcas 'pedes etiam in nates raduces, in lectum inſpira. - - - 'To be the ſooner warm, draw up your feet into your 'breech, and breathe in your bed. It is likely, he knew the benefit of them by his own experience.

[G] His rough and wild way,] He ſeldom jeſted, and ſeldom departed from his gravity; and when he had a mind to appear more ſociable, by ſome witty conceit,

---

(a) Symphorianus Champier, & Jerome Du-Mont.

(b) Taken from his Life prefixed to his works, and written by Renatus Moreau.

(8) Apolog. d'Herodote, pag. 168.

(9) Ex Renato Moreau, in Vita Jacobi Sylvii.

(10) In Catalogo Doctor. Monſpel.

(11) Moreau, in Vita Jacobi Sylvii.

(12) Ibid.

(13) J. Væ-vræus, apud Moreau, ibid.

(14) Præfat. Libri de Oſſibus.

(15) Diog. Laërt. in ejus Vita.

(16) Apologie d'Herodote, pag. 168.

(17) See, above, the remark [A].

(18) In Elogiis, pag. m. 27.

(19) In II Catal. Libr. Galeni.

(20) In Antiquit. Pariſienſ.

(21) In Lindenio renovato.

(22) In Theatro Virorum Eruditione clarorum.

departed from him [H]. I ſhall ſay ſomething of his writings [I]. He was very much at variance with Veſalius [K].

conceit, he did it ſomewhat uncouthly. Here is the only merry thought that is told of him: He ſaid one day, That he had parted with three beaſts; his cat, his mule, and his maid.

[H] Judicial aſtrology was the only thing.] It had never been ſo much in vogue both at court and in the town, as in Sylvius's time; and yet (23) he oppoſed it ſtoutly, whenever there was occaſion for it. One day after he had railed bitterly at the Aſtrologers, he told his good friend Turnebus, that he had often been at the trouble to run over the whole almanack, in the beginning of the year, and ſet down fair weather wherever there was rainy weather; wind inſtead of calm; cloudy weather inſtead of clear weather; and having obſerved the event, he had found at the year's end, that he had been a much better Aſtrologer than they (24).

[I] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his writings.] The chief books he compoſed, and which made him moſt to be known, are, Methodus medicamenta componendi ad uſum medicorum concinnata; Libri de medicamentorum ſimplicium delectu in Pharmacopœorum gratiam conſcripti; Caſtigationes & emendationes in Joannem Meſuæum. His books of anatomy were publickly explained by the profeſſors of Paris. His treatiſe De menſibus mulierum, was the text on which Lewis Duret read public lectures. The ſame tract, and another De generatione hominis, were tranſlated into French by William Chretien, Phyſician to Henry II. His tracts of Anatomy and Pharmacy have been tranſlated into French, and re-printed ſeveral times. They are probably the ſame that were publickly explained by one of the moſt zealous diſciples of Veſalius; which is much, conſidering how violently he and Veſalius hated one another (25). There is an edition (26) in folio of Sylvius's works, publiſhed by Renatus Moreau, who prefixed to it the life of that great man, out of which I have extracted this article. This life is ſo well written, that it were to be wiſhed, that the work (27) from which it was taken, was printed. Next to it there are many encomiums upon Sylvius, collected out of divers authors, whereby it appears that he was a man in great eſteem.

[K] He was very much at variance with Veſalius.] The latter gave Sylvius the greateſt trouble that ever he had. Sylvius's excellency lay in Anatomy, and he was preparing a work upon that ſubject, which he looked upon as his maſter-piece. In the mean time, Veſalius publiſhes in 1541, his Opus Anatomicum, ſo well done, and with ſo many fine cuts, that every body admires it. Veſalius had been Sylvius's ſcholar for the ſpace of three years, which was another cauſe of his vexation; the diſciple ſupplants the maſter. Beſides, he writes againſt Galen, and not only charges him with ſeveral faults, tho' perhaps without reaſon, but plainly ſhews ſome of his real errors. How could Sylvius bear this, being looked upon as the reſtorer and firſt interpreter of Galen? Sylvius kept no meaſures, he maintained that Galen had writ nothing but what was true, and indulged his anger to ſuch a degree, that he continually inveighed againſt his antagoniſt. Sylvius ita exarſit in iras tantoque odio commotus eſt in Veſalium, primo ut nihil à Galeno ſcriptum prolatumque eſſe contenderet quod veritati non eſſet conſentaneum; ſecundo ut nulla habita ratione ætatis & gravitatis ſuæ, impetu quodam mentis fervidiore elatis anſam declamandi in Veſalium (quem Veſanum appellabat) ſingulis diebus arriperet, & contumelioſius exciperet, quam vel ipſe propter prudentiam longa rerum experientia comparatam, vel Veſalius ob laudabile ſuum inſtitutum ad utilitatem publicam deſtinatum mereretur (28). The emperor's Phyſician, and even ſome courtiers, who hated Veſalius, becauſe of his preſumption and merit, threw oil into the fire. That quarrel produced many books, and the progreſs of it may be known by reading Sylvius's book in Veſanum, Veſalius's letter de China radice, a piece of Francis Puteus in Veſalium, another of Renatus Henerus in Sylvium, Fallopius's Anatomical Obſervations, and Cuneus's Apology againſt Puteus.

---

(23) Note, that inſtead of and yet, one might ſay, and therefore. This ſort of things have two faces.

(24) Turnebus, Epiſt. ad. Cardinal. Lotharingum, præfixa Opuſc. Plutarchi de Orac. defectu.

(25) See the remark [K].

(26) Mine is that of Geneva 1635. The Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated the firſt of September 1629.

(27) De illuſtribus Medicis Pariſienſibus, by Renatus Moreau.

(28) Renatus Moreau, in Vita Sylvii.

SIMON or SIMONIS (Theodorus) was born at Berchſtede in the country of Holſtein (a). See the remark [I] of the article of Janſenius, to which you may add what follows. Fromondus maintains (b); that this man being ſet at liberty, abjured his Hereſies at Louvain, and that Janſenius gave him wherewithal to pay his charges in the tavern, and to make his journey. He further ſays, that he had forſaken his order at Magdeburg before he came to Louvain. I ſhall ſpeak of the anſwer that was made to this account [A]. Some perſons may think that a certain very impious book concerns our Simonis [B]; and therefore I here give notice that it is falſe. He changed his name into that of Philippus Coſmius (c).

[A] I ſhall ſpeak of the anſwer that was made to this account.] I ſhall not repeat what concerns Simonis's journey to Louvain, and his conferences with Janſenius (1). I ſhall only ſay, that after he had left that town, he writ a piece, De falſis principiis fidei Pontificiæ ejuſque Idololatria, which he ſent to Janſenius in 1631. It contained the motives of his converſion, and he hoped that Janſenius would anſwer him; but he was miſtaken: his ſilence made him proceed, and write a letter (2) to him, wherein he earneſtly deſired to have an anſwer from him, and publiſhed it. That letter contains the hiſtory of his impriſonment: it was inſerted in a book of Voëtius (3), in 1635. Whereupon Fromondus thought himſelf obliged to ſpeak of Simonis, in anſwer to that book of Voëtius. He gave a very unfaithful account of the matter, if we may depend upon the anſwer that was made him. See the Apologetical Letter which Simonis inſcribed to him: it is prefixed to his treatiſe De ſtatu & Religione propria Papatus adverſus Cornelium Janſenium Epiſcopum Iprenſem, printed at Leyden in 1638. He maintains that Fromondus falſified and ſuppreſſed ſeveral circumſtances of the fact; he denies that he had abjured the Catholic religion at Louvain; he owns that he was for ſome time in the order of the Premonſtratenſes, but that he left it before he made any vow (4).

[B] Some . . . . may think that a certain very impious book concerns our Simonis.] To know in general that Simonis's name is in the title of ſuch a book, and that Theodorus Simonis was ſucceſſively a Lutheran, a Papiſt, a Lutheran, and a Socinian; and was rector of a Socinian college in Poland, and that the book in queſtion was printed in Poland, are things which may make people judge that this book was written by that Socinian; for the time is not always minded. This is the ſubject of this remark. Thoſe, who deſire to know ſomething of that impious book, need only read the following paſſage of Spizelius: ‘ De Atheiſmo in Po-
‘ lonia, ex Atheo libello, Cracoviæ anno 1588 tit: Si-
‘ monis Religio, authore incerto edito, judicium fieri
‘ poterit in quo præter portenta innumera hæc quoque
‘ verba reperiuntur; Credo in tria, Cœlum, Terram,
‘ & Cœli formam, in Cœlum patrem, atque creato-
‘ rem omnium. In Terram omnium matrem, atque
‘ nutricem, & in Cœli formam omnia ſentientem, &
‘ intelligentem. Ede itaque, bibe, lude, jam Deus ‘ figmentum eſt (5). - - - One may form a judgment of ‘ the Atheiſm in Poland, by an impious book publiſhed at ‘ Cracow, in the year 1588, intituled, Simonis Reli‘ gio, authore incerto edito; wherein beſides innume-
‘ rable monſtrous things theſe words are alſo found; I ‘ believe in three, the Heaven, the Earth, and the ‘ form of Heaven; in Heaven, the Father, and Crea‘ tor of all things. In the Earth, the mother and ‘ nurſe of all things; and in the form of Heaven, per‘ ceiving all things, and underſtanding them.

(a) Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſ. Cimbricæ, Part. iii, pag. 108.

(b) Lib. Fromondus Criſi Deſperatæ Cauſæ Papatus, cap. xlv, pag. 284.

(c) Bibl. Antitrinit. pag. 143.

(1) See the article JANSENIUS, remark [I].

(2) Dated from Emmeric, the 12th of February 1632.

(3) Intituled Deſperata Cauſa Papatus, See pag. 762, & ſeq.

(4) A voti monaſtici & Ordinis religione liber in hunc uſque diem perſtiti.

(5) Spizelius, in Scrutinio Atheiſmi, pag. 43, 44. See alſo the ſame Spizelius, in infel. Literato, pag. 355, where he ſpeaks more at large of that impious book. See alſo the remark [D] of the article SIMONIUS (Simon).

SIMONETTA (Hyacinthus) a Gentleman of Milan, was much eſteemed for his bravery, and experience in war. He was made priſoner by a Gentleman of Bretagne, called James de Rommelin, Lieutenant of a company of the Seneſchal d'Armagnac. This Briton, who amongſt the Military men was called the little Captain la Lande, becauſe he was a younger brother of the houſe of la Lande, carried his priſoner to the city of Aſti, and ſet him at liberty, after he had received his ranſom. Simonetta complained that la Lande had treated him unworthily, and wrote ſomething to him concerning it, and having received an anſwer, he ſent him a challenge to fight, which he accepted, inſomuch that the conditions thereof being ſettled by John James Trivulſo, who commanded in the Aſteſan for the King of France, Charles VIII, and by Lucio Malvecio, Lieutenant of the Duke of Milan, the two champions entred the liſts in the year 1496. The victory fell to the Gentleman of Bretagne (a), of which Trivulſo gave a certificate, that may be ſeen at length in Bertrand d'Argentré (b), who corrects ſome miſtakes concerning that famous duel [A].

(a) Taken from Bertrand d'Argentré Hiſtoire de Bretagne, lib. xii, cap. lxi,

(b) Ibid.

[A] D'Argentré corrects ſome miſtakes concerning that famous duel.] He cenſures (1) Arnoldus Ferron (2) for having ſaid that la Lande was a native of Bourdeaux, deſcended of a citizen family, and that the duel was fought in the preſence of Charles VIII. Here are three things that are falſe; for la Lande was a gentleman of Britany, and did not fight till 1496; and the king returned into France in the beginning of the year 1495. La Lande's antagoniſt was not called Chriſtopher Zerbulo, and was not of Genoa, as Arnold Ferron affirms: he was called Hyacinthus Simonetta, and was a native of Milan. They did not fight on foot with ſwords, nor did la Lande run his ſword into the belly of his enemy, as Ferron pretends. They fought on horſeback, and their firſt attack was with their lances running in a full carreer one againſt the other, and afterwards with battle-axes. Simonetta was wounded in the face (3), as Trivulſo, who was a ſpectator of the combat, hath declared in his atteſtation. Note, that Symphorianus Champier (4) in his life of Charles VIII, is diſpleaſed with Sabellicus, who, out of hatred to the French, hath made no mention of this duel, notwithſtanding it was ſo memorable that a trophy was erected in the place where it was fought. D'Argentré adds (5), that Alciatus, who was then a profeſſor of the Civil Law at Milan, ſpoke of that adventure in a book which he wrote de Duello: but that he is miſtaken in ſaying (6) that Simonetta fought with Baiard; for the duel of Baiard was with Dom Alfonſo de Sotomajore, in the year 1503. This criticiſm is right; but it is not true that Alciatus at that time taught Civil Law at Milan. He never was profeſſor of that ſcience: and he was not above four or five years old when la Lande and Simonetta fought. He dedicated his treatiſe de ſingulari Certamine to Francis I. the firſt day of March, 1529; he was then at Avignon.

(1) D'Argentré, Hiſt. de Bret. book xii. ch. lxi, p. m. 702, 704.

(2) Ferron. in Hiſt. Caroli VIII. folio m. 37, verſo.

(3) D'Argentré, ubi ſupra, pag. 703.

(4) Ferron. ubi ſupra, fol. 38.

(5) D'Argentré, pag. 704.

(6) Alciat. de ſingulari certamine, cap. xxxviii, pag. 67, Edit. Lugd. 1543 in 8*vo*.

SIMONIDES, an Iambic Poet, was born at Minoa (a) a town of the Iſle of Amorgos one of the Sporades (b). If we will believe Suidas, he flouriſhed 406 years after the taking of Troy; but it is very likely he is not ſo ancient. He is quoted by Athenæus, Julius Pollux, Ælian, and ſome other authors. He made a very ridiculous ſatire againſt women [A].

(a) Stephanus Byzantinus, Voce Ἀμοργός.

(b) Strabo, lib. x, ſub fin.

[A] He made a very ridiculous ſatire againſt women.] He ſuppoſed that their ſouls had a different original, according to the diverſity of their humours; that the ſouls of ſome women came from horſes, foxes, or apes, &c. and that the ſouls of others proceeded from the ſea, or the earth, &c. Ælian quotes what he ſaid concerning women, who loved to paint and trick up themſelves: he derived their ſouls from horſes. Καὶ ὁ Σιμωνίδης δὲ, ἐκ παντοδαπῶν θηρίων λέγων τὰς γυναῖκας γενέσθαί τε, καὶ διαπλασθῆναι, φησὶν ἐνίαις ἐκ τῶν ἵππων τό τε φιλόκοσμον καὶ φιλόμυρον συντεχθῆναι κατ᾽ ἐκείνους φύσει: Quin & Simonides fabulans ex diverſis beſtiis natas & conformatas eſſe mulieres, nonnullis earum ornatus & unguentorum ſtudium ex equorum naturâ innatum eſſe ſcribit (1). I omit the Greek verſes that follow in Ælian, and I ſhall only ſet down the concluſion of that paſſage in Latin. Talis quidem uxor præbet ſe ſpectaculum aliis jucundum, ſed viro nocet ſuo: Niſi ille fuerit aut rex, aut vir præpotens. Hujuſmodi uxor oblectare quem queat. The meaning of which is, that ſuch a woman is a pleaſant ſight to other men, but very prejudicial to her huſband, unleſs he be a king or a great lord. You will find in Stobæus not only the ſame verſes mentioned by Ælian, but alſo many more out of the ſame work of Simonides (2). That Poet was very near as unjuſt as the Italian author, who maintained that women have no ſouls (3). For the reſt, if I aſcribe to this Simonides, and not to that mentioned in the following article, the verſes quoted by Ælian, I do but follow Leo Allatius's opinion (4).

(1) Ælian. de Animal. lib. xvi, cap. xxiv, pag. m. 941.

(2) Stobæus, Sermone LXXI, de Vituperio Mulierum, fol. m. 252, verſo.

(3) See Vigneul Marville's Melanges, Tom. i, pag. 16, 17.

(4) Allatius, de Simeonum Scriptis, pag. 206, 207.

SIMONIDES, one of the beſt antient Poets, was a native of Ceos, an iſland of the Ægean See. He flouriſhed ſtill in the time of Xerxes's expedition, that is, about the LXXVth Olympiad. He exerciſed his talent in compoſing ſeveral ſorts of Poems; but he ſucceeded chiefly in elegies [A]. It is ſaid that he was preſerved twice from the [A] He ſucceeded chiefly in elegies.] This we learn of Quintilian. 'Simonides tenuis (1), alioqui ſermone proprio & jucunditate quadam commendari poteſt: præcipua tamen ejus in commovenda miſeratione virtus, ut quidam in hac eum parte omnibus ejuſdem operis autoribus præferant (2). - - - Simonides's ſtile was plain, but fitted to the ſubject with a certain ſweetneſs; but his principal excellency lay in raiſing commiſeration, and he was by ſome preferred to all authors on that account.' Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus acknowledges, among other virtues, that Simonides had the talent of moving to pity, and places him in that reſpect much above Pindar. Σιμωνίδου δὲ παρατήρει τὴν ἐκλογὴν τῶν ὀνομάτων, τῆς συνθέσεως τὴν ἀκρίβειαν, πρὸς τούτοις καθ᾽ ὃ βελτίων εὑρίσκεται καὶ Πινδάρου τὸ οἰκτίζεσθαι μὴ μεγαλοπρεπῶς, ἀλλ᾽ ὡς ἐκεῖνος παθητικῶς. Simonidis vero obſerva nominum delectum compoſitionis accuratam rationem; ad hæc, in quo etiam multo melior eſt ipſo Pindaro, miſerationem commovet, non ut ille magnifice, ſed ſuo ipſe more pathetice (3). When Horace has a mind to denote lamenting Muſes, he uſes an expreſſion which repreſents our Poet.

Sed ne relictis, Muſa procax, jocis
Ceæ retractes munera næniæ (4).

Catullus may be alſo quoted for the ſame thing (5). One of the moſt famous works of Simonides was intituled Lamentations (6). I have ſaid, in another place (7), that he carried the prize of the elegy from Æſchylus.

(1) Concerning this ſimplicity of Simonides. See Mr le Fevre, Abregé de la Vie des Poëtes Grecs, pag. m. 38.

(2) Quintil. Inſtitut. Orat. lib. x, cap. i, pag. m. 468.

(3) Dionyſ. Halicar. de veter. Scriptor. Cenſ.

(4) Horat. Ode I, lib. ii.

(5) Paulum quid lubet adlocutionis mœſtius lacrymis Simonideis. Catullus, Epig. XXXIX.

(6) See Mr le Fevre, ubi ſupra, pag. 39.

(7) In the article ÆSCHYLUS, remark [G].

the danger of imminent death, and that this was a reward of his virtue [B]. The invention of local memory is aſcribed to him [C]. He is one of thoſe Poets, whoſe vein and memory laſted a long time; for at eighty years of age he diſputed the prize of Poetry, and carried it (a), and boaſted of having the beſt memory of any man in the world

[B] It is ſaid that he was preſerved twice from the danger of imminent death, and that this was a reward of his virtue.] One day he ſupped at Scopas's houſe, who was a conſiderable man for his noble birth, and great riches. After he had recited the Poem he had made for a ſet price in that man's honour, wherein he inſerted an encomium upon Caſtor and Pollux, he was told, that he ſhould receive one half of the price agreed upon, that he might, if he thought fit, aſk the other half of the Tyndarides (8), on whom he had beſtowed as many praiſes as upon Scopas. Soon after he was informed that two young men ſtood at the door, and deſired to ſpeak with him. He went out and ſaw no body. In the mean time the room, where he had left Scopas, and the other gueſts, fell down, and they were all killed. Cicero relates this in very fine words. Dicunt quum cœnaret Gramnone in Theſſalia Simonides apud Scopam fortunatum hominem & nobilem, ceciniſſetque id carmen, quod in eum ſcripſiſſet, in quo multa ornandi cauſa poëtarum more in Caſtorem ſcripta, & Pollucem fuiſſent, nimis illum ſordide Simonidi dixiſſe, ſe dimidium ejus ei quod pactus eſſet pro illo carmine, daturum, reliquum à ſuis Tyndaridis, quos æque laudaſſet, peteret, ſi ei videretur. Paulò poſt eſſe ferunt nunciatum Simonidi, ut prodiret, juvenes ſtare ad januam duos quoſdam, qui eum magnopere evocarent, ſurrexiſſe illum ipſum, prodiſſe, vidiſſe neminem. Hoc interim ſpatio conclave illud, ubi epularetur Scopas, concidiſſe, ea ruina ipſum oppreſſum cum ſuis interiſſe (9). Valerius Maximus relates the ſame thing (10), but he is guilty of an inexcuſable omiſſion; for he does not ſay why Caſtor and Pollux did that good ſervice to Simonides. Note, that Solinus aſcribes to Pindar what all other writers aſcribes to Simonides, with reſpect to this divine favour (11). Salmaſius ſuſpects that Solinus did ſo to conceal his theft, I mean, to make people believe that he was not a mere tranſcriber of Pliny (12). Obſerve alſo that Quintilian calls this apparition of the Tyndarides a fable (13), becauſe that Poet, who doubtleſs would not have deprived himſelf of ſo great a glory, does not mention it in his works. He obſerves that authors do very much differ as to the perſon in whoſe honour Simonides made that poem: nor did they agree about the town where the entertainment was given. But he informs us of one thing, which Cicero ſhould not have omitted. He tells us that the perſon, whom Simonides praiſed, was a victorious wreſtler. Cum pugili coronato carmen, quale componi victoribus ſolet, mercede pacta ſcripſiſſet; abnegata ei pecuniæ pars eſt, quòd more poëtis frequentiſſimo digreſſus, in laudes Caſtoris & Pollucis exierat (14). The omiſſion of this particular by Cicero is very prejudicial to Simonides; for one would think he had made improper digreſſions, and that he was ſo imprudent as to obſcure the glory of the man, who had bought his panegyric, by inſerting in it an encomium upon the gods. But if we conſider that Simonides was to celebrate the victory of a wreſtler, the objection vaniſhes away, and it is plain that Caſtor and Pollux (15) were to have a ſhare in his praiſes. Wherefore it is not a blameable digreſſion, but a neceſſary epiſode. As for the reſt, Mr de Girac makes a wrong criticiſm upon Quintilian. The learned Rhetorician, ſays he (16), would not have made uſe of a negative argument, if he had read in Callimachus that Simonides himſelf mentions that adventure in words full of gratitude towards his deliverers. It is certain that Quintilian might have ſaid what he ſays, notwithſtanding Callimachus's verſes. There is a vaſt difference between what a Poet relates in his poems, and what others make him ſay in their writings.

Here follows the other miracle. Simonides having landed, found the dead body of an unknown man upon the ſhore, and buried it. That unknown man warned him in a dream, not to take ſhipping again the next day: Simonides followed his advice, and he ſaw the veſſel ſhipwrecked. He made a poem upon that adventure. ‘ Longe indulgentius Dii in poëta ‘ Simonide, cujus ſalutarem inter quietem admoni‘ tionem conſilii firmitate roboraverunt. Is enim cùm ‘ ad littus navem appuliſſet, inhumatumque corpus ‘ jacens ſepulturæ mandaſſet, admonitus ab eo ne pro‘ ximo die navigaret, in terra remanſit: Qui inde ‘ ſolverant, fluctibus & procellis in conſpectu ejus ‘ obruti ſunt. Ipſe lætatus eſt, quòd vitam ſuam ſom‘ nio, quam navi, credere maluiſſet. Memor autem ‘ beneficii, elegantiſſimo eum carmine æternitati con‘ ſecravit, melius illi & diuturnius in animis homi‘ num ſepulchrum conſtituens, quàm in deſertis arenis ‘ ſtruxerat (17)- - - - - The gods were far more indulgent ‘ to the Poet Simonides, and confirmed him in the reſolu‘ tion which he had taken from the wholeſome advice ‘ he had received in his ſleep. For when he was ready ‘ to take ſhipping, and had buried the dead body of a ‘ man which lay on the ſhore, he was warned by the ‘ ſame man not to go to ſea the next day, and ſtay at ‘ land. They who had taken ſhipping periſhed, in his ‘ ſight, by a ſtorm, and were ſwallowed up in the ‘ waves. Simonides rejoiced, becauſe he had truſted his ‘ life rather to a dream than a ſhip. Being mindful ‘ of the favour, he immortalized that man in a moſt ‘ elegant poem, erected a better and more durable tomb ‘ to him, than that which he had formerly built upon ‘ the deſart ſands.’ He did not think that humanity required any thing from him beſides the burying of the dead body; but being ſo well rewarded for that favour, he went farther, and put this glorious epitaph upon the tomb of that unknown man.

Οὗτος μὲν Κείοιο Σιμωνίδου ἐστὶ σαωτήρ,
Ὃς καὶ τεθνειὼς ζῶντι παρέσχε χάριν.

Hic quidem Cei Simonidis eſt ſervator,
Qui & mortuus vivo retulit gratiam (18).

This is the tomb of the man who ſaved the life of Simonides of Ceos, and who, after his death, was grateful to the living.

[C] The invention of local memory is aſcribed to him.] It will not be improper to obſerve upon what occaſion he invented it. When Scopas and his gueſts were cruſhed by the fall of the room, they were ſo disfigured that they could not be known one from another. And yet there was a neceſſity to know them; for thoſe, who deſigned to bury them, deſired to perform that duty, each to his kinſman. Simonides removed the difficulty; he remembred in what place each gueſt ſat down at table, and was thereby enabled to tell each of their relations which of them was to be buried by him. Afterwards conſidering how neceſſary order is to preſerve the ideas of objects, he invented the method of annexing them to certain places, that is, he was the inventer of local memory. Cicero ſhall be my voucher (19). Non ſum tanto ego, inquit, ingenio, quanto Themiſtocles fuit, ut oblivionis artem quàm memoriæ malim, gratiamque habeo Simonidi illi Chio, quem primum ferunt artem memoriæ protuliſſe. Dicunt enim quum cœnaret . . . . (20) Quos quum humare vellent ſui, neque poſſent obtritos internoſcere ullo modo, Simonides dicitur ex eo quod meminiſſet quo eorum loco quiſque cubuiſſet, demonſtrator uniuſcujuſque ſepeliendi fuiſſe. Hac tum re admonitus inveniſſe fertur, ordinem eſſe maxime, qui memoriæ lumen afferret. Itaque iis qui hanc partem ingenii exercerent, locos eſſe capiendos, & ea quæ memoria tenere vellent effingenda animo, atque in his locis collocanda: ſic fore, ut ordinem rerum locorum ordo conſervaret, res autem ipſas rerum effigies notaret, atque ut locis pro cera, ſimulacris pro literis uteremur. That author obſerves, in another place, that Simonides had a very good memory (21). Theſe words of Philoſtratus give a great idea of it: Apollonius being an hundred years old had ſtill a better memory than Simonides ever had in his greateſt vogue; and he uſed to ſing a canticle which that Poet had made in praiſe of memory, wherein he ſays, that every thing fades and vaniſhes away in time, whereas time never grows old, is never corrupted, and always remains the ſame, with memory that goes along with it (22). Some authors ſay, that Simonides took ſome remedies to acquire a good memory, which produced the intended effect (23).

[D] At eighty years of age he diſputed the prize of Poetry.] This he mentioned in one of his poems. ‘ Simonides,

---

(a) Plutarchus an ſeni ſit gerenda Reſpubl. pag. 785, A.

(8) That is, Caſtor and Pollux.

(9) Cicero de Oratore, lib. ii, fol. 87. D. See alſo Phædrus, lib. iv, fab. xxiv.

(10) Val. Maximus, lib. i, cap. viii, num. vii, in Ext.

(11) Solin. cap. i, pag. m. 11.

(12) Salmaſ. Exercitat. Plin. Tom. i, pag. 53.

(13) Qanquam mihi totum de Tyndaridis fabuloſum videtur, neque omnino hujus rei meminit uſquam poëta ipſe, profecto non taciturus de tanta ſua gloria. Quintilian, lib. xi, cap. ii, pag. m. 517.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) They were in a manner the patrons of wreſtlers.

(16) Girac, Replique à Coſtar, §. liii, pag. m. 465. He quotes the words of Callimachus, cited by Suidas: I ſhall ſpeak of it afterward in remark [E], citat (26).

(17) Valer. Maximus, lib. i, cap. vii, num. iii, in Ext. See alſo Cicero, de Divinatione, lib. i, fol. 308, C.

(18) Tzetz. Chiliad. i, Hiſt. xxiv. He quotes one Ariſtides. See Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, lib. iii, cap. xxx, pag. 331, where he corrects this paſſage of Tzetzes.

(19) Cicero de Oratore, lib. ii, fol. 87, D. See alſo Quintilian, lib. xi, cap. ii, pag. 517.

(20) You may ſee in the foregoing citation (9), the words I omit here.

(21) Cicero, Tuſculan. Quæſt. lib. i, fol. 249, C.

(22) Philoſtratus, in the life of Apollonius, book i, ch. ix. See the ſame in Vitis Sophiſtar. lib. ii, in Proclo.

(23) Scriptores varii memorant Cyrum regem & Simonidem Lyricum, & Hippiam Eleum . . . . ideo valuiſſe memoria quod epotis quibuſdam remediis id impetrarunt. Amm. Marcell. lib. xvi, cap. v, pag. m. 116.

world (b). He lived ſtill above ten years longer (c). It is ſaid that the deſtruction of his tomb by a General of the Agrigentines did not remain unpuniſhed [E]. The anſwer which he gave to a prince, who aſked him the definition of GOD, is very famous [F]. I mean, ‘ Simonides vero Poëta octogeſimo anno & docuiſſe ſe carmina, & in eorum certamen deſcendiſſe ipſe gloriatur: nec fuit iniquum, illum voluptatem ex ingenio ſuo diu percipere, cùm eam omni ævo fruendam traditurus eſſet (24). - - - - But the Poet Simonides gloried that at eighty years of age, he both compoſed verſes, and conteſted for the prize: nor was it unreaſonable that he ſhould long enjoy the pleaſure of his own wit, which from him was to be enjoyed by all ages.’

[E] The deſtruction of his tomb . . . . did not remain unpuniſhed.] Phœnix, General of the Agrigentines, being at war with the Syracuſans, pulled down Simonides's tomb (25), and built a tower with the materials of it: and it happened that the town was taken through that part of the wall where the tower was built. Callimachus brought in Simonides complaining of that impious action, and ſaying, that Phœnix had not been afraid of Caſtor and Pollux, who, added he, preſerved me from the fall of a houſe (26). Suidas's negligence cannot be ſufficiently wondered at; for he does not name the town, where a tower was built of the ſtones of Simonides's tomb. But becauſe he ſays that a General of the Agrigentines cauſed that tomb to be demoliſhed, and the tower to be built, we have ſome reaſon to think that it was Agrigentum. Unleſs one had rather ſay, that Phœnix having conquered Syracuſe, and being beſieged in it, cauſed a wall to be fortified by the building of a tower, and that Syracuſe was re-taken, through that place. It is likely Simonides died at Hiero's court. A very learned Chronologer places the death of this Poet a year before that of the prince. ‘ Utriuſque obitus contiguos, ut ita dicam, in annos incurrit, Simonidis quidem in annum mundi 3516. Hieronis autem 3517, apud P. Petavium lib. 13. de doctrina temporum (27). - - - Both their deaths happened, if I may ſay ſo, in contiguous years, that of Simonides in the year of the world 3516. But Hiero's in 3517, as Petavius ſays.’ We may obſerve that Petavius follows Diodorus Siculus, who ſays that Hiero died in the ſecond year of the LXXVIIIth Olympiad (28); and therefore he believed that Simonides died in the firſt year of the ſame olympiad (29). But becauſe he places (30) the beginning of the olympiads in the year of the word 3208, he placed the death of Simonides in the year of the world 3517.

[F] The anſwer he gave to a prince, who aſked him the definition of GOD, is very famous.] Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, deſired that Poet to tell him what GOD is. The Poet anſwered him, that it was not a queſtion that could be immediately anſwered, and that he wanted a whole day to think upon it. When that term was over, Hiero aſked the anſwer; but Simonides deſired two days more to conſider of it. This was not the laſt delay he aſked: he was often called on to give an anſwer, and every time he deſired double the time he had laſt demanded. The tyrant wondring at it, deſired to know the reaſon of it. I do ſo, anſwered Simonides, becauſe the more I examine the matter, the more obſcure it appears to me. I am going to give the ſame account of this in Latin, to the end it may be ſeen, that Cicero, in the perſon of Cotta the pontiff, declares, that, in the like caſe, he would give the ſame anſwer as Simonides did. ‘ Nec ego nunc ipſe aliquid afferam melius; ut enim modo dixi, omnibus fere in rebus, & maximè in phyſicis, quid non ſit, citiùs, quàm quid ſit dixerim. Roges me; quid aut qualis ſit Deus: auctore utar Simonide; de quo cùm quæſiviſſet hoc idem tyrannus Hiero, deliberandi cauſſâ ſibi unum diem poſtulavit. Cùm idem ex eo poſtridie quæreret, biduum petivit; cum ſæpius duplicaret numerum dierum, admiranſque Hiero quæreret cur ita faceret, QUIA QUANTÒ, inquit, DIUTIUS CONSIDERO, TANTÒ MIHI RES VIDETUR OBSCURIOR. Sed Simonidem arbitror (non enim Poëta ſolùm ſuavis, verùm etiam cæterqui doctus, ſapienſque traditur) quia multa venirent in mentem acuta, atque ſubtilia, dubitantem quid eorum eſſet veriſſimum, deſperaſſe omnem veritatem (31). - - - Neither can I now offer any thing better: for as I have juſt ſaid in all ſubjects, and eſpecially in Phyſics, I can more readily tell what a thing is not, than what it is. Aſk me what, or what kind of a being is GOD; I will anſwer in the words of Simonides; who, when the tyrant Hiero had aſked him this queſtion, required a day to conſider of it. When next day he aſked him the ſame queſtion, Simonides required two days more: When he had often doubled the time he required, and Hiero being ſurpriſed, aſked him the reaſon of it. IT IS, ſays he, BECAUSE THE LONGER I CONSIDER, THE MORE OBSCURE THE SUBJECT APPEARS TO ME. But I think that Simonides, (who is recorded to have been not only a delightful Poet, but beſides a learned and wiſe man) when many acute and ſubtile things came into his mind, doubted which were trueſt, and at length deſpaired of all truth.’ Obſerve well the laſt words of Cicero: they ſtrike home, they come to the point. Simonides might eaſily have anſwered, had he been contented with popular notions, and thoſe lively impreſſions which are now called inward proofs. But as he had to do with a diſcerning prince (32) who had refined his judgment, by his frequent converſations with men of learning, he was afraid to hazard his reputation. Therefore he took time to examine the matter, he viewed it in all lights, and on every ſide; and becauſe his mind no ſooner furniſhed him with ſeveral anſwers, but it ſuggeſted the refutation of them: he found nothing ſolid; he diſcovered every where a ſtrong and weak ſide, and depths unſearchable: he feared therefore leſt he ſhould be deceived, whatever principles he might lay down to ſettle the definition of GOD: he no longer entertained any hopes of finding the truth, and ſo gave it up. A man of mean parts would not have been ſo nice; but would have been dazzled with the firſt hypotheſis he had met with, he would not have apprehended the difficulty in it, and would have dogmatically laid it down as the immoveable point of truth, beyond which there was nothing but folly and extravagance. There are even perſons of great parts, who quickly deliver their opinion as the only one that ought to be embraced; they decide, that it is evident, and abuſe thoſe who do not acknowledge it. A ſtrong perſuaſion inſpires them with this conduct. Tertullian will ſupply us with another example. He will have it, that this happened not at the court of Syracuſe, but at that of Lydia: According to him, Crœſus demanded of Thales a definition of GOD, but had it not, what time ſoever he granted that Philoſopher to examine that queſtion. ‘ Quid enim Thales ille princeps Phyſicorum ſciſcitanti Crœſo de divinitate certum renuntiavit, commeatus deliberandi ſæpe fruſtratus? Deum quilibet opifex Chriſtianus & invenit, & oſtendit. Et exinde totum, quod adeo quæritur, re quoque aſſignat: licet Plato affirmet factitatorem univerſitatis, neque inveniri facilem, & inventum enarrari in omnes difficilem (33). - - - - For what certain anſwer did Thales, the chief of natural Philoſophers, give to Crœſus aſking him concerning the Deity; when he had often found that the time he required for conſidering of it, was not ſufficient? Any Chriſtian tradeſman can both diſcover and declare what GOD is, and from thence can impart to others a full and ſatisfactory anſwer: though Plato affirms, that the Maker of the univerſe neither can eaſily be diſcovered, nor, when diſcovered, can be eaſily deſcribed to all men.’ You ſee how much this Father extolleth the knowledge of the meaneſt Chriſtian artificer above that of the moſt famous heathen Philoſophers. All our tradeſmen, ſays he, find GOD and declare him, and effectually explain whatever may be called in queſtion concerning the divine nature. Which is as much as to ſay, that if Crœſus or Hiero had aſked

(24) Valer. Maximus, lib. viii, cap. vii, num. 13, in Ext.

(25) Διαλύει τὸν τάφον τȣ̃ Σιμωνίδȣ μάλα ἀκηδῶς τε καὶ ἀνοίκτως. Simonidis ſepulchrum cum magna contemptione & crudeliter diſſolvit. Suidas, in Σιμωνίδης, pag. m. 741, 742.

(26) Taken from Suidas, ibid.

(27) Leſcalopier. in Ciceron. de Natura Deorum, lib. i, pag. 84.

(28) Petavius, in Rationario Tempor. Parte. i, lib. iii, cap. vi, p. m. 136.

(29) Id. ibid. Part. ii, lib. iii, cap. i, pag. m. 153.

(30) Suidas ſays that Simonides lived till the LXXVIIIth Olympiad.

(31) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, pag. 83, Edit. Leſcaloperii.

(32) See Ælian Var. Hiſtor. lib. iv, cap. xv, & lib. ix, cap. i.

(33) Tertullianus, in Apologetico, cap. xlvi.

(b) See the Greek Diſtich mentioned by Ariſtides περὶ τȣ̃ παραφθέγματος. Valeſius in Amm. Marcell. lib. xvi, cap. v, pag. m. 116, quotes it.

(c) Σιμωνίδης ὁ Κεῖος ὑπὲρ τὰ ἐνενήκοντα (ἔζησεν). Simonides Ceus ſupra nonaginta (vixit.) Lucian. in Macrobiis, ſub finem, pag. m. 644, Tom. ii. Suidas makes him live eighty-nine years, and not ninety-nine, as Giraldus does. Dialog. IX, Hiſtoriæ Poëtarum, pag. 463.

mean, the anſwer he gave to Hiero, tyrant of Syracuſe, to whoſe court he went, notwithſtanding aſked the moſt ignorant of the Chriſtians, What is GOD, and which are his attributes, they would immediately have received a direct anſwer, and ſo full, that nothing would have been wanting. Tertullian goes too faſt, and ſuffers himſelf to be carried away by his imagination. He conſidereth not that the Pagan Philoſophers, who acknowledged themſelves unable to ſatisfy the curioſity of thoſe who aſked them, what God was, were only at a loſs for an anſwer, becauſe they would not reſt contented with the vulgar notions, as an ignorant perſon would have done. Nothing could have been more eaſy than for them to have anſwered, God is an infinite being, and omnipotent, who framed the univerſe and governs it, who puniſhes and rewards, who is angry with ſinners, and is attoned by our ſacrifices. In this manner would our tradeſmen have anſwered Hiero, adding what we read in the Catechiſm concerning the perſons in the Trinity, and the death and paſſion of Jesus Christ, &c. Once more, if Thales or Simonides had been ſatisfied with theſe general notions, they would not have demanded time to prepare their anſwer, they would have had it in readineſs. But as they deſired that all the terms of the definition required ſhould be evidently indiſputable, and found themſelves, that whatever they could propoſe might be diſputed, they demanded one delay after another, and at laſt were not able to anſwer. I believe Simonides imagined, that his anſwer would be propoſed to be canvaſſed by all the fine wits of the court of Syracuſe, and that he would be obliged to defend it by reſolving all their difficulties.

This is what probably he thought with himſelf. If I ſay, that God is a being diſtinct from all the bodies which compoſe the univerſe, I ſhall be aſked if the univerſe always exiſted, at leaſt as to the matter of it? Had that matter an efficient cauſe? And if I anſwer that it had one, I oblige myſelf to maintain that it was made of nothing, but this is a doctrine I ſhall never be able to make either Hiero or the fine wits of his court to comprehend, and which I cannot comprehend myſelf: wherefore I have reaſon to be uncertain my ſelf, whether that point is true or not: for ſo long as it is to me incomprehenſible, I cannot be rightly aſſured of its ſtate and nature. If I ſay, that the matter of the univerſe hath no efficient cauſe, I ſhall be aſked, whence comes God to have the power over it, and why hath it not as much power over God as he hath over it (34)? I muſt give good reaſons, why of two beings independent one of the other as to exiſtence, equally neceſſary and eternal, one hath all power over the other, without being reciprocally liable to be acted upon by the other. It is not ſufficient to ſay, that God is a being diſtinct from bodies which compoſe the univerſe. They will deſire to know, whether he is like them with reſpect to extenſion, that is, whether he is extended. If I anſwer, that he is extended, they will infer that he is corporeal and material: and I do not find myſelf able to make them underſtand, that there are two kinds of extenſion, one corporeal, the other incorporeal; one compoſed of parts and conſequently diviſible, the other perfectly ſimple and of conſequence indiviſible. If I ſay that God is not extended, it will be inferred that he is no where, and that he cannot have any union with the world. And how then ſhall he move the bodies? How can he act where he is not? Beſides, our underſtanding is not capable to conceive a ſubſtance unextended, and a ſpirit entirely ſeparated from matter (35). But ſuppoſing it ſhould be granted me, that God is an immaterial and unextended ſubſtance, a ſpirit infinite and omnipotent. How many new queſtions ſhould I have to reſolve? Does this ſpirit not neceſſarily exiſt, either with reſpect to his ſubſtance, or with reſpect to his qualities? Is not his power an attribute as neceſſary as his knowledge? Therefore he does not act freely, taking freedom to be the power of acting, or not acting. Whatever he does therefore is neceſſary and unavoidable; I ſhall be told that I entirely deſtroy religion, for religion is neceſſarily founded upon the ſuppoſition that God changeth his behaviour to men, as they change their manner of living; and if they did not appeaſe him by their prayers, he would do a great many things, which, in regard to their devotion, he will abſtain from doing. But if to avoid this troubleſome inconveniency, I have recourſe to the hypotheſis of the liberty of indifferency, and of conditional wills, I lay myſelf under an obligation to explain, both how this ſort of liberty can be conſiſtent with a being that is not the cauſe of its own power (36), and how an infinite train of conditional decrees, is compatible with a cauſe infinitely wiſe and independent, which muſt have followed a plan fixed and immoveable, and which at bottom hath no attribute more eſſential than immutability; for there is not any excellency more evidently contained in the idea of a being infinitely perfect than this of unchangeableneſs. Theſe are, if I am not miſtaken, a few of the reaſons which offered themſelves to Simonides, when he ſought for the definition demanded of him, and which made him determine not to give any, ſo afraid was he of affirming what was not true.

I may venture to ſay, that of moſt men it becomes Tertullian the leaſt to inſult our Thales, and to boaſt of our tradeſmen, for had he been in the place of Thales or Simonides, he would have but poorly come off. His zeal and haſty temper would have prompted him to give an immediate anſwer to the queſtion of Crœſus, or that of Hiero. But if you deſire to know what anſwer he would have made, read theſe words of Daillé (37): How ſtrange is his Philoſophy, concerning the nature of GOD †, whom he ſeems to make ſubject to paſſions like ours, to anger, to hatred, to grief? He aſcribes ⸸ to him a corporeal ſubſtance, not believing (as he ſays) that any one would deny that GOD is a body, which will ſurpriſe us leſs, if he boldly aſſerts ‡, that there is no ſubſtance but what is corporeal. Every one may ſee, that Tertullian would have defined God to be a corporeal ſubſtance ſubject to paſſions. If he had explained his definition, he would have ſaid, that our ſins exaſperate the Deity, that he hates the crime, and feels a real ſorrow when his laws are violated: but is eaſily appeaſed when his mercy is implored. Would he have been able to maintain this anſwer before Simonides, and the other ſages, whom King Hiero entertained at his court? Would they not have objected to him that every body is diviſible, and compounded of parts; and of conſeqence, that the infinitely perfect being is not a body. Would they not have ſaid, that ſupreme happineſs is eſſential to the divine nature, which therefore is not ſubject to paſſion, nor to any trouble or vexation? Would they not have ſaid, that the divine nature is unchangeable, and conſequently cannot alter either from love to hatred, or from hatred to love, nor from compaſſion to wrath, nor from wrath to compaſſion? If he had recurred to metaphors, would he not have been told, that Hiero wanted not a rhetorical anſwer, but an accurate definition, exactly conformable to the laws of Logic, or right reaſoning. It will be owned, I aſſure myſelf, that Tertullian had done better had he been ſilent, as he was whom he inſults. Let us ſuppoſe, that his Chriſtian tradeſman whom he repreſents ſo knowing, were aſked by Hiero, and ſhould anſwer, GOD is a being immaterial, infinite, all-powerful, perfectly good, perfectly happy, and infinitely juſt, who created all things according to the good pleaſure of his own will; can we think, that Simonides examining that anſwer, would not have ſaid, all this I knew as well as you; but I would not venture to aſſert it, becauſe it appears to me, that a being infinitely powerful, infinitely good, infinitely holy, and who had created all things with a perfect liberty of indifference, would not have ſubjected man to that ſinful and miſerable ſtate in which he lives. Had he left the ſoul at liberty to unite it ſelf to the body or not, it would never have entred into the body; for by ſuch a choice, the ſoul would have appeared too fooliſh to be the workmanſhip of a being infinitely perfect. If it is he who joins our ſouls to bodies, he muſt be induced to it by ſome determination natural and irreſiſtible; for acting freely, that is, having power to act or to abſtain from acting, to act after one, or after another manner, it cannot be imagined that he would have taken that courſe, ſeeing the ſoul by its union with the body, becomes ſubjected to a thouſand

---

(34) See, above, the remark [T] of the article EPICURUS, and Dr Burnet, Biſhop of Saliſbury, in the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, October 1699, pag. 442.

(35) Si mentem iſtam quaſi animal aliquod eſſe voluit, erit aliquid interius ex quo illud animal nominetur. Quid autem interius mente? Cingitur igitur corpore externo. Quod quoniam non placet, aperta, ſimplexque mens nullâ re adjunctâ quæ ſentire poſſit, fugere intelligentiæ noſtræ vim & notionem videtur. Cicero, lib. i, de Natura Deorum, pag. 39. Edit. Leſcaloperii.

(36) The nature of God, with all his attributes, doth neceſſarily exiſt, wherefore his power and his will are neceſſary beings, but neceſſity excludes indifference.

(37) Daillé of the right uſe of the Fathers, book ii, ch. iv, pag. m 354.

† Tertull. lib. i, adv. Marc. cap. 25, & 1, 2, cap. xvi.

⸸ Id. adv. Orig. cap. vii, & lib. ii, contra Marc. cap. xvi. Quis negabit Deum corpus eſſe, etſi Deus ſpiritus eſt?

‡ Id. lib. adv. Hermog. cap. 35. Cum ipſa ſubſtantia corpus ſit cujuſque.

withſtanding his great age; being prompted to it by his covetouſneſs, for he loved money a thouſand diſgraceful and abſurd diſorders, and to almoſt a continual miſery. ‘Quinetiam dicunt, ſi anima eſt divina poteſtque vivere ſejuncta à membris mortalibus, ut quid ſe miſeræ carni inſinuat? cujus vitio tot perpetitur mala, & admittat tot flagitia? ergo ſtulta eſt, ſi ſponte hoc facit: at ſi invita nefandas corporis ingreditur latebras, quis cogit? an ipſe Juppiter? ergo Deus nequaquam hanc diligit: imo carcere quam clauſit tam turpi, odiſſe videtur (38). - - - - But, moreover they ſay, If the ſoul is divine, and can live ſeparated from its mortal members, why does it join itſelf to a miſerable body? by the pravity of which it ſuffers ſo much evil, and commits ſo much wickedneſs? therefore it is fooliſh, if it does this of its own accord: but if unwillingly it enters the vile caverns of the body, who compels it? Does Jupiter himſelf? therefore GOD loves it not; yea, he appears to hate what he hath ſhut up in ſo deteſtable a priſon.’ But we will not leave our Chriſtian tradeſman to ſuſtain all the charge: we will call in a Divine, who may explain to Simonides the whole ſyſtem of Grace, and all the oeconomy of the decrees of Predeſtination: undoubtedly this Poet would anſwer him, you carry me from one dark region to another ſtill more obſcure. I cannot comprehend how under the government of a God who had the attributes you mention, there can ever be occaſion for any puniſhment; for the ſovereign power of ſuch a deity, together with an unlimited goodneſs and holineſs, would never permit any puniſhable crime to be perpetrated in his dominions. Such a being as this ſeems to me incapable of making his glory to reſult from the miſery of another, or depend on the endleſs duration of infernal torments: I even apprehend there is a downright inconſiſtency betwixt theſe two things, three Perſons who are but one God, of which the one puniſheth, and the other is puniſhed, and yet it cannot be ſaid, that he who is puniſhed, puniſheth, and that he who puniſheth is puniſhed, tho' yet both, one and the other are only one and the ſelf ſame ſubſtance, only one and the ſame God! Theſe three Perſons, I ſay, are to me a direct contradiction. Wherefore I choſe rather to give no anſwer to the Prince of Syracuſe, than to have propoſed to him ſuch definitions of God.

But, it may be ſaid, Is then Tertullian groſsly miſtaken, when he prefers Chriſtian tradeſmen to the Philoſophers? I anſwer, That what he aſſerts may very well be rectified. There needs only be ſaid, that the meaneſt Chriſtian tradeſman does ſtedfaſtly believe more things concerning the nature of God, than the greateſt of heathen Philoſophers have been able to attain the knowledge of. He needs only declare that with his bare Catechiſm, he will give ſo great a number of particulars, that for one thing they did partly affirm, he will aſſert forty without heſitation. This is what Tertullian might have ſaid without being miſtaken. But theſe Chriſtians ſo knowing in compariſon of Thales, and any other Philoſophers of antient Greece, would have been as much at a ſtand what to ſay, and as ſilent as Thales, if they had offered nothing but what they did clearly and diſtinctly comprehend; and they are beholden for their great knowledge, only to their having the happineſs of being educated in a Church, where they obtained an hiſtorical, and even ſometimes a juſtifying faith of revealed truths. This convinces them of the exiſtence of ſeveral things which they do not comprehend. Our greateſt divines, if they acted as Simonides did, that is, if they affirmed nothing for certain concerning the nature of God, but what by the light of reaſon appeared to them undeniable, evident, and proof againſt all objections, would have continually demanded farther delays of all the Hieroes in the world. Add moreover, that though Simonides ſhould have had the opportunity of conſulting and examining the ſcriptures, without the influence either of education or grace, he would not have got out of his labyrinth and ſilence. Reaſon would forbid him to deny the facts contained in the ſcripture, and make him perceive ſomething ſupernatural in the connection and order of theſe facts; but this would not have been ſufficient to bring him to a determination. The powers of reaſon, and Philoſophical examination, go no farther than to hold us in ſuſpence, and to keep us in fear of erring, whether we affirm, or whether we deny (39). Either the Grace of God, or education muſt neceſſarily come in to their aſſiſtance. And carefully obſerve, that there is not any ſyſtem againſt which reaſon affords more objections than that of the goſpel. The myſtery of the Trinity, the incarnation of the Word, his death for the expiation of our ſins, the propagation of Adam's ſin, the eternal predeſtination of a few men to heavenly happineſs, the eternal condemnation of almoſt all men to the torments of hell, which will never have an end; the loſs of free-will ever ſince the fall of Adam, &c. are matters, which would have furniſhed Simonides with greater doubts, than his imagination did ever ſuggeſt to him. Let us mind what St Paul ſays (40), not only that the goſpel was a ſtumbling-block to the Jews, and fooliſhneſs to the Greeks, but alſo that God ſaved men by the fooliſhneſs of preaching.

Here follows a conſideration which, perhaps, ought not to be ſlighted. Simonides was, in all likelihood, in great difficulty, about the genus of the definition: he durſt not ſay that God was matter, an hundred objections hindred him. He durſt not ſay that God was a ſpirit; for he could apprehend nothing but under the notion of extenſion. Until Des Cartes, all our doctors, both Divines, and Philoſophers, attributed extenſion to ſpirits; infinite extenſion to God, and finite to angels, and rational ſouls. It is true, they maintained that this extenſion was not material, nor compounded of parts, and that ſpirits are wholly in every part of the ſpace wherein they are, Toti in toto & toti in ſingulis partibus. Hence proceeded the three ſpecies of local preſence, ubi circumſcriptivum, ubi definitivum, ubi repletivum, the firſt for bodies, the ſecond for created ſpirits, the third for God. The Carteſians have rejected all theſe tenets, they ſay, that ſpirits have no kind of extenſion, nor local preſence; but their opinion is rejected as very abſurd. Wherefore almoſt all our Philoſophers, and all our Divines, do at this day ſtill teach according to the popular opinion, that the ſubſtance of God is diffuſed through infinite ſpaces. But certainly, this is pulling down with one hand, what hath been ſet up by the other; it is, in effect, aſcribing to God materiality, which had been denied of him. You ſay, that he is a ſpirit, very well, this is aſcribing to him a nature different from matter; but at the ſame time you ſay, that his ſubſtance is diffuſed every where: you ſay therefore that he is extended: but we have no idea of two kinds of extenſion; we clearly conceive that all extenſion of whatever kind it be, hath diſtinct parts, impenetrable, and ſeparable from one another: it is monſtrous to ſay that the ſoul is all in the brain, and all in the heart. It is inconceivable, that the divine extenſion, and the extenſion of matter can be in the ſame place; this would be a real penetration of dimenſions, which our reaſon cannot apprehend. Beſides, things which are penetrated by a third, are penetrated by one another (41), and thus the heavens, and the terreſtrial globe, are mutually penetrated; for they would be penetrated with the divine ſubſtance; which, according to you, has no parts; hence it follows, that the ſun is penetrated by the ſame being as the earth. In one word, if matter is matter only becauſe it is extended, by conſequence all extenſion is matter: you cannot ſhew any attribute different from extenſion, by virtue of which matter is matter. The impenetrability of bodies can only reſult from their extenſion, we can conceive no other grounds of it, and ſo you muſt grant, that if ſpirits were extended, they would be impenetrable, wherefore they would not be different from bodies by penetrability. After all, according to the common doctrine, the divine extenſion is neither more nor leſs impenetrable or penetrable, than that of body. Its parts, call them virtual as much as you pleaſe, its parts, I ſay, cannot be penetrated one by another, but they may be penetrated by the parts of matter. Do not you ſay the ſame thing concerning the parts of matter; they cannot penetrate one another, but they can penetrate the virtual parts of the divine extenſion? If you will but attentively conſult common ſenſe, you will perceive, that when two extenſions are penetratively in the ſame place, the one is as penetrable as the other. It cannot therefore be ſaid, that the money (d), and knew that Hiero was a liberal prince. Some Divines would not have made

---

(38) Palingenius, in Zodiaco Vitæ, lib. vii, pag. m. 189.

(39) Obſerve that the matter in queſtion between Hiero and Simonides, was not the exiſtence of God, but a true definition of what he is.

(40) 1 Cor. i. 21, 23.

(41) Quæ penetrantur cum uno tertio penetrantur inter ſe. By this axiom, thoſe are refuted who ſay that a ſolid body is made up of mathematical points.

(d) See the remark [N], citation (86).

---

the extenſion of matter differs from any other ſort of extenſion by impenetrability: It is therefore certain, that all extenſion is matter, and conſequently you only take from God the name of matter, and attribute to him the thing itſelf; when you affirm that he is extended. Since therefore it was not poſſible for you to have done otherwiſe, you ought not to wonder, that Simonides durſt not deny that God was matter; neither durſt he affirm it; he choſe rather to be ſilent. We muſt remember, that the moſt ſubtle Carteſians maintain, that we can form no idea of a ſpiritual ſubſtance. We only know by experience that it thinks, but we know not what is the nature of that being, whoſe modifications are thoughts; we know not what is the ſubject in which theſe thoughts exiſt, or the ground that ſupports them. Simonides perhaps, was hereby obliged not to ſay that God was a ſpirit. He could not conceive what a ſpirit was.

A Jeſuit, who writ a commentary upon Cicero's books De Natura Deorum, does not blame Simonides for being ſo reſerved, and wiſhes the antient Poets and Philoſophers, and the heretics had imitated him. What he obſerves, concerning the incomprehenſibility of God, deſerves to be tranſcribed here. ‘ Quæ Tertullianus inſcitiæ, alii modeſtiæ dederunt. Atque utinam veteres philoſophi, & poëtæ, quique illos conſecuti ſunt Hæretici, hac in parte tam verecundi, quam Thales, aut Simonides, fuiſſent: nunquam profecto adeò abſurda, impia, & blaſphema Divinæ Naturæ affinxiſſent, nunquam impegiſſent in fœdiſſimos errores, in quos per ſummam impudentiam præfidentes homunculos videmus, & dolemus impegiſſe. Nimirum tenemur omnes magno quodam ſciendi ſtudio, cognoſcendi verò numinis, multò majore: ex quo Deum quidem à nobis cognoſci velle licet intelligere; ſed intra fines præſtitutos, & intra columnas, quibus ſuo ipſe quaſi digito inſcripſit, Ne plus ultra: ſunt enim divinis in rebus adyta quædam, in quæ Magnus Deus noluit nos penetrare: quod ſi quis temeritate, & confidentia ſui elatus porro pergit, ac perrumpere, hoc ſacrarium attentat, quò penitiùs ingreditur, eò denſiores illi tenebræ offunduntur, ut vel ſic, & Divinæ Naturæ majeſtatem imperveſtigabilem, & humanæ mentis imbecillitatem, ſi quid ſapit, agnoſcat, ac confiteri cum Simonide cogatur, Quanto diutiùs conſidero, tantò mihi res videtur obſcurior. Quemadmodum de ſpecu quodam Coricio narrat Pomponius Mela, qui primùm jucundâ quadam amœnitate allectat adeuntes ad ſe, donec altiùs, atque altiùs ingreſſos tandem horror quidam ac Majeſtas numinis illic inhabitantis pedem referre compellat (42). - - - - What Tertullian imputes to ignorance, others have aſcribed to modeſty, and I wiſh the antient Philoſophers and Poets, and the heretics who came after them, had in this matter been as reſerved as Thales or Simonides were: They would never have attributed to the divine nature things ſo abſurd, impious, and blaſphemous, or ever have broached ſuch deteſtable errors, as bold, impudent, and deſpicable men have done. All men are naturally very deſirous of knowledge, but eſpecially of the Deity: whereby we may perceive that GOD would be known by us, but he hath ſet certain bounds to our knowledge, beyond which we neither ought nor can proceed, and hath as it were erected pillars, engraven, as it were, with his own finger, with a Ne plus ultrà: For in things divine, there are holy receſſes into which the great GOD will not permit us to enter; but if any, puffed up with raſhneſs and confidence, will preſumptuouſly attempt it, the further he goes, the more he will be ſurrounded by darkneſs, ſo that he will be obliged to acknowledge the unſearchable majeſty of the divine nature, and the imbecillity of the human mind, and confeſs with Simonides, The longer I conſider, the matter appears to me the more obſcure. As Pomponius Mela relates of a certain cave, that with a delightful pleaſure at firſt allured thoſe that entred, till going ſtill further, a certain horror, and the majeſty of the inhabiting Deity forced them to retire.’ Afterwards, he quotes a remarkable paſſage of St Auguſtin (43). A French author looked upon Simonides's modeſty as a pious action, and took from thence occaſion to inveigh againſt the boldneſs of the Eunomians. ‘ Remember, ſays he (44), the pious modeſty of Simonides, who having aſked but one day of King Hiero, to diſcourſe of the divine eſſence before him, aſked him afterwards two days, and then three, proteſting that the more he thought upon it, the more he found it difficult to perform his promiſe. For my part, I make no doubt, but that this humble acknowledgment of his ignorance was more acceptable to the Supreme Being, as much a heathen as Simonides was, than the boldneſs of an Eunomius, and of that kind * of Arians, who followed him, and boaſted of comprehending God as fully as he could comprehend himſelf.’ Du Pleſſis Mornai, in the chapter wherein he proves by reaſons and authorities that it is impoſſible to comprehend God (45), did not forget Simonides's anſwer. He obſerves (46), without quoting any body, that this Poet taught very well that GOD is wiſdom itſelf. He ſays in another place (47), that Ariſtotle in his Metaphyſics mentions and commends the known anſwer of Simonides to Hiero, importing in ſhort that none but GOD is a Metaphyſician, that is, can ſpeak of things that are above nature. In peruſing the Metaphyſics of Ariſtotle I could not find that paſſage. But be that as it will, the thought is very good, and is of the ſame import.

When I ſaid that I have not in that work of Ariſtotle, met with that paſſage which Mr Du Pleſſis quotes, it was in reſpect of the circumſtances of that citation, namely, that it is an anſwer of Simonides to Hiero commended by Ariſtotle; for otherwiſe I found the following words in the ſecond chapter of the firſt book. Διὸ καὶ δικαίως ἂν οὐκ ἀνθρωπίνη νομίζοιτο αὐτῆς ἡ κτῆσις. πολλαχῆ γὰρ ἡ φύσις δούλη τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐστίν. ὥστε κατὰ Σιμωνίδην, Θεὸς ἂν μόνος τοῦτο ἔχοιτο γέρας· ἄνδρα δ' οὐκ ἄξιον μὴ ζητεῖν τὴν καθ' αὐτὸν ἐπιστήμην. Quocirca merito, ejus poſſeſſio non humana exiſtimari poteſt. Multis enim in rebus ſerva natura hominum eſt. Itaque ut Simonidi placet, ſolus Deus hunc ſibi honorem vindicat. At non decet virum eam ſcientiam, quæ ſibi congruit, non quærere (48). Thoſe words amount to this: The knowledge of the firſt principles is ſo ſublime, that it might be reaſonably ſaid, that the poſſeſſion of it does not belong to man; and therefore, according to Simonides, that poſſeſſion is the privilege of God only: But it were an unbecoming thing for man not to endeavour to know himſelf, or to neglect the knowledge that concerns him. I fancy, that if I had lived in Ariſtotle's time, I ſhould have found his thought clearer than it is: However, I can find nothing in it, whereby it may appear that he commends or approves Simonides's opinion, and I have read ſome Commentators, who directly affirm that he confutes it. Fonſeca making a paraphraſtical note upon thoſe words of Ariſtotle puts in the margin Refutatio ſententiæ Simonidis. Here is the text which anſwers to that ſummary. ‘ Adeo compertum eſt hanc ſcientiam non eſſe humanam poſſeſſionem, ut inde ſumpſerit Simonides poëta ſui erroris occaſionem. Monebat enim iis tantùm ſcientiis dandam eſſe hominibus operam, quæ cum mortali vita congruerent; proinde hanc ſcientiam, quæ de divinis rebus inſtituitur, relinquendam eſſe Deo, diviniſque ſubſtantiis, quod ſit ſupra humanum captum. Cui inepto conſilio, & virilis animi magnitudine indigno reſpondet Ariſtoteles, Non decere virum eam ſcientiam negligere, quæ maximè intellectui congruat, neque enim eſt putanda aliena ab humana natura, cujus præcipua pars eſt mens ipſa (49). - - - - That this knowledge (viz. of a GOD) is not in man's poſſeſſion, is a truth ſo well known, that it occaſioned the error of Simonides. For he adviſed that men ſhould apply only to thoſe ſciences, which concerned this mortal life; wherefore that knowledge which concerns things divine, is to be left to GOD and divine beings, becauſe it ſurpaſſes human capacity. To which unwiſe advice, unbecoming the excellency of the human ſoul, Ariſtotle hath given this anſwer, viz. That a man ought not to neglect that knowledge, which ſuits beſt to his mind; for that is not to be thought foreign to human nature, ſince the mind is the chief part of it.’ He will have it (50) that Ariſtotle condemns a like thought of Simonides in another place, and that this Poet is hinted at in the following words: Χρὴ δὲ οὐ κατὰ

(42) Leſcaloperius in Ciceron. de Natura Deorum, lib. i, pag. 84, 85.

(43) Certè hoc eſt Deus, quod & cùm dicitur, non poteſt dici: cùm æſtimatur, non poteſt æſtimari: cùm comparatur, non poteſt comparari: cùm definitur, ipsâ definitione creſcit. Auguſtin. Sermone de tempore CIX, apud Leſcaloperium, ibid. pag. 85.

(44) La Mothe le Vayer. Letter cxvi, pag. 26. of the 12*th vol. Edit. in* 12*mo*.

* Theodor. l. hær. fabul.

(45) It is the 4th chapter of his book concerning the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion.

(46) Ibid. fol. m. 35.

(47) Ibid. ch. xx, fol. 266, verſo. There is in the Latin edition of that book of Du Pleſſis, pag. m. 446. Ariſtoteles tritum illud Simonidis ad Hieronem laudat, de rebus, inquit, quæ præter naturam Deo ſoli credendum.

(48) Ariſtotel. Metaphyſ. lib. i, cap. ii, pag. m. 644, E.

(49) Fonſeca in Ariſt. Metaphyſ. lib. i, cap. ii, pag. m. 99, 100.

(50) Id. ibid. See alſo Theophil. Raynaud, Theol. Natur. pag. 1.

made the ſame acknowledgment he did, that he could not give a definition of God [G]. His τȣ̀ς παραινȣ̃ντας, ἀνθρώπινα φρονεῖν, ἄνθρωπον ὄντα, ȣ̓δὲ θνητὰ τὸν θνητὸν, ἀλλ᾽ ἐφ᾽ ὅσον ἐνδέχεται ἀπαθανατίζειν, καὶ ἅπαντα ποιεῖν πρὸς τὸ ζῆν κατὰ τὸ κράτισον τῶν ἐν αὐτῷ. Neque nos oportet humana ſapere ac ſentire, ut quidam monent, cum ſimus homines: neque mortalia, cum mortales: ſed nos ipſos, quoad ejus fieri poteſt, à mortalitate vindicare, atque omnia facere, ut ei noſtri parti, quæ in nobis eſt optima, convenienter vivamus (51). If this be true, this ſentence ought to be placed among thoſe of Simonides: viz. ſince we are but men, our knowledge ſhould be but human; and ſince we are mortal, we ought to be contented with the knowledge of things mortal. We ſhall ſee another miſtake of Du Pleſſis Mornai. The firſt conſiſts in affirming that the abovementioned ſaying of Simonides was approved by Ariſtotle.

We find in Plato's Protagoras (52), that that ſaying was in a poem inſcribed to Scopas, ſon of Creon the Theſſalian. It was not therefore an anſwer to King Hiero: And it is to be obſerved that the thing ſpoken of in that place is not ſcience but virtue: and that therefore it might be ſaid, that Ariſtotle's application is not right; or that our Poet made uſe of the ſame thought ſometimes with reſpect to moral, and ſometimes in relation to intellectual qualities. Plato is very particular in his diſcuſſion of ſome verſes, wherein Simonides had ſaid, that it is a difficult thing to become a perfectly honeſt man, and that Pittacus was very much miſtaken in ſaying, that it is a difficult thing to continue an honeſt man. Ὅτι ἄνδρα ἀγαθὸν μὲν ἀλαθέως γενέσθαι χαλεπὸν, χερσί τε καὶ ποσὶ καὶ νόῳ τετράγωνον, ἄνευ ψόγȣ τετυγμένον. Difficile eſſe virum vere bonum fieri, manibus pedibuſque & mente ad amuſſim quadratis (53). Χαλεπὸν ἐσθλὸν ἔμμεναι. Difficile eſt bonum manere (54). One of Plato's interlocutors maintains that thoſe words of Simonides are contradictory. Another maintains they are not, and underſtands them in this ſenſe: It is a difficult thing to become an honeſt man, and impoſſible to continue ſo always; and therefore Pittacus is miſtaken, for he ſuppoſes it is poſſible for a man to perſevere in the practice of virtue: Had he not believed the poſſibility of it, he would not have ſaid that it is a difficult thing. This explication is proved by a ſentence of Simonides, inſerted in the ſame place, which imports, that it is the privilege of God alone to be always good (55). Ὅτὶ θεὸς ἂν μόνος ἔχοι τȣ̃το γέρας. Quod ſolus Deus hoc munere frui dignus ſit.

[G] Some Divines would not have made the ſame acknowledgment he did, that he could not give a definition of GOD.] A proof of this may be ſeen in the preceding remark; but here is an author who ſpeaks more plainly to the purpoſe. It is the famous Peter Charron, a Prebend of Condom. ‘The Deity, ſays he (56), being ſo high, far removed from us, and above our capacity, that we know not at all what he is, either afar off or near, it is on one ſide, the greateſt and moſt outrageous preſumption to decide and determine concerning him, as the Atheiſts do: who in all their objections ſpeak of him as of a limited Being, circumſcribed, and of neceſſity ſuch and ſuch, ſaying, if there were a God, he muſt have been ſo and ſo; and being ſo, he would, ſhould, and might, do this thing, and the other which is not done: Ergo: on the other hand, it is an error to think to find any reaſon ſufficiently demonſtrative to prove and eſtabliſh evidently and neceſſarily what God is: at which we ought not to be ſurpriſed, but might well remain aſtoniſhed if we ſhould meet with ſuch. For it is not poſſible that human comprehenſion, nor the capacity of any created being, ſhould be able to reach ſo far . . . Deity, is what cannot be known, nay even perceived, between finite and infinite there is no proportion, no tranſition: infinity is altogether inacceſſible, nay imperceptible, God is the one, true, and only infinite. The moſt exalted underſtanding, the higheſt ſtretch of imagination, are as far from comprehending him, as the loweſt and meaneſt apprehenſion. The greateſt Philoſopher, and the moſt learned Divine, know not more or leſs of God, than the meaneſt tradeſman. Where there is no paſſage, no way, no acceſs, there can be neither far nor near . . . God, Deity, Eternity, Omnipotence, Infinity, are only words, and nothing more to us: they are not things that can fall under human underſtanding . . . . If all we ſpeak and affirm concerning God were rigourouſly canvaſſed, it would be found only vanity and ignorance. Wherefore it was the ſaying of a great and antient Doctor, that, To ſpeak of GOD even the things that were true, was moſt dangerous. The reaſon of which ſentence is, becauſe not only ſuch and ſo ſublime truths were debaſed in paſſing through our ſenſes, underſtandings, and mouths, but we even do not know, nor can be certain, that they are true. It is by chance we find them: for we are altogether blind, and know neither what he is, nor what he operates. But to ſpeak of God with doubting and uncertainty, and as it were groping in the dark, and by conjecture, is dangerous, and we know not if God will approve it; unleſs it be becauſe we have ſuch confidence in his goodneſs, that he takes well what is ſaid of him with a good intention, and to honour him as much as we can. But, beſides, who knows if this reliance on him is pleaſing to him, and that the divine goodneſs is ſuch as to accept what is done with a good intention, and to do him honour? This indeed is the duty and effect of human goodneſs, created, and finite: but who knows if that which is divine, uncreated, and infinite, be of a like nature? And even it is not univerſally agreed, as to that which is human, what are its rules and offices . . . Therefore the fitteſt courſe that can be taken by one that is deſirous to think, and to frame an idea of the Deity, is, that the ſoul, after an univerſal abſtraction from all things, raiſing itſelf above all, as in a vacuum, indeterminate, and boundleſs, with a profound and pure ſilence, an awful aſtoniſhment, an admiration full of a timorous humility, raiſe in it ſelf an imagination of a luminous abyſs, without bottom, without banks, without ſhores, without high or low, without laying hold upon, or attaching itſelf to any thing preſent to the imagination, only to loſe itſelf, to be immerged, and yield itſelf to be ſwallowed up in that infinity. To which come very near theſe antient ſentences of the ſaints. The true knowledge of God is an intire ignorance of him. To approach God is to know him to be a light unacceſſible, and to be ſwallowed up by it. It is knowing him in ſome meaſure to be ſenſible, that being above all, he cannot be known: eloquently to praiſe him, is with aſtoniſhment and terror to be ſilent, and in ſilence to adore him in the ſoul. But becauſe it is extremely difficult, and next to impoſſible for the ſoul, to remain in ſo uncertain and unconfined an infinity (for ſhe would be bewildred, and at a ſtand) like one, who confounded by the turning of his head, not any more knowing where he is, lets himſelf fall down: and although ſhe could, being ſtupified, uncapable of moving, and ſeized with terror and admiration, ſhe would not be able in any manner to have communion with God, to pray to him, call upon him, acknowledge him, honour him; which are the firſt and principal points of all religion: for in theſe performances, it is neceſſary, that he be conceived with ſome quality, good, powerful, wiſe, underſtanding, accepting our good intentions: It is neceſſary, and cannot be otherwiſe in this preſent ſtate of life, that every one frame and repreſent to himſelf an image of the Deity, which he may regard, addreſs, adhere to, and which may be as his God. This the ſoul does, by raiſing her imagination above all things, and conceiving with all her might an infinite goodneſs, power, and perfection. For the utmoſt and higheſt degree, any one can riſe to by the greateſt ſtretch of apprehenſion, is his God, and ſerves him for an image of the deity: an image nevertheleſs falſe, that is, deficient and imperfect: For the deity being, as hath been ſaid, unimaginable and infinite, to which the ſoul cannot be ſaid to approach by any conception, either near or far off, nor can form any true image, more than of a thing it knows not at all; it is ſufficient that ſhe make it the leaſt falſe, leaſt imperfect, the moſt high, and the moſt pure ſhe can.’ Thouſands of readers who ſhall find theſe thoughts of a ſublime genius in this Dictionary, had never known

(51) Ariſtot. Moral. lib. x, cap. vii, pag. m. 102, H.

(52) Plato, in Protagora, pag. 235, E.

(53) Id. ibid.

(54) Id. ibid. pag. 236, A.

(55) Plato, in Protagora, pag. 237, D. See alſo pag. 239, C.

(56) Pierre Charron, des trois Veritez, livr. i, ch. v.

His anſwer to a King of Lacedemon produced the ſame effect as that of Solon to Crœſus [H]. Another anſwer is aſcribed to him very like that of the Philoſopher, who boaſted that he carried about him his whole eſtate [I]. What he anſwered to Hiero's wife, ought not to be taken in a literal ſenſe [K]. It was rather a jeſt than a ſerious declaration them had I not recited them. This is the reaſon I cauſed them to be inſerted in this remark.

It will poſſibly be ſaid, that Charron is a Divine too much ſuſpected to deſerve that his principles ſhould be regarded. We will remove this objection, and ſay that Arnobius has expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner, as will highly juſtify the anſwer of Simonides. Has he not ſaid that our words can expreſs nothing concerning the nature of God, and that we ought to be ſilent, if we would form an idea of him; and to the end that our looſe conjectures may make ſome ſearch into this matter, as under a cloud, and in the dark, we ought to ſhut cloſe our mouth? ‘O maxime, ô ſumme rerum inviſibilium procreator! ô ipſe inviſe, & nullis unquam comprehenſe naturis! . . . Prima . . . tu cauſa es, locus rerum ac ſpacium, fundamentum cunctorum quæcunque ſunt, infinitus, ingenitus, immortalis, perpetuus, ſolus, quem nulla delineat forma corporalis, nulla determinat circumſcriptio, qualitatis expers, quantitatis, ſine ſitu, motu, & habitu, de quo nihil dici & exprimi mortalium potis eſt ſignificatione verborum: qui, ut intelligaris, tacendum eſt; atque, ut per umbram te poſſit errans inveſtigare ſuſpicio, nihil eſt omnino mutiendum (57). - - O immenſe, O ſupreme Creator of things inviſible! O thou unſeen, and uncomprehended by any beings! . . . Thou art the firſt cauſe, the place of beings, and the ſpace, the foundation of all things that are, infinite, unbegotten, immortal, everlaſting, alone, whom no corporeal form can repreſent, no limits can bound, without quality, quantity, without ſituation and motion, of whom nothing can be ſaid or expreſſed in the language of mortal men: of whom, that thou mayſt be known, we muſt be ſilent; and that wandring ſuſpicion may ſearch thee out in the dark, nothing is even to be uttered.’ It would be no ſmall ignorance to tell me, that this paſſage ought to be reckoned amongſt the errors of Arnobius; for all who have read his Commentators may have ſeen, that the moſt orthodox Fathers of the Church have agreed with him in his opinion (58). Be pleaſed to read the Commentators on theſe words of Minucius Felix. ‘Nobis ad intellectum pectus anguſtum eſt: & ideo ſic eum (Deum) digne æſtimamus, dum inæſtimabilem dicimus. Eloquar quemadmodum ſentio, magnitudinem Dei, qui ſe putat noſſe, minuit; qui non vult minuere, non novit. Nec nomen Deo quæras (59). - - - Our mind is too narrow to comprehend; and therefore we eſteem GOD as we ought when we believe him ineſtimable: I will plainly declare what I think, whoever believes that he knows the immenſity of GOD does diminiſh it: he that will not leſſen it, owns he knows it not. Neither do thou ſeek for the name of GOD.’ You ſhall find that they refer you to innumerable paſſages wherein the antient Fathers agree with Arnobius in this matter. And obſerve, that the Jeſuit Leſcaloperius alledges thoſe very words of Minutius Felix, to confirm the remark he had made, that the wiſeſt and moſt modeſt Philoſophers confeſs every where, that God is not only inviſible and inexpreſſible, but alſo unintelligible. Sapientiſſimi quique ac modeſtiſſimi philoſophorum Deum ἄγνωστον, non intelligibilem, ἀειδῆ minimè ſpectabilem, ἄῤῥητον καὶ ἀνεκφώνητον indicibilem, &, ſi fas, invocabilem, innominabilem, ubique confitentur, at nihil hunc in locum afferri poteſt illuſtrius, quàm quod habet Minutius Felix(60).

[H] His anſwer . . . produced the ſame effect as that of Solon to Crœſus (61).] Pauſanias ſitting at table with Simonides, ordered him to ſpeak ſome ſentence. Remember, anſwered he, that you are a man. This ſaying appeared ſo inſipid to Pauſanias, that he did not mind it; but when he happened to be in a place of refuge, where he ſtruggled with an intolerable hunger, and out of which he could not come, without running the hazard of being put to death, a misfortune he brought upon himſelf by his ambition, he remembered the words of that Poet, and cried out three times, O Simonides! how important was the meaning of the exhortation you gave me (62)! Τηνικαῦτα ἐμνήσθη τοῦ Σιμωνίδου, καὶ ἐξεβόησεν εἰς τρὶς, ὦ ξένε Κεῖε, μέγα τι ἄρα χρῆμα ἦν ὁ λόγος σου, ἐγὼ δὲ ὑπ' ἀνοίας οὐδὲν αὐτὸν ᾤμην εἶναι. Tunc in mentem ei venit Simonidis, & ter magna voce exclamavit: O Cee hoſpes, magnum quiddam in tuo ſermone inerat, ego vero inani perſuaſione eram adductus, ut eum nullius momenti putarem (63). It is certain, that if this ſentence were ſufficiently conſidered, and viewed with the eye of a Philoſopher, nothing would be more mortifying and inſtructive, than to think ſeriouſly that we are men. This comprehends all the weakneſs, miſery, and inconſtancy, that can be thought of.

[I] Another anſwer is aſcribed to him . . . very like that of a Philoſopher, who boaſted that he carried about him his whole eſtate.] It is ſaid that Simonides, in order to free himſelf from poverty, went about the great towns of Aſia, where he ſang for money the praiſes of conquerors. Being enriched by that means, he took ſhipping for the iſle of Ceos, his native country. The ſhip was caſt away: every body ſtrove to ſave himſelf with whatever he could carry. Simonides took nothing, and being aſked the reaſon of it, he anſwered (64), It is becauſe all that I have is with me. Several of his ſhip-wrecked companions were drowned, ſinking under the weight of what they had endeavoured to ſave. Thoſe who landed, were plundered by robbers: Every one went to Clazomenæ, a town not far from the place where the ſhip was caſt away. A citizen, who loved learning, and had read Simonides's poems with great admiration, knowing him, afforded him all neceſſaries, whilſt the reſt were forced to beg in the ſtreets. The Poet meeting them, told them his anſwer was right (65).

[K] What he anſwered to Hiero's wife, ought not to be taken in a literal ſenſe.] That princeſs deſired to know whether it was better to acquire learning than riches. Simonides anſwered her, That riches were better than learning; for, ſaid he, I ſee every day learned men waiting upon rich people (66). We muſt not believe that he indeed valued ſilver and gold more than learning; but he made uſe of a nice raillery to blame the diligence of the generality of men of letters, who court rich people, and endeavour to get ſome preſents from them. He himſelf was touched by his own jeſt, ſince he went to the court of Syracuſe, thro' a motive of intereſt; and on ſeveral other occaſions had made it his buſineſs to procure the means of life, and to mend his condition by the liberality of others. It might be ſaid alſo, that he preferred riches to learning, conſidering the advantage that accrues from them. It is manifeſt, that riches are more proper than learning to procure temporal advantages, and whatever is moſt earneſtly wiſhed for in human life. In this ſenſe it were true literally, that it is better to be rich than learned. I muſt not forget the reflexion that was made upon the proof alledged, by Simonides. It has been ſaid, that it is the part of Phyſicians to viſit ſick people, and that for the ſame reaſon, it is requiſite learned men ſhould frequently viſit thoſe that are rich. Here are two witty ſayings of an antient Philoſopher. Somebody was ſaying that he always ſaw the Philoſophers reſort to rich mens houſes; Ariſtippus anſwered him, Do not Phyſicians go to ſick people, and yet no body would rather chuſe to be ſick than to be a Phyſician (67). Another time Diogenes aſked him, Why do Philoſophers viſit rich people, and how comes it that rich people do not viſit the Philoſophers? His anſwer was (68), It is becauſe the Philoſophers know what they want, but rich people do not know it. Eraſmus explains that anſwer in the following manner: The Philoſophers are not ignorant that one cannot live without money, and therefore they aſk of thoſe that have it; but if rich men knew that they had need of learning, they would be more careful to make their court to the Philoſophers. I omit Eraſmus's moral reflexion; it may be ſeen in theſe Latin words. ‘Philoſophi ſciunt abſque pecunia vivi non poſſe: itaque petunt eos qui quod opus eſt dare poſſunt. Quòd ſi divites æquè intelligerent ſe egere ſapientia, multo magis tererent philoſophorum limina. Miſerior enim eſt egeſtas animi quam corporis: atque hoc miſerius egeni ſunt

‘divites

---

(57) Arnob. lib. i, pag. m. 17.

(58) See Elmenhorſt upon this paſſage of Arnobius, pag. m. 28, 29.

(59) Minut. Felix, p. m. 143.

(60) Leſcalop. in Cicer. de Natura Deor. pag. 2.

(61) See Herodotus, lib. i, cap. LXXXVI.

(62) See Cornelius Nepos in the Life of Pauſanias.

(63) Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. lib. ix, cap. xli. See alſo Plutarch, in Conſolat. ad Apollonium, pag. 105, A.

(64) Mecum inquit mea ſunt cuncta. Phædrus, ubi infra.

(65) Taken from Phædrus, fab. xxi, lib. iv.

(66) Ariſtoteles, Rhetoric. lib. ii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 438.

(67) Diogenes Laërtius, in Ariſtippo, lib. ii, num. 70.

(68) Id. ibid. num. 69.

declaration of his opinion. He acknowledged himſelf uncapable to deceive ſtupid people [L]. Some verſes, wherein he cenſured a maxim of Pittacus, were thought very difficult to be underſtood (e). It appears from the examination of thoſe verſes that he was none of thoſe ſevere Critics, who praiſe nothing but what ſeems to them perfectly good, and who cenſure the leaſt faults. He was infinitely more tractable, and could bear with human imperfections. He was well enough pleaſed with a man provided he was not very wicked (f). There would be no end, ſaid he, if we ſhould cenſure all thoſe who are guilty of follies. The number of fools is infinite, and I do not look upon earth for a man of an unblameable life. There is no ſuch man; and I ſhall never have occaſion to praiſe any on that account. It is enough for me that a man be tolerably good and free from crimes (g). He was of opinion that men ſhould uſe all the things of this life, as an amuſement and not too ſeriouſly to mind them (h). Though the chief character of his Poetry was a kind of a moving and ſoftning ſweetneſs, he made himſelf dreaded by ſharp invectives [M]. No body denies that he was an excellent Poet; and if it be conſidered that he reconciled two princes extremely incenſed, and actually at war againſt one another (i), it will be confeſſed that all his merit did not conſiſt in making very good verſes. He had doubtleſs many other qualities, which made him a conſiderable man; but his avarice is not to be excuſed, nor his mercenary pen [N]. His glory muſt needs fall upon that account; I mean they are ſhades, which inſtead of ſetting off the fineſt parts of (e) See the remark [F] towards the end.

(f) Ἔμοιγε ἐξαρκεῖ ὃς ἂν μη κακὸς ᾖ, μηδ᾽ ἄγαν ἀπάλαμνος. Mihi ſatisfacit & ille quiſquis malus non eſt, nimiumve ignavus. Plato, in Protag. pag. 240.

(g) Ex Platone, ibid.

(h) Παίζειν ἐν τῷ βίῳ καὶ περὶ μηδὲν ἁπλῶς σπουδάζειν. Ut ludamus in vita, neque ulli rei ſtudeamus ſerio. Theo, Progymn. cap. v, pag. m. 84.

(i) See the Scholiaſt upon Pindar in Oden II, Olymp. and the remark [C] of the article HIERO I.

'divites quòd non intelligant, quàm pretioſa quamque 'neceſſaria re careant (69). - - - - Philoſophers know 'that it is impoſſible to live without money, therefore 'they ſeek ſuch as can give what is wanted. But if 'the rich were ſenſible of their want of wiſdom, they 'would be much more aſſiduous at the houſes of Philoſophers. For the indigence of the mind is more miſerable than that of the body; and the more wretchedly indigent are the rich, becauſe they know not how precious, and how neceſſary a thing they want.'

[L] He acknowledged himſelf uncapable to deceive ſtupid people.] Eraſmus did not forget, in his collection of Apophthegms, Simonides's anſwer to thoſe who aſked him, why he did not endeavour to engage the Theſſalians to give him ſomething, ſince he was ſo careful to get what he could in other countries: Thoſe men, ſaid he, are not ingenious enough to be deceived by ſuch as I am (70). I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage of Eraſmus, becauſe it contains a good reflexion. Idem (Simonides) quum cæteros laudando veneretur, ut aliquid darent, interrogatus cur non & Theſſalos captaret, Stupidiores ſunt, inquit, quàm ut à me falli poſſint. Qui quærunt cui imponant, ad ſtupidos eunt. At qui tam erant ſtupidi, ut non ſentirent ingenium poëmatum illius, nec tangerentur amore nominis in poſteros tranſmittendi, non poterant ab illo falli (71). Eraſmus is in the right: thoſe who have a mind to deceive others, look for fools; but thoſe, who are too ſtupid to be ſenſible of the beauties of a poem, or to deſire a long fame, were not fit to be deceived by Simonides. A thought of Gorgias Leontinus may be applied to this ſubject. He had defined tragedy a deceit, wherein the deceiver is more juſt than he, who does not deceive, and he who is deceived is more knowing than he who is not deceived (72). Whereupon Daniel Heinſius makes this obſervation. 'A tantis viris poſſe decipi paucorum 'eſt: & illorum fere tantum, qui præſtantiam eorum, ſi non aſſequi re ipſa, mente ac intellectu æſtimare ac complecti poſſunt, qui cum aliquo judicio 'decipiuntur (73). - - - Few are capable of being deceived by ſo great men, and almoſt only thoſe who have 'ſome confuſed notions of their excellency, can be deceived 'with ſome judgment.' I have ſaid elſewhere (74), that a great captain complained that his enemies were ſo ſilly, that he could not ſucceed in his ſtratagems againſt them. I have ſaid alſo (75), that Balzac obſerved that the maids of his village were too ſilly to be deceived by a man of wit.

[M] He failed not to make himſelf dreaded by ſharp invectives.] Timocreon was his enemy (76). He was one of the Poets of the antient Comedy (77), and conſequently he knew how to rail, and did it with an impudent licentiouſneſs.

> Eupolis atque Cratinus, Ariſtophaneſque Poëtæ,
> Atque alii, quorum Comœdia priſca virorum eſt,
> Si quis erat dignus deſcribi, quòd malus, aut fur,
> Quòd mœchus foret, aut ſicarius, aut alioqui
> Famoſus; multâ cum libertate notabant (78).

> Cratin and Eupolis, that laſh'd the age,
> Thoſe old Comedian furies of the ſtage;
> If they were to deſcribe a vile, unjuſt,
> And cheating knave, or ſcourge a lawleſs luſt,
> Or other crimes: regardleſs of his fame
> They ſhow'd the man, and boldly told his name.'
>
> CREECH.

He compoſed a comedy againſt Simonides (79); and therefore it may be thought he uſed him ſeverely: neverthelеſs, ſome verſes are ſtill extant, wherein he confeſſes that he had been the ſufferer, and we have his epitaph made by Simonides. It is very abuſive. (80) Id non impune feciſſe (Timocreontem) colligo ex carminibus ejuſdem Timocreontis nondum editis, qui in ſemetipſum Simonidis dicacitatem accuſat, & plane vituperat metro Trochaico pentametro: Κατὰ μετάθεσιν τῆς λέξεως, dictionibus ſcilicet tranſpoſitis.

> Κήϊα μὲ προσῆλθε φλυαρία οὐκ ἐθέλοντα,
> Οὐκ ἐθέλοντά με προσῆλθε Κηΐα φλυαρία.

> Ceia me inceſſit importuna loquacitas invitum,
> Invitum me inceſſit Ceia importuna loquacitas

Extatque hodie num Simonidis Epigramma in Timocreontis ſepulchrum, quo injurias ſibi illatas ultus pulchre fuiſſe ſibi viſus eſt.

> Πολλὰ φαγὼν, καὶ πολλὰ πιὼν, καὶ πολλὰ κακ᾽ εἰπὼν
> Ἀνθρώπους κεῖμαι Τιμοκρέων Ῥόδιος.

> Cum multa comederim & multa biberim, multa mala dixerim
> Hominibus, jaceo Timocreon Rhodius (81).

I find in thoſe poems of Timocreon which have not yet been publiſhed, that he did not abuſe Simonides without ſuffering for it. He accuſes himſelf for the prating ſharpneſs of Simonides, and plainly blames it, ſaying, I was ſeized with the troubleſome loquacity of Simonides. And there is ſtill extant an epigram of Simonides on the tomb of Timocreon, by which he thought he had handſomely revenged the injuries which had been done by him. After I have eaten and drunken plentifully, and ſpoken a great deal of ill of men, here I lie, Timocreon of Rhodes.

[N] His avarice is not to be excuſed, nor his mercenary pen.] I know what he anſwered thoſe, who aſked him why he was ſo covetous in his old age; becauſe, ſaid he (82), I had rather leave ſomething to my enemies after my death, than want the aſſiſtance of my friends during my life. This anſwer is not altogether amiſs; for there is nothing one ought more carefully to avoid than to be chargeable to any body, or to depend upon the diſcretion and caprices of others: but Simonides ſhould not have been afraid of it; he might have avoided that misfortune, without being ſo intent upon getting money. Another anſwer, leſs tolerable than the firſt, is aſcribed to him. You may ſee that Plutarch does not approve of it. 'For not only, Venus of his picture, make them dark and ugly. Of all the ſayings that are aſcribed to him, I ſhall only mention this: he ſaid, that neceſſity was a thing which the gods themſelves would not oppoſe or reſiſt (k). His father, Leoprepes, hath deſerved to be mentioned for a good advice he gave to two young men [O]. Though Gyraldus's collections are very good (l), they do not equal thoſe of Allatius concerning our Simonides (m). He gives us the titles of all his Poems, as far as they can be known by the antient monuments that are extant; but we do not find there Simonides's egg, mentioned by Mr Blondel the Architect (n). Mr Blondel is miſtaken in this: he has confounded Simonides with Simmias Rhodius. If

---

(69) Eraſm. in Apophthegm. lib. iii, in Ariſtipp. num. 10, pag. m. 186.

(70) I uſe the words of Mr le Fevre, Journal du Journal, pag. 19. Here are the words of Simonides, Ἀμαθέστεροι γάρ εἰσιν ἢ ὡς ὑπ᾽ ἐμοῦ ἐξαπατᾶσθαι. Plut. de audiend. Poëtis, circa init. p. 15.

(71) Eraſm. in Apophthegm. lib. vi, pag. m. 499, 500.

(72) Gorgias ille Leontinus . . . tragœdiam definiebat, Fallaciam, qua qui deciperet, juſtior eo qui non deciperet, qui deciperetur, ſapientior eo qui non deciperetur, eſſet. Daniel Heinſius, Orat. de utilitate, quæ ex lectione Tragœdiarum percipitur, init. p. m. 269. Plutarch. de audiendis Poëtis, pag. 15, quotes that ſaying of Gorgias.

(73) Id. Heinſius, ibid.

(74) In the article AGESILAUS II. remark [C].

(75) Above citation (9) of the article PYRRHO.

(76) Suidas, in Τιμοκρέων.

(77) Id. ibid.

(78) Horat. Sat. IV, lib. i, init.

(79) Suidas, in Τιμοκρέων.

(80) Leo Allatius, de Simeonum Scriptis, pag. 213.

(81) Athenæus, lib. x, pag. 415.

(82) Stobæus, Serm. VIII, fol. m. 55.

Venus to old men is averſe, ...

‘ as Euripides has it; but their appetite alſo to their meat and drink is for the moſt part dull, and as one would ſay, toothleſs; ſo that they have but little guſt and reliſh in them. They ought therefore to furniſh themſelves with pleaſures of the mind, not ungenerous or illiberal, as Simonides ſaid to thoſe, who reproached him with covetouſneſs, that being by his years deprived of other pleaſures, he recreated his old age with the only delight he took in heaping up riches. But the political life, or the management of the common-wealth, has in it pleaſures exceeding great, and no leſs honourable; being ſuch, as it is probable the very gods do only, or at leaſt chiefly enjoy themſelves in; and theſe are the delights which proceed from doing good, or being beneficial to many, and the glory of great and honourable actions (83).’ Had I curtailed this paſſage, I ſhould have left out ſome things, that may be profitable to the reader; but if he only draws from thence a proof of the avarice of our Poet, I ſhall be contented with it. His way of living was ſomewhat ſordid, as Chamæleon (84) rightly obſerved. Ὄντως δὲ ἦν ὡς ἀληθῶς κίμβιξ ὁ Σιμονίδης καὶ αἰσχροκερδὴς ὡς Χαμαιλέων φησίν. Fuit autem revera præparcus Simonides & quæſtus vel turpis avidus, ut ait Chamæleon (85). But Simonides was indeed frugal to an exceſs, and covetous even of diſhoneſt gain. Read this paſſage of Ælian: Οὐκ ὤκνησέ γε Σιμονίδης βαρὺς ὢν ὑπὸ γήρως πρὸς αὐτὸν ἀφικέσθαι· ἦν μὲν γὰρ καὶ φύσει φιλάργυρος ὁ Κεῖος· προὔτρεπε δὲ αὐτὸν καὶ πλέον ἡ τοῦ Ἱέρωνος φιλοδωρία φασί. Neque Simonidem impedivit ſenectus profunda, quo minus ad eum veniret. Erat enim Ceus avidiſſimus pecuniæ, magiſque ipſum commovit Hieronis propenſus ad largiendum animus, ut fama eſt (86). Nor did the great age of Simonides keep him from going to Hiero: for the Cean was exceeding covetous, and it is ſaid that the great generoſity of Hiero the more readily induced him to it. He was never at a loſs for an anſwer when aſked why he took ſuch pleaſure in ſaving: but his anſwers, as has been ſeen above, were far from being ſatisfactory. Whilſt he was at Syracuſe, the king ſupplied him plentifully from day to day, with every thing that was neceſſary for his maintenance. He ſold the greateſt part of it, and alledged for his reaſon, that he had a mind to ſhew his frugality, and Hiero's magnificence (87): which was a poor ſubterfuge.

He has been blamed for being the firſt that let out the Muſes for hire: which, I think, ought not to be underſtood as if the Poets, who lived before him, had refuſed rewards. I believe they had an eye to the preſents and liberalities of thoſe, for whom they ſung, and that they made heavy complaints againſt thoſe ungrateful men, who gave them nothing, or gave them too little. How then ſhall we underſtand theſe reproachful words of Callimachus?

Οὐ γὰρ ἐργάτιν τρέφω
Τὴν μοῦσαν, ὡς ὁ Κεῖος Ὑλλίχου νέπους.

Non enim mercenariam alo
Muſam, ut Ceus ille Hyllichi nepos (88).

My Muſe, ſays he, is not mercenary like that of Simonides. The latter was taxed with the ſame fault by Anacreon (89), and it is thought Pindar levelled a like ſtroke at him, when he ſpoke of a certain time when the Muſes were not yet mercenary.

ἁ μοῖσα γὰρ οὐ φιλοκερδής πω τότ' ἦν, οὐδ' ἐργάτις, οὐδ' ἐπέρναντο γλυκεῖαι μελίφθογγοι ποτὶ Τερψιχόρας, ἀργυρωθεῖσαι πρόσωπα, μαλθακόφωνοι ἀοιδαί (90).

Theſe Greek verſes are thus paraphraſed by Benedictus. ‘ Nondum enim Muſa lucri amans erat, nec quemadmodum operarii operam mercede locabat. Neque à Terpſichore Lyricorum magiſtra dulces cantilenæ, molli vocis ſono pronuntiandæ, ſuaque ſuavitate adblandientes, atque argenti in fronte mentionem facientes vendebantur. - - - - For the Muſes were not yet become lovers of gain; nor, like labourers, hired themſelves out for money. Nor did Terpſichore, the miſtreſs of Lyric Poets, ſet to ſale her pleaſing ſongs, to be ſoftly pronounced, flattering with their ſoft ſweetneſs, and mentioning money in the beginning.’ If it be ſo, we muſt ſuppoſe that Simonides introduced an innovation, which conſiſted in making verſes for a ſet price. He would not ſing upon truſt, nor rely on the generoſity of his heroes: he would have, firſt of all, his wages agreed upon; and, perhaps, he deſired ſometimes to be paid before hand, or, at leaſt, took an earneſt. However it be, he does not deſerve to be reckoned among the inventers of good things; he ought to be placed among thoſe who have depraved or corrupted good cuſtoms. He diſhonoured the Muſes by his mercenary ſpirit, and diſgracefully became a proverb (91). We are told (92), that he uſed to ſay, I have two trunks, one for ſalaries, and the other for favours; I open them from time to time, and I always find the trunk of ſalaries full, and that of favours empty. He needed not wonder at it; for ſince he did nothing gratis, he could not pretend to free gifts, but only to be paid according to his agreement he had made with his heroes. Perhaps, he intended only thereby to excuſe the precautions he uſed. How do we know but this might be the thought: I had prepared two trunks, one for what I ſhould receive by way of gift, and the other for what I ſhould receive by way of payment: I never found any thing in the firſt, and therefore I have ſet a price to my poems: It has turned to a good account; the trunk for payments is always full. Some will have it, that by the trunk for favours, he meant thanks: if ſo, his meaning would be, that the trunk of thanks was of no uſe to him. He thought fit to ſearch for ſome aſſiſtance from it, but never found any (93).

We read in Phædrus's Fables, that Simonides went about the towns of Aſia to get money by ſinging the praiſes of conquerors. The editions have Mercede accepta laudem victorum canens (94); but ſeveral Critics maintain, it ſhould be pacta inſtead of accepta, becauſe he uſed to make a bargain before hand. Which appears from another paſſage of the ſame Phædrus (95). This alſo appears from a ſtory mentioned in Ariſtotle's Rhetoric. A man, who got the prize of the race, deſired Simonides to make a triumphal ſong upon that ſubject: the Poet not being ſatisfied with the reward offered to him, anſwered, he could not treat that ſubject worthily; for that victory had been obtained in a race with mules, and he pretended that a mule did not afford matter for an encomium. But having a better price offered him, and at laſt ſuch as he thought ſufficient, he then made the Poem according to that man's deſire (96).

[O] His father, Leoprepes, hath deſerved to be mentioned for a good advice he gave to two young men.] Two good friends aſked him which was their beſt way to

---

(k) Ἀνάγκη οὐδὲ θεοὶ μάχονται. Cum neceſſitate neque Dii pugnant. Suidas, in Σιμωνίδης, pag. 741.

(l) Gyrald. Dial. IX de Poëtar. Hiſtor. p. 462, & ſeq.

(m) Allatius de Simeonum Scriptis, pag. 207, & ſeq.

(n) In his Comparaiſon de Pindare d'Horace, pag. 32, Dutch edition. That fault has been obſerved in the remarks publiſhed in French, by a Dutch Advocate upon that work of Mr Blondel, at Rotterdam 1701.

(83) Plut. an ſeni ſit gerenda Reſpubl. pag. 786.

(84) He wrote the Life of Simonides.

(85) Athen. lib. xiv, pag. 656.

(86) Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. lib. ix, cap. i.

(87) Ὅπως εἶπεν ἥτε Ἱέρωνος μεγαλοπρέπεια καταφανὴς ᾖ, καὶ ἡ ἐμὴ κοσμιότης. Ut perſpecta ſit inquit, & Hieronis magnificentia & mea temperantia. Athen. lib. xiv, pag. 656.

(88) Callimach. in Fragm. p. 337, Edit. Grævii 1697.

(89) See Tzetzes, Chil. viii, num. 228.

(90) Pindar. Od. II, Iſthm. p. m. 675.

(91) See Eraſmus upon the proverb Simonidis cantilenæ, Chil. II, Centur. IX, num. 12.

(92) Plut. de Curioſitate, p. 520.

(93) See Ritterſhuſius upon Phædrus, pag. 381, Edit. 1698.

(94) Phædr. Fab. XXI, lib. iv.

(95) Simonides . . . victoris laudem cuidam Pyctæ ut ſcriberet CERTO condixit PRETIO. Id. Fab. XXIV, lib. iv,

(96) Ex Ariſtot. Rhetor. lib. iii, cap. ii.

If I have any thing to ſay againſt Moreri in the following Article.

to render their friendſhip perpetual. You muſt never be angry, ſaid he, one with another at the ſame time; but one of you muſt ſhew reſpect to the anger of the other (97). It is a very judicious advice.

(97) Ælianus, Var. Hiſtor. lib. iv, cap. xxiv.

SIMONIDES, ſon of the daughter of the foregoing, was a native of the iſle of Ceos: ſome think he was ſirnamed Melicertes [A]. He flouriſhed before the Peloponneſian war, and writ three books of Genealogies, and three books of inventions (a). I ſhall take notice of ſome ſmall faults in Moreri's Dictionary [B]. Though there have been ſeveral Simonides's (b), It would be I think a difficult thing to name any of them that lived with Phalaris [C].

(a) Taken from Suidas.

(b) See Voſſius, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 14.

[A] Some think that he was ſirnamed Melicertes.] They are miſtaken. This is not Suidas's meaning; but Voſſius aſcribes it to him, when he ſays that Simonides the grandfather, was ſirnamed Melicertes (1).

[B] I ſhall take notice of ſome ſmall faults in Moreri's Dictionary.] I ſhall take notice of thoſe, which concern the other Simonides. I. Moreri, ſays that he was eſteemed in the LXVth Olympiad, and that he died in the LXXXVIIIth, being eighty-nine years old. This is a wrong calculation. Simonides was at leaſt twenty years of age when he came to be in repute; and therefore, according to Moreri, he ſhould have been born in the LXth Olympiad: from whence it follows, that he would have died at 112 years old, or thereabouts, if he had lived till the LXXXVIIIth Olympiad. If Moreri ſhews himſelf a ſorry Arithmetician in that reſpect, he makes it appear alſo, that he knew not how to tranſcribe the author quoted by him (2), for that author places the birth of Simonides in the LVIth Olympiad, and his death in the LXXVIIIth Olympiad: which will make up the eighty-nine years of life, that he gives him. II. Moreri mentions one Simonide de Melece (they are his words) more antient than the Lyric Poet, and, in all likelihood, the inventor of four letters of the Greek alphabet. Here is a very childiſh overſight; for theſe words Simonide de Melece, are the tranſlation of theſe, Simonides Melicus, which ſignify Simonides the Lyric Poet, and which Moreri had read in Voſſius. I could wiſh, for the honour of Voſſius, that theſe two lines were not to be found in the fourteenth page of his book, concerning the Greek Poets. 'Simonides Melicus qui temporibus belli Medici vixit, 'quatuor vel quinque literas alphabeto finito adjecit, 'atque ita illud primus abſolvit. - - - - Simonides, the 'Lyric Poet, who lived in the time of the Bellum 'Medicum, added four or five letters to the alphabet, 'and ſo was the firſt who compleated it.' He refers this to the XXIXth Olympiad: but we know not what he means by his Bellum Medicum at that time. Beſides, when in the LVth Olympid he mentions Simonides, who makes the ſubject of the foregoing article, he calls him a Lyric Poet, and aſcribes to him the invention of four letters (3). Whereby the reader is induced to believe, that he mentions the ſame Poet twice, and that he makes him flouriſh from the XXIXth Olympiad till the LXXVth (4). I confeſs he obſerves in the fourteenth page, that Simonides, placed by Euſebius in the XXIXth Olympiad, cannot be he that was born at Ceos; but why then does he call them both Lyric Poets, and aſcribe to them the invention of four letters? But to return to Moreri. III. He ſays that Simonides the younger was the ſon of a ſiſter of the other Simonides. He ſhould have ſaid the ſon of a daughter. He ſtumbled in a fair way, ſince he miſunderſtood theſe words of Voſſius, Simonides junior, Simonidis Lyrici è filia nepos (5). IV. Moreri ſhould not have aſcribed ſome poems to him, ſince Suidas aſcribes none to him, and ſeeing Voſſius does not reckon him among the Poets. Ambigo an & in Poëtis ei ſit locus (6). V. Why does Moreri aſcribe to him a treatiſe concerning things lately invented? Does Suidas, or any other writer, mention that circumſtance? Were it not an abſurd thing to ſay, that Polydore Virgil wrote a book, wherein he treats of thoſe who had lately invented ſome things?

[C] It would be . . . . a difficult thing to name one Simonides, that lived with Phalaris.] I have read a thing in Voſſius's letters, which gives me occaſion to make this remark. Voſſius being uneaſy on account of his friend Puteanus, who was brought into trouble for a political book, wiſhes his enemies may be contented to tell him what Phalaris did adviſe Simonides, Mind only the Muſes (7). Doubtleſs there is here a ſlip of memory: I thought at firſt, that Voſſius had ſaid Phalaris inſtead of Hiero; from whence I concluded that Simonides concerned himſelf with ſome court intrigue, that was like to bring him into trouble: but at laſt, I found out where the miſtake lay. Voſſius named Simonides inſtead of Steſichorus, for it is Steſichorus whom Phalaris exhorted to meddle no more with ſtate-affairs, and to mind only his Muſes: Μέλοιεν δέ σοι μȣσῶν εὐκλεεῖς πόνοι. Curæ tibi ſint præclara muſarum ſtudia (8).

(1) Simonides Ceus ex filia nepos fuit Simonidis Lyrici, cognomento Melicertæ qui memoriæ artem inveniſſe dicitur. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. iv, cap. vi, p. 454.

(2) Viz. Suidas.

(3) Voſſius, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 20.

(4) He ſays he writ a Poem upon the battle of Salamis. Scripſit, ſays he, navale prælium ad Salaminem quod commiſſum Olympiade LXXV. Id. ibid.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 34. See alſo the ſame Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, p. 454.

(6) Idem, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 34.

(7) Utinam non aliud audire cogatur quam quod olim in ſimili fere negotio à Phalaride aiunt fuiſſe dictum Simonidi, μέλοειν σοὶ μȣσῶν εὐκλέεῖς πόνοι. Voſſius, Epiſt. CXCIX, pag. m. 218. See above citation (22) of the article PUTEANUS.

(8) Phalaris, Epiſt. CXLVII, pag. 141, Edit. Oxon. 1695.

SIMONIDES (SIMON) one of the beſt Latin Poets of the XVIth century, was born at Lemberg in Poland, and after having gone through a courſe of Philoſophy at Cracovia, he went to Italy to compleat his ſtudies; from whence he returned, ſo well ſtored with learning that John Zamoſki, the greateſt hero that was in Poland, choſe him for his ſecretary, and ſhewed him much affection, and procured him the honour of knighthood. Pope Clement VIII honoured him with the poetic garland. Juſtus Lipſius gives him very great praiſes, comparing him to Catullus, and maintaining that his poeſy might have raiſed the jealouſy of the Antients (a). Simonides entertained in his houſe at Lemburg in the year 1597, with a very ſingular affection, George Douza in his journey to Conſtantinople, who was the ſon of Janus Douza, a good Poet, and good Humaniſt. This procured him an encomium to be ſeen below, together with the title of his Poems [A].

(a) Taken from Starovolſcius in Centum Script. Polon. pag. 130, 131.

[A] An encomium to be ſeen below, with the title of his poems.] George Douza writing to his father a relation of his journey, ſpeaks thus of his ſtay at Lemberg: 'Huic urbi (Leopoli) plurimum me debere fa'teor quod hic cum Simone Simonide hoſpitium & 'amicitiam contrahere licuerit: qui Vir quanto orche'ſtræ plauſu Parnaſſi collem inſtiterit, è Scriptis ejus 'editis Ælinopæane videlicet, & caſto Joſepho, tum 'Joëlis illâ Paraphraſi ſatis ſuperque conſtare arbi'tror (1). - - - - To this city (Lemberg) I confeſs I am 'much indebted, becauſe here I had opportunity to lodge in 'the houſe of Simon Simonides, and to obtain his friend'ſhip: with how much applauſe of the learned this man 'appeared upon Parnaſſus, is, I think, ſufficiently ma'nifeſt from the works which he publiſhed, namely, his 'Ælinopæane, his Joſephus, and his paraphraſe on Joel.' His father wrote him a letter from Conſtantinople, wherein he expreſſed his gratitude for the good offices of Simonides, and his eſteem he had long entertained for the poems of that Poliſh gentleman. 'Ne'ſcis,

(1) Georg. Douza, de Itinere ſuo Conſtant. pag. 14.

‘ ſcis, mi fili, quantâ cum animi voluptate illam Epiſtolæ tuæ particulam legendo ruminaverim, ubi non modo tanti viri (Interpretis Polonici, natione Armenii) faventiam ultrò tibi oblatam gloriaris ac prædicas: verum etiam incomparabilis Viri Simonis Simonidis benevolentiæ fores jam pridem patefactas aditum tibi porrò ad doctiſſimi illius ac diſertiſſimi Interpretis amicitiam concinnaſſe. . . . . Nunc ceſſator eſſe cogor, ac commodiori tempori hoc ſcribendi officium reſervare, præſertim ad Simonem Simonidem, quem virum ego jam pridem ex Scriptis editis, Ælinopæane puta, atque Odis Pindaricis tum Joëlis Paraphraſi illâ Poëticâ multò quæſitiſſimâ, procul diſſitus licet, & veneratus ſum & admiratus (2). - - - You cannot think, dear ſon, with what ſatisfaction I read that part of your letter, wherein you not only mention the friendſhip which ſo great a man (the Poliſh interpreter, by nation an Armenian) offered to you of his own accord; but alſo that the obliging incomparable Simonides, by having received you kindly into his own houſe, has given ſome acceſs to the friendſhip of that moſt learned and moſt eloquent interpreter . . . . but now I am obliged to put off to a more convenient opportunity my thanks, eſpecially to Simon Simonides, a man whom I have long honoured and admired, tho' at a great diſtance, becauſe of the works he hath publiſhed, namely, Ælinopæane, his Pindaric Odes, and his poetical Paraphraſe on Joel, which hath been much ſought after.’

Beſides the poems, whoſe titles I have already mentioned, Simonides compoſed Hercules prodicius: Pantezilea: Flagellum livoris: Odæ in victoriam, nuptias, atque obitum Samoſcii, inque victoriam Thomæ Samoſcii Joannis filii, &c (3).

(2) G. Douza de Itinere ſuo Conſtant. pag. 129.

(3) See Simon Starovolſcius, in Centum Script. Polon. pag. 131.

SIMONIUS (SIMON) a Phyſician and Philoſopher, and author of ſeveral books [A], lived in the XVIth century. He was of Luca. I think he left his country that he might elſe where make open profeſſion of the Reformed Religion. He was for ſome time, profeſſor of Philoſophy at Geneva, and afterwards in the univerſity of Heidelberg. After this he was made profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Leipſic, whence he withdrew into Sileſia and Moravia, and thence into Poland, where there is ſome ground to believe he became an Anti-Trinitarian about the end of his days (a). Two letters of Theodore Beza greatly confirm this conjecture; for it cannot well be doubted that they were written to Simonius [B], and it appears that he, to whom they were written at Heidelberg in 1568 and in 1569, followed the opinions of Valentinus Gentilis (b). The ſame letters inform us that Simonius was twice impriſoned at Geneva, and that he was cenſured by the miniſters, and was of a reſtleſs ſpirit and at variance with all the world (c). He had the preſumption to ſay before a full auditory at Heidelberg that he could raiſe objectons to which St Paul himſelf could not have given an anſwer [C]. I know not (a) Baillet, num. 150, of the Anti.

(b) See the remark [C].

(c) Beza, Epiſt. LIV, pag. m. 264.

[A] He is the author of ſeveral books.] He publiſhed at Geneva in 1566 a commentary on Ariſtotle's book De ſenſu & ſenſili, in folio. You will find in Lindenius renovatus (1), that his Synopſis breviſſima novæ theoriæ de humoralium febrium natura, periodis, ſignis, & curatione, was printed at Leipſic in the year 1577, in 8vo, and at Baſil in the year 1580, in 8vo, with his Examen ſententiæ à Brunone Seidelio latæ de iis quæ Joubertus ad explicandam febrium humoralium naturam in paradoxis ſuis diſputavit; that his, Vera & indubitata ratio periodorum, nec non continuationis intermiſſioniſque febrium humoralium was printed at Leipſic, in the year 1575, in 4to; that his Methodus artificioſa curandæ peſtis was printed in the ſame city, in the year 1576, in 4to; that the Simonius ſupplex was printed at Cracow in the year 1585, in 4to; that the Scopæ quibus verritur Confutatio quam advocati Nicolai Buccellæ, Itali, Chirurgi Anabaptiſtæ, innumeris mendaciorum, calumniarum, errorumque purgamentis infertam poſtremo emiſerunt, was printed at Olmuts in the year 1589, in 4to; that his Diſputatio de putredine was printed at Cracow in the year 1584 in 4to; and that his Reſponſum de obitu Stephani Polonorum Regis was printed at Olmuts in the year 1588, in 4to. The catalogue of the Bodleian Library aſcribes to him a treatiſe De vera Nobilitate, printed at Leipſic in the year 1572, in 4to: it was reprinted at Iëna, in the year 1616, by the care of Thomas Sagittarius. This book is commended by Naudæus (2). What concerns the writings which Simonius publiſhed againſt James Schegkius will afterwards be ſeen.

[B] It cannot well be doubted that . . . . two letters of Theodore Beza were written to Simonius.] One is the LIVth, and the other the LVIth. The latter is dated the 13th of March, 1569, and the former the 26th of May. The year is not ſet down, but it is undoubtedly the year 1568. What may perſuade us that they were writ by Beza to Simonius, is his cenſuring a bad doctrine, which was ſeen in a book of Simonius (3). It is thereby that Mr Crenius has proved his conjecture. ‘ Epiſtolæ LIV & LVI (Bezæ) D. Simoni Simonio inſcribendæ ſunt. Nam quæ in hac ultima epiſtola Beza perſtringit, iſta omnia docuit Simonius in Lectione, quâ explicavit principium illud Phyſicum: ex nihilo nihil fit; d. 30. Decemb. 1568. Heidelb. (4). - - - - The fifty-fourth and fifty-ſixth letters (of Beza) muſt be aſcribed to Simon Simonius. For all that Beza cenſures in this laſt epiſtle, was taught by Simonius in the lecture wherein he explained that principle of Natural Philoſophy; Of nothing nothing is made; on the 30th day of December, 1568, at Heidelberg.’ If theſe words did not clearly ſhew that Simonius lived at Heidelberg when Beza wrote him thoſe two letters, I could mention a thing which inſinuates it. Simonius had written a letter to Theodore Beza, that being willing to diſpute with thoſe who condemned the Geneva diſcipline, he found himſelf unable to defend it, and there he particularly mentions Thomas Eraſtus (5), who was then profeſſor at Heidelberg.

[C] He had the preſumption to ſay . . . that he could raiſe objections to which St Paul himſelf could not have given an anſwer.] Beza teſtifies his indignation thereupon as it deſerved. ‘ Sed quo tandem loco, wrote he to him, poſtremum iſtud tuum dictum habebimus, poſſe te multas rationes afferre, quibus ne Paulus quidem ipſe, ſi viveret, reſpondere poſſe? Itáne verò te potuiſſe deſipere, ut iſtud quod vel cogitare impium & in Deum ipſum blaſphemum eſt, palam etiam, tot audientibus, auſus ſis effutire? Tune miſer homuncio, auſus organo Dei electo, cujus tonitrua ferre univerſa mundi ſapientia non potuit, tune, inquam Spiritui Chriſti per os Apoſtolorum loquentis opponere quicquam poſſis, quod refellere Dei ſapientia non poſſit? An ignoras quid Elymæ mago, quid Alexandro fabro ærario, ſeſe Pauli ſapientiæ opponentibus contigerit (6)? - - - - But what can we think of that laſt aſſertion of your's, that you could bring many objections which St Paul himſelf, were he alive, could not anſwer? Is it poſſible you could be ſo void of ſenſe, as publickly, and in the hearing of ſo many people, to utter what was impious and blaſphemous even to think? Would you have dared, wretched man, to oppoſe any thing againſt that choſen inſtrument of GOD, whoſe thundering eloquence all the wiſdom of the world was unable to withſtand, could you, I ſay, have objected any thing againſt that Spirit of CHRIST, ſpeaking by the mouth his Apoſtlcs, which the wiſdom of GOD could not refute? Know you not what befel Elymas the Sorcerer, and Alexander the Copperſmith, who oppoſed the wiſdom of Paul.’ Obſerve that Beza was telling him his opinion of a tract concerning the Divine Eſſence. ‘ Allatum eſt ad nos ſcriptum de Dei eſſentia, quod aiunt vel à te dictatum, vel ex te fuiſſe exceptum, breve quidem illud, ſeu ejuſmodi ut ſummopere bonos & doctos omnes Theologos ſit optimo jure offenſurum (7). - - - A diſſertation was brought us, which they ſay was either dictated by or received from you; indeed, it is ſhort, but ſuch as will extreamly offend all good and learned Divines, and moſt juſtly.’ Simonius in that tract maintained, that it may be ſaid that the Son,

(1) At the pages 979, 980, Edit. 1686.

(2) Naudæus, Bibliogr. Politic. pag. m. 544.

(3) See the remark [C].

(4) Crenius, Animadv. Part. ii, pag. 91.

(5) It is of him Beza ſpeaketh, when he ſays in his LIVth letter, pag. 265: Et quod de quorundam hac in re judiciis commemoras, nihil me movet. Imò ne de illo quidem ipſo cujus theſes ſunt, aliud mihi perſuaſi, quàm veritati ſponte ceſſurum. - - - And what you mention of the opinion of ſome in this matter, ſurpriſes me not even as to the perſon, whoſe theſes they are: I never thought otherwiſe, but that he, of his own accord, would yield to the truth.

(6) Beza, Epiſt. LVI, pag. 267.

(7) Ibid. p. 266.

not whether we might not conjecture that a book of which I have ſpoken before, and which bore the title of Simonis Religio, was a ſatire publiſhed againſt him [D]. I ſhall relate the diſputes he had with James Schegkius [E].

Son of God was made (8). He added, 1. That the doctrine of the Orthodox concerning the Trinity had no other advantage, but that it was leſs abſurd than that of the Heretics. And, 2. That the Scripture did not afford wherewithal to anſwer the objections of the Arians, ſince it affords paſſages which they wreſt to their own advantage. ‘ Jam verò quis illud ferat quod ‘ dicis, nempe eo differre, dogma adverſariorum à ‘ noſtro, id eſt mendacium à veritate, tenebras à luce, ‘ quòd illud quidem plura, noſtrum verò pauciora ab‘ſurda conſequantur ? . . . . Quòd autem dicere ‘ audes teſtimoniis & veris principiis Scripturæ ‘ quamvis malè accommodatis niti Antitrinitari‘os, ideòque ex verbo Dei ipſis reſponderi non ‘ poſſe, certè vox eſt piis omnibus intolerabilis, & ‘ quod ad me attinet, ſi ita ſentis, vix alio te loco ‘ habuerim, quàm hominis prorſus impii (9) - - - But ‘ now who can bear what you ſay, namely, that the opi‘nion of our adverſaries differs only from ours, that is ‘ a falſhood from the truth, darkneſs from light, in this, ‘ that theirs is attended with more, ours with fewer ab‘ſurdities ? As to what you preſume to ſay, that the ‘ Anti-Trinitarians rely upon teſtimonies and true prin‘ciples of Scripture, tho' ill applied, and that therefore ‘ they cannot be anſwered from the word of GOD, this ‘ certainly is an aſſertion intolerable to all pious per‘ſons ; and as for myſelf, if this is indeed your perſuaſion, ‘ I cannot think of you otherwiſe, than as a perſon alto‘gether impious.’

[D] I know not whether we might not conjecture that a book . . . . intituled, Simonis Religio, was a ſatire written againſt him.] That book was printed at Cracow in the year 1588, as I have ſaid elſewhere (10). Which I believe was the time when our Simonius was in Poland. Poſſibly ſome adverſary may have deſigned to defame him by publiſhing a book which might be taken for a deſcription of the opinions of this Phyſician. This I give as a conjecture, which may excite ſome curious perſon to examine the matter, if he ſhould have the opportunity of a large library.

[E] I ſhall relate the diſputes he had with James Schegkius.] Here is the account which Mr Baillet hath given of it. ‘ The diſpute began about the year 1569, ‘ and it extended to matters of Philoſophy, Phyſic, ‘ and Theology. Simonius had advanced ſomething ‘ concerning the cauſe and nature of the fever, which ‘ was not at all approved by Schegkius, and which ‘ the latter had occaſionally cenſured. Simonius was ‘ no leſs diſſatisfied with this, than with what Scheg‘kius had objected to him ſome time before upon ‘ ſome points of Ariſtotle's Phyſics, and he refuted it ‘ in a book, which he called Anti-Schegkius, or rather ‘ Anti-Schegkiana. The work came out at Baſil about ‘ the end of the year 1570, in 8vo, with the title of ‘ Anti-Schegkianorum liber unus in quo ad objecta Scheg‘kii reſpondetur, vetera nonnulla ejuſdem errata incul‘cantur, novaque quamplurima pejora deteguntur. Scheg‘kius preparing to anſwer this work, proviſionally ‘ publiſhed the forerunner of his anſwer under the ‘ title of Prodromus Anti-Simonii contra Simonem Simo‘nium, printed at Tubingen in Suabia in the year ‘ 1571, in 4to. When Simonius had ſeen that eſſay, ‘ he made a ſhort reply, which he publiſhed not long ‘ after. This laſt work being come to Schegkius's ‘ hands he examined it throughout, and his confuta‘tion was ready to be prefixed to his Anti-Simonius, ‘ and was printed in 1572, under the title of Anatome ‘ Reſponſi Simonii ad Prodromum Anti-Simonii. After ‘ that he publiſhed his large anſwer to the Anti‘Schegkiana of Simonius, printed at Tubingen in the ‘ year 1573, under the title of Anti-Simonius, five, ‘ Refutatio errorum in Philoſophia Simonii in ſuo libro ‘ Anti-Schegkianorum, in quo plures quàm trecenti errores ‘ ejuſdem repelluntur, &c. Theſe two diſputants had ‘ yet another conflict upon ſome controverſial points in ‘ Theology, with reſpect to a book which Schegkius ‘ had writ concerning the union of the two natures of ‘ JESUS CHRIST (11).’

(8) Quum factum dici poſſe Filium dicis, jacis Arianæ blaſphemiæ fundamentum, loqueris contra Scripturæ & omnium orthodoxorum morem, objicis omnes noſtras Eccleſias calumniis adverſariorum, ut nemo pius hoc audire ſine offenſione poſſit, quibuſcunque poſtea interpretationibus utaris. - - - When you ſay that the Son of God may be ſaid to have been made, you lay the foundation of the Arian blaſphemy, ſpeak contrary to the Scripture, and the expreſſion of all Orthodox Divines, you expoſe all our churches to the reproach of their adverſaries, ſo as no pious ears can hear it without offence, whatever explanations you may after give. Id. ibid. See alſo pag. 265.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 267.

(10) In the remark [B] of the article SIMON (THEODORE).

(11) Baillet, num. 150. of the Anti. Note that he thought Simonius was in Saxony, who was then at Heidelberg.

SYNERGISTS. So they called in the XVIth century ſome German Divines, who thinking that Luther's hypotheſis about Free-will was too harſh, taught that men are not converted by the Divine Grace, without the co-operation of human will. This was the fifth ſchiſm that aroſe among the Lutherans (a). Melanchthon laid the foundation of it; for Victorinus Strigelius, and ſome other Divines, who had a great regard for his authority, conſidered ſome phraſes which they found in his books, whereby it appeared that he aſcribed a great power to man's will. Wherefore they maintained that the natural power of Free-will concurred with grace in the converſion of a ſinner. George Major, Paul Eberus, Paul Crellius, and Piperinus were the other chief defenders of that opinion (b), and were perſecuted by the faction of Illyricus. It is certain that Melanchthon could not approve the rigid method of Luther and Calvin about the doctrine of Grace [A] ; and it were in vain to alledge, as a proof of his being of the ſame

(a) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 865.

(b) Ex eodem, ibid.

[A] Melanchthon could not approve the rigid method of Luther and Calvin about the doctrine of Grace.] Balduinus has given a good proof of it, when he publiſhed an abſtract of a letter which Melanchthon writ to Calvin, the 11th of May 1543. Calvin had dedicated to him his book de ſervitute humani arbitrii (1). Here is part of the letter wherein he thanks him for it. ‘ Malint te illam tuam excellentem eloquentiam in ‘ aliis materiis magis propriis Eccleſiæ conſumere ‘ quam in queſtione ϖερὶ τῆς ἀνάγκης. Habebam ‘ amicum Tubingæ doctum hominem Franciſcum Sta‘dianum, qui dicere ſolebat ſe utrumque probare, ‘ evenire omnia ut divina providentia decrevit, & ‘ tamen eſſe contingentiam : ſed ſe hæc conciliare non ‘ poſſe. Ego cum hypotheſin hanc teneam, Deum non ‘ eſſe cauſam peccati nec velle peccatum ; poſtea con‘tingentiam in hac noſtra infirmitate judicii noſtri ad‘mitto, ut ſciant rudes Davidem ſua voluntate ultro ‘ ruere. Et eundem ſentio cum haberet Spiritum ſan‘ctum, potuiſſe eum retinere & in ea lucta aliquam ‘ eſſe voluntatis actionem. Hæc etſi ſubtilius diſpu‘tari poſſunt, tamen ad regendas mentes hoc modo ‘ propoſita, accommodata videntur. Accuſamus ipſi ‘ noſtram voluntatem cum labimur : non quærimus in ‘ Dei conſilio cauſam. E contra cum nos erigimus ‘ ſcimus Deum & velle opitulari & adeſſe luctantibus. ‘ Μόνον ϑέλησον (inquit Baſilius) καὶ Θεὸς ϖαρὰ ‘ ϖάντα. Excitatur ergo cura in nobis & laudatur ‘ Dei immenſa bonitas, qui & promiſit auxilium, & ‘ præſtat ſed petentibus (2). - - - They wiſh you had ‘ rather employed your excelling eloquence in other matters ‘ more beneficial to the church than in the queſtion con‘cerning Neceſſity. I had a friend at Tubingen, a learned ‘ man, Francis Stadianus, who uſed to ſay, that he be‘lieved all things happened according to the decrees of ‘ divine providence, and that notwithſtanding there were ‘ things contingent : but he knew not how to reconcile theſe ‘ two things. I hold this principle, that GOD is not ‘ the cauſe of ſin, nor willeth it, and at the ſame time ‘ admit of contingency in this weakneſs of our judgment, ‘ that the ignorant may know that David ſinned of his ‘ own free choice. And, I think, that having the holy Spirit, ‘ he might have retained it, and that in this conflict he ‘ might have ſome power over his will. Tho' theſe things ‘ might be argued more ſubtilly, yet thus propoſed they ſeem ‘ ſufficiently ſuited for the direction of our mind. We blame ‘ our own will when we fall ; and do not ſeek the cauſe in ‘ the decree of GOD. On the contrary, when we hold out, ‘ we know that GOD both will and does aſſiſt us. Be ‘ willing only and GOD is all ſufficient, ſaith Baſil. Thus ‘ our care is excited, and the boundleſs goodneſs of GOD ‘ is praiſed, who hath both promiſed aſſiſtance, and ‘ grants

(1) Balduin. in Reſponſ. altera ad Jo. Calvinum, pag. m. 139.

(2) Melanchth. Epiſt. ad Calvin. apud Balduinum, ibid.

ſame opinion with them upon that head, the great praiſes he beſtowed upon their piety ; for grants it to thoſe who aſk it.’ Every body knows that Calvin and Caſtalio were like fire and water with reſpect to thoſe doctrines. Now Melanchthon being at Worms in 1557, writ a very obliging letter to Caſtalio, which was a kind of a ſymbol of fraternity, about the doctrine of Predeſtination. ‘ Porro cum ex eo (ut ſcis) conventu amiciſſime ſcripſiſſet ad Caſtalionem, & ejus ſententiam neſcio quam de prædeſtinatione & libero arbitrio ſuam eſſe ſignificaret : ſcire potuiſti, & quàm damnaret tuam in eo viro vexando intemperiem, & quàm ne tum quidem probaret omnia tua paradoxa (3). - - - Moreover ſeeing (as you know) that after the interview he had writ in a moſt friendly manner to Caſtalio, and ſignified his approbation of I know not what opinion of his concerning Predeſtination and Free-will : you might have underſtood, both how much he blamed your exceſſive vexation of that man, and how even then he diſapproved all your paradoxes.’ They are Balduinus’s words to Calvin ; and it is to be obſerved, that he declares to him, he knows not wherein Caſtalio’s opinion conſiſts. This ignorance proceeded from two cauſes : one was, that Caſtalio’s book had been ſuppreſſed ; the other, that Balduinus did not much care to examine the doctrine of Predeſtination. He confeſſes he does not underſtand it (4). ‘ Equidem arcanam illam περὶ ἀνάγκης quæſtionem non excutio, neque Caſtalionem . . . . unquam vidi vel audivi, ac ne per literas quidem unquam ſum allocutus . . . . neque quod de ea quæſtione ſcripſit (nam & id ſupprimi pro tuo imperio juſſiſti) unquam legi : neque quod de fatali neceſſitate diſputas ſatis intelligo, & in meis ad Minucium annotationibus nuper non diſſimulavi mihi non liquere (5). - - - Indeed I do not much ſearch into that abſtruſe queſtion concerning neceſſity, neither have I ever either ſeen or ſpoke with Caſtalio . . . nor ſo much as had any correſpondence by letters . . . nor did I ever read what he wrote concerning this controverſy, for you commanded it to be ſuppreſſed : neither do I ſufficiently underſtand what you argue about fatal neceſſity, nor did I diſſemble my ignorance of it in my notes upon Minutius.’

Let us ſee what Beza anſwered to that part of Balduinus’s book. Firſt, he denied that Melanchthon had writ ſuch a letter to Caſtalio (6) : his reaſon for it was, that all the books of Melanchthon, and even the letter produced by Balduinus, ſhewed that this German Divine differed from Calvin only in his way of expreſſing himſelf. In the ſecond place, he alledged a fragment of that letter, to prove that there was a perfect agreement between Melanchthon and the Divines of Geneva as to the doctrine. ‘ In rebus ipſis quam inter illum & nos convenerit, unde tandem meliùs quàm ex ipſius teſtimonio probabitur ? Sic ergo ſcribit in iis literis quarum tu ipſe partem citaſti : Quum autem & honorifico me teſtimonio ornaris, & de tota re non ſolùm piè, ſed etiam eloquenter diſſerueris, de utraque re, videlicet de mea gratitudine, & de ipſa diſputatione coram nos, ut ſoliti ſumus quoties unà fuimus, prolixè colloqui poſſe optarim. Etſi enim, tantum vel ingenii vel doctrinæ mihi non arrogo quantum tribuis, & nos imprimis in Eccleſia agnoſcere noſtram imbecillitatem decet, tamen benevolentia erga me tua vehementer delector, tibique gratiam habeo quòd in ſcripto luculento (loquitur autem de Calvini libris de libero arbitrio adverſus Pighium ſcriptis) tanquam in illuſtri poſitam loco extare ſignificationem amoris erga me tui voluiſti. An hæc verba ſunt, Balduine, hominis à Calvino diſſentientis (7) ? - - - How far we agreed with him as to the things themſelves, whereby can it better be proved than by his own teſtimony ? Thus he writes in theſe letters, a part of which you have quoted : Seeing then you have both given me an honourable teſtimony, and have reaſoned upon the whole matter, not only piouſly but eloquently, I could have wiſhed we might have diſcourſed at large of both matters, namely of my gratitude, and of the diſpute itſelf before us, as we were wont when we were together. For although I do not arrogate to myſelf ſo much either of wit or learning, as you are pleaſed to aſcribe to me, and it becomes us, eſpecially in the Church, to acknowlege our own weakneſs, notwithſtanding I am exceedingly delighted with your benevolence towards me, and eſteem myſelf much beholden to you, that you would have the teſtimony of your love to me to be recorded in your excellent works (he ſpeaks of Calvin’s books concerning Free-will againſt Pighius). Are theſe, Balduinus, the expreſſions of a man, who differs from Calvin ?’ Thirdly, he taxed Balduinus with a notorious falſification ; and to prove his charge againſt him, he alledged a period maliciouſly left out of Melanchthon’s letter. That period runs thus : ‘ Hæc non ſcribo ut tibi tradam quaſi dictata homini & eruditiſſimo & peritiſſimo exercitiorum pietatis : & quidem SCIO HÆC CUM TUIS CONGRUERE, ſed ſunt παχύτερα, & ad uſum accommodata (8). - - Theſe things I write not, as if dictating to you, a man moſt learned and moſt ſkillful in all exerciſes of piety : and indeed I KNOW THESE THINGS AGREE WITH YOUR THOUGHTS, but they are coarſer, and fitted for uſe.’ Beza’s firſt obſervation is not ſolid ; he himſelf affords us the refutation of it ; for in a book, wherein he did not think of Balduinus, and was not aware of ſaying ſomething that might ſerve that adverſary, he ingenuouſly confeſſes that Melanchthon had cenſured the Divines of Geneva, as if they had introduced the fatality of the Stoics. ‘ Baſileæ verò Caſtellio . . . . . non obſcurè Pelagianiſmum tuebatur. Quinetiam his de rebus ita ſcribere cœperat Philippus, ut quamvis antea Calvini adverſus Pighium libro diſertè ſubſcripſiſſet, tamen Genevenſes quaſi Stoicum Fatum invehentes notare quibuſdam videretur (9). - - - At Baſil Caſtellio . . . . did clearly enough mention Pelagianiſm. And even Melanchthon began ſo to write of theſe things, that though before he had directly ſubſcribed to Calvin’s book againſt Pighius, he, notwithſtanding, ſeemed to ſome to charge thoſe of Geneva as introducing the fate of the Stoics.’ Theſe words of Beza plainly ſhew, that neither all the books of Melanchthon, nor the very letter he writ to Calvin, (I mean the letter, out of which Balduinus quoted a paſſage) were proper to refute thoſe who maintained that he had writ a letter of approbation to Caſtalio. The ſecond part of Beza’s anſwer has no force in it ; for the praiſes Melanchthon beſtowed upon Calvin, do not prove that he was of his opinion. He had ſo much equity, moderation, and civility, that he did juſtice even to thoſe who maintained opinions he did not approve. Tho’ he was prepoſſeſſed in favour of Free-will, he could diſcern the great parts, and the piety, and eloquence which Calvin diſcovered in maintaining the contrary opinion, and could not forbear to congratulate him on account of his being author of ſuch a work. I ſhall enlarge hereafter upon this thought (10). What Beza ſays in the third place is his beſt remark, and yet it is not very ſolid. He juſtly exclaims againſt Balduinus, and treats him as a deceiver : the omiſſion of that period ſhews Balduinus’s unfairneſs ; he would not have left it out, had he not been afraid of doing himſelf ſome prejudice by producing it. And therefore he deſigned to impoſe upon his readers, and to carry the cauſe by a trick and dolo malo. But I muſt obſerve, that on this occaſion Balduinus ſhewed as little judgment as ſincerity ; for had he conſidered well, he might eaſily have perceived that the period he left out was not prejudical to him. A man who hath declared that he admits an active and even an antecedent concourſe of the will, and that he wiſhes no body would write books to maintain the neceſſity of human actions, ſhews plainly enough that he is not of Calvin’s opinion. Now this is what Melanchthon had declared in the words alledged by Balduinus : .and therefore if he declares afterwards, that he does not advance thoſe things, as if Calvin wanted to know them, and that he thinks they agree, at the bottom, with Calvin’s doctrine, tho’ they are not propoſed with the ſubtilty of that Divine, but in a plain, coarſe, and more popular manner ; I ſay, if he acts thus, it is plain he does it out of civility, and compliment, to diveſt himſelf of the odious appearance of a man, who takes upon himſelf to adviſe and cenſure others. Every body knows there is a civil way of putting people in mind of their duty, which conſiſts in telling them they are not ignorant that ſuch and ſuch things ought to be done, and that they do not want to be told of it. I cannot ſufficiently wonder how Beza could undertake to maintain againſt Balduinus, that Melanchthon, and the Divines of Geneva taught the ſame thing concerning Free-will.

(3) Balduin. ibid. pag. 138.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) He ſpeaks thus, pag. 141 : Me unum, qui talia non tracto, nec fortaſſe intelligo, in Gallia exagitas.

(6) De Philippi vero literis quicquid garris falſiſſimum eſt. Beza, Reſponſ. ad Balduin. pag. 230, Tom. ii, Operum.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1552, Oper. Tom. iii, pag. 376.

(10) In the following remark.

for he was a man who knew very well how to avoid the ill conſequences of prepoſſeſſion. He believed that men might err through a good motive [B]. What I ſhall ſay thereupon will

This he maintained in the year 1563. He knew what he wrote ſince in the life of Calvin (11); he was not ignorant of the diſputes of the Synergiſts mentioned by Balduinus (12). But what will a man not do in the heat of diſpute? En quo diſcordia cives (13)?

I fancy the readers will not be diſpleaſed to know what Balduinus replied. He was ſilent as to the omiſſion of the period, finding no other way to hide his ſhame; but as to the reſt, he anſwered haughtily, and in a few words, ‘ Nil quicquam impudentius dici aut fingi poteſt ‘ quam quod jam contendis, hac tota in re Philippum ‘ idem quod vos, & vos idem quod Philippus ſentire. ‘ Nam etſi nonniſi poſtremis ejus libris & ſententiis ‘ ſtandum eſſe dicas, tamen quod poſtremo ad articulos Bavaricos ſcripſit, an cum doctrina in hoc genere veſtra plane conſentit (14)? - - - Nothing more ‘ impudent can be ſpoken or imagined than what you affirm, that in all this matter Melanchthon is of the ‘ ſame opinion as you, and you as he. For though you ‘ ſay we muſt ſtand to his laſt books and opinions, yet ‘ what he laſt wrote upon the Bavarian articles, does ‘ it plainly agree with your doctrine upon this ſubject?’

[B] Melanchthon believed that one might err through a good motive.] A haughty and choleric Divine, will be ſo exceſſively fond of his opinions, that he thinks none can oppoſe them without acting againſt common ſenſe, or the dictates of his conſcience. He hardens and devotes himſelf to his own prejudices the more, as you ſtrongly argue againſt him. But a moderate, modeſt, and humble Divine, and of a phlegmatic temper, as Melanchthon was, takes a different courſe. Though he rejects an opinion as being falſe and dangerous, yet he will do juſtice to thoſe who maintain it: He acknowledges not only their other excellent qualities, and commends them for them, but alſo does not ſcruple to own that they have very ſpecious reaſons to maintain it. He will not therefore break with them, nor looſen the bonds of fraternity, whilſt the diſſention is confined within certain bounds. From whence it appears that neither Melanchthon's letters to Calvin, nor the praiſes he beſtowed upon him in printed books, can prove that they agreed in the doctrine of Free-will. All that can be inferred from thence is, that he was ſo equitable as to diſtinguiſh theſe two things one from another, Calvin's doctrine, as he conſidered it, and that ſame doctrine as Calvin himſelf conſidered it. He thought that doctrine made God the author of ſin; but he very well knew that Calvin did not teach it under that notion, and would have looked upon it as an abominable tenet if ſo conſidered. He was not ignorant, under what form it appeared to Calvin, namely, under the appearance of a ſyſtem, grounded upon ſeveral paſſages of the ſcripture, and tending to maintain the rights of GOD's providence, and thoſe of the diſpenſation of the new law. He was not ignorant that the doctrine of Free-will appeared to Calvin under a monſtrous ſhape, as deſtructive of providence, and directly contrary to St Paul's Epiſtles, and to the glory that redounds to God from mens ſalvation. And therefore, tho' Melanchthon did not approve Calvin's opinion, yet he believed that it was grounded upon a motive worthy of a good man, and a zealous ſervant of God: Notwithſtanding their different notions, they agreed in this maxim, That of two opinions, that which is moſt conſonant to the ſcripture, and to the glory of God, ought to be preferred to the other. Their perfect agreement in this point, occaſioned their diſcord; for, in conſequence of this maxim, Calvin embraced the doctrine of Neceſſity, and Melanchthon that of Free-will. One of them believed that the ſupreme empire of God over all things, and the rights of a providence, worthy of the Infinite Being, required an abſolute Predeſtination. The other believed that the goodneſs, holineſs, and juſtice of the Supreme Being required there ſhould be ſome contingency in our actions. Such were the grounds they went upon. Both of them aimed at the ſame thing, viz. at the greateſt glory of God, but they took different ways. Was this a ſufficient reaſon for them not to own one another for brethren, and fellow-labourers in the Lord's vineyard (15)?

I foreſee it will be objected to me, that thoſe different ways ſhould have obliged thoſe two Divines to anathematize one another, ſince Melanchthon ſhould have believed that, under pretence of aſſerting the rights of the divine authority, Calvin deſtroyed the goodneſs, the holineſs, and the juſtice of God, by making him the author of ſin and eternal miſery; and, on the contrary, Calvin ſhould have maintained, that under colour of preſerving thoſe three divine attributes, Melanchthon overturned providence and the empire of God, by aſſerting that man has a Free-will. But here is a very good ſolution to this difficulty. If Calvin had argued thus: Not being able to preſerve all the attributes of God, I give over part of them, that I may preſerve the reſt, and I rather chuſe to ſacrifice the moral virtues to the phyſical ones, than the phyſical to the moral; I rather chuſe to make him a powerful maſter, than a good maſter; he would have deſerved to be anathematized by all men. But he maintained on all occaſions, that, by aſſerting the ſupreme authority of GOD, he did not intend in the leaſt to derogate from the moral Perfections of the infinite being, from his goodneſs, his holineſs, his righteouſneſs. And therefore Melanchthon had been very unjuſt to have cavilled perſonally with him on that account, I mean to have imputed to him conſequences, which at the worſt were only drawn from his doctrine, ſince Calvin diſowned them; which he did in theſe words. ‘ Ubique in ſcriptis ſuis clamitat ‘ (Calvinus) quoties de peccato agitur, non miſcendum eſſe Dei nomen: quia in Dei naturam non niſi ‘ perfecta rectitudo & æquitas competit. Quàm putida igitur calumnia eſt, hominem de Eccleſia Dei ‘ bene meritum, crimine hoc involvere, quaſi Deum ‘ faciat authorem peccati? Docet quidem ubique ‘ nihil fieri niſi volente Deo. Interea quæ ſceleratè ‘ fiunt ab hominibus Deum arcano judicio ita moderari aſſerit, ne quid affine habeat hominum vitio. ‘ Summa doctrinæ ejus eſt, Deum mirabiliter, & modis nobis incognitis, in quemcunque vult finem omnia dirigere, ut æterna ejus voluntas prima ſit rerum ‘ omnium cauſa. Cur autem velit Deus quod nobis ‘ videtur minimè conſentaneum, fatetur eſſe incomprehenſibile. Ideòque nimis curioſè & audacter inveſtigandum eſſe negat: quoniam judicia Dei ſint ‘ abyſſus multa, & myſteria quæ modulum noſtrum ‘ ſuperant, reverenter adorare conveniat potius, quam ‘ excutere. Interea principium illud retinet, Quamvis ‘ nos ratio conſilii lateat, ſemper tribuendam eſſe Deo ‘ juſtitiæ laudem: quia ejus voluntas ſumma ſit equitatis regula (16). - - - - - Calvin in his writings ‘ every where declares, when he treats of the cauſe of ‘ ſin, that the name of GOD ought not to be mentioned: becauſe the nature of GOD is perfectly upright ‘ and righteous. How rank a calumny therefore is it, ‘ to charge a man who hath ſo well deſerved of the ‘ Church of GOD, with making GOD the author of ‘ ſin? He teaches indeed on all occaſions, that nothing can ‘ be but what GOD wills. He ſays, that the wicked ‘ actions of men are ſo ruled by the ſecret judgment of ‘ GOD, as that he is no ways acceſſary to them. The ‘ ſum of what he teaches is, that GOD wonderfully, ‘ and in ways to us unknown, directs all things to ‘ whatever end he pleaſes, ſo that his eternal will is the ‘ firſt cauſe of all things. But why GOD willeth ‘ what ſeems to us not ſuitable to his nature, he acknowledges to be incomprehenſible. And therefore denieth that it ſhould be over-curiouſly and boldly ſearched into: becauſe the judgments of GOD are a vaſt ‘ abyſs, and myſteries beyond our reach, which ought with ‘ awful reverence to be adored rather than ſearched ‘ into. But ſtill he keeps to this principle, tho' the reaſon of his counſel be unknown to us, the praiſe of ‘ righteouſneſs is ever to be given to GOD: becauſe ‘ his will is the ſupreme rule of equity.’ Warm and paſſionate men will not be ſatisfied with ſuch a wiſe anſwer; but Melanchthon, who was a lover of peace, and whoſe great equity and modeſty enabled him clearly to diſcover the weak and the ſtrong ſide of the opinions he approved or rejected; Melanchthon, I ſay, being of ſuch a diſpoſition of mind, was always ready to do juſtice to Calvin. Every body ſhould imitate that equitable Divine. Tho' you ſhould clearly prove againſt a Predeſtinarian, that his ſyſtem is neceſſarily

(11) See above citation (9).

(12) Audiveras paulo antequam hæc ſcriberes in Saxonia inter Illyricum & Victorinum magnam fuiſſe quæſtionem περὶ αὐτεξουσίου ἢ συνεργείας. Tu Illyricum qui tecum ſentit, ferre non potes: Victorinum qui Melanthonem ſequitur non oppugnas. Balduinus, in Reſponſ. altera ad Calvin. pag. 141.

(13) Virgil. Eclog. I, ver. 72.

(14) Reſponſ. ad Calvinum & Bezam pro Franc. Balduino, fol. 145, verſo.

(15) Note, that I do not pretend to extend this notion on all the ſects, that ſhould agree in the general maxim of aiming at God's glory.

(16) Calvinus, in brevi Reſponſione ad diluendas nebulonis cujuſdam calumnias, pag. m. 730, Tractat. Theologicor. See at the end of this Dictionary, citation (49), of the explication on the Manichees.

will give me occaſion to examine the anſwer [C], that was made to a paſſage in the Philoſophical neceſſarily attended with this conſequence, Therefore God is the author of ſin, you ſhould be contented with this anſwer as to his perſon; I ſee, as well as you, the connexion of my principle with that conſequence, and my reaſon that ſees it, does not afford me a ſufficient knowledge to make me underſtand how I am miſtaken in ſeeing it; nevertheleſs, I am fully perſuaded, that God finds in the infinite treaſures of his wiſdom, a certain way of breaking that connexion; a way, I ſay, certain and moſt infallible, tho' it be unknown to me, and ſurpaſſes the reach of my knowledge. A Chriſtian ought chiefly to value himſelf upon his ſubmitting to God's authority. Not to believe what is ſeen, ought frequently to be the motto of a Chriſtian, as well as to believe what is not ſeen. This is, in effect, the ſenſe of Calvin's words, which we have juſt now ſeen. Melanchthon, and any other Divine, who aſſerts man's Free-will, would be the more to blame for not being ſatisfied with this anſwer, becauſe they are forced to have recourſe to ſuch an explanation; for, provided they have any ſincerity, they acknowledge that the manner of reconciling God's providence, and his preſcience with man's Free-will, is incomprehenſible to them (17). Thus they are driven into the ſame precipice into which they drove others; they take refuge in their turn in the incomprehenſibility of God's nature, with reſpect to the weakneſs of human reaſon.

It is therefore a great ſubject of ſcandal to ſee the diviſions occaſioned by the diſputes about Grace. Every ſect taxes the other with teaching impious things and horrid blaſphemies, and carries animoſity to the higheſt degree; and yet, it is about ſuch doctrines that a mutual toleration ſhould moſt readily take place. The too immoderate zeal of either of the parties might be excuſed, if they could clearly prove their opinions, and anſwer all objections clearly, directly, and in a convincing manner; but that men who are obliged to ſay, that they have no better ſolution to give, but that theſe are ſecrets impenetrable to the human mind, and concealed in the infinite treaſures of the incomprehenſible divine immenſity: for ſuch perſons, I ſay, to practiſe barbarous cruelty, to thunder out anathema's, baniſh and hang thoſe who diſſent from them, is a thing which appears to me inexcuſable. Melanchthon was more human. He did not believe that thoſe, who deny Free-will, are unworthy of being looked upon as God's ſervants; he excuſed them on account of the obſcurity of the matter, and the goodneſs of their motives.

Nothing would be more uſeful than to make ſerious reflexions upon what is to be found concerning that controverſy in a book of Dr Burnet, Biſhop of Saliſbury (18).

[C] The anſwer, that was made to a paſſage in the Philoſophical Commentary upon theſe words, Compel them to come in.] I think one of the reaſons why Melanchthon expreſſed ſo great a moderation about this diſpute, was his conſidering that the method God thought fit to uſe, was choſen by him among infinite others equally worthy of the moſt perfect being. Now this conſequence ariſes from that conſideration; viz. that a man may be miſtaken in explaining Theological doctrines, without aſcribing any thing to God that is prejudicial to his perfections: for thoſe are miſtaken, who embrace an hypotheſis not conſonant to what God has actually done; but if it be agreeable to one of the other methods he might have choſen, it aſcribes to God a conduct altogether worthy of him. Let us clear the matter by an example. Let us ſuppoſe that Solomon, who uſed to exchange riddles with the King of Tyre (19), writ to him a letter in cyphers, wherein he argued about a ſtate affair. Let us ſuppoſe that Titius and Mevius being ordered to decypher that letter, did not make uſe of the ſame key; one of them took for an A what the other took for an O, and ſo with the other figures, Titius found out Solomon's intentions, and conſequently Mevius miſſed it; but nevertheleſs Mevius found out ſo reaſonable and ſo coherent a ſenſe, that Solomon's wiſdom appeared as much by it as by that of Mevius. It might have been objected to Mevius, that he aſcribed ſome things to Solomon inconſiſtent with the uſual courſe of prudence; but he might have anſwered, that Solomon being a man of a vaſt genius, dived ſo far into political affairs, as to find out things that were above the capacity of other men. And therefore, would he have ſaid, what ſurpriſes us in the preſent caſe, ought to be looked upon as an effect of his extraordinary wiſdom. A like objection might have been raiſed againſt Titius, and he would have anſwered it the ſame way. The great genius of that King of Jeruſalem would have ſerved for a new key to reſolve the particular difficulties in the explication of the cypher. None but he could have determined whether Titius had been either more fortunate or more knowing than Mevius; but perceiving, on one hand, that Mevius aſcribed to him a ſublime reaſoning, and on the other, that if there remained any difficulty in it, it was removed by a ſuppoſition very glorious to his wiſdom, he might have been as well-pleaſed with Mevius as with Titius and might have ſpoken thus to them: One of you makes me think what I have thought, and the other what I might have thought with an equal glory.

It will be readily granted me, that this is an image of the fate of Aſtronomers, who explain the celeſtial phænomena by oppoſite ſyſtems. Thoſe phænomena are like an enigmatical letter, delivered by God to be decyphered by Aſtronomers: Some take the motion of the earth, and others its reſt, for their key. The revolution of the earth round it's axes, is by ſome of them uſed to account for the preceſſion of the equinoxes (20); others chuſe rather ſpiral lines (21), and ſo of the reſt. The three ſyſtems, viz. of Ptolemy, Copernicus, and Tycho Brahe, though never ſo different, each explains the phænomena; and yet there is but one that is true. This was Mr Marion's meaning (22), when he ſaid that Copernicus's ſyſtem was an opinion true in art, and falſe in nature. But as all the followers of thoſe ſyſtems are agreed in admiring in the work the infinite power and infinite wiſdom of the author of it, they are not afraid of offending God if they ſhould be miſtaken. They think that if he does not perform thoſe things as they fancy he does, he might ſo do it without any prejudice to his perfections, and that having an infinite knowledge, he has the ideas of infinite plans of the world, all perfectly beautiful, and worthy of the moſt wiſe and moſt perfect being. I am ſure that a Copernician, after much exclaiming againſt Ptolemy's ſyſtem, and the perplexities of ſo many circles and epicycles, and againſt the inſignificancy of the prodigious ſwiftneſs of the firmament, &c. will confeſs, if he conſiders it, that all the faults he obſerves in that hypotheſis might be made up by advantages, not to be found in the ſimple mechaniſm of the motion of the earth. Whoever conſiders the ideas of an infinite knowledge, will ſee the poſſibility of ſuch a compenſation; he will perceive that man is not the only being, for whom ſuch great objects are deſigned. He will be ſenſible that the inconceivable rapidity of the celeſtial ſpheres might be of a wonderful uſe, with reſpect to ſome parts of the univerſe, placed beyond the reach of our ſight; in a word, that if Ptolemy's ſyſtem is falſe, yet it is ſtill poſſible, and conſequently very worthy of the Creator's wiſdom; for if it was unworthy of it, it would not be poſſible. I do not think that any Aſtronomer, who is conſcious to himſelf, that he prefers that ſyſtem to all others, becauſe all things duly conſidered, he believes it to be more conſonant to God's choice, would be afraid of appearing before the judge of the world with ſuch an opinion, tho' it ſhould prove falſe. I think he would expect that the Copernican and himſelf ſhould, both of them, receive an anſwer, much like that which I have ſuppoſed Solomon would have made to Titius and Mevius. Few people will deny this; but if the queſtion was about a point of Divinity, an infinite number of Divines would deny it (23). I preſume that Melanchthon would be none of them, as to the two ſyſtems, concerning Predeſtination, that of Liberty, and that of Neceſſity. He would ſuppoſe that the ſyſtem is falſe probable, poſſible, and not contrary to God's perfections.

Laying aſide the doctrinal part of thoſe queſtions, I ſhall mention a fact, which the laws of hiſtory warrant me to take notice of; and if I add ſome criticiſms to my narrative, I ſhall do nothing inconſiſtent with the deſign of this Dictionary. A miniſter of of Utrecht, in his reflexions upon the Philoſophical Commentary, has confuted the following paſſage as ſtrongly as he could. ‘ Here is a hint that may ſerve to remove the phantoms and panic fears, wherewith Divines have been ſo long troubled upon the ſubject of error; for it is certain, that the reaſon why men find ſo many arguments, which ſeem to be of an equal ſolidity to maintain truth and falſhood in controverſies about religion, is that moſt falſities that appear in them are as poſſible as the truths. In effect, we all ſuppoſe that revelation depends upon a free decree of God; for he is not neceſſitated by his nature to make men or any other being. And conſequently he might, if he had pleaſed, have produced nothing, or produced a world different from this; and if he had deſigned to place therein men, he might have directed them to his ends, by methods quite contrary to thoſe he has pitched upon, and which would have been equally worthy of the moſt perfect being; for an infinite wiſdom has infinite ways of manifeſting itſelf, that are all worthy of it. Which being ſo, it is no wonder if Divines find as many arguments to maintain Free-will as to impugn it; for we have ideas and principles to apprehend and to prove, that God could have made man a free creature, and not have beſtowed upon him a liberty of indifference, as it is called; and the ſame may be ſaid of an hundred other contradictory propoſitions, 2 Tom. Suppl. chap. 24. pag. 308, 309, 310 (24).’ The reflexions upon this paſſage, as far as they concern the preſent ſubject, may be reduced to this interrogation: Who told him that we have ideas and principles to apprehend and to prove, that GOD could make man a free creature, and forbear beſtowing upon him a liberty of indifference (25). I believe Mr Saurin would not have aſked ſuch a queſtion, if he had well-conſidered, that for the ſpace of one hundred and fifty years, a vaſt number of books have been publiſhed all over Europe, for and againſt liberty, in which each party make unanſwerable objections. He would have confeſſed then that we have ideas and principles to apprehend, &c. Let him peruſe ſome books written by the Arminians or the Calviniſts, the Moliniſts or the Janſeniſts, and he will ſee that thoſe ideas and principles are very plentiful in mens minds. He adds (26) that there are contradictory things, repugnant to GOD's nature; and conſequently impoſſible . . . that GOD could not create bodies without extenſion and three dimenſions, nor ſpirits without being endowed with the faculty of thinking. Theſe words are to no purpoſe; for the commentator ſaid nothing, whereby he inſinuates that there are not ſome things abſolutely impoſſible: To what purpoſe then does Mr Saurin obſerve, that the attributes, which conſtitute the eſſence of a creature, cannot be ſeparated from it? Did the Commentator doubt of that truth? If God (Mr Saurin goes on) (27), has not made man endowed with his liberty of indifference, our Philoſopher cannot know whether he could have created him with that liberty; and whether that liberty is not as contradictory as a ſquare circle, or an independent creature. I do not underſtand this well enough to confute it; but I think that Melanchthon being to anſwer ſuch an objection, would have been contented to ſay, I do not love to uſe ſubtilties upon this ſubject, I follow the notions of the people, I believe God has freely made all his works, and I wonder a miniſter calls ſuch a truth into queſtion (28). His intimating that the liberty of indifference is as contradictory as a ſquare circle is ſtill more ſtrange to me, ſince he affirms a little after, that it is impoſſible GOD ſhould produce an intelligent creature, without giving him ſome laws (29). The laws God gave to Adam were attended with promiſes and threatnings: which clearly ſuppoſes that it was in Adam's power to obey or diſobey. The moſt rigid Divines, St Auguſtin and Calvin, expreſſly teach, that men have loſt their free-will only becauſe Adam made an ill uſe of it in the terreſtrial Paradiſe. I deſire no more than this to be certain, that it is poſſible for God to beſtow a liberty of indifference upon men. Had he not beſtowed it upon Adam, all our ſyſtems of religion would come to nothing: From whence I conclude, that God gave him ſuch a liberty; now every body knows, that from the act to the power, the conſequence holds good (30). But I conceive he might have made him determined to good things, in ſuch a manner, as never to waver between good and evil; and therefore the hypotheſis of man's liberty, and that of neceſſity, appear both poſſible to me. This is what I think Melanchthon might have anſwered. I think alſo he would have taken it ill, that the author of the reflexions upon the Philoſophical Commentary did not declare his opinion, but was contented with an If GOD, &c. an indeterminate phraſe, from which one may infer, that the privation of free-will implies a contradiction: For if it ſhould follow from God's creating Adam without a liberty of indifference, that it is a liberty which implies contradiction; others would maintain, that if he had created him with that liberty, it would follow, that the determination to one of the contraries would be as impoſſible as a ſquare circle. I omit what the author of the reflexion ſays againſt the commentator, who advances that the proofs of a falſe thing are ſometimes as good as the proofs of a true one. What Mr Saurin anſwers to it is full of needleſs things; for it is needleſs in a diſpute to prove to an adverſary what he does not deny. The only thing that does not ſeem ſuperfluous is his ſaying, that the reaſons which determine us to the choice of a religion, ought to be moral demonſtrations (31): But even that is of no uſe in the controverſy about Free-will mentioned by the commentator; for ſince each party pretends to ſuch demonſtrations, it is referring us to equivocal ſigns.

---

(17) Beza objects to them, that they have no other anſwer when they are preſſed hard. I have quoted his words in the remark [H] of the article CASTALIO, citation (93).

(18) Mr de Beauval gives an extract of it, in his Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, Oct. 1699, pag. 435, & ſeq. and alſo Mr Bernard, in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Auguſt 1700, pag. 155, & ſeq.

(19) Joſeph. Antiq. Jud. lib. viii, cap. ii, fol. m. 315.

(20) See Rohault's Phyſics, Tom. ii, ch. xix, pag. m. 77, and Regius's Philoſophy, Vol. iii, lib. iii, Part ii, ch. vi, pag. m. 128, Edit. in 12*mo.*

(21) See the book intituled, Uranie ou les Tableaux des Philoſophes, Tom. iii, pag. 44.

(22) In one of his pleadings. See Mr Arnauld, Difficult. à Steyaert. Part. ix, pag. 101.

(23) If the queſtion was only to foretel eclipſes, and other phænomena, to ſatisfy our curioſity, or for the uſe of life, one might be free to chuſe a ſyſtem: different hypotheſes might be reconciled with the ſame phænomena; or if one had an ill ſucceſs, it were but a miſtake attended with no ill conſequence. Whether we follow Ptolemy's ſyſtem, or Tycho-Brahe's, or Kepler's, or Copernicus's, it ſignifies but little, as long as we do not poſitively affirm a thing of which we have not a mathematical certainty. But it is not ſo with ſyſtems of religion. Saurin, ubi infra, p. 335.

Here follows another paſſage of the Commentary. ‘ (32) What do they do then, when the revelation is doubtful about ſome point? Why ſome explain it by one ſyſtem, and others by another. Granting that one of thoſe ſyſtems is conſonant to the method which God has actually pitched upon, it does not follow that the other ſyſtem is not conſonant to what he might have done with the ſame glory and wiſdom he has diſcovered by doing another thing, ſince we conceive that God might have done things otherwiſe than he has done them, a thouſand different ways, all worthy of his infinite perfection: otherwiſe, he would not be a free being, and would not differ from the God of the Stoics, chained down by an unavoidable fate, a doctrine little better than Spinoziſm. And conſequently, no falſe ſyſtem can be pernicious; but when a Divine builds it upon notions, which he believes to be contrary to God's word, and unbecoming his majeſty. But I think there are no ſuch Divines in the world. 2 Tom. Suppl. chap. 24. pag. 310, 311.’ Mr Saurin comparing thoſe words with another paſſage, wherein the commentator ſays, he will not take advantage of the compariſon of a prince, whoſe vaſt empire ſhould contain many nations, that have different laws, ways, cuſtoms, and languages, thinks (33), that the commentator thereby juſtifies, not only all the ſects of Chriſtianity, but all thoſe of Paganiſm. I wonder he did not perceive that his adverſary confines himſelf to the ſyſtems grounded on the different ſenſes put upon the ſcripture (34). Here follows another paſſage, at which you will be ſurprized. GOD might have done things otherwiſe than he has done them, a thouſand different ways, all worthy of his infinite perfection. Mr Saurin (35) having quoted again thoſe words of the Philoſophical Commentary, confutes them with a diſtinction between the eſſential parts of religion, and thoſe that are not eſſential; and then he ſays (36): ‘ The author makes no ſuch diſtinction; he uſes an univerſal propoſition; GOD might have done things otherwiſe than he has done them, an hundred different ways. And what is there remarkable, is that among thoſe different ways he reckons thoſe, that have been imagined by the heathen Poets, and the Chineſe Philoſophers; for he will juſtify all the ſyſtems of religion, that have been invented by Divines, and received by the people. In order to prove his aſſertion, he alledges the liberty of God. Otherwiſe, ſays he, he would not be a free being, and would not differ from the GOD of the Stoics, chained down by an unavoidable fate, a doctrine little better than Spinoziſm. Were this conſequence right, God would have the moſt dreadful liberty of indifference that can be imagined. He might lie and perjure himſelf, when he ſwears by himſelf: he might command us to hate him, and forbid

---

(24) Saurin, Reflex. ſur les Droits de la Conſcience, pag. 323.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 324.

(26) Id. ibid.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 325.

(28) Theſe words, if God has not made man endowed with a liberty of indifference imply a doubt.

(29) Saurin, Reflex. ſur les Droits de la Conſcience, pag. 330.

(30) Ab actu ad potentiam valet conſequentia.

(31) Id. ibid. pag. 326.

(32) Id. ibid. pag. 327.

(33) Id. ibid. pag. 329.

(34) What do they do then, when THE REVELATION is doubtful about ſome point? Comment. Philoſoph. quoted by Mr Saurin, ubi ſupra, pag. 327.

(35) Id. ibid. pag. 329.

(36) Id. ibid. pag. 330.

‘forbid us to love him: he might command us treachery, and perjury, in a word all ſorts of crimes: in ſhort, he might turn all virtues into ſo many vices, and all vices into as many virtues.’ Theſe few words are ſufficient to refute thoſe reflexions: mind this clauſe, ALL WORTHY OF HIS INFINITE PERFECTION. It ſhews, with the utmoſt evidence, that GOD's liberty does not conſiſt in being able to act right or wrong, wiſely or imprudently; but in having the power of chuſing among infinite plans, equally beautiful and good, one or another, as he thinks fit. Can this ſignify that he might have introduced the falſe worſhips ſung by the heathen Poets? Are they worthy of his infinite perfection?

SIRIS, a river of Italy, at the mouth of which there was a town called SIRIS, went ſucceſſively by ſeveral other names [A]. That town was ſaid to have been built by the Trojans, and to prove it, they ſhewed there a ſtatue of the Trojan Minerva (a). It was ſhewn ſtill in Strabo's time, as a miraculous image; for it looked downwards, and the reaſon given for it is, that the goddeſs conceived a great horror, when the Ionians took the town, and ſhewed no reſpect for that ſtatue. Several inhabitants fled to that Minerva, and there implored the clemency of the conquerors, as in a place of refuge which they thought to be inviolable; but the enemies had no regard to their intreaties, and they were barbarouſly dragged out of that ſanctary (b). The goddeſs had not the courage to behold ſuch an irreverence. This was the reaſon why ſhe caſt her eyes downwards. It was not the firſt time that a dreadful ſight made her turn her eyes another way: ſhe had done it before at Troy when Caſſandra was raviſhed (c). The author, from whom I have theſe particulars, makes a judicious reflexion upon the great number of ſtatues, which the Trojans were ſaid to have conſecrated ſince their diſperſion [B]. Mr de Marolles, Abbot of Villeloin, made the ſame obſervation [C], upon the frequent multiplication of the ſame relick. I have obſerved in another place (d) Florus's miſtake about the river Siris.

[A] Went ſucceſſively by ſeveral other names.] Conſult Cluverius (1), he will tell you it was called Leuternia, Polieum, Heraclium. He ſays that the Tarentines having built Heraclea three miles above the mouth of the river Siris, removed thither the inhabitants of Siris; ſo that from that time the town of Siris was only the port of the town of Heraclea. According to Stephanus Byzantinus, the town of Siris was called Polieum by the Trojans; but according to Tzetzes it was called Polieum, before it went by the name of Siris. It may be inferred from Lycophron, Strabo, and the ſame Tzetzes, that Leuternia was it's firſt name (2).

[B] Strabo makes a judicious reflexion upon the great number of ſtatues . . . . which the Trojans had conſecrated ſince their diſperſion.] It is a piece of impudence, ſays he, to pretend, not only that a ſtatue did formerly caſt it's eyes downwards, but even, that ſuch a ſtatue may be ſeen to this day. It is ſtill a greater impudence to mention a great number of ſuch ſtatues brought from Troy. They boaſt at Rome, at Lavinium, at Luceria, and at Siris, that they have the Minerva of the Trojans; and what is ſaid of the Trojan women is applied to ſeveral other places; and therefore tho' the thing be poſſible, it does not appear credible. Ἰταμὸν μὲν οὖν καὶ τὸ οὕτω μυθεύειν ὥς τε μὲ μόνον καταμῦσαι φαινόμενον, καθάπερ καὶ τὸ ἐν Ἰλίῳ ἀποστραφῆναι κατα τὸν Κασάνδρας βιασμὸν, ἀλλὰ καὶ καταμύον δείκνυσθαι. Πολὺ δὲ ἰταμώτερον τὸ τοιαῦτα ποιεῖν ἐξ Ἰλίου κεκομισμένα ξόανα ὅσα φασὶν οἱ συγγραφεῖς. καὶ γὰρ ἐν Ῥώμῃ, καὶ ἐν Λαουϊνίῳ, καὶ ἐν Λουκερίᾳ, καὶ ἐν Σειρίτιδι Ἰλιὰς Ἀθηνᾶ καλεῖται ὡς ἐκεῖθεν κομισθεῖσα. Καὶ τὸ τῶν Τρωάδων δὲ τόλμημα περιφέρεται πολλαχοῦ, καὶ ἄπιστον φαίνεται, καίπερ δυνατὸν ὄν. Enimvero protervum eſt fingere, ſimulacrum aliquod non modo viſum fuiſſe connivere, ſicut imaginem Minervæ Illii ferunt oculos avertiſſe cum violaretur Caſſandra: ſed fabulæ adjicere, ſimulacrum etiamnum connivens conſpici. At multo etiam protervius eſt ea ab Ilio allata fabulari, quæ ſcriptores ponunt. Nam & Romæ, & Lavinii, & Luceriæ, & Siritidi Minerva habetur Iliaca, quaſi ab Ilio allata: & facinus mulierum Trojanarum multis adſcribitur locis, eoque fides ei derogatur cùm fieri tamen potuerit (3). I have ſet down the Greek for the ſatisfaction of thoſe, who are never pleaſed, unleſs they ſee the original words, and likewiſe to exempt my ſelf from a ſtrict tranſlation of that paſſage. Strabo's reflexion is very judicious; for if the variations of Hiſtorians are not a certain character of falſity, they afford at leaſt a juſt pretence to ſuſpend one's belief: and when ſeveral towns pretend to have the ſame miraculous image, it is a very ſtrong preſumption that all of them falſly boaſt of it, and that the ſame trick, and the ſame intereſt moves them to ſet up their traditions.

[C] The Abbot of Villeloin made the ſame obſervation.] Let us ſee his own words. ‘As they were ſhewing (4) her the head of St John the Baptiſt, which the people there reverence as one of the moſt conſiderable relics in the world; after ſhe had kiſſed it, ſhe bad me come near, and do the ſame. I conſidered the ſhrine, and what was in it: I kiſſed it as others did, and was contented to ſay, as ſoftly as poſſible, that it was the fifth or ſixth head of St John the Baptiſt, which I had had the honour to kiſs: at which her highneſs was a little ſurpriſed, and could not forbear ſmiling, but it was not perceived: and the ſacriſtan, or treaſurer, who alſo took notice of what I ſaid, replied, he could not deny that ſeveral others were mentioned (for perhaps he had been told that the ſame head was to be ſeen in St John's Church at Lyons, at St Jean de Morienne, at St Jean d'Angeli in Saintonge, at Rome, in Spain, in Germany, and in ſeveral other places) but that the head he ſhewed was the true one. And to prove the truth of his aſſertion, he deſired us to obſerve the hole that was in the ſcull of that relic above the right eye, that it was the ſame hole that Herodias made in it with her knife when the head was brought to her in a diſh. I think, ſaid I, the Goſpel does not mention ſo remarkable a particular; but perceiving he was reſolved to maintain the contrary, I yielded very reſpectfully: and without entring into a farther examination of the matter, or alledging the authority of St Gregory Nazianzen, who ſays that all the bones of St John the Baptiſt were burnt in his time by the Donatiſts, in the town of Sebaſta, and that nothing remained of them but a ſmall part of the head, which was carried to Alexandria, I was contented to tell him that the tradition of ſo venerable a church as that of Amiens, was ſufficient to authorize ſuch a belief, tho' it was not above four hundred years old, and tho' it was not an article of faith. However, people purchaſed many repreſentations of that holy relic, and the honeſt prieſt was very well ſatisfied (5).’ The author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (6), ſpeaking of a book written about the holy handkerchief, mentioned this paſſage of the Abbot of Villeloin, and related theſe words of Charles Patin, the ſon (7). I am only ſorry to ſee ſo often the picture of the Virgin drawn by St Luke; for it is certain people are miſtaken about moſt of them, it being unlikely that St Luke ſhould have drawn ſo many pictures of the Virgin.

(a) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 182.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) In the ſecond article PYRRHUS, remark [G].

(1) Cluver. Ital. Antiq. lib. iv, cap. xiv, pag. 736, Epitom. Bunon.

(2) Cluver. ibid.

(3) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 182.

(4) He means the Princeſs Mary Gonzaga, who was then at Amiens.

(5) Marolles, Memoires, pag. 132, at the year 1641.

(6) For the month of September, 1685, Art. v, pag. 999. He examines whether it be an imprudent thing to multiply thoſe things.

(7) Relations Hiſtoriques, p. 221. Edit. of Lyons 1676.

SIXTUS IV.

SIXTUS IV, made Pope in the year 1471, had been General of the Franciſcans and his name was Franceſco della Rovere. He was born the twenty-ſecond of July 1414 at Cella (a) a town of the Riviera di Genoa, five miles from Savona. One of his Hiſtorians (b) aſcribes to him all ſorts of good qualities, a great learning, an ardent charity for the poor, a great liberality to the princes oppreſſed by the Turks, an admirable exactneſs in cauſing juſtice to be duly adminiſtred, and a great care of repairing the ruins of Rome, and adorning that town. He does not diſſemble the faults for which he was blamed. 1. His committing many injuſtices in favour of his creatures [A]: 2. his ſtirring up a war in Italy very unſeaſonably: 3. his excommunicating Laurence de Medicis: 4. and then exerciſing all manner of hoſtilities againſt the Florentines. He does not charge him, as others do (c), with knowing and having contrived the conſpiracy of the Pazzi. He ſays nothing of the diſſolute life of the cardinals who were in favour under that reign, one of which, as many believe, is deſcribed in ſome verſes of Baptiſta Mantuanus [B]. Nor does he mention the abominable leudneſs, to which ſome ſay that Pope lent a helping hand. They will have it that he granted a petition, [A] He was blamed . . . . for committing many injuſtices in favour of his creatures.] 'He was more indulgent to his relations than any other Pope, and he is blamed for having done and granted many things upon their account præter fas juſque, againſt all human and divine laws (1).' The three Cardinals of his firſt promotion were Peter Riario of Savona, whom he brought up being a little boy, with his brother Jerome, both born in the ſame town, (not without myſtery) and Julian his brother's ſon, who was afterwards Julius II (2). He beſtowed great benefices upon Peter, a man ſo luxurious and prodigal, that he ſeemed to be born to throw away money, having ſpent, during the two years of his cardinalſhip, two hundred thouſand crowns for his ordinary, and when he died, he owed ſixty thouſand crowns, and left many rich houſhold goods, departing this world all over rotten, by reaſon of his debaucheries at twenty-eight years of age (3). 'It is he, whoſe prodigious prodigality has been deſcribed by Baptiſta Fulgoſius †, which he carried ſo far as to give his whore Tireſia pattins covered with pearls. Baptiſta Mantuanus ‡ made alſo the following verſes upon him, wherein he repreſents him ſaluted by Jupiter in Hell.

> At tu implume caput cui tanta licentia quondam
> Fœmineos fuit in coïtus, tua furta putabas
> Hic quoque prætextu mitræ impunita relinqui?
> Sic meruit tua fœda Venus, &c (4).
>
> But thou bald-pate who ſo delighted was
> With womens leud embraces, &c.

We ſhall ſee hereafter that Mr Jurieu applies thoſe verſes to Pope Sixtus (5), tho' he had read in Du Pleſſis that they were made upon the cardinal I ſpeak of. Coëffeteau does not deny the diſſolute life of that cardinal, and adds that Sixtus was not more lucky in his choice of Jerome, if the Hiſtorians are to be credited, excepting that he was not given to ſenſuality, being only fond of hunting. This Jerome being made Prince of Imola and Friuli (6) by the Pope, married the baſtard daughter of the Duke of Milan; and upon account of that marriage, Sixtus gave a cardinal's hat to Aſcagno, the duke's ſon. Sixtus raiſed alſo Leonard, his brother's ſon, and married him to a baſtard of King Ferdinand, and made him governor of Rome. When this nephew died, he raiſed in his room another nephew, brother . . . . of Cardinal Julian, and made him Prince of Sorra and Senegaglia. This ſecond nephew married Joan, daughter of Frederic de Montefeltro, Duke of Urbino, by whom he had Francis Maria, who, after the death of his uncle Guy Ubaldino, who died without male iſſue, ſucceeded by adoption to the Duchy of Urbino (7). Du Pleſſis relates an abominable action in the following words. 'Sixtus, who deſigned to raiſe his dear Jerome, had a mind to make himſelf maſter of Florence; but Laurence and Julian de Medicis were an obſtacle to it. He practiſed upon Francis Pazzi, who was the leader of the contrary faction, to attempt upon their lives; and, in order to carry on the thing with greater ſafety, he ſent to Florence Raphaël Riario, Cardinal of St George, a young man, and Jerome's nephew, to encourage the conſpirators. Accordingly, upon a Sunday, they fell upon the Medicis in the middle of the ſervice in St Reparada's church. Julian was there killed; Laurence was wounded, whom the ſextons carried into the veſtry, &c (8).'

[B] One of the Cardinals that were in favour, as many believe, is deſcribed in ſome verſes of Baptiſta Mantuanus.] You have ſeen in the foregoing remark four Latin verſes of that Poet, which relate to the Cardinal Peter Riario, if we believe Mr du Pleſſis. He is not the only author who applies them to him: others pretend they ought to be underſtood of Pope Sixtus. But the better to judge of the whole matter, it is neceſſary to conſider the reflexions which an ingenious perſon has been pleaſed to ſend me. Here they are. (9) 'In order to underſtand thoſe verſes of Mantuanus, in the 4th book of his poem, intituled Alphonſus, we muſt know that in that work, which is only a deſcription of Alphonſus's going through hell, the Poet repreſents the ſtate of ſeveral ſouls, ſome of which were condemned to eternal torments, and others to thoſe of purgatory. He feigns that Alphonſus, ſon of John II, and grandſon of Henry III, Kings of Caſtile, going with his father and grandfather from purgatory to the terreſtrial Paradiſe, heard a long dialogue between the ſoul of a Pope in purgatory, and a Devil called Jupiter, who tormented him. The Pope's ſoul diſcovers it's quality in theſe verſes:

> Apud ſuperos ego templa tenebam
> Vaticana, dabant Reges his oſcula plantis.
>
> When living I poſſeſs'd
> The Vatican, and ſoveraigns kiſs'd theſe feet.

The Devil, in one of his replies, ſpeaks to him thus,

> At tu implume caput cui tanta licentia quondam,
> Fœmineos fuit in coïtus, &c.
>
> But thou bald-pate who ſo delighted was
> With womens leud embraces, &c.

from whence it follows that theſe verſes ought to be underſtood of a Pope. The queſtion is, Whether they are to be applied to Sixtus IV? The Commentator Badius ſays, he found in the margin of the copy he made uſe of this annotation S. P. or. Minorum in two places, viz. over-againſt theſe verſes:

> Prima ſono vox languenti, miſerere dolentum,
> Et ſine, clamabat, feſſos ſpirare parumper.
>
> The firſt I heard, with languid mourning voice,
> Cries, pity us in pain, and let us breathe a while.

And eighty verſes after, over-againſt this:

> At tu implume caput, &c.
>
> But thou bald-pate, &c.

From whence it appears, ſays he, that Pope Sixtus is meant by them, though he will not warrant the

---

(a) Ghilini, Teatro, Parte ii, p. 93. Rivet is miſtaken in his Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. ii, p. 622. where he makes him a native of Albizzola.

(b) See the Life of Sixtus IV, at the end of Platina, fol. 363, 364. Edit. Lugd. 1512.

(c) See Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 70, and the remark [A], citation (8) of that page. Conſult alſo Machiavel, book viii, of the Hiſtory of Florence.

(1) Du Pleſſis Mornai, ex Volaterrano & Onuphrio, in his Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 555.

(2) Du Pleſſis, ibid.

(3) Volaterran. lib. xxii, p. m. 818.

† Baptiſt. Fulgoſ. dictor. & factor. memorabil. lib. ix.

‡ Baptiſt. Mantuan. in Alphon. lib. iv.

(4) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 555.

(5) Simon Goulart in his Continuation of the Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis, does likewiſe apply them to Sixtus, and alſo what has been ſaid above of the great expences of Cardinal Peter Riario. Gretſer, in Examin. Myſterii Pleſſ. pag. 544, takes advantage of thoſe variations.

(6) It ſhould be Forli.

(7) Coëffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 1205.

(8) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 556.

(9) A manuſcript Memoir of de la Monnoie.

petition, wherein he was deſired to permit the exerciſe of Sodomy, during three months in a year. I have traced this fact up to the origin [C], and ſhall give my thoughts of it in ‘ truth of it: Nam Sixtus, they are his words, inter bonos numeratur Pontifices. Verum nullus malus purgatorio infertur, purique tam pauci decedunt, ut nihil purgandum ſecum ferant, opera enim illorum ſequuntur illos. - - - For Sixtus is reckoned among the good Popes; but wicked men are not ſent to purgatory, and ſo few die ſo pure, as to want no purgation, for their works follow them. The ſame Commentator upon the verſe: At tu implume caput, adds, that the Poet not having ſpecified the Pope, he dares not ſpecify him neither, notwithſtanding the marginal note. And three lines after explaining this verſe, At niſi feminea tandem prece motus olympi Rex afferret opem, &c. - - - Had not the Lord of Heaven, moved by a woman's prayer, at laſt aſſiſted thee, &c. by feminea prece, - - - a woman's prayer, words which the Devil uſes out of contempt, he underſtands Divæ Virginis cui, ſays he, ſi de Sixto quarto loquitur, ſtudioſus admodum fuit, ejuſque conceptionis diem celebrari indixit. - - - The holy virgin Mary, for whom Sixtus the IVth, if he is here meant, had the greateſt regard, and appointed the day of her conception to be kept holy. Badius, for want of chronology, prepoſterouſly entangled himſelf. Properly ſpeaking, thoſe verſes cannot be underſtood of Pope Sixtus, ſince Alphonſus, who is the hero of the Poem, dying on the fifth of July 1468, remained in purgatory, according to Mantuanus, till the taking of Negropont by Mahomet II, the 12th of July 1470; after which the Poet ſuppoſes that Alphonſus goes from purgatory to the terreſtrial Paradiſe, and from thence to Heaven, where he arrived on Eaſter-day, the year following 1471, and conſequently near four months before Sixtus was made Pope, and above thirteen years before he died. It is therefore more reaſonable to believe that Mantuanus deſigned to make in general a deſcription of a proud and voluptuous Pope, who however having obtained before his death the remiſſion of his ſins, by the Virgin's interceſſion, Feminea prece, was condemned in the other world, not to hell torments, as ſome authors have raſhly affirmed, but only to thoſe of purgatory. This is what the Devil himſelf owns, whom the Poet introduces ſpeaking to that Pope in theſe words:

At niſi feminea tandem prece motus olympi
Rex afferret opem, cum jam ſuſpiria raucus
Ultima vix traheres, & mors incumberet ori,
Noſter eras, ego jam ſtratum tibi molle parabam
Larga ubi tartareas intrat ſentina cloacas,
Par meritis locus ille tuis, Deus iſte malorum
Fautor, ut antiquis viduatam civibus aulam
Et noſtro mœſtam exilio repararet, in aſtra
Colluviem vulgi humani, paſſimque volentes
Ire levat, &c.
Sic illi placet, & placeat, mihi forſitan olim
Non impune feres, & non ſine vulnere multo
In loca pervenies quondam mea.

Had not the Lord of Heaven, moved by a woman's prayer, at laſt aſſiſted thee when thou couldeſt hardly gaſp, and death lay heavy on thee, thou hadſt been mine. For thee I had prepared a downy bed, where the wide ſink is diſembogued into the infernal ſhore: a place moſt due to thy deſerts. That God, abettor of the wicked, in order to repair his court, abandoned of it's old inhabitants, and ſad for our exile, calls up to heaven, the dregs of human race, &c. For this is his good pleaſure. So let it be. I may, in time, make thee ſeverely ſuffer for it, and many laſhes ſhalt thou feel, before thou enter thoſe regions formerly poſſeſſed by us.

‘ I do not deny that the Poet, who was naturally ſomewhat ſatirical, was pleaſed with putting into his deſcription ſome ſtrokes relating to the licentious life of ſome Popes and Prelates, whoſe memory was ſtill freſh. Some curious perſons have exerciſed their wit in making their applications. Some have ſaid that the author meant Sixtus IV, and others that he meant Paul II. At leaſt, I find in the edition of Bologna, in folio, of the 11th of June 1502, over-againſt theſe verſes, Prima ſono vox languenti miſerere dolentum, Et ſine, clamabat, &c. this marginal note, Papa P. And lower, over-againſt the verſe, At tu implume caput, there is in the margin of the ſame edition F. P. or. Minorum, which ſome read, Frater Petrus ordinis Minorum, viz. Peter Riario a Cordelier, and afterwards a Cardinal, nephew to Pope Sixtus. I confeſs there is nothing in theſe laſt verſes but what ſuits that Cardinal; but becauſe it is certain the Poet brings only two interlocutors into his dialogue, viz. a Pope, whoever he be, and a devil, called Jupiter, it follows that a third cannot be admitted, and conſequently that this conjecture, tho' never ſo probable, vaniſhes away.’

There is another thing, whereby it may be proved, that Baptiſta Mantuanus did not mean Pope Sixtus, which is, that he commends him very much in the ſame work, wherein he deplores the corruption of his age. He praiſes him ſo far as to ſay, that if that corruption had not been ſo great as to be paſt curing, that Pope might have cured it.

Poſtquam rerum te Roma potentem
Fecit, & obſcuro jubar hoc reſplenduit orbi,
Exanimis virtus, ſcelerum ſub mole ſepulta
Reſpirare parum viſa eſt, & tollere frontem;
Et niſi tot vitiis hæc ſecula noſtra fuiſſent
Depravata, boni poterant rectoris habenæ
Errantes frenare rotas, ſed tantus equorum
Impetus aurigam ſuperat, fruſtraque retractans
Lora gubernator ſine lege per invia fertur,
Propterea ſortem doleo mitiſſime Patrum
Sixte tuam, fueras annis melioribus aptus
Eſt tibi quæ tanto ſatis eſt in principe virtus (10).

When Rome made thee it's ſovereign, a light ſhone o'er the darkned world; virtue expiring, and groaning under crimes, appeared again to breathe and raiſe her drooping head. Had not our age been ſo depraved by crimes, the reins in the hands of a good prince, might have reſtrained the wandring wheels of government. But the impetuous fury of the ſteeds o'ercomes the charioteer, who pulling back the reins in vain, is carried over pathleſs ground. Therefore, O Sixtus, I lament thy fate, Sixtus, the mildeſt of fathers, born for better times, endowed with every princely virtue.

[C] I have traced this fact up to the origin.] In the year 1686, Mr Jurieu publiſhed his Prejugez legitimes contre le Papiſme, wherein he ſays, among other things (11), that Sixtus IV was more debauched and vicious than one can imagine, and a Popiſh writer (12) ſays of him, that a petition was preſented to him, by the family of the Cardinal of Santa Lucia, that they might be permitted to perform the act of ſodomy during the three hotteſt months of the year, June, July, and Auguſt (§ α). He wrote under the petition, Let it be done as deſired. It is for him that Baptiſta Mantuanus, who lived at that time made theſe verſes (13):

At tu implume caput cui tanta licentia quondam
Fœmineos fuit in coitus: tua furta putabas
Hic quoque pretextu mitræ impunita relinqui,
Sic meruit tua fœda Venus: ſic prodigia in omnem
Nequitam, ad virtutis opus tua avara libido,
Illa Dioneæ Cythereia munera conchæ,
Illa pudicitiam quibus impugnare ſolebas,
Et noctes emere & nudæ indulgere paleſtræ.

But thou bald-pate who was ſo delighted with womens leud embraces, fancied thy crimes, protected by the mitre, might alſo here eſcape unpuniſhed. This recompence thy wantonneſs deſerves, thy filthy luſt, profuſe in every wicked act, and covetous in virtue, thoſe leacherous arts by which you oft enſnared chaſtity, and purchaſed nights of pleaſure, ſporting in naked combats.

---

(10) Bapt. Mantuanus, de calamit. ſuorum tempor. lib. iii.

(11) Jurieu, Prejug. légitim. Tom. i, p. 246.

(12) See, below, citation (20).

[(§ α) This petition ſuppoſes that the family which preſented it, deſired of the Pope the expedient propoſed, only as a ragout, which might revive the appetite in a ſeaſon, when it is not very ſtrong for the uſual food. Rem. Crit.]

(13) Mr Zuinger, profeſſor of Divinity at Baſil, affirms the ſame thing, p. 135, of his Tractatus de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, printed in 1685.

The Poet introduces a devil ſpeaking to Sixtus IV in Hell, and telling him, that his Papal mitre and bald pate will not prevent his being puniſhed for his luxury, and leudneſs, and for the venereal ſports, upon which he beſtowed ſo many days and nights. He quotes for the petition, Weſſelius Groningenſis. Tractatu de Theſauro Eccleſ. Indulg. I have been told that a very honeſt man, and a very good Proteſtant, having read that particular, went to Mr Jurieu in his ſtudy, and deſired him to ſhew him the author, who relates ſuch a monſtrous thing; and that Mr Jurieu ingenuouſly confeſſed to him that he had him not, but that it is to be found in ſeveral good writers. That honeſt man went away very well ſatisfied with that anſwer. For my part, I confeſs I ſhould not have been contented with it: the author of the Prejugez ſhould have quoted Du Pleſſis Mornai, from whom he had that paſſage; in a word, he ſhould have added to the quotation, apud Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſt. d'Iniquité, pag. 557. But notwithſtanding this addition, I would have made further inquiries; for in ſhort we ought to be informed how Du Pleſſis came to know that Weſſelus of Groningen relates ſuch a thing. It is ſo ſtrange, and ſo improbable, that one ought not to believe it without ſeeing it. I have therefore endeavoured to find out that book of Weſſelus, and not being able to get it, I have looked for the anſwers that were made to Du Pleſſis. Coëffeteau's anſwer ſeems to me weak; for he only excepts againſt the witneſs, becauſe he was a Heretic, and becauſe ſuch a depoſition ſhews his impudence. 'It is ſufficient for the reader, ſays he (14), to know that Weſſelus was a Heretic. Beſides, it is a piece of impudence to write ſuch a thing, nor can it be imagined that any man ſhould have been ſo profligate as to think of what he imputes to Pope Sixtus, and to the Cardinals of St Sixtus, and Santa Lucia. I cannot apprehend how a gentleman could write down ſuch filthy things.' This anſwer of Coëffeteau ſhews that he owns the thing to be in Weſſelus, whereby he grants to Du Pleſſis whatever he could deſire. The Jeſuit Gretſer comes off much better; he denies that Weſſelus ſaid ſuch a thing, and proves that he has not ſaid ſo (15). 1. Becauſe his treatiſe of Indulgences quoted by Du Pleſſis, and publiſhed by Goldaſtus, a good Calviniſt, contains not a word relating to the petition preſented to the Pope. 2. Becauſe Flacius Illyricus, who took out of Weſſelus's works whatever he thought favourable to his deſign, did not mention what concerns that petition. From whence it plainly follows, that neither Flacius Illyricus, nor Goldaſtus, men throughly verſed in the knowledge of ſuch books, found in any library a manuſcript of Weſſelus's works, that contained the fact mentioned by Du Pleſſis. The only authority that we have, is therefore that of Bale, who having related that particular (16), quotes for it the book of Papal Indulgences, written by Weſſelus of Groningen. Not being willing to ſtop here, I further looked into the reply to Coëffeteau, made by a very learned miniſter (17), who had as much reading as any man in his time. He was not ignorant of what Gretſer had anſwered; he replies nothing to it; which ſhews that Gretſer did not tell a lie, in what he affirmed concerning Goldaſtus's edition, and Illyricus. From whence it ought to be concluded, that it is only upon Bale's credit that Weſſelus mentioned the petition in queſtion.

Which being ſo, I ſay that none will mention again ſuch a petition, but a wretched rhapſodiſt, who tranſcribes and heaps up without any judgment, whatever he finds in the writers of his party; for, in ſhort, if the author of the Prejugez had conſidered what he did, would he not have foreſeen that ſuch a petition would be denied, and would he not have made himſelf ready to maintain the truth of it; but then would he not have quickly found out that the thing could not be maintained? and if he had been a wiſe man, he had wholly laid aſide that objection. Let us ſuppoſe an adverſary, who attacks him upon that ſubject. Prove to me, will he ſay, that Sixtus IV granted the exerciſe of ſodomy for three months yearly to thoſe who petitioned him for it. Mr Jurieu will anſwer, that Weſſelus of Groningen affirms it in his book concerning indulgences. This is not true, will the adverſary reply; here is the book of Weſſelus, publiſhed by a Proteſtant, but that fact is not to be found in it. Illyricus, another Proteſtant, who had ſo much peruſed Weſſelus, did not find it neither: and therefore you calumniate Weſſelus. No, will Mr Jurieu ſay; I do not calumniate him, for Bale aſcribes to him the thing in queſtion. But the adverſary will anſwer, if you had common ſenſe, could you believe that the authority of a writer, ſo much cried down, and ſo much deteſted by the Church of Rome, will counterbalance Illyricus's ſilence, and Goldaſtus's edition? Why not, will Mr Jurieu reply: the Papiſts have ſtruck that paſſage out of Weſſelus's book, and therefore Illyricus and Goldaſtus could not find it; but Bale had a copy that was not interpolated. And I maintain, will the antagoniſt ſay, that Bale made uſe of a copy, into which a man, who was no better than he, foiſted that paſſage, if Bale himſelf was not the impoſtor; and after all, you are to ſhew me a manuſcript of Weſſelus, which favours you, and which you may oppoſe to Goldaſtus's edition, which confounds you. I do not know what Mr Jurieu could reply; and therefore he is like thoſe imprudent accuſers whom Cicero laughed at, who are nonpluſſed when their aſſertions are denied (18). Every wiſe man will grant, that the believing of a crime is not ſufficient to charge any body with it, and that one muſt be in a capacity to prove it to thoſe that deny it. Tho' you believe never ſo much that Sixtus IV. was guilty of ſuch an abomination, and that Weſſelus wrote ſo, you will not affirm it in a book, if you are a man of judgment, and if you have no better proofs than Mr Jurieu. For the reſt, I do not pretend that theſe critical obſervations concern Mr Du Pleſſis Mornai: he wrote in a time when men were not ſo nice; and Goldaſtus's edition was unknown to him (19).

I had almoſt forgot to obſerve, that none but a very ignorant or inſincere man can maintain that Weſſelus was a Papiſt. If he had been a Papiſt, would Luther have beſtowed this encomium upon him? 'Prodiit en Weſſelus, vir admirabilis ingenii, rari & magni ſpiritus, quem & ipſum apparet eſſe vere theodidactum, quales prophetavit fore Chriſtianos Eſaias: neque enim ex hominibus accepiſſe judicari poteſt, ſicut nec ego. Hic ſi mihi antea fuiſſet lectus, poterat hoſtibus meis videri Lutherus omnia ex Weſſelo hauſiſſe, adeo ſpiritus utriuſque conſpirat in unum, &c (20). - - - Here is Weſſelus, a man of admirable parts, of an excellent and great ſpirit, and who alſo appeared to be truly taught of GOD, ſuch as Eſaias propheſied Chriſtians would be: for he cannot be judged to have learned of men, no more than I. Had I read him before, my enemies might have thought that Luther had taken all from Weſſelus, ſuch agreement there is betwixt the genius of both, &c.'

Note, That Mr Saldenus, a Dutch miniſter at the Hague, affirms, that according to Agrippa, the permiſſion I have been ſpeaking of, was granted to a cardinal by Sixtus IV. Idem hic Sixtus, teſte Agrippa, Cardinali cuidam maſculæ Veneris uſum certis menſibus ſecure indulſit (21). Agrippa ſays no ſuch thing (§ β). See below the remark [E].

[(§ β) Obſerve alſo that Johannes Lydius was very near falling into the ſame miſtake with reſpect to Volaterranus. 'Quid dixiſſet pia Fœmina, ſays he *, ſi Sixti Quarti audiviſſet impietatem, qui Cardinali Luciæ Sodomiam tribus menſibus calidioribus permiſit: teſte Volaterrano in Declam. ad Leu. - - - - What would the pious woman have ſaid, had ſhe heard of the impiety of Sixtus the fourth, who granted to the Cardinal of Lucia a diſpenſation for ſodomy in the three hotteſt months: witneſs Volaterranus, &c. in Declam. ad Leu.' This paſſage was not unknown to Mr Bayle, who, finding the citation obſcure and unintelligible, conſulted Mr La Croze †. He received from him an explanation of it, which he did not publiſh, and which I aſked of that learned man. Here is the ſubſtance of it. A book intituled, Mus exenteratus, printed for the firſt time at Stutgard, in 1593, after having ſpoken of the pretended diſpenſation of Sixtus IV, in favour of ſodomy, puts in the margin, Volater. Lib. 22 Antroph. Stella in Sixto IV. Joh. Baleus Anglus. Agrippa in Declam. ad Lovanienſes, &c. It is eaſy to perceive, that divers authors are there quoted indiſcriminately who have ſpoken ill of Sixtus IV. Lydius, in all likelihood, uſed this teſtimony againſt him; and, whether by the error of the Printer, or of Lydius, or that of ſome author who had copied it before him, the words that are between Volater. and in Declam. were omitted. I add, that by an error of the preſs Lov. might very eaſily be changed into Leu. Mr Bayle hath acknowledged that Mr La Croze had very well gueſſed from whence the wrong citation of Lydius, in the remarks. It is highly improbable [D]. If Sixtus IV, had granted ſuch a petition, he

---

(14) Coëffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 1207.

(15) Sed in illo libro (de Indulgentiis Papalibus) prout tomo primo monarchiæ Goldaſticæ à Goldaſto Calviniſta evulgatus eſt; nullum penitus de hac inexpiabili enormitate verbulum reperitur; nec, quod mireris, Illyricus in Catalogo ejus meminit, eo loco ubi ex operibus Weſſeli, ea, quæ ad ſuum forum facere credebat, excerpſit. Gretſerus, in Examin. Myſterii Pleſſæani, p. 545.

(16) Cent. VIII, cap. I.

(17) Andrew Rivet. See the ſecond part of his book, pag. 625.

(18) Jam invideo magiſtro tuo, qui te tanta mercede . . . nihil ſapere doceat. Quid eſt enim minus non dico Oratoris, ſed hominis, quam id objicere adverſario, quod ille ſi verbo negarit, longius progredi non poſſit qui objecerit? Cicero Philipp. II, pag. 532, Edit. Abrami. To which theſe words of Lactantius may be added. Turpe eſt hominem ingenioſum dicere id quod ſi neges probare non poſſit. Inſtit. Divin. lib. iii, cap. xxviii, p. m. 219.

(19) The firſt volume of his Monarchia, did not come out till after the Myſtere d'Iniquité.

(20) Luther in a preface that was prefixed to a book of Weſſelus. See Geſner's Bibliotheque, fol. 628.

(21) Saldenus, Otia Theolog. p. 164. He quotes Agrippa de Vanit. Scient. cap. 64.

* Pag. 9. Analect. ad Clemeng. de corrupto Eccleſ. ſtatu.

† See Mr Bayle's Letters, Tom. iii, Letter CCXLII, p. 914. of the Amſterdam edition, 1729.

Lydius proceeded; and he obſerves that Volaterranus ſpeaks not at all of that diſpenſation in the XXIId book of his Anthropologia, and that he had read over the Declam. ad Lovanienſes of Agrippa, without finding there any ſuch thing †. Thus this teſtimony falls ſtill to the ſhare of Bale alone. REM. CRIT.]

[D] . . . . It is highly improbable.] My deſign is not to extenuate the vices of thoſe, who are ſaid to have preſented that petition; on the contrary I aggravate them: for I maintain, that if thoſe men had been ſo wicked as to preſent it, and make uſe of the permiſſion granted them, they were too profligate to care for ſuch a permiſſion. You may be ſure that ſuch men would not forbear plunging themſelves into vice, till the Pope had granted their petition. Beſides, was it neceſſary to draw up a petition in form, and to expect an anſwer to it in writing? Was it not ſufficient to whiſper it in the ear, without diſcovering ſuch an abominable impudence to ſeveral perſons? In ſhort, I could be ſooner perſuaded of the truth than of the probability of ſuch a propoſition. The moſt profligate men do commonly obſerve a decorum, when they cannot offend againſt it without acting needleſſly, or to their prejudice. If that Pope had a mind to grant a privilege, he might have done it by word of mouth, without expoſing his reputation. If he grants it in writing, the conſcience of the petitioners will not be more at reſt for it, and he runs the hazard of being convicted of an abominable action by his own hand. Will a profligate man, if he has any wit, commit ſuch a fault?

I muſt not forget an obſervation that is proper enough to ſhew the falſity of this ſtory. It is ſuppoſed that the family of the Cardinal of Santa Lucia aſked leave to perform the act of ſodomy during the three hotteſt months in the year, viz. June, July, and Auguſt. There is in it a miſtake in matter of fact, which makes the whole ſtory ſuſpected: it is ſuppoſed that leud people in Italy are more tormented with their paſſion during the greateſt heat, than at any other time; which is a falſe ſuppoſition. If you conſult Phyſicians, they will tell you, that of all the ſeaſons of the year, men are leſs inclined to venery in ſummer, becauſe the heat weakens and enervates them. ‘Coitum porro mulieres æſtate magis appetunt, quia ſemen earum frigidum tunc calore temporis contemperatur, ac movetur, in viris autem fit exhalatus, conſumptio, ac debilitas à calore adaucto: Hyemis vero frigore vigoratur, & vegetior ac fortitor redditur, ideoque magis appetunt viri hyeme, quam mulieres (22). - - - The amorous deſires of women are ſtrongeſt in ſummer, becauſe the female ſeed being cold, is tempered and put into motion by the heat of that ſeaſon; whereas the increaſe of heat produces exhalation, waſting, and weakneſs in the male ſeed, but the coldneſs of winter adds vigour, life, and ſtrength to it. And therefore the amorous deſires of men are ſtronger in the winter, than thoſe of women.’ If thoſe, who vented this ſtory, had pitched upon March, April, and May, it had been more likely. We are told in the Menagiana of a woman, who confeſſed ſhe would not engage to be chaſte in May, tho' ſhe pretended to overcome the temptations of the fleſh all the other months of the year. In France the month of May is accounted the ſtrongeſt in that reſpect: and becauſe all the effects of the ſpring are earlier in Italy, the month of April muſt needs be there what the month of May is in other countries. I would not have any conſequences drawn from what we obſerve in plants and animals to man; they might be unexact, becauſe man's induſtry affords him a thouſand remedies againſt the ſeverity of the winter, which are unknown to vegetables and beaſts: however, I ſhall take notice of what the Naturaliſts obſerve, that the ſpring is the uſual time of generations (23).

Nam ſimul ac ſpecies patefacta'ſt verna diei,
Et reſerata viget genitalis aura Favoni;
Aëriæ primum volucres te, Diva, tuumque
Significant initum percuſſæ corda tua vi:
Inde feræ pecudes perſultant pabula læta,
Et rapidos tranant amneis; ita capta lepore,
Illecebriſque tuis omnis natura animantum
Te ſequitur cupide, quo quamque inducere pergis:
Denique per maria, ac monteis fluvioſque rapaceis,
Frundiferaſque domos avium, campoſque virenteis,
Omnibus incutiens blandum per pectora amorem,
Efficis, ut cupide generatim ſæcla propagent (24).

When firſt the riſing ſpring adorns the mead,
And a new ſcene of nature ſtands diſplay'd,
When teeming buds and cheerful greens appear,
And weſtern gales unlock the lazy year,
The joyous birds thy welcome firſt expreſs,
Whoſe native ſongs thy genial fire confeſs:
Then ſavage beaſts bound o'er their ſlighted food,
Struck with thy darts, and tempt the raging flood:
All nature is thy gift; earth, air, and ſea:
Of all that breathes the various progeny,
Stung with delight, is goaded on by thee.
O'er barren mountains, o'er the flow'ry plain,
The leafy foreſt, and the liquid main,
Extends thy uncontroll'd and boundleſs reign.
Thro' all the living regions doſt thou move,
And ſcatter'ſt where thou goeſt the kindly ſeeds of love.
DRYDEN.

What you have juſt now read out of the Menagiana, was quoted by me without book: I had not then time to look for the page; I have found it ſince; and tho' I ſaw I had not miſtaken the ſenſe of the author, I am ſenſible that I omitted ſome circumſtances, that deſerved to be mentioned. Here follows the whole paſſage. ‘One day as we were diſcourſing of the effects of the month of May, which heats a-new, not only the earth, and what is on it, but alſo revives love in the very bottom of the water: after a great deal of talk about that ſubject, the Marchioneſs de C. L. . . . mother of the Marchioneſs de S. . . . told me, I will engage to be chaſte in all the months of the year, but I cannot be ſure of it in May (25).’ A Phyſician, who continued the work of Laurence Joubert about popular errors, examines this queſtion: Whether this ſaying be right, Do not ſport much with women, but drink hard in the months that have no R (26). He diſapproves that rule no farther than as it excludes the month of May; a month, ſays he (27), the moſt devoted to love: and I could eaſily believe that in antient times people did not marry in that month, not ſo much out of jealouſy, or for fear of getting bad wives, according to the Poet's ſaying, Maio nubunt malæ, as by reaſon of the fury of love, which is then ſo violent in women, that they can hardly be ſatisfied, and therefore they may think of other men, to be as Marte viri, Maio mulieres. He had made uſe of theſe words in the foregoing page: ‘If therefore the ſpring is the moſt proper time for ſuch a ſport, it ſeems unreaſonable to abſtain from it in all the months that have no R, ſince the ſpring begins only about the latter end of March, and laſts all April and May, which has the true qualities of heat and moiſtneſs; and it is then that the gayity of the ſeaſon fills all ſorts of animals with love.

In furias ignemque ruunt, furor omnibus idem.

All are on fire, and the like flame
With equal fury burns the ſame.

‘At this rate the ſpring, which is the beſt time of the year for ſuch performances, would paſs away without them (28).’ The doctrine of Rodericus à Caſtro above-mentioned (29), is that of the antient Naturaliſts. One of the properties of ſummer, according to Heſiod, is to weaken the males, and kindle a greater love in females.

Τῆμος ποιόταταί τ' αἶγες, καὶ οἶνος ἄριστος,
Μαγλόταταί δὲ γυναῖκες, ἀφαυρότατοι δέ τε ἄνδρες Εἰσὶν.

Tunc

---

† Letter CCLIII, pag. 957, ubi ſupra.

(22) Rodericus à Caſtro, de morbis mulierum, lib. iii, cap. iii, p. m. 108.

(23) Vere tument terræ, & genitalia ſemina poſcunt. Virgil. Georg. lib. ii, ver 324. Continuoque avidis ubi ſubdita flamma medullis Vere magis (quia vere calor redit oſſibus.) Id. ibid. lib. iii, ver. 271.

(24) Lucret. lib. i, ver. 10.

(25) Menagiana, p. 170, of the ſecond Dutch edition.

(26) Bachot, ubi infra.

(27) Bachot, Erreurs populaires touchant la Médecine & Regime de Santé, book ii, ch. ix, p. 301.

(28) Id. ibid. p. 300.

(29) Above, citation (22).

he would have fallen far ſhort of the prudence and virtue which Clement VII diſcovered, when he thought that ſome ladies deſired of him a permiſſion to do an unlawful thing [E]. It

Tunc pingueſque capræ, & vinum optimum, Salaciſſimæ vero mulieres, & viri imbecilliſſimi ſunt (30).

The Poet Alcæus was of the ſame opinion (31). Ariſtotle ſuppoſes it to be true, and enquires into the reaſons of it (32). The Moderns, who ſo much criticize the antient Naturaliſts, have nothing to ſay againſt them upon that point. Mr Venette, a famous Phyſician, follows their opinion, and expreſſes himſelf fully to that purpoſe. ‘ The great heat of the months of July and of Auguſt, together with our fiery temper, deſtroys our natural heat, waſtes our ſpirits, and weakens all the parts of our bodies. It produces a great deal of choler, and many ſharp excrements, which afterwards make us weak and languiſhing. If we have then a mind to ſport with women, our ſtrength ſoon fails us; and tho' at firſt our paſſion enables us to make ſome efforts, we quickly find ourſelves ſo weak, and ſo exhauſted, that it is impoſſible for us to be ſtout champions. And if we have a mind to loſe all our ſtrength, and to be ſick, we need only ſport frequently with women. On the contrary, women are much more laſcivious in ſummer time. Their cold and moiſt temper is mended by the ſchorching heat of the ſun . . . . . Truly thoſe amorous paſſions are not well diſtributed. Whilſt women are fiery, we are languiſhing. Their paſſion no ſooner begins to appear, but ours vaniſhes away, as if nature intended thereby to teach us, that the exceſs of love is wholly prejudicial to mens health (33).’ This moral reflexion of Mr Venette puts me in mind of a paſſage in Pliny, wherein I thought he acknowledged a providence of nature in ſuch a diviſion of paſſions (34); but having more narrowly conſidered it, I find it ought not to be underſtood in that ſenſe: nay, it ſeems to me that Pliny has committed a fault, which perhaps no body has taken notice of, and therefore I ſhall ſet down his words. Urinam ciere præcipue traditur (ſcolymos) ſanare lichenas & lepras ex aceto. Venerem ſtimulare in Vino, Heſiodo & Alcæo teſtibus: qui florente ea cicadas acerrimi cantus eſſe, & mulieris libidinis avidiſſimas, viroſque in coitum pigerrimos ſcripſere, velut providentia naturæ hoc adjumento tunc valentiſſimo (35). That is to ſay, according to the verſion of du Pinet: ‘ It is ſaid that the artichoak (36) is very proper to provoke urine: and that uſed with vinegar, it cures tetters, itch, and ſhingles. Heſiod and Alcæus ſay, that it excites love: and they maintain, that when the artichoaks are in flower the graſs-hoppers make the loudeſt noiſe; for they are then moſt bent upon ſinging. They alſo ſay, that women are at this time moſt laſcivious, and men, on the contrary, moſt languiſhing in the ſports of love: inſomuch that nature, in order to ſupply the neceſſities of the ladies, ſends the artichoak as a food very proper to warm the men.’ This ſeems not to be a bad tranſlation; wherefore, if there are errors in this paſſage, I impute them to the original. It ſeems to me that Pliny did not apprehend Heſiod's meaning, nor that of Alcæus; for thoſe two Poets ſay nothing of the virtue of the ſcolymos: They only ſay that it is a plant, which flowers during the greateſt heat of the ſummer, and when graſs-hoppers ſing moſt, &c. They deſcribe the ſummer by thoſe two marks, and by ſome others, but without pretending that there is any relation between them as between a cauſe and it's effect.

I ſhall conclude with ſaying, that thoſe, who mentioned the petition in queſtion, did wrongly chuſe the three months of the diſpenſation. They pitched upon the three hotteſt months in the year, which were thoſe they ought leaſt of all to have choſen. The Spaniards would not have made ſuch a choice; as it appears from theſe words of the continuator of Laurence Joubert (37): Celſus ſeems to have learnedly concluded this chapter, when he ſays (38), that amorous exerciſes are not dangerous and pernicious in winter; that they are very ſafe in the ſpring; and neither good in the ſummer nor in the autumn, tho' more tolerable in the autumn. For one ought wholly to forbear in the ſummer, if it be poſſible. The Spaniards ſeem to have better obſerved that common ſaying (39) than we have, by excluding May, and reckoning only three months: Junio, Julio, y Auguſto, Dieta olguetta & quatre nodios in braguetta. - - - A moiſt diet in June, July, and Auguſt, and four buttons on the codpiece.

If any one ſhould ſay that ſome reaſons, well known at Rome to debauched people, did, pehaps, occaſion the aſking of a diſpenſation for the three hotteſt months in the year, he ſhould deſerve no anſwer. Such a general diſcourſe ought neither to be examined nor minded; and until a better reaſon be alledged, the firſt who mentioned that petition, will juſtly be accounted one of thoſe ſatirical writers, who know not how to obſerve the rules of probability. We may apply to him theſe words of an antient Father, Voluntatem eum habere mentiendi, artem fingendi non habere: he is very willing to tell a lie, but he does not underſtand the art of lying (40). This does not concern Weſſelus of Groningen; for firſt, it is not known whether he mentioned that petition; that fact is not to be found in his books that are extant: and, in the ſecond place, it may be preſumed, that if he ſaid ſomething of it, it was upon the credit of another. He quoted ſomebody, or at leaſt he made uſe of this clauſe, Fama eſt, fertur, - - - It has been reported, it is ſaid, &c. However it be, I declare I do not take him to be the firſt author of that ſtory. Many controverſiſts have been impoſed upon by the name of ſuch a wiſe and eminent Divine; but ſince they knew not how he ſpoke of it, whether he gave ſome proofs of it, or none at all, whether it was upon a hear-ſay, or upon the teſtimony of grave men, they have been too haſty in their judgment, and in their quotations. It is particularly about libels diſperſed againſt ſuch perſons as Sixtus IV, that one ought to act with deliberation. He had diſturbed the public peace of Italy; he had laid an interdict upon the Republics of Venice and Florence, and engaged in a violent war with both. There was not a little corruption in his court; his relations had made themſelves odious by their ambition and debauchery. It was impoſſible but that many paſquinades would come out againſt him (41). Any Venetian or Florentine, ſkilled in the art of ſlandering, could not fail to pleaſe his ſovereigns or his fellow-citizens, by uſing his talent againſt the Pope. He might expect that his ſatirical ſtrokes, whether true or falſe, would be very acceptable: it is a conſolation for thoſe who fear or hate a prince, to ſee him abuſed in libels; they believe every thing, every thing goes down in ſuch a diſpoſition, and therefore ſatirical writers do not much care to obſerve the rules of probability, being ſure to make people believe the groſſeſt lies. Which they are particularly ſure of, when they can juſtly charge others with ill actions: thoſe truths ſerve as a ſafe conduct to the falſities that go along with them (42). This obſervation might be of uſe at all times to thoſe, who are not willing to confound well-grounded ſlanders with malicious calumnies. But to ſpeak only of Sixtus IV. I obſerve, that if there was any ground for the petition in queſtion, Weſſelus would not be the only writer that had ſaid ſomething of it. How could he have found out what was unknown to the ſatirical writers of Venice and Florence?

[E] The virtue which Clement VII diſcovered, when he thought that ſome ladies deſired he would permit them to do an unlawful thing.] This particular may be ſeen in a chronicle; it is not a ſtory preſerved by tradition. It may be found in the annals of Aquitain, publiſhed ſeveral times by John Bouchet, who lived at that time (43). He ſpeaks of the interview between Clement VII, and Francis I, at Marſeilles in 1533. ‘ During that interview between the Pope and the King, where all the royal family of France was, and ſeveral princes and lords, and alſo the Queen of France and her retinue, there was a common report, that a pleaſant trick, deſerving to be remembered, had been plaid to three ladies of the queen, who were all virtuous, chaſte, and devout women. Thoſe three ladies, who were all widows, having a weakly and ſickly conſtitution, deſired to have a licence from the Pope to eat fleſh upon prohibited days; and in order to it, they made their application to the Duke of Albania, his near relation, who gave them his promiſe, and then ſent for them to come to the Pope. That duke, who was very familiar ‘ with

---

(30) Heſiod. Oper. & Dier. ver. 585.

(31) See Proclus in Heſiod. ibid. Conſult Menage, in Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, p. 352, and Father Harduin, in Plinium, Tom. iv, p. 205, 206.

(32) Ariſtot. Problem. §. iv, Quæſt. xxvi.

(33) Venette, Tableau de l'Amour Conjugal, p. 180, 181. Edit. 1696.

(34) As if nature had deſigned thus to diſtribute the ſeaſons of love, to prevent the ill conſequences of exceſs.

(35) Plin. lib. xxii, cap. xxii, p. m. 205, 206.

(36) Obſerve that according to Salmaſius the Scolymos of which Pliny ſpeaks after Heſiod, is not the Arti choak. See Mr le Clerc in his Notes on Heſiod, p. 282. Edit. 1701.

(37) Bachot, Vulgar Errors, book ii, ch. ix. p. 302, 303.

(38) Venus tum (hieme) non æque perniciofa eſt . . . Neque æſtate vero, neque autumno utilis Venus eſt. Tolerabilior tamen per autumnum: æſtate in totum, ſi fieri poteſt, abſtinendum eſt. Corn. Celſus, lib. i, cap. iii. p. 33, 34.

(39) Viz. that which I nave mentioned above citation (26).

(40) It is obſerved in the eighth volume of the Morale pratique des Jéſuites, pag. 152, that this ſaying was aplied to the Jeſuit Briſacier.

(41) Non modo omnes Italiæ potentatus in eos (Venetos) concitavit, ſed etiam veluti Clemens VI, alias fecerat, illos execravit, interdixit, & omnibus dignitatibus privavit. Nec quoad vixit, illis abſolutionis beneficium impendere voluit. Ex quo multos detractores habuit. Nauclerus, Gener. l, fol. m. 979.

(42) Note, that on the other hand this mixture of truths and falſities is favourable to thoſe who make an apology for perſons that are defamed; for when the writer of a libel is convicted of falſhood upon ſeveral points, he becomes ſuſpected of calumny in every thing elſe.

(43) He ſays, fol. 270, verſo, edition of Poitiers 1557, that they were printed at Poictiers the third time, in the beginning of the year 1535.

It is ſaid that Sixtus died in the year 1484, of the grief he conceived, when he heard that the peace was concluded between the Duke of Ferrara and the Venetians [F]. He loved the war, and he has been looked upon as the diſturber of the repoſe of Italy. Agrippa ſays one thing of him which deſerves to be mentioned [G]. You may ſee in Moreri (d), that it has been ſaid that this Pope got himſelf admitted into the houſe of la Rovere, which was very illuſtrious in Piedmont. That family was in poſſeſſion of a ſtrange prerogative [H].

All authors are agreed that Sixtus IV was a learned man. He had received his doctor's degree at Padua, and had read public lectures in the univerſity of Bologna, at Pavia, at Siena, at Florence, and at Peruggia. From the employment of a lecturer in the univerſities, he was promoted to ſeveral dignities: he was made firſt of all Provincial of the province of Liguria, and then Procurator-General of his order at the Court of Rome, and afterwards Vicar-General of Italy, and at laſt General of the Franciſcans. After thoſe preferments he received a cardinal's hat. He got a great reputation by the works,

he

' with thoſe ladies, having a mind to give ſome ſport to the Pope and to the King, told the Pope, holy Father, there are three young ladies, who are widows, and of an age to get children, whom I take to have ſome luſtful temptations, becauſe they have deſired me to beg of you that they may be allowed to make uſe of a man without marrying, when they are in great want of one. How, couſin, ſaid the Pope, it were againſt GOD's commandment, from which I can diſpenſe no body? I beſeech you, holy Father, to hear them, and to make this remonſtrance to them. Whereupon the ladies came into the hall where the Pope was, and after they had kneeled and kiſſed his feet, one of them ſaid to him, Holy Father, we have deſired the Duke of Albania to beg a favour of you, and to repreſent to you our age, frailty, and weak conſtitution. Daughters, ſaid the Pope, your requeſt is not reaſonable, for it is contrary to the command of GOD. The widows not knowing what the Duke of Albania had told him, anſwered, Holy Father, be pleaſed to give us ſuch a diſpenſation, three times in a week, at leaſt in Lent, and without ſcandal. How, replied the Pope, muſt I give you leave to commit fornication? I ſhould be damned if I did. Whereupon the ladies were ſenſible that there was ſome jeſt in the matter; and one of them ſaid, We beg a a diſpenſation to eat fleſh upon prohibited days. The Duke of Albania told them, I thought, ladies, you meant live fleſh. The Pope perceiving the jeſt, ſmiled, and told the duke, Couſin, you make the ladies bluſh; when the queen comes to hear of this, ſhe will be diſpleaſed with it. The king, the queen, and the princes, were immediately told of it, and liked the humour very well (44).' You will find this adventure in Brantome's Memoirs, towards the end of the ſecond volume of his Dames Galantes (45), where it is related more at large than in the Annals of Aquitain. He knew not that this ſtory was to be found in that book: for he concludes thus: I have been told the names of theſe three ladies, viz. the Lady de Chateau-briant, the Lady Chaſtillon, and the widow of the Bayliff of Caën, all very virtuous women. I have this ſtory from the old courtiers (46).

[F] It is ſaid he died . . . of the grief he conceived when he heard that a peace was made between the Duke of Ferrara and the Venetians.] He had declared a war againſt the Republic of Venice, in favour of the Duke of Ferrara, and had a mind to keep it up; but his allies forſook him, and made a peace without conſulting him. The grief he conceived upon it increaſed his gout, and carried him off in five days. What a vicar of the Prince of Peace, who ſays in his goſpel, Bleſſed are the peace makers. Quum pacem à ſociis præter ejus voluntatem & conſenſum fieri conſpiceret, ex animi uti putatur dolore, podagra inſuper aggravante qua in ultimis annis maxime laborabat, in quintum diem expiravit (47). He deſerved the epitaphs, which the Poets made upon him (48).

I will not forget a fine paſſage of Alcyonius. ' Ad id (49) adductus videri poterat Ferdinandus à Xyſto Pont. Max. qui & officii Pontificii, & religionis & Dei oblitus non ſecus in Italia bella excitare ſolebat atque illa Aſiæ aut Africæ provincia eſſet, in qua Turcæ & Pœni regnarent, non pars Europæ ex flore clariſſimorum virorum conſtans, cujus princeps eſſet pontifex maximus qui moderatiſſime & ſapientiſſime clavum tanti imperii tenere & gubernacula Reip. tractare in maximo curſu & fluctibus deberet. Dein eodem Xyſto ſi non ſuaſore & impulſore certe approbatore Veneti terra & aquis arma intulerunt Herculi Ferrarienſi Principi (50). - - - Ferdinand was thought to be brought into the war againſt Tuſcany by Sixtus; a man who forgetting his duty as a Pope, forgetting his religion and his GOD, uſed to raiſe his wars in Italy, as if that country was a province of Aſia, or of Africa, under the dominion of Turks or Carthaginians, and not that part of Europe which produces the moſt eminent and moſt illuſtrious men, and which has for it's prince, a Pope, who ought to ſteer the helm of ſo great a government amidſt the moſt violent ſtorms with the greateſt moderation and wiſdom. Afterwards if it was not by the perſuaſion and inſtigation of Sixtus, it was certainly by his approbation that the Venetians made war by ſea and land upon Hercules, Prince of Ferrara.' Take notice that I have been informed by Mr de la Monnoie, that the firſt of the three epitaphs, which I have mentioned (51), from Du Pleſſis Mornai, does not concern Pope Sixtus, and that it contains two verſes of Sannazarius againſt Pope Alexander VI; alſo that it ought to be read Sextum, and not Sixtum; and that Sannazarius did rather praiſe Sixtus than blame him, as it appears from this epigram againſt the ſame Alexander. Viſuram ſe iterum Sixtum cum Roma putaret, Pro Sixto Sextum vidit & ingemuit.

[G] Agrippa ſays one thing of him which deſerves to be mentioned.] Du Pleſſis relates it thus. Among the pimps of theſe latter times, ſays Agrippa, Sixtus IV was moſt remarkable, who built a noble bawdy-houſe at Rome . . . . The courtezans of Rome pay a Giulio every week to the Pope, and this yearly income does ſometimes amount to above twenty thouſand ducats; and that office is ſo particularly appropriated to the chiefs of the Church, that the rent of pimping is reckoned part of the Eccleſiaſtical revenues. For, ſays he, I heard formerly the computation made in the following manner: He has two benefices, a curacy of twenty ducats, a priory of forty, and three whores in a bawdy-houſe, who bring him twenty giulio's every week (52). Thoſe, who deſire to ſee Agrippa's words, need only read the following paſſage. ' Sed & recentioribus temporibus Sixtus Pontifex Maximus Romæ nobile admodum lupanar extruxit . . . . . Multi alii magiſtratus . . . . in civitatibus ſuis lupanaria conſtruunt foventque, nonnihil ex meretricio queſtu etiam ærario ſuo accumulantes emolumenti: quod quidem in Italia non rarum eſt, ubi etiam Romana ſcorta in ſingulas hebdomadas Julium pendent Pontfici, qui cenſus annuus nonnunquam viginti millia ducatos excedit, adeoque Eccleſiæ procerum id munus eſt, ut unâ cum Eccleſiarum proventibus etiam lenociniorum numerent mercedem. Sic enim ego illos ſupputantes aliquando audivi; Habet, inquientes, ille duo beneficia, unum curatum aureorum viginti, alterum prioratum ducatorum quadraginta, & tres putanas in burdello, quæ reddunt ſingulis hebdomadibus Julios viginti (53).

[H] The family of Rovere . . . . poſſeſſed a ſtrange prerogative.] It was a right over the maidenheads of the virgins, whom their vaſſals married. A cardinal of that houſe threw into the fire the patent of that privilege. ' Cotal coſtume (54) de pagani & da gentili, fu gia in Piemonte, & il Cardinale Illuſtriſſimo Hieronimo della Rouere mi diceva haver egli ſteſſo abbrucciato il privilegio, che havea di cio la ſua Caſa (55). - - - This Pagan cuſtom prevailed formerly

' in

(d) Under the word Ruvere.

(44) Bouchet Annales d'Aquitaine, fol. m. 267.

(45) Pag. m. 356, & ſeq.

(46) Brant. Dames Galantes, Tom. ii, p. 358.

(47) Volaterran. lib. xxii, p. 819.

(48) Non potuit ſævum vis ulla extinguere Sixtum; Audito tandem nomine pacis, obit. See the end of this remark, Item. Dic unde Alecto pax iſta refulſit, & unde Tam ſubito reticent prelia? Sixtus obit. Item, Pacis ut hoſtis eras, pace peremptus obis. Apud du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 556.

(49) That is, to make war againſt Tuſcany.

(50) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice legato poſteriore, fol. 1, verſo.

(51) Above citation (48).

(52) Du Pleſſis, Myſtery of Iniquity, p. 557.

(53) Agrippa, de vanitate Scientiar. cap. lxiv, Tom. ii, Operum, p. 135.

(54) The author had been ſpeaking of that, which Malcolme king of Scotland had eſtabliſhed.

(55) Bonifacio Vannozzi, Auvertimenti Politici, Tom. ii, p. 253.

he publiſhed [I], and being raiſed to the Papal See he made it appear that he was ſtill a lover of learning; for he ſet up the library of the Vatican (e), and gave the direction of it to the learned Platina, and allowed yearly penſions to ſeveral other perſons, who were to help him in taking care of the books, and tranſcribing Greek, Latin, and Hebrew manuſcripts (f). He ordered the ſame Platina to write the Hiſtory of the Popes (g). It has been obſerved that he was much more liberal to his ſiſters ſons than to his brothers ſons, and that among his ſiſters ſons he particularly favoured Peter and Jerome Riario. This would not be a meer fantaſtical humour, as it is pretended but rather a very natural thing, were it true that he was their father, as ſome writers will have it [K]. He was the firſt who inſtituted the feaſt of the Conception and Preſentation of the Holy Virgin, as alſo that of St Anne and St Joſeph, and that of Francis of Aſſiſi (b). He canonized Bonaventura (i), and appointed him a feaſt among thoſe of the apoſtolical palace (k). He reſtored a devotion invented by St Dominic, which was diſcontinued, viz. that of the Roſary and the Pſalter of the Holy Virgin (l). It is a miſtake to ſay that he was the firſt who ordered that the Jubilee ſhould be celebrated once in twenty-five years. That ordinance was made by Paul II, his predeceſſor, in the year 1470. He only confirmed it, and was the firſt who put it in execution in the year 1475 (m). The place which Polydore Virgil gives him among the inventers of things, does him little honour; for he aſcribes to him the firſt creation of ſeveral offices that were bought [L]. This was the ſource of a diſorder that increaſed daily. All authors are (e) See the article PLATINA, in the text, citation (g), and Bonanni, ubi infra, citation (k), pag. 430.

(f) Taken from Ghilini Teatro d'Huomini Letterati, Tom. ii, p. 93.

(g) Platina, Epiſt. dedicat. ad Sixtum IV.

(b) Vita Sixti IV, ad calcem Platinæ, fol. m. 364.

(i) Id. ibid.

(k) Bonanni, in Numiſm. Pontificum, Tom. i, p. 91.

(l) Id. ibid.

(m) Id. ibid. p. 98.

'in Piedmont, and the moſt illuſtrious Cardinal Jerome 'della Rovere, told me that he himſelf had burnt the 'patent which his family had for that privilege.' They are the words of an author, who lived in the beginning of the XVIIth century. See the margin (56).

[I] The works which he publiſhed.] Here follow the titles of them. De ſanguine Chriſti liber: De futuris contingentibus: Commentarii de Potentia Dei: De Conceptione B. Virginis: Contra errores cujuſdam Carmelitæ Bononienſis qui affirmabat Deum ſua omnipotentia, damnatum hominem ſalvare non poſſe. He writ alſo a book to ſhew that Thomas Aquinas and Scotus, who differ ſo much in words, are at the bottom of the ſame opinion (57).

[K] He particularly favoured Peter and Jerome Riario. This would not be .... a fantaſtical humour .... were it true that he was their father, as ſome writers will have it.] '(58) He had nine nephews, 'viz. five, whoſe name was de la Rovere, as his 'was and [illegible] ere the ſons of his three bro'thers deceaſed, and four who went by the names of 'Riario, Baſſo, and Sanſoni, the three families into 'which his ſiſters, and one of his nieces, had been 'married..... (59) It was not barely the exceſs of 'the Pope's ambition that made it intolerable, ſince 'it was attended with a kind of oddneſs, grounded 'neither upon intereſt, nor upon probability: for 'tho' Sixtus in all appearance ſhould have ſhewn more 'kindneſs to the five nephews I have juſt now men'tioned, than to the other four, who were only re'lated to him by his ſiſter's ſide; and tho' he had 'all the reaſon in the world to do it; and that 'Julian, the eldeſt of them all, was endowed with 'all the wonderful qualities, which made after'wards his Pontificate ſo famous under the name of 'Julius II; it is certain he never could obtain of 'his uncle that he ſhould behave as head of the 'houſe of la Rovere, or perform the functions of 'Cardinal Nephew, or that his brother, or his three 'couſins ſhould have what was denied him. In a 'word, the ſtrongeſt inclinations of Sixtus were al'ways in favour of his ſiſters children, eſpecially to 'thoſe of the eldeſt, who had two ſons, viz. Peter 'and Jerome Riario. Peter had been a Franciſcan 'as well as his uncle, and perhaps deſerved upon that 'account to have a great ſhare in his uncle's affe'ction. He was made cardinal on the ſame day 'that Julian was; but he had this advantage above 'him, that he was declared Cardinal Nephew, and 'obtained the biſhopric of Treviſo, which Julian had 'aſked. Afterwards the moſt conſiderable benefices, 'that came to be vacant, were beſtowed upon him; 'and he became ſo powerful, that he had a greater 'train than the reſt of the ſacred college..... '(60) His brother Jerome .... whom the Pope de'ſigned to make his chief heir, &c.' Machiavel will tell us that Peter and Jerome Riario were called Sixtus's nephews, only to conceal the relation of paternity under ſuch a name. 'Fù queſto Pontefice, ſaith 'he (61), il primo che cominciaſſe à moſtrare quanto 'un Pontefice poteva, & come molte coſe chiamate 'per l'adietro errori, ſi potevano ſotto la Pontificale 'autorità naſcondere. Haveva tra la ſua famiglia 'Piero e Girolamo, i quali (ſecondo che ciaſcuno 'credeva) erano ſuoi figlivoli, nondimeno ſotto altri 'più honeſti nomi gli palliava. - - - - This Pope was 'the firſt who began to ſhew how much a Pope could 'do, and that many things, formerly called errors, could 'be concealed under the Papal authority. Among others 'of his family, he had Peter and Jerome, who (as 'every one believed) were his own children; however 'he concealed them under honeſter names.' John Michael Brutus affirms, that Sixtus begot thoſe two boys when he was but a Franciſcan, and had them bred up under the name of his nephews to conceal his fault. Ab eo cum adhuc ageret in Franciſcanorum familia liberos ſuſceptos fuiſſe: ac quo minor Parentis infamia eſſet, propinquorum honeſtiori nomine liberaliter quidem & honeſte, ſed non tamen in ſpem tantam educatos (62).

Some ſay he was neither the father nor the uncle of Peter and James Riario, but that they were only his favourites. Coëffeteau put that ſenſe upon the parentheſis of a paſſage above quoted (63), which contains theſe three words, not without myſtery. Theſe are Coëffeteau's words. Du Pleſſis endeavours to find an abominable myſtery in that love, which is a thing that a man who loves honour ſhould have no thought of (64). I own it, replies Rivet (65), 'in order to approve it, 'and much leſs to delight in it; but an honeſt man 'may take notice of it, and deteſt it in a ſinful man, 'and it will no more defile his imagination than the 'words of the Scripture concerning the ſodomites, or 'thoſe of St Paul ſpeaking of the heathens, in the firſt 'chapter of his epiſtle to the Romans. Certainly the 'words of Raphael Volaterranus, together with that 'extraordinary indulgence, may raiſe a ſuſpicion in 'the moſt charitable perſons; for, ſpeaking of thoſe 'two men, he ſays, Petrum à puero, una cum Hieronymo fratre, SIBI educaverat, that he had brought 'them up for himſelf from their infancy.' Obſerve, that Mr Du Pleſſis has not taken care to expreſs himſelf clearly. His words are ſo ill placed, that the beſt ſenſe which can be put upon them is a falſhood. Having provided for theſe two, ſays he (66), who were nearer related to him by love than kindred, he comes next to his relations. Jerome, his brother of the ſame nurſery, whom he made Prince of Furli and of Imola. Compare this with the words preceding, you ſhall find that by having provided for theſe two, he underſtands the promotion of Peter and Jerome Riario, from whence it follows that he meant, that Jerome, who was made Prince of Furli, was brother of Pope Sixtus, and a different perſon from that Jerome Riario whom he had mentioned: but this is a grand miſtake.

[L] Polydore Virgil .... aſcribes to him the firſt creation of many offices that were bought.] See the ſecond chapter of the eighth book de Inventoribus Rerum, out of which I ſhall ſet down the following paſſage. 'Pius II .... following the example of John XXII, 'created ſome Abbreviators, and made it an office, 'which was bought as well as the reſt. Afterwards 'Paul II, being a conſcientious man, turned out 'thoſe

(56) Mr Pars, miniſter of Katwick ſays in a Dutch book, intituled, Katwykſe Oudbeden, that is Antiquities of Katwic, pag. 196, that certain lords in Holland (he names ſome of them) had ſuch a privilege, and that it was ſuppreſſed by the States who gave them ſome money for the ſuppreſſion of it.

(57) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro, Part ii, p. 94.

(58) Varillas, Anecd. de Florence, p. 67.

(59) Id. ibid. p. 68.

(60) Id. ibid. p. 69.

(61) Machiavelli, delle Hiſt. Florentine, lib. vii, p. m. 289.

(62) Jo. Michael Brutus, Hiſtor. Florent. lib. vii, p. 387, apud Joan. Zuingerum, de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, pag. 133.

(63) Citat. (2).

(64) Coëffeteau, anſwer to the Myſtery of Iniquity, p. 1205.

(65) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réſponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. ii, p. 623, Note that he is miſtaken in calling Peter and Jerome Riario by the name of la Ruere. Mr Zuinger, de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, p. 133, has committed the ſame fault: Ad Petri Ruerii, ſays he, quem pro Cinædo habuerit Sixtus & Hieronymi fratris ſui (it ſhould be ejus) poſtulationes, &c.

(66) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 555.

are not agreed that this pontif was a man of a mean extraction [M]. If he was, he may be properly alledged in confirmation of what I have ſaid in another place (n), that the moſt haughty and daring men may be born among the dregs of the people; for his haughtineſs was very great: the Florentines found it ſo by experience; for they could not be reconciled to him, but by ſubmitting to the moſt ſhameful humiliations (o). Never was ſatisfaction more ſevere than what he impoſed upon them. It is in vain for Father Bonanni to ſay that John Michael Brutus has no reaſon to complain of the harſh anſwer that was made by that Pope to their deputies: what he relates and what he confeſſes is a ſufficient proof of the great mortification they ſuſtained (p).

In refuting the error of Mr Saldenus (q), I might have cenſured ſtill upon better grounds the author of Turco-Papiſmus; for he quotes Agrippa as having related that this Pope appointed places of proſtitution as well for ſodomitical leudneſſes, as for others more ordinary, and granted the permiſſion of the ſin contrary to nature to a cardinal. He adds that Weſſelus alſo ſpeaks of it [N].

(n) Remark [L] of the article GREGORY VII.

(o) In the year 1480.

(p) See Bonanni, ubi ſupra, p. 102, & ſeq.

(q) At the end of remark [B].

those blood-ſuckers; but Sixtus reſtored them as ſo many ſervants neceſſary to a maſter, who is reſolved to get money by any means whatſoever. Nay, he did worſe, for he ſet up a band of ſollicitors, proctors, and ſetters, without whom no patents, called Bulls could be drawn up, that being examined by ſeveral perſons they might not be ſo eaſily interpolated and falſified. At laſt he appointed nine comptrollers or ſupervisors of the treaſury, to whom he gave a ſalary, that their offices might be the better ſold. Nor was he fruſtrated in his expectation; for an office that was ſold before for five hundred ducats, ſold moſt times for one, two, or three thouſand ducats by reaſon of that ſalary, ſo carefully do they ply their buſineſs who buy their places. This gain proved ſuch a charm to Innocent VIII, who ſucceeded Sixtus, that he ſet up an office of ſecretaries . . . . . and increaſed their number. Alexander VI appointed the collectors of briefs to the number of fourſcore. I leave you to judge whether among an army or innumerable multitude of recorders and ſcriveners, there is any want of ſerjeants, whoſe faces (as the Poet has it) are always pale with hunger, and who greedily feed upon the people: to whom we may add the Griffins, thoſe who ſo well know how to ſhear ſheep, I mean notaries and ſcriveners who ſuck poor peoples ſubſtance, whom Nicolas III turned out, being afraid they would deſtroy the whole ſheepfold (67).' I need not inform my reader that this invention of Sixtus IV is blamed, not only as an unlawful means of getting money, but alſo as a very ill example which makes way for greater miſchiefs. I might ſay many things upon it, if I would ſet up for a maker of political reflexions; but I do not pretend to that. I rather chuſe to quote another writer, who mentions the ſame conduct of Sixtus IV: it will appear from his words, that it was grounded upon the deſire of aggrandizing one of his nephews. Conſider well the words of Varillas. 'The only thing that remained to be done by Riario, in order to compleat his ſettlement, was to get footing in Umbria, from whence he might have eaſily penetrated into Romagna, and perhaps alſo into Tuſcany; but having no troops, and wanting a great deal of money to raiſe ſome, his uncle did not ſcruple to ſell the offices of the Chancery, and of the Court of Rome, which had been the reward of virtue and ability under the foregoing Popes. He created five colleagues, through whoſe hands all the diſpatches of the Datary were to go ſucceſſively, and nine new offices in the apoſtolical chamber, which were bought very dear. He neither conſidered the ſhameful trade he was going to introduce, nor the honeſt liberty of which he deprived the Court of Rome, nor the inconveniences that would ariſe from putting an end to the labour and induſtry of the moſt refined Italians; by taking from them offices freely given, which was an allurement to them, and kept up their emulation. He increaſed the old taxes, and laid new ones: He alſo ordered extraordinary tithes to be paid (68).'

[M] All authors are not agreed that this Pontif was a man of mean extraction.] He was ſo, if we believe Machiavel (69), and many other authors who ſay his father was a Fiſherman. Their proof for it would be a weak one, ſhould they go upon the authority of Panvinius, who obſerves that the inhabitants of the village, where he was born, do hardly get their livelihood any other way but by fiſhing; for that Hiſtorian ſays on the other ſide, that the family of that Pope was none of the moſt inconſiderable in the town of Savona, and that it was a branch of the houſe della Rovere, one of the moſt antient in Piedmont (70). It appears by ſeveral letters of that Pope, that he pretended to be a native of Savona; and it is obſerved that he was born by chance in the village of Cella, becauſe his father and mother had fled thither during the plague that raged at Savona. It is further ſaid, that family bore the arms of the houſe della Rovere (71) before Sixtus was born; which is alledged by ſome, to confute thoſe who ſay, that the lords of that family beſtowed their name and their arms upon Pope Sixtus. Francis Carriere ſays ſo in his expoſition of the Prophetical Symbols of Malachi the Iriſh man. Father Oldoini has collected ſeveral reaſons, to prove that our Franceſco della Rovere was of a noble family, and that he turned Franciſcan of his own motion, and not becauſe poverty put him upon looking for a livelihood at the expence of others (72). See Father Bonanni's Hiſtory of the Popes by medals, and compare with this the remark [A] in the article JULIUS II.

[N] He quotes Agrippa as having related, &c.] You ſhall ſee that it is an expreſs, not an indirect, quotation; for he hath put in Italic characters what he hath taken from Agrippa. 'Sixto quarto nihil cogitari poteſt turpius aut inquinatius; erat enim, & propter lenocinium, & nefandiſſimas libidines, infamis. Lupanaria, ut inquit Agrippa †, utrique Veneri erexit, cardinalique cuidam maſculæ veneris uſum certis menſibus indulſit: hoc etiam attigit * Weſſelus Groningenſis (73). - - - - - Nothing can be imagined more baſe and filthy, than Sixtus IV; for he was infamous, both for his practiſing and encouraging the moſt abominable luſts. He erected ſtews, as Agrippa relates, to both ſorts of Venery, and indulged the uſe of Sodomy, to a certain cardinal in certain months. This is alſo mentioned by Weſſelus of Groningen.' It is moſt falſe that Agrippa ſays any of theſe two things. See above (74).

(67) Polyd. Virgil. de Inventor. Rerum, lib. viii, cap. ii, p. m. 482, 483. See Du Pleſſis Mornay, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 556, 557.

(68) Varillas, Anecd. de Florence, p. 70.

(69) Huomo di baſſiſſima & vile conditione. Machiavelli, delle Hiſtor. Fiorentine, lib. vii, p. 289.

(70) See Bonanni, Numiſmat. Pontific. Romanor. Tom. i, p. 91.

(71) They are rebuſſes, viz. that kind of Oak which the Latins call Robur, the Italians Rovere, or Ruvere, and the French Rouvre.

(72) Bonanni, Numiſm. Pontif. Romanor. Tom. i, p. 92.

† De vanit. ſcient. c. de lenocinio.

* Lib. de indulgentiis.

(73) Sutlivius, in Turco-Papiſmo, lib. i, cap. xvii, p. 115.

(74) In the remark [G].

SMIGLECIUS (MARTIN) a native of Lemberg in Poland, turned Jeſuit at Rome in the year 1581, where he ſtudied with great application and good ſucceſs. Being ſent back into Poland, he taught Philoſophy at Vilna four years, and Divinity ten years. He was rector of ſeveral colleges, and ſuperior of the religious houſe at Cracow. He died at Kaliſs after a long ſickneſs the twenty-ſixth of July 1618, at fifty-ſix years of age. He ſhewed an admirable patience in his adverſity, eſpecially during the ſickneſs which conſumed him by degrees (a). He applied himſelf very much to controverſy both againſt the Proteſtants and the Unitarians. This appears from the books books he publiſhed [A]. His Logic is very much eſteemed [B]: it was printed in two volumes in 4to at Ingolſtad in the year 1618.

(a) Taken from Sotuel, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societat. Jeſu, p. 592, 593.

[A] The books he publiſhed.] I omit thoſe he wrote in his mother tongue, ſome of which are againſt the Arians (1); and I ſhall only ſet down the titles of thoſe he compoſed in Latin, as I find them in Father Alegambe (2). Latine edidit de Zechariæ Prophetæ pro Chriſti divinitate illuſtri teſtimonio, adverſus Fauſti Socini Anabaptiſtæ cavillationes. Vilnæ MDXCVI in 4to. Nodum Gordium, ſeu, de Vocatione Miniſtrorum. Cracoviæ MDCIX in 4to. Nova Monſtra novi Arianiſmi. Niſſæ MDCXII in 4to. Verbum Caro factum, ſeu, de Divinâ Verbi Incarnati Natura, contra novos Arianos. Cracoviæ MDCXIII in 4to. Refutationem vanæ Diſſolutionis Nodi Gordii de Vocatione Miniſtrorum, contra Joannem Volkelium Miniſtrum Arianum. Ib. MDCXIV in 4to. De erroribus novorum Arianorum, lib. ii, contra Valentinum Smalcium, Ibid. MDCXV in 4to. De Chriſto vero & naturali filio Dei, ejuſque pro nobis ſatisfactione, adverſus Valentinum Smalcium Arianum, lib. ii. Acceſſit Reſponſio ad Refutationem C. errorum Smalcio objectorum. Ibidem MDCXV in 4to. De Baptiſmo, adverſus Hieronymum Moſcorovium Arianum, lib. i. Ibidem eodem anno ac formâ. De Ordinatione Sacerdotum in Eccleſiâ Romanâ, contra Jacobum Zaborovium Calvinianum Miniſtrum. Cracoviæ MDCXVII. De Notis Miniſtrorum. lib. ii. contra eundem. MDCXVII. Vanam ſine viribus iram Miniſtrorum Evangelicorum. Coloniæ apud Antonium Boëtzerum MDCXI in 16mo. Refutationem Epicherematis miſſionem Miniſtrorum Evangelicorum propugnantis. MDCXII.

[B] His Logic is very much eſteemed.] 'Smiglecius, a Poliſh Jeſuit, was one of the laſt Logicians, who wrote upon Ariſtotle's Logic with the greateſt ſubtilty and ſolidity. He dived into the bottom of that ſcience with a clearneſs and exactneſs, hardly to be found in any other author. His Logic is an excellent work (3).' This teſtimony of a fellow Jeſuit will not appear a flattering one to thoſe, who are capable of judging of ſuch a book. The Engliſh have done juſtice to that work; it has been reprinted in their country.

(1) See Alegambe and Sotuel, in Biblioth. Scriptor. Soc. Jeſu.

(2) Alegambe, ibid. pag. 331. col. 2.

(3) Rapin, Reflexions ſur la Logique, num. viii, pag. m. 383.

SOCINUS (MARIANUS) a famous Civilian, was born at Siena the fourth of September 1401. He taught the Canon-Law at Padua and then at Siena: it appears from his works (a) that he underſtood it perfectly. He received in his country all the honours due to his great merit. He was deputed by his countrymen to Pope Pius II, who made him Advocate-Conſiſtorial, and gave him ſeveral marks of a particular eſteem. He was of a low ſtature [A], but of a ſtrong conſtitution: he had a more univerſal knowledge than any other man in his time (b). It is ſaid that one day he eaſily checked Politian's vanity [B]. What he anſwered to thoſe, who aſked him why he left off reading lectures, ſince he had a wife [C], is curious. He died at Siena the thirtieth of September 1467. See his encomium in the letters of Pius II (c). He left ſeveral children behind him, and among others a ſon, who exceeded him [D].

(a) See the remark [D], at the end.

(b) Æneas Silvius, Epiſt. cxii, lib. i, apud Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. lib. iii, c. xxxv, p. m. 456, & ſeq.

(c) Taken from his Life, written by Panzirolus, in lib. iii, de claris Legum Interpretibus, p. m. 456, & ſeq.

[A] He was of a low ſtature.] Æneas Silvius, his countryman, who was Pope by the name of Pius II, ſpeaks of him thus (1). 'Nihil ei præter formam natura invidit. Humuncio eſt, naſci ex mea familia (2) debuit cui parvorum hominum eſt cognomen. - - - Nature had been liberal to him in every thing, but his ſtature. He is a little man, he ſhould have been of my family, whoſe firname is Piccolomini, i e. little men.'

[B] It is ſaid that one day he .... checked Politian's vanity.] That great critic, who ſhould have been contented with the reputation of an excellent Philologer, pretended alſo to be a Civilian of the firſt rank. He ſaid one day that he could make better lectures of the Civil-law, than the famous Accurſius; but our Socinus nonpluſſed him by the firſt queſtion he put to him. '(3) Semel etiam Angelum Politianum virum Græcis, Latiniſque literis impensè eruditum, cum Senis in Juris civilis interpretationibus ſe vel Accurſium ſuperaturum jactabundus gloriaretur, leniter correxit, ab eo enim interrogatus Angelus, quis eſſet in jure ſuus hæres, ob imperitiam obmutuit, ac pudore ſuffuſus ſuæ audaciæ pœnas dedit †. - - - He one time gently reproved Politian, a man very well ſkilled in Greek and Latin, when he vainly boaſted that he could exceed Accurſius, in interpreting the Civil-law. Socinus aſked him who was his heir at law, being ignorant, he made no anſwer, and ſuffered for his raſhneſs, by the ſhame he was put to.'

This ſeems to me a fabulous ſtory, for Politian was but fifteen years of age, when Socinus died.

[C] Since he had a wife.] He only anſwered, I have got a wife; and being told that Socrates did not leave off his lectures after he was married: it is, replied he, becauſe Xantippe was an ill humoured woman, and perhaps ugly, whereas I have got a handſome and complaiſant wife. Uxore ducta, cum docendi munus intermiſiſſet, interrogatus, cur id non continuaret, ſe conjugem duxiſſe reſpondit; ‡ cùm verò replicaretur, Socratem nunquam philoſophiam ob uxorem deſeruiſſe, ſubjecit, illum moleſtam, & fortè turpem Xantippem, ſe autem formoſam, & obſequentem habere (4).

[D] He left ... behind him ... a ſon who exceeded him (5).] Viz. BARTHOLOMEW SOCINUS, born at Siena the twenty-fifth of March 1437. He taught the Civil-law at Siena, and then at Piſa, whither he was called in 1474. Having a greater reputation than all the Civilians of his time, he was called to Ferrara, where he was a profeſſor four years; and then he performed the ſame function at Bologna, from whence he returned to Piſa, where he had a ſalary of a thouſand ducats. There aroſe a great emulation between him and Jaſo Mainus: they grew ſo hot in their diſputes, that Laurence de Medicis went to Piſa on purpoſe, to have the pleaſure of ſuch a fight. He removed ſeveral times from one univerſity to another, and at laſt a kind of palſey in the tongue having deprived him of his ſpeech, he was only a chamber counſellor. He died at Siena in 1507 (6). He had more learning than virtue, for he lived a debauched life, and made ſo many fooliſh expences, that he was buried at the public charges. 'Illiberalibus verò moribus inſignem doctrinam maculaſſe dictus eſt, qui chartarum, & aleæ ludo ſupra modum deditus, non modo debitis lectionibus quandoque auditores fraudaſſe, ſed inſomnes etiam noctes turpiter egiſſe dicitur. Eo vitio paternis opibus conſumptis, & univerſa, quam docendo, & de jure reſpondendo plurimum coëgerat, pecunia effuſa, ad extremam inopiam deductus eſt, uſque adeo ut nec quod funeri ſuppeteret, poſt ſe reliquiſſe dicatur. Eam ob cauſam ſemper egens undique pecuniam avarius conquirere cogebatur (7). - - - - He is ſaid to have ſullied his excellent learning by his ſordid life, being ſo addicted to cards and dice, that he not only deprived his ſcholars of their lectures, but ſpent therein whole nights. Hereby having conſumed his patrimony, and whatever he gained by his ſcholars and conſultations, he was reduced to extreme poverty, inſomuch that he is ſaid not to have left wherewithal to bury him. And therefore being always in want, and covetous, he was forced to get money any how.' His memory failed him upon two remarkable occaſions. 'Memoriæ imbecillitate bis inter orandum excidit. Primo cum anno MCCCCXCII. à Republica Senenſi Alexandro VI. Pont. Max. ſuæ civitatis nomine gratulatum miſſus in prima propè oratione, quam illi Angelus Politianus dictaverat, defecit, quod ubi Pontifex deprehendit, manum ſublevans ſatis ſibi notam viri virtutem eſſe dixit, eùmque Advocati Conſiſtorialis titulo honeſtavit. Idem iterum illi Venetiis contigit, ubi dum apud Auguſtinum Barbadium Reipublicæ Principem dicere conatur, excidentibus quæ antea excogitaverat, nihil exprimere potuit (8). - - - - By the weakneſs of his memory, he failed twice in his ſpeech. Once, when ſent by his Republic to congratulate Pope Alexander VI,

(1) Æneas Silvius, Epiſt. cxii, lib. i, apud Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. iii, cap. xxxv, p. m. 458.

(2) Pius II, was of the family Piccolomini.

(3) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, p. 457.

† Corraſ. lib. iii, miſcell. cap. xvi.

‡ Tiraquell. in 2 l. connubia glo. 1. part. 2. n. 25. Æneas Sylvius, de dictis & factis Alfonſi Regis, lib. iii, cap. xxvii.

(4) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. pag. 457.

(5) Eo provectus eſt ut patrem ſuperaverit. Panzirol. ibid. lib. ii, cap. cxxvi, pag. 276.

(6) Taken from Panzirolus, ubi ſupra, p. 275, & ſeq.

(7) Id. ibid. p. 279.

(8) Id. ibid. p. 280.

‘ he ſtopped almoſt in the beginning of his oration, which ‘ Angelus Politianus dictated; this, when the Pontif per- ‘ ceived, lifting up his hand, he ſaid, that he ſufficiently ‘ knew the ability of the man; and honoured him with ‘ the title of a Conſiſtorial Advocate. The ſame thing hap- ‘ pened to him another time at Venice, where, when he ‘ was endeavouring to make a ſpeech before Auguſtinus ‘ Barbadius, the Doge of that Republic, forgetting what ‘ he had deſigned to deliver, he could not expreſs any ‘ thing.’ His conſultations, and thoſe of his father, have been collected into four volumes (9). Beſides, eath of them wrote ſeveral other books that are printed.

SOCINUS (MARIANUS) grand-ſon of the foregoing (a), was not leſs famous than his grand-father in the profeſſion of the law. He was born at Siena the twenty-fifth of March 1482, and having taken his degree of Doctor of the Civil-law at Siena at twenty-one years of age, he taught that ſcience there for ſeveral years, after which he was called to Piſa, where he taught it ſeven years. He was recalled to Siena, from whence at a year's end he went to Padua to be profeſſor of the ſame ſcience. From that place he removed to Bologna (b), to fill up the chair that was vacant by the return of Alciatus to Pavia in the year 1540. The penſions and privileges beſtowed upon him, at Bologna, were ſo conſiderable, that he would not leave it, though he had very great offers made him in ſeveral other univerſities. He married Camilla Salvetta at Siena, and loſt her after he had been married forty-ſix years. Having been uſed for a long time to lie with a woman, he could not be without one; he gave up himſelf to incontinency [A], whereby he got ſome diſtempers, which proved ſo troubleſome to him, that at laſt the violence of the remedies he uſed, conſumed his ſtrength, and occaſioned his death the nineteenth of Auguſt 1556 (c). If we believe Panzirolus (d), he had thirteen children (e), two of which only, viz. CELSUS and PHILIP out-lived him. Celſus who was profeſſor of the Canon-law at Bologna, obtained there the profeſſorſhip of the Civil-law after his father's death, and left it. Panzirolus ſhould have known that Marianus left behind him a third ſon, called LELIUS SOCINUS, the firſt author of the Socinian ſect [B]. ALEXANDER SOCINUS ſon of the ſame Marianus, and [A] He gave up himſelf to incontinency.] I will expreſs it in the words of Panzirolus. Apud eos (Bononienſes) Camillam uxorem LXIII annum agentem amiſit, quicum annis XLVI vixerat. Poſtea uxori aſſuetus parum continenter vixiſſe dicitur; unde contracto morbo non ſemel ægrotavit, ac demum dum præſentaneis remediis ſibi mederi conatur, potentium pharmacorum vi oppreſſus LXXIV. ætatis anno deceſſit (1).

[B] He left behind him a third ſon called LÆLIUS SOCINUS, the firſt author of the Socinian ſect.] He was born at Siena in the year 1525 (2). Being deſigned for the Civil-law by his father, he began early to look for the foundations of that ſcience in the word of God; and by that ſtudy he came to diſcover that the church of Rome taught many things contrary to revelation. Deſiring to dive more and more into the true ſenſe of the holy Scripture, he ſtudied the Greek and the Hebrew, and even Arabic, and quickly left Italy to go into a Proteſtant country. Fear contributed alſo to his removing; for he knew that private opinions in matters of religion were not tolerated in his country. He began to travel in the year 1547, and ſpent four years in going thro' France, England, the Netherlands, Germany, and Poland; and then he ſettled at Zurich. He made himſelf known to the moſt learned men of that time, who expreſſed their eſteem for him in their letters to him: but having diſcovered, by the doubts he propoſed to them, that he ſuffered himſelf to be infected with the poiſon of the Arian or Photinian hereſy, he made himſelf very much ſuſpected. Calvin gave him very good advice about it in the year 1552. ‘ Quod pridem teſtatus ſum, ſerio iterum moneo, niſi ‘ hunc quærendi pruritum mature corrigas, metuendum ‘ eſſe, ne tibi gravia tormenta accerſas (3). - - - - What ‘ I formerly repreſented to you, I now again put you in ‘ mind of, that unleſs you in time reſtrain that itch of in- ‘ quiry, it is to be feared, you will bring upon yourſelf ‘ grievous troubles.’ Socinus making a good uſe of that advice, and more ſtill of Servetus's execution, took care not to diſcover his thoughts but in a proper time and place, and behaved himſelf ſo dexterouſly, that he lived among the mortal enemies of his opinions, without being in the leaſt injured by them. An example, that is propoſed in his nephew's life to thoſe, who expoſe themſelves raſhly to martyrdom, being ſometimes more greedy of a great reputation, than truly zealous for truth. ‘ Sciant, quos nimia veri libertas ‘ in pericula ſæpe intempeſtiva præcipitat, ipſam illam, ‘ quam propugnant, veritatem in circumſpecta pru- ‘ dentiæ lenitate, quam in effreni zelo plus habere ‘ præſidii. Ut qui ultro ſuis diſcriminibus occurrunt, ‘ magis ad privatam laudem, quam ad publici emolu- ‘ menti rationem feſtinare videantur (4). - - - Let them ‘ know, whom too great liberty in ſpeaking unſeaſonably ‘ the truth oftentimes throws into dangers unexpected, that ‘ what they maintain, is better advanced, by a circum- ‘ ſpect prudential meekneſs, than by a headſtrong zeal. ‘ And thoſe who of their own accord go to meet the danger ‘ ſeem more to haſten to their own glory, than to regard ‘ the public good.’ He found ſome diſciples, who reſpectfully heard his inſtructions: they were Italians, who wandred up and down in Germany and Poland. He alſo communicated his errors to his relations by ſome writings he ſent to them at Siena. He took a journey into Poland after his father's death (5), and obtained from the king ſome letters of recommendation to the Doge of Venice, and the Duke of Florence, that he might be ſafe at Venice all the time his affairs ſhould require his ſtay there; for he intended to poſſeſs himſelf of his father's eſtate, and to ſettle the matter with his relations. It was about the year 1558, that he travelled into Poland. Circa annum 1558, & 1559, literis Poloniæ atque Bohemiæ Regum muniri voluit, ut ſecurius in urbe Veneta cum amicis de patrimonio agere poſſet. Tunc profecto patuit apud pleroſque Germaniæ atque Poloniæ proceres, ipſoſque adeo Reges, quantum is gratia potuerit. Summis enim ſtudiis in ejus cauſa apud Ludovicum Priulum Venetiarum, atque Coſmum Hetruriæ Duces certatum eſt (6). His family was diſperſed at that time: they were ſuſpected of Hereſy: his brother Camillus was impriſoned; ſome others fled away, and his nephew Fauſtus was one of them. Lælius returned into Swiſſerland, and died at Zurich in May 1562. Fauſtus was then at Lyons, and ſet out immediately when he heard that his uncle was dead. He arrived at Zurich before any of Lælius's papers had been conveyed away; he took poſſeſſion of them, and made uſe of them afterwards (7).

Some other circumſtances are to be found in the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum. LÆLIUS SOCINUS, born in the year 1525, began to confer about matters of religion in the year 1546, with above forty perſons. They privately met in the territory of the Venetians (8), and brought into queſtion particularly the myſtery of the Trinity; and of Chriſt's ſatisfaction. Ochinus, Valentinus Gentilis, and Paul Aciatus, aſſiſted at thoſe conferences. They were diſcovered: ſome of thoſe innovators were apprehended, and condemned to death; the reſt fled away. The Chronology of that author is not right, for Ochinus left Italy about the year 1542. Zanchius ſays, that Lælius Socinus endeavoured to infect him with his heretical notions, not by maintaining them in expreſs words, but propoſing them as doubts, and by way of a diſpute. He adds, that and father of FAUSTUS SOCINUS, of whom I am going to ſpeak, died very young, and with the reputation of a learned Civilian [C]. We have ſome works of his

---

(9) Printed at Venice in 1579.

(a) He was the ſon of ALEXANDER SOCINUS, the ſon of Marianus. To diſtinguiſh thoſe two Marianus's, the firſt is ſirnamed Senior, and the ſecond Junior.

(b) See, above, remark [G], of the article ALCIATUS (ANDREW), the reputation he there acquired.

(c) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. ii, cap. clxii, pag. 338, & ſeq.

(d) Ibid. p. 341.

(e) Panzirolus having ſaid that they were ten ſons, and three daughters, calls them all Filios a little after.

(1) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. pag. 341.

(2) Bibliotheca Antitrinitar. pag. 18.

(3) See the Life of Fauſtus Socinus, prefixed to the firſt volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

(4) Ibid.

(5) His father as I have ſaid before, died at Bologna, in the year 1556.

(6) Vita Fauſti Socini, pag. 2.

(7) Taken from the Life of Fauſtus Socinus.

(8) Circa annum 1546, inſtituerat cum ſociis ſuis itidem Italis, quorum numerus quadragenarium excedebat, in Veneta, ditione, collegia colloquiaque de religione, in quibus potiſſimum, &c. Biblioth. Antitrinit. pag. 18.

father

that Lælius underſtood very well Greek and Hebrew, and was a man of an unblameable life. ‘ Fuit is Lælius, nobili honeſtaque familia natus: bene Græcè & Hebraicè doctus; vitæque etiam externæ inculpatæ: quarum rerum cauſa mihi quoque interceſſerat cum illo non vulgaris amicitia; ſed homo fuit plenus diverſarum hæreſium: quas tamen mihi nunquam proponebat, niſi diſputandi cauſa: & ſemper interrogans, quaſi cuperet doceri (9). - - - - This Lælius was deſcended of a noble and honourable family: well learnt in Greek and Hebrew; and alſo of an unblamable outward life: wherefore there was betwixt us a more than ordinary friendſhip; but he was a man full of Hereſies: which yet he never propoſed to me, but by way of diſpute: and always aſking queſtions, as deſiring to be informed.’ It is certain, that when Zanchius wrote thoſe words, Lælius had compoſed a paraphraſe upon the firſt chapter of St John's Goſpel full of Photinianiſm (10). The ſame Lelius wrote a dialogue in 1554, againſt the book publiſhed by Calvin, to ſhew that Heretics ought to be puniſhed with death. Calvinus and Vaticanus are the interlocutors of that dialogue (11): ſome aſcribe it to Caſtalio; but others, as Cloppenburg (12) and Hoornbeek (13) aſcribe it to Lælius Socinus. He is ſaid alſo to be the author of the book, intituled, de Hæreticis capitali ſupplicio non afficiendis, that was publiſhed (14) under the fictitious name of Minus Celſus Senenſis, and there is more reaſon to aſcribe it to him, than to Fauſtus Socinus. Some pretend that Lælius is the author of a book, intituled, Martini Bellii Dialogus Lælius de Hæreticis gladio coërcendis, publiſhed againſt Calvin, and they endeavour to prove it againſt Placcius by the teſtimony of the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (15). Obſerve, that Placcius aſcribes that dialogue to Caſtalio, and refers us to Calvin's Life, where Beza boaſts of having confuted that book of Caſtalio (16); but it is certain Beza makes no mention there of a piece, intituled, Dialogus Lælius. He only ſpeaks of a Farrago, which he aſcribes to Caſtalio, and againſt which he wrote a book. What he calls Farrago, is intituled, De Hæreticis, an ſint perſequendi, & omnino quomodo ſit cum eis agendum, Luteri & Brentii, aliorumque multorum tum veterum tum recentiorum ſententiæ. Liber hoc tam turbulento tempore perneceſſarius, & cùm omnibus, tum potiſſimum principibus & magiſtratibus utiliſſimus, ad diſcendum, quodnam ſit eorum in re tam controverſa, tamque periculoſa, officium; and contains the following pieces, MARTINI BELLII præfatio, in qua quid ſit hæreticus, & quidnam cum eo agendum ſit, demonſtratur. MARTINI LUTERI ſententia, in qua apertè oſtenditur, hæreticorum punitionem ad magiſtratum non pertinere. JOANNIS BRENTII de Anabaptiſtis, & cæteris qui hæretici habentur, ſententia, quæ idem docet. Aliorum authorum, tum veterum, tum recentiorum, eadem de re ſententiæ. Baſilii Montfortii refutatio eorum, quæ pro perſecutione dici ſolent. We may obſerve another ſmall error in Mr Placcius; for he refers us to a book of Hoornbeek (17), wherein he only mentions the dialogue between Calvinus and Vaticanus. A learned German whom I have quoted (18), alledges this teſtimony of Placcius, and does not rectify it: he alſo alledges Mr Teiſſier, who only ſays in page 238, of the firſt volume of his additions to the elogies taken from Thuanus, that Caſtalio is the author of a book publiſhed under the name of Martin Bellius, in which he endeavours to prove that Heretics ought not to be puniſhed. Thus here are two authors quoted, the laſt of which does not ſay what is imputed to him, and the other is miſtaken: but let us ſee whether the objection raiſed againſt the latter is a ſolid one. It is objected againſt Placcius, that Martini Bellii Dialogus Lælius de Hæreticis gladio coercendis, is aſcribed to Lælius Socinus in the Bibliotheque of the Antitrinitarians. Verum in Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum . . . . pag. LXIV, & XX. ille tractatus Lælio Socino tribuitur, allegata in hanc ſententiam auctoritate Johannis Cloppenburgii & Hoornbeekii (19). Conſult the 64th page of that Bibliotheque, and you will find that it is thought Lælius Socinus Senenſis took the name of Minus Celſus Senenſis in a book, De Hæreticis non capitali ſupplicio afficiendis. Conſult the 20th page, and you will find that the dialogues between Calvinus and Vaticanus, wherein it is aſſerted that the power of the ſword ought not to be extended to Heretics, is aſcribed to Lælius Socinus by Cloppenburg and Hoornbeek. I need not ſay that there is little exactneſs in this account. As for what concerns the other writings of Socinus, the uncle, ſee the ſame Bibliotheque.

I muſt not forget a paſſage of Hoornbeek quoted in it, which teſtifies the eſteem that Melanchthon had conceived for Lælius Socinus. That paſſage will confirm what has been ſaid above of Lælius's deſign to take a journey to Venice. ‘ Uti Zanchium, quamdiu cum eo viveret, mirifice fefellit Lælius; ſimiliter bono viro Philippo Melanthoni, quocum triennium exegit familiariter, adeo impoſuit, ut Philippus pro eo tanquam optimo viro a. cIↄ Iↄ lvii. interceſſerit tum ad Imp. Maximilianum II. tum ad Poloniæ regem Sigiſmundum, ut horum nomine Lælius Legati vicem Venetiis obire, eaque ratione paternam hæreditatem, ſibi ob conſuetudinem cum Proteſtantibus in Germaniâ, intercluſam adire tutius poſſet (20). - - - As Lælius wonderfully deceived Zanchius, ſo long as he lived with him; in like manner he ſo impoſed on the good man Philip Melanchthon, with whom he paſſed three years in a familiar manner, that Melanchthon interceeded for him, as for a deſerving perſon, both with the Emperor Maximilian II, and with Sigiſmund, King of Poland, that Lælius might execute in their name an embaſſy to the Venetians, and by that means more ſafely get poſſeſſion of his paternal inheritance, detained from him becauſe of his familiarity with the German Proteſtants.’ Father Maimbourg has committed ſome faults, which ought to be obſerved. Lælius Socinus, ſays he (21), and Matthew Gribaldus, came to Gentilis in Poland. He had been ſaying, that Gentilis being ſent for by Blandrata, went into Poland, after he had privately left Geneva. Now you muſt know, that Gentilis having left Geneva, ſome time after he had made l'amende honorable on the ſecond of September 1558, acted ſo many parts before he went into Poland (22), that it is probable he went not thither till about the year 1560. The Socinian Hiſtorians place that Journey in the year 1562, or in the year 1563 (23), and therefore he did not make it with Lælius Socinus; for the latter was in Poland about the year 1558 (24). Maimbourg adds, that as Gentilis and Lælius Socinus were returning thro' Germany and Swiſſerland into Italy, teaching their Doctrine every where, Socinus died at Baſil, and Gentilis was apprehended by the magiſtrates of Berne (25). But we may remember that Socinus died at Zurich the ſixteenth of May 1562, and Gentilis did not leave Poland till the year 1566.

[C] ALEXANDER SOCINUS . . . . father of FAUSTUS SOCINUS . . . . died very young, and with the reputation of a learned Civilian.] He was admitted Doctor of the Civil-law at Siena in 1530. He had before maintained, during five days at Padua, and during two days at Siena, three hundred theſes with great ſucceſs. After he had been made Doctor he explained the Inſtitutes in his native country, and then he was called to Padua to be profeſſor in ordinary. The quarrels, that aroſe between him and the other profeſſors, obliged him to return to Siena, where he continued to read publick lectures. He went to Macerata in the year 1540, to teach the Civil-law in the univerſity lately founded there, where he died the twenty-ſixth of April 1541 (26). He had married Agnes Petrucci daughter of Burgeſio Petrucci, and of Victoria Piccolomini. This Petrucci having ſucceeded his father Pandolphus, who had been the head of the Republic of Siena, could not keep his poſt long: he was driven from it by a contrary faction, and died ſoon after. Victoria Piccolomini his widow, ſiſter, niece, or couſin to many great lords, bore that misfortune with great conſtancy, and lived fifty-ſix years after the death of her huſband, in the conſtant practice of the virtues moſt eſſential to her ſex. Her daughter, brought up by ſuch a mother, anſwered her education, and was married to Alexander Socinus a young man of great parts (27). Theſe are the father and mother of Fauſtus Socinus. Relicta vidua Victoria animum, quem in prioris faſtigii ſplendore nunquam ſuſtulerat, tam iniqua rerum viciſſitudine frangi non permiſit. Itaque annis quinquaginta ſex, quibus mariti vitæ & communi fortunæ ſuperfuit, ſingulari

---

(9) Zanchius, in Præfat. Libri de tribus Elohim, apud Bibl. Antitrinit. pag. 19.

(10) He wrote it in the year 1561. Biblioth. Antitrin. pag. 21.

(11) It was reprinted in Holland in the year 1612, with ſome other pieces of the ſame nature. The year following it was printed in Dutch in the ſame country. Ibid. pag. 20.

(12) In Præfat. Compendioli Socinianiſmi confutati.

(13) In Summa Controverſ.

(14) In the Bibl. Antitrinitarior. pag. 21, the ſecond edition of that work is placed in the year 1584. But Placcius, de Pſeudon. pag. 176, mentions an edition in 1577, Chriſtlingæ, in 8*vo. which probably is not the firſt.*

(15) Joh. Albertus Faber, Decad. num. 25.

(16) Placcius, de Pſeudonymis, pag. 161.

(17) Summa Controverſ. pag. 563, of the ſecond edition, and 442 of the firſt.

(18) Joh. Albertus Faber. His Decas Decadum, was printed in 1689.

(19) Joh. Albertus Faber, ubi ſupra, num. 25.

(20) Hoornbeek, Summa Controverſ. lib. vii, pag. 442, Edit. 1653.

(21) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de l'Arianiſme, book xii, Tom. iii, pag. 351, 352, Dutch Edit.

(22) See his article.

(23) See the article ALCIATUS (JOHN PAUL) remark [A].

(24) See the Life of Fauſtus Socinus, pag. ii.

(25) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de l'Arianiſme, Tom. iii, pag. 361.

(26) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. p. 341.

(27) Alexander ſubtilitatum & pater ejus Marianus Junior Juriſconſultorum principes vocati ſunt. Vita Fauſti Socini, initio.

father [D].

ſingulari modeſtia & ſpectata integritate ac pudicitia vidui ſtatus ſolitudinem toleravit. Filiam Agnetam, quam, ut tanto genere dignum erat, ſanctiſſimis moribus imbuerat, Alexandro Socino in matrimonium dedit, patricio quidem juveni, ſed tamen privato. Is fuit Fauſti noſtri pater (28). Had Panzirolus known how Fauſtus Socinus turned his ſtudies, he would not have uſed the following words. ‘ Ex eo (Alexandro) & Agnete ex Burgheſia Pandulfi Petruccii Senarum Principis nepte natus, fauſtus præclari ingenii Juvenis parentum veſtigia ſecuturus eſſe ſperatur (29). - - - - Fauſtus Socinus, ſon of Alexander Socinus and Agnes Petrucci, a youth of an excellent diſpoſition, gave hopes that he would follow the footſteps of his parents.’

[D] We have ſome works of Marianus Socinus.] The catalogue of the Bodleian library mentions a Conſilium in materia monetaria, printed at Cologne in the year 1591. He is ſaid to be the author of Bartolus's diſtinctions, printed at Venice in the year 1564, and we are told that his conſultations furniſhed materials for the book of the common opinions of the Doctors, publiſhed by one Muſculus (30).

SOCINUS (Faustus) grand-ſon of the foregoing, and the chief founder of a very ill ſect that goes by his name, and which, notwithſtanding the perſecutions, hath flouriſhed a conſiderable time in Poland [A], was born at Siena the fifth of December 1539. He ſtudied but little in his youth; he only had a tincture of Claſſical learning, and learned only the elements of Logic. The letters his uncle Lelius did write to his relations,

[A] A ſect . . . which notwithſtanding the perſecutions, hath flouriſhed a conſiderable time in Poland.] Sigiſmund Auguſtus granted liberty of conſcience to the ſects which forſook the Church of Rome. They made no ſeparate bodies at firſt; but when the Evangelics came to know the opinions of the Unitarians, they would no longer communicate with them; which occaſioned two different communions. That rupture began at Cracow by the care of Gregory Pauli. The Unitarians had ſeveral churches in Poland and Lithuania, ſome in the great towns (1), and others in the country-ſeats of gentlemen. They eſtabliſhed their metropolis at Racovia, in the Leſſer Poland. There they had a yearly ſynod, there they erected a college, and ſet up a printing-houſe. Some Catholics ſent their children to that college; and ſome joined with thoſe heretics. Some Proteſtants did the ſame, and a vaſt number of books came out of the printing-houſe of Racovia, and were diſperſed in foreign countries. This proſperity was interrupted in 1638; for ſome ſcholars of the college of Racovia having broke a wooden croſs ſet up in a high-way, the Diet of Warſaw ordered that the college ſhould be demoliſhed, the Church of Racovia ſhut up, the printing-houſe of the Unitarians deſtroyed, and the miniſters and teachers baniſhed (2). This was executed. Some time after the Judges of Lublin deſtroyed the church of Kiſelin, and that of Bereſc in Volhinia, under pretence that the miniſters of Racovia, and the teachers of the college, had fled thither. The Diet of the year 1647 baniſhed Jonas Slichtingius for publiſhing a book intituled, Confeſſio Chriſtiana, and that book was burnt by the hands of the executioner. But, notwithſtanding theſe misfortunes, the Unitarians performed their religious exerciſes in many places of that kingdom, till the year 1658. They were then expelled upon pretence that ſome of them had put themſelves under the protection of the King of Sweden, who had conquered the greateſt part of Poland. However that reaſon was not alledged in the edict of baniſhment; for they were afraid of offending the Swedes, who had ſtipulated a general amneſty for all the ſubjects of the King of Poland, who adhered to them during the invaſion. Their baniſhment was only grounded upon their doctrine: they pretended, that in order, to draw God's bleſſing upon the kingdom, it was neceſſary to baniſh thoſe, who denied the eternal Divinity of the Son of God. They were therefore ordered to depart from it upon pain of death: all their eſtates were confiſcated, all perſons were forbidden upon the ſame penalty, to give them any aſſiſtance, or any mark of affection in their exile (3). Quum Sueci Poloniam invaſiſſent, & pleraque ejus loca occupaſſent, ita ut & provinciæ multæ miſſis legatis Regi Suecorum ut victori ſeſe ſubjicerent, & exercitus ipſi cum Ducibus ſuis eidem ſeſe addicerent, quia ex Unitariis nonnulli etiam ad Suecorum patrocinium & protectionem confugerant, quamvis multi eorum nullam cum Suecis inirent ſocietatem, poſt Suecorum diſceſſum, omnes ii quos Arianos vocant, publica regni conſtitutione, 1658 non prætextu perduellionis, ne Sueci, qui per tractatus amneſtiam iis qui ipſis adhæſerant pacti ſunt, offenderentur, ſed directe ob religionem, ob id quod Jeſu Filii Dei prææternam, quam vocant, Deitatem non agnoſcant, extorres acti ſunt, ut ſcilicet Deus hiſce blaſphemis amotis, omnia proſpera iſti regno tribueret: ita ut niſi patria excederent, accuſati pœna capitali ſubjicerentur: bona quoque eorum fiſco publico ſunt applicata (4): & vetitum ne quiſquam eos ullo modo juvare, vel extra ſolum patrium exſulantes, aliquo benignitatis ac benevolentiæ indicio proſequi audeat, alioqui eidem cum ipſis pœnæ obnoxius futurus (5). The Socinians never recovored of that ſevere blow: they diſperſed themſelves as well as they could in Tranſylvania, Sileſia, Pruſſia, &c. There is a great fault in thoſe Latin words, for they intimate a great falſity, viz. That the eſtates of the Unitarians were confiſcated; and they ſay nothing of their being permitted to ſtay two years in the kingdom to ſettle their affairs. It is an uſual thing for thoſe, who complain of their ſufferings, to ſuppreſs whatever might make their perſecution look leſs violent than it was. And therefore in order to repreſent the true ſtate of the thing, I muſt give another account of it contained in the following paſſage. ‘ As during the laſt war of the Swedes in Poland, it was found out that the Arians, or Socinians intending to raiſe themſelves upon the ruins of the ſtate, kept intelligence with Ragotſki Prince of Tranſylvania, who had attacked that kingdom at the ſame time; the Catholic Lords, in the general Diet of Warſaw, in the year 1658, took hold of that opportunity to exterminate out of Poland that abominable Hereſy, which might bring ſtill greater calamities upon the ſtate, that had not been far from ruin. The Lutheran and Calviniſt deputies, who were in that Diet, being apprehenſive that a law enacted againſt thoſe Heretics might be a precedent againſt themſelves, and that in time they would be treated in the ſame manner, joined together in order to oppoſe it. But becauſe their number was very ſmall, if compared with the Catholics, and they were not deprived of their liberty, and beſides they did not love the Arians, having more than once before demanded that they ſhould not be tolerated in Poland, a law was at laſt enacted, with a common conſent, againſt Arianiſm; and the Arians and Socinians comprehended under the ſame name, were obliged to abjure their hereſy, or to depart the kingdom within two years, which were allowed them to ſell their eſtates. That law, which was afterwards confirmed in the other general Diets, was none of thoſe that loſe by degrees the force that was given them in the heat of a zeal conceived from time to time againſt public diſorders. It was executed, and is ſo to this day (6).’

Leſt any one ſhould think that the Jeſuit Maimbourg has given an unfair account, to praiſe the King and the States of Poland for having obſerved a kind of moderation, I muſt acquaint the reader that ſome Socinian writers (7) ſay, that the edict of the year 1658, allowed them three years to ſell their eſtates, and that afterwards one of thoſe three years was taken from them; ſo that the 10th of July 1660, was the day appointed for their departure (8). There is hardly any thing more lamentable than the deſcription they make of the miſeries they were expoſed to from the year 1648, till they left Poland. They ſuffered a thouſand inſults during the two years allowed them; they could not ſell their eſtates but at a very low rate; their miſery was aggravated by all ſorts of artifices.

---

(28) Ibid.

(29) Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. p. 342.

(30) Scripſit diſtinctiones Bartoli, quas Venetiis A. MDLXIV edidit, & Socino vindicavit, Simon Schardius. Etiam ex ejus conſiliis collecta ſunt communes Doctorum opiniones, editæ ab Eraſmo Muſculo Hanojenſe. Hoornbeek, Apparatu ad Socinian. Controverſ. pag. 50.

(1) Such as Cracow, Lublin, and Novogrod.

(2) I ſhall quote an author in the remark [L], who denies that all thoſe things were contained in the decree of the Diet.

(3) Taken from the perface to the firſt volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

(4) This is only to be underſtood of thoſe effects which they could not ſell in the time allowed them.

(5) The ſame preface, pag. *2.

(6) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de l'Arianiſme, lib. xii, pag. 375, 376. of the ivth Tom. Dutch edition.

(7) See the two Letters printed at the end of the Hiſtoria Reformationis Polonicæ, pag. 278. & ſeq.

(8) Ibid. pag. 294.

relations, whereby they and their wives had imbibed many ſeeds of hereſy (a), made an impreſſion upon him; ſo that knowing himſelf not innocent he fled away as the reſt, when the inquiſition began to perſecute that family. He was at Lyons when he heard of his uncle's death, and immediately ſet out to take poſſeſſion of all the writings of the deceaſed. He returned into Italy, and became ſo acceptable to the Great Duke, that the charms of the court, and the honourable employments beſtowed upon him, hindered him for the ſpace of twelve years from remembring that he had been looked upon as the man, who was to put the laſt hand to the ſyſtem of the Samoſatenian Theology, which his uncle Lælius had begun. At laſt, the ſearch after the Goſpel truths appearing to him more valuable than the delights of a court life, he voluntarily left his country, and went into Germany in the year 1574, nor would he hearken to any perſuaſions to return, though he was deſired to do it by the Great Duke. He ſtayed three years at Baſil, where he ſtudied Divinity with great application; and having embraced a doctrine very different from that of the Proteſtants, he reſolved to maintain and ſpread it; and in order to it, he wrote a book de Jeſu Chriſto Servatore [B]. He diſputed at Zurich with Francis Puccius, in the beginning of the year 1578. The differences occaſioned by the ill doctrine of Francis David, about the honours and the power of the Son of GOD, cauſed a great diſturbance in the churches of Tranſilvania. Blandrata, a man of great authority in thoſe churches, and at court, ſent for Socinus, whom he took to be a perſon well qualifyed to pacify thoſe troubles. He lodged him in the ſame houſe with Francis David; but the latter would not be undeceived, and maintained his opinion ſo openly and ſo boldly, that he was impriſoned. He died ſoon after; and Socinus was ill ſpoken of upon that account, though it is affirmed he had no hand in the counſels that were given to the Prince of Tranſilvania, to oppreſs Francis David. He retired into Poland in the year 1579, and deſired to be admitted into the communion of the Unitarians; but becauſe he differed from them in ſome points, and would not be ſilent,

he

(a) Hos inter quoque, ſuggerendæ veritatis mirus artifex Lælius, ejus ſemina ſparſerat, eaque longis licet terrarum ſpatiis diviſus, tam efficaci ſtudio fovebat, ut nonnullorum uxores ignotus adhuc & abſens in partes traxerit. Vita Fauſti Socini, pag. 2.

artifices. They do not forget the open infraction of perpetual and irrevocable edicts, and of the royal oaths, by virtue of which, they had been unmoleſted near one hundred years: much leſs do they forget to obſerve, that the Clergy moved the States of the kingdom to ſuch an infraction, and King John Caſimir to break the oath he had taken ten years before. ‘Cœpit id primum odium Theologicum & furor vulgi; vis deinde confecit ſacerdotalis occupata authoritate Comitiorum, reſciſſis, projectis, ſpretis, pro omnium Diſſidentium pace ac ſecuritate, quâ annis admodum centum gaviſi ſumus inviolati, ſeveriſſimis legibus, graviſſimis ſtatutis, pactis, fœderibus, promiſſis quæ omnium ordinum ſanctiſſimo ſcito & conceptiſſimo Regum, hujus nominatim & quidem ter repetito jurejurando, ſæpè & nuperrimè erant religioſiſſimè & ampliſſimè renovata, aſſerta, atque confirmata; ut vim juris obtinerent inviolabilis atque æterni (9). - - - - It was begun firſt by the hatred of the clergy and the fury of the vulgar; and after carried on and compleated by the violent rage of the prieſts, who prevailed both with the Diets to diſannul, diſregard, and deſtroy the moſt expreſs, important, ſacred promiſes, laws, and ordinances made for the peace and ſecurity of all diſſenters in religion, which we enjoyed for near a century of years unviolated; and, with our kings, to break the moſt expreſs and ſolemn oaths, and our preſent king in particular his oath thrice renewed, and moſt religiouſly and amply confirmed; which ſhould have had the force of an eternal and inviolable law.’ Two pages after, they ſet down the oath taken by the king, in 1648, and then they ſay (10): ‘Decimo poſt anno, octavo videlicet quinquageſimo menſe eodem, Papali plerique faſcino incantati, Ordines Regni, ac fidei ſuæ, honoris ac conſcientiæ religioſiſſimis nexibus obligatæ turpiter obliti, perculſis qui rectè ſentiebant violentis clamoribus & minaci turba, Sanctiſſimam & Saluberrimam pacis legem, tot Comitiorum cautionibus, pactis, fœderibus, ſtipulationibus, tot Regum à Sigiſmundo Auguſto continua ſerie ſuccedentium, publicis Sacramentis firmiſſimè conſtitutam, & nuper adeo tam ſollicitè ac ſolemniter conſtabilitam nobiſcum, proſcribunt, noſque hoc feriunt, & natali ſolo exterminant diro decreto. - - - Ten years after, namely the fifty-eighth year, in the ſame month, the eſtates of the kingdom, moſt of them by a Papal faſcination, baſely forgetting their faith given, with the ſacred ties of honour and conſcience, and the ſounder part overborn by the violent clamours and threats of the rabble, diſannul and aboliſh the moſt ſacred and wholeſome law of peace, moſt firmly eſtabliſhed by ſo many proviſions, promiſes, laws, obligations of general Diets, and aſſured by the public ſolemn oaths of ſo many kings by an uninterrupted ſucceſſion from Sigiſmond Auguſtus; and but lately carefully and ſolemnly confirmed to us; and by this terrible decree, they proſcribe and drive us from our native country.’ In order to know the vexations they were under before the revocation of the edicts, you need only read the Latin paſſage I am going to quote. It will appear from it, that the King and the Republic of Poland ſtruck many blows one after another, before they came to the laſt extremities. France took the ſame courſe (11) againſt the Proteſtants. It appears alſo from the ſame paſſage, that the Unitarians aſcribed all the calamities of Poland to the perſecution which the ſects, ſeparated from the Church of Rome, had ſuffered in that kingdom, contrary to the faith of edicts. ‘Poloniam deinde infauſto omine commemorant, patriam noſtram; quæ dum non tantum nobis, ſed etiam Evangelicis, & aliis, contra jurisjurandi & fœderum fidem, templa adimit, exercendæ religionis libertatem labefactat, & variis preſſuris ob diverſum in ſacris ſenſum, infeſtam ſeſe præbet; vindicem Dei manum in ſe provocavit, & iis ſeſe cladibus & calamitatibus involvit, quarum necdum finem videmus ullum: quæ quamdiu ſartam tectam cuivis ſervavit conſcientiæ & religionis libertatem, altiſſima pace, & omnium bonorum felicitate cumulata floruit; ſed ubi vinculum illud, æquali lege omnes de rebus divinis diſſentientes continens, ſolvi cœpit, omnia

In pejus ruere, & retro ſublapſa referri (12).

‘- - - - Then they mention Poland, our country, with an unlucky omen; which, while it takes away the churches and liberty of religion, not only from us, but alſo the Proteſtants and others, contrary to the faith of oaths and covenants, and oppreſſes us with manifold injuries, becauſe of our different ſentiments in matters of religion, hath provoked the avenging hand of GOD againſt it ſelf, and incurred theſe deſtructions and calamities, of which we can yet ſee no end: ſo long as it preſerved to every one their liberty of conſcience and religion, it flouriſhed in profound peace and plenty of all bleſſings; but when that bond, which by an impartial and juſt law comprehended all that have different ſentiments about religion, began to be diſſolved, all things grew worſe, and tended towards utter deſtruction.’ Thus they ſpeak in a writing which they preſented to the States of the province of Holland in the year 1654.

[B] A book de Jeſu Chriſto Servatore.] Therein he diſputes againſt a miniſter of Paris (13), who being come to Baſil, in his way to Francfort, lodged in the ſame

(9) Hiſtor. Reformat. Polonicæ, pag. 290.

(10) Ibid. pag. 293.

(11) That is before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685.

(12) Apologia pro Veritate accuſata, adverſus Edictum Ordinum Hollandiæ, pag. 40.

(13) Called James Couet. He has been miniſter of the French Church at Baſil: See above the remark [E] of the article ROTAN.

he met with a repulſe. Nevertheleſs, he ceaſed not to write in favour of their churches againſt their enemies. The book he wrote againſt James Paleologus afforded his enemies a pretence to exaſperate the King of Poland; and yet that book did not at all favour ſedition [C]. But though the bare reading of that book was ſufficient to confute the informers, Socinus thought it expedient to leave Cracow, after he had been there four years, and to take ſanctuary in the houſe of a Poliſh lord (b). He lived above three years under the protection of ſeveral lords of the kingdom, and alſo married a woman of a good family. He loſt her in the year 1587, at which he was extremely afflicted ſame houſe with him. That book was printed in 1595, by a diſciple of the author. Socinus's name was put to it; it was the firſt time his name appeared in his works. ‘ Diſputationem illam edidit poſtmodum Socini amicus & ſequax, Elias Arciſſevius, Polonus, An. MDXCV. præfixo, quod nunquam ante factum in aliis ſcriptis fuerat, Auctoris nomine (14). --- Elias Arciſſevius, a native of Poland, a friend and follower of Socinus, publiſhed afterwards that diſpute, prefixing to it the author's name, which had never been done in his other writings.’ I ſhall ſay by and by (15), why he was ſo long without putting his name to his books.

[C] The book did not at all favour ſedition.] He therein ſo fully condemns the ſubjects who take up arms againſt their prince, and the Proteſtant divines who ſaid that it was lawful to oppoſe thoſe who oppreſſed the liberty of conſcience, that perhaps the greateſt ſticklers for the arbitrary and deſpotical power of ſovereigns never ſpoke more poſitively. He ſpeaks rather like a monk, who let out to hire his pen, to make the Proteſtant Reformation odious, than like an Italian refugee. Theſe are his words: ‘ Veſtris belli gerendi Chriſtiano populo conceſſionibus factum eſt, ut contra ipſum magiſtratum Chriſti nomine gaudens populus arma capere non dubitaverit, vobis non modo aſſentientibus, & approbantibus, verum etiam ſuadentibus, atque impellentibus, & libris præterea editis, id & poſſe, & debere fieri publice conteſtantibus, ac contendentibus. Teſtis eſt hodie eorum quæ dico orbis ipſe terrarum, qui hæc fieri aut vidit, aut certiſſima fama accepit, ſed teſtes potiſſimum ſunt duæ nobiliſſimæ provinciæ Gallia, & Germania inferior, quæ civili ſanguine jam diu madent, atque redundant, eo quod perſuaſum ſit, ex certis quibuſdam cauſis populo, ſeu populi parti, adverſus dominum & principem ſuum Bellum gerere licere. Itaque hac ætate noſtra ab iis, qui Chriſtianos ſe eſſe præ cæteris jactant, per ſpeciem Chriſtianæ Religionis aſſerendæ, id fieri vidimus, quod barbari atque efferati homines facere exhorreſcunt, ut ſcilicet contra proprios reges arma ferant. Et tamen (ſi Deo placet) eos, qui ob prædictam ſive in ipſa acie, ſive alibi ceciderunt, & obtruncati ſunt, in martyrum Chriſti numerum referri, publice audivimus. O ſeculum! Hi nimirum ſunt, ut dixi, veſtrarum belli gerendi conceſſionum fructus. Egregii vos ſcilicet magiſtratuum defenſores eſtis, qui populos contra magiſtratum, id eſt reges ſuos armatis, dum magiſtratu jubente, bello juſte geri poſſe docetis. Rege enim tyranno facto (quod quid ſit, quilibet ſuo modo interpretatur) non regem amplius, ſed populum ipſum, ſive aliquos ex regni proceribus magiſtratum eſſe, vulgus hominum vobis ipſis indicantibus, vel certe annuentibus, contendit, quibus auctoribus, ex veſtra diſciplina, tyrannum illum, ut ipſi putant, ejuſque vim armis repellere, cumque eo aperte bellum gerere non dubitant. Unde quot ingentia mala neceſſario proficiſcantur plus ſatis jam experientia novimus, quæ miſere deplorari magis quam apte verbis explicari poſſunt (16). - - - - By your allowing Chriſtian people to take up arms, it is come to paſs, that people called by the name of Chriſt have not ſcrupled to riſe up in arms againſt their magiſtrates, not only with your conſent and approbation, but alſo by your advice and perſuaſion, and by printed books, publickly declaring and maintaining, that it may and ought to be done. All the world at this day, who have either ſeen or heard that ſuch things are done, can witneſs the truth of what I ſay, but eſpecially two famous countries, viz. France, and Lower Germany, which of a long time have been ſtained and overflowed with civil blood, becauſe they are perſuaded that it is lawful for a people, or a part of them, for certain cauſes, to fight againſt their lord and prince. Wherefore in theſe our days we have ſeen that done by thoſe, who pretend to a greater perfection in Chriſtianity than others, in defence, as they alledge, of religion, which barbarous and ſavage men would abhor; namely, to fight againſt their own kings. And notwithſtanding ſuch as have died on this account, whether in battle, or otherwiſe, have been publickly ranked amongſt martyrs for CHRIST. Theſe are, as I have ſaid, the fruits of your allowing of making war. You are rare defenders of magiſtrates, who arm people againſt their magiſtrates, that is, their kings, whilſt you teach that people may riſe in arms without, and contrary to the command of their magiſtrates. For when a king becomes a tyrant, (and who is a tyrant every one pretends to judge) he is no more king, but the power devolves upon the people themſelves, or ſome of the nobles, according to the opinion of the vulgar taught by you, or at leaſt aſſented to, and that it is lawful to reſiſt him, to repel force by force, and to wage open war againſt him, according to your doctrine. From whence, what prodigious and fatal miſchiefs do neceſſarily ariſe, we are taught by woful experience, which may ſooner be ſadly lamented, than ſufficiently deſcribed by words.’ Hoornbeek having quoted this long paſſage, adds a ſhort confutation to it, and obſerves, among other things (17), that ſuch a malicious reflexion upon the conduct of the Dutch againſt Philip II, might have been alledged by the States-General, when they expelled the Socinians in the year 1598. I wonder that Cocceius, who quotes another paſſage out of that book of Socinus, knew not that this Heretic did particularly condemn the wars of the Dutch againſt Spain. Cocceius's words deſerve to be inſerted here: it appears from them, that in 1654, the Socinians did very much commend the conduct which Socinus had ſo much blamed in 1581. ‘ Socinus contra Palæologum, p. 261, dicit: Ex quo intelligi poteſt, quam præpoſterè ii ſe gerant, qui arma adverſus eos, qui dominantur, capiunt, ut (quemadmodum ajunt ipſi) Dei cultum & religionem tueantur. Ita Socinus A. C. 1581. locutus eſt. Neque eſt, puto, qui credat, eum non harum provinciarum proceres deſignaſſe. Nunc eques laudat ſcilicet Illuſtrium Ordinum pro præſumpta iſta libertate conſcientiæ geſtum bellum, & Deum hanc præclaram Rempublicam elegiſſe dicit, ut illius libertatis, imò licentiæ, ſedes eſſet (18). - - - Socinus writing againſt Palæologus, ſays; Whereby it may be judged how prepoſterouſly thoſe act, who take up arms againſt their governours, that (as they give out) they may defend the worſhip of GOD and religion. Thus ſpoke Socinus in the year 1581. Nor is there any one, I think, who can imagine, that he did not here point out the chiefs of theſe provinces. Now truly the knight commendeth the war carried on by the illuſtrious States for that pretended liberty of conſcience, and ſays, that GOD has choſen this famous Republic to be the ſeat of that liberty, or rather licence.’ But obſerve by the by, that informers are a ſort of men that will do any thing; for Socinus was accuſed to the King of Poland as being the author of a ſeditious libel; and yet Socinus openly condemned in that book all the writers, who ſay that ſubjects may take up arms, and ſet up for judges of this queſtion, Whether a prince is a tyrant or not? ‘ Stephanus tunc Regnum Poloniæ obtinebat. Ejus aures accuſator imbuit ſeditioſi contra Magiſtratum ſcripti criminatione. Indignum eſſe, ſi authore vago atque exuli Italo impune abeat hæc audacia. Libellus contra Palæologum deſignabatur. Qui licet aliud non poſtularet innocentiæ teſtimonium, quam ſui lectionem, declinari tamen periculum placuit (19). - - - - Stephen was at that time King of Poland. He was told by an informer, that a ſeditious writing had been publiſhed againſt governours. That it would not be commendable to let this boldneſs of a vagrant author, an Italian, to go unpuniſhed. The book againſt

(b) Chriſtophorus Morſtinius Pawlikovii Dominus.

(14) Hoornbeek, in Apparatu ad Controverſ. Socinianas, pag. 51.

(15) In the remark [E].

(16) Socin. in Libro de Magiſtratu, adverſ. Paleologum, Part i, pag. 144, 145, apud Hoornbeek, in Apparatu ad Controverſ. Socinianas, pag. 58.

(17) Hoornbeek, ibid. pag. 59.

(18) Cocceius in Examine Apologiæ Equitis Poloni, pag. 141.

(19) Vita Fauſti Socini, fol. : verſo.

afflicted [D]; and to compleat his affliction, he was deprived of the yearly income of his patrimony by the death of Francis de Medicis, Great Duke of Florence [E]. The conſolation he had to ſee his doctrine approved at laſt by many miniſters, was very much diſturbed in 1598; for he received a thouſand inſults at Cracow, and his friends had much ado to reſcue him out of the hands of the mob. He loſt his houſhold-goods, and ſome of his manuſcripts, the loſs of which he extremely lamented [F]. He loſt, among others, that which he had writ againſt the Atheiſts. To avoid the like dangers for the time to come, he retired to a village about nine miles diſtant from Cracow, and he ſpent the remaining part of his life in the houſe of Abraham Blonſki a Poliſh Gentleman (c). He died there the third of March 1604 (d). His ſect was ſo far from dying with him, that it very much increaſed; but ſince it was expelled from Poland in 1658, it is very much decayed and very much diminiſhed as to its viſible ſtate: I expreſs my ſelf ſo, becauſe moſt people are perſuaded that it has made an inviſible progreſs, and grows daily more numerous; and it is thought, conſidering the preſent ſtate of things, that Europe would be amazed to perceive itſelf Socinian in a little time, if potent princes made a public profeſſion of that hereſy, or only ordered that thoſe, who profeſs it, ſhould be freed from the temporal diſadvantages that attend it. It is the opinion of ſeveral people, which makes them uneaſy and alarms them. But others pretend there is nothing to fear, and that princes will never embrace a ſect, which does not approve war, and the exerciſe of magiſtracies [G]. That very thing, ſay they, will always prejudice particular ‘ Palæologus was meant. Which, tho’ it wanted no ‘ other teſtimony of it’s innocence than only to be read, ‘ yet he thought fit to withdraw from that danger.’

I do not think that any Socinian has hitherto maintained, That it is lawful to take up arms againſt one’s prince; the reaſon of it is, that they have had no occaſion to juſtify their ſect upon that head. It has ſtill it’s virginity in that reſpect, and is not like many others, which might ſay as the courtezan in Petronius, Nunquam memini me Virginem fuiſſe, &c. It is likely the Socinians have not had any convenient opportunity to imitate them.

[D] He loſt his wife, in the year 1587, at which he was extremely afflicted.] His grief was ſo violent, that his health was much impaired by it: he could not ſtudy for ſome time; he could not overcome the weakneſs that affected his body. His wife, ſome months before ſhe died, was delivered of a daughter, who was afterwards married to a Poliſh gentleman, by whom ſhe had ſeveral ſons and daughters. ‘ Filiam Agnetem ſuſtulit circa Pentecoſtem anni 1587, ætatis 48, ex qua, cum poſt mortem patris Staniſlao Wizowatio Equiti Polono nupſiſſet, nepotes nepteſque etiamnum ſuperſunt. Eodem anno in Septembre amiſit uxorem Eliſabetham: quem caſum viro luctuoſum & acerbum gravis ægritudo corporis excepit: adeo quidem pertinax, ut per aliquot menſes ſtudiorum uſum interciperet (20).

[E] He was deprived of the yearly income of his patrimony, by the death of Francis de Medicis, Great Duke of Florence.] During the life of Iſabella de Medicis, ſiſter to the Great Duke, and wife of Paul Giordano de Urſini, the inquiſitors endeavoured, in vain, to get that Heretic deprived of his eſtate. When ſhe died, the Great Duke himſelf took care to protect him. He ſent him word to return into Italy, and aſſured him that whatever happened, he would let him enjoy his income, and only recommended to him, not to put his name to his books. This was certainly a very great favour in a country where the court of Rome is ſo powerful. Ne qua calamitatis ſpecies abeſſet, eadem fere tempeſtate, per mortem Franſciſci Magni ducis Hetruriæ, fructus bonorum ejus, quem quotannis ex Italia capiebat, penitus ipſi fuit ereptus. Sane aliquanto ante, criminatorum acerbitate ac minis Pontificum, bona ejus in periculum venerant. Sed Iſabellæ Mediceæ Magni Ducis Hetruriæ ſororis, quæ Paulo Jordano Urſino, quem ſupra memoravimus, nupta fuerat, dum vixit, enixo ſtudio, & poſtea ipſius Franciſci Magni Ducis benevolentia, factum eſt, ut illo ſuperſtite annuos ex iis reditus Socinus caperet. Adeo nondum illic meritorum ejus exoleverat memoria, ut literis ac precibus, damnati & exulis, pridem deſtituti ac ſæpe depudiati, principes difficillima in re gratificarentur. Humaniſſimis quoque literis compellatus, & in poſterum quoque bono animo eſſe juſſus eſt, quamdiu vita illis ſuppeteret, dum ne in libris edendis nomen ſuum publice extare pateretur. Sed tunc illos principes infeſtum Socini fatum abſtulerat (21).

[F] He loſt . . . . ſome . . . . manuſcripts, the loſs of which he extremely lamented.] The ſcholars of Cracow having ſtirred up ſome of the dregs of the people, they entered Socinus’s houſe; they dragged him half naked out of his chamber, tho’ he was ſick; they carried him along the ſtreets; they cried, that he ſhould be hanged; they beat him, and it was with extreme difficulty that a profeſſor got him out of the hands of this rabble. His houſe was plundered, he loſt his goods; but he particularly lamented the loſs of ſome manuſcripts, which he would have redeemed at the price of his blood. Let us hear what his Hiſtorian ſays. Anno 1598. commota per Scholaſticos infimæ plebis fæce, æger tunc & forte curandæ valetudini intentus, extrahitur è cubiculo ſeminudus, & per forum ac celeberrimas plateas, depoſcentibus ad ſupplicium pleriſque contumelioſe raptatur. Tandem in illa furentium colluvie peſſime mulctatus, à M. Vadovita Profeſſore Cracovienſi ægre furenti multitudini eripitur. Direptas tunc ſarcinas & ſuppellectilem, quæque alia rapi potuere, longe minori dolore tulit, atque ſcriptorum quorundam jacturam irreparabilem, quam ipſius vitæ impendio ſeſe redempturum fuiſſe ſæpe profeſſus eſt. Periit ibi una inſignis contra Atheos labor, quem refellendis ingenioſis magni cujuſdam Viri commentis ſuſceperat (22).

[G] Princes will never embrace a ſect, which does not approve war, and the exerciſe of magiſtracy.] How many princes make a trade of their own ſubjects, as a private man deals in horſes and ſheep? They raiſe troops not to defend their frontiers, or to attack their enemies, but to make them ſerve other princes for money (23). They are very glad to have ſubjects always ready to liſt themſelves upon the firſt beating of a drum; they get a great deal by it, and therefore they would be ſorry if they ſhould turn Socinians; their treaſury would be the worſe for it. On the other ſide, moſt ſovereign princes love to make irruptions into the neighbouring ſtates, or to confederate with other princes who are at war; and it is of great moment for them that it ſhould be known, that whoever attacks them will not do it with impunity. In all theſe views nothing could be more inſignificant than to rule over men, who are engaged not to bear arms out of a principle of religion. There goes a ſtory, which perhaps is only a meer jeſt, viz. That the King of Poland being attacked by the rebellious Coſſacks, and by the Tartars, and wanting all his ſubjects to oppoſe the enemies, ſent word to the Socinians to take up arms. They anſwered, that their conſcience did not allow them to ſhed human blood, nor to do any harm to reaſonable creatures. Whereupon, it was propoſed to them to go to the army without putting any ſhot in their muſkets: they were told that they would make a ſhew; which would prove of ſome uſe, becauſe their enemies would be more afraid: but they had much ado to reliſh that expedient. See the end of the next remark. I have it from very good hands, that the Poliſh gentlemen of the Socinian perſuaſion went to the war, when the laws of the kingdom required it, and even that ſome of them profeſſed a military life, without being obliged to it out of a neceſſity of obeying the laws of the kingdom: their ſect did not approve their conduct in the laſt caſe.

(c) Cum ad tam barbarum ſævitiæ exemplum minæ quoque accederent, Cracovia Luclavicias migravit, in pagum ultima ſua habitatione atque obitu nobilem, novem circiter milliaribus Cracovia diſſitum; ubi aliquot annos, uſus menſa & ædibus viri nobilis Abrahami Blonſcii, vicinus Stoinio vixit. Vita Fauſti Socini, folio  3.

(d) Taken from his Life, written by Samuel Przipcovius, a Poliſh gentleman. It is prefixed to the firſt volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

(20) Vita F. Socini, ibid.

(21) Ibid.

(22) Ibid. fol.  3.

(23) Compare what is ſaid above, at the end of the remark [L] of the article ANABAPTISTS; and the remark [E], of the article BULLINGER.

cular men againſt Socinianiſm; for few people can renounce ambition, and give over a military life [H]. To be convinced of it we need only conſult experience; and conſider what is [H] Few people can renounce ambition, and give over a military life.] Thoſe, who love war, are innumerable, and are acted by very ambitious motives. Gentlemen, and thoſe who live nobly, are excited thereto either by the ſole deſire of raiſing themſelves, and acquiring glory, or, by a deſire of ſupplying their wants. The ſoldiers are animated by lazineſs, and by debauchery: they hope to be idle the greateſt part of the time; they hope to pillage and plunder, and to have plenty of good wine, and debauched women. In every town, thoſe who are qualified to pretend to offices, ſue for them with great earneſtneſs, and leave nothing unattempted to obtain them. As ſoon as there is a vacancy, you immediately ſee ſeveral competitors, who have long before opened the way by their ſollicitations and liberalities: a plain demonſtration that the deſire of honours and dignities is very powerful, and very general. From whence it ought to be concluded that the Socinian religion cannot ſuit a whole nation, nay, nor the greateſt number; it is only adapted to ſome perſons of a particular temper: and if it be true, that a Pope hearing that the Proteſtants puniſhed adulterers and fornicators, cried out, that their religion would be of no long continuance (24), it may be affirmed that his prognoſtication would have been more juſt, if he had applied it to a ſect of men, who will neither bear arms nor exerciſe any office.

Whether the rejection of myſteries is a good way to get followers.

Give me leave to impart to my readers an obſervation that was made in my hearing againſt thoſe, who ſay that all the ingenious Italians, who forſook Calviniſm to ſet up a new Arianiſm, deſigned to form a greater party than that of the Reformers of Germany and Geneva. It is ſuppoſed that tho' they believed myſteries, they pretended to oppoſe them, in order to have many followers. The captivating of one's underſtanding to the belief of three perſons in the Divine Nature, and of a God-man, is a heavy yoke for reaſon (25): Chriſtians are therefore very much eaſed when freed from ſuch a yoke; and conſequently it is probable that vaſt crowds will follow a man, who removes ſo great a burthen. Behold the reaſon why thoſe Italians, who fled into Poland, denied the Trinity, the hypoſtatical Union, Original Sin, abſolute Predeſtination, &c. They thought that ſince Calvin ſhaking off the neceſſity of believing all the incomprehenſible things contained in Tranſubſtantiation, brought over many people to him; they ſhould make a greater progreſs ſtill, if they rejected all the inconceiveable doctrines which that Reformer had kept. But it may be anſwered, that they had been very ſilly and unworthy of the Italian education, if they had made uſe of ſuch a cheat. The ſpeculative myſteries of religion are little troubleſome to the people: they will, indeed, tire a profeſſor of Divinity very intent upon them in order to explain them, and anſwer the objections of the Heretics. Some other ſtudious men, who examine them with great curioſity, may be alſo troubled by the reſiſtance of their reaſon; but all other men are at perfect eaſe about it: they believe, or fancy they believe, all that is ſaid of them, and quietly reſt in that perſuaſion. Whereforehe would not be far from Fanaticiſm, who could imagine that citizens and peaſants, ſoldiers and gentlemen, would be freed from a heavy yoke, if they were diſpenſed from believing the Trinity, and the hypoſtatical Union. They like much better a doctrine that is myſterious, incomprehenſible, and above reaſon: they are more apt to admire what they do not comprehend; they form to themſelves an idea of it more ſublime, and alſo more comfortable. All the ends of religion are much better to be found in incomprehenſible things: they inſpire a greater admiration, reſpect, fear, and conſtancy. If falſe religions have had their myſteries, it is becauſe they have been forged by the ape of the true one. God out of his infinite wiſdom has accommodated himſelf to the ſtate of man (26), by mixing darkneſs with light in his revelation. In one word, it muſt be granted, that in certain matters incomprehenſibility cauſes approbation (27). If a man had a mind to invent an hypotheſis only for Philoſophers, and ſuch as might be called Religio Medici, it is likely, he would think himſelf obliged to lay aſide the doctrines difficult to be comprehended; but then he muſt not have the vanity to expect to be followed by the multitude. If he had a mind to ſatisfy his vanity in that reſpect, he ſhould do as the hero of Lorenzo Gratian (28). But granting that thoſe Italians have been ſo ſilly as to think that people would be freed from an intolerable yoke, if they were diſpenſed from believing the Trinity, &c. muſt we alſo grant that they thought the prohibition of civil and military employments would not be a yoke a thouſand times heavier than that which they intended to break? Will any one be ſo unreaſonable as to require that we ſhould have ſuch a notion of thoſe men, who wanted neither wit nor addreſs, as every body owns? What I am going to ſay will doubtleſs reſolve the queſtion. When men of parts, deſigning to ſet up a new ſect, pitch upon a looſe method, and ſubſtitute an eaſy doctrine in the room of a difficult one, it may be ſaid that they do not pitch upon the moſt proper method to ſucceed in their deſign; but it ought not to be ſuppoſed that they are contented to ſuppreſs ſpeculative myſteries, and that they keep the whole practical part, and even aggravate the yoke of the moral precepts. And yet this is ſuppoſed concerning the founders of the Socinian hereſy; and therefore what is ſaid of their deſign is a miſtake. They are more rigid than other Chriſtians about the prohibition of revenge, and the contempt of worldly honours; they are not for any mitigated or figurative explications of ſuch texts of the Scripture as relate to morality. They have revived the ſeverity of the Primitive Church, which did not approve that the Faithful ſhould concern themſelves with magiſtracies, and ſhould have any hand in the death of their neighbour, ſo far that they would not have them to accuſe malefactors. 'Non enim cum occidere Deus vetat, latrocinari nos tantum prohibet, quod ne per leges quidem publicas licet, ſed ea quoque ne fiant monet, quæ apud homines pro licitis habentur. Ita neque militare juſto licebit, cujus militia eſt in ipſa juſtitia, neque vero accuſare quemquam crimine capitali, quia nihil diſtat, utrumne ferro, an verbo potius occidas, quoniam occiſio ipſa prohibetur. Itaque in hoc Dei præcepto nullam prorſus exceptionem fieri oportet, quin occidere hominem ſit ſemper nefas, quem Deus ſanctum animal eſſe voluit (29). ---- For when God forbids killing, he does not only prohibit robbery, which is done by the laws of the ſtate, but alſo ſuch things as by men are accounted lawful. Wherefore it is not lawful for a juſt man to fight, whoſe warfare muſt be the fight of faith; nor to accuſe any of a capital crime; for if you kill it is no matter how, whether by ſword or otherwiſe, becauſe all killing is forbidden. Wherefore in this command of God, there ought to be no exception; but it is always a crime to kill a man, an animal, whom God would have ſacred.' The prohibition of civil and military offices is a heavier burthen than the prohibition of revenge; for it excludes the expedients both of deceiving one's ſelf, and alſo of deceiving others. Thoſe, who preach moſt earneſtly againſt revenge, find out a thouſand diſtinctions to elude that precept. Some ſay, they do not hate their neighbour as he is a man, but as he is an enemy of God: others proteſt, that they do him no harm to revenge a private quarrel, but for God's glory. This is approving, by the help of ſome diſtinctions, what one pretends to condemn. Some deceive themſelves; others are mere hypocrites, who deceive the world: but no ſubterfuge can be alledged as to the doctrine which forbids going to the war, and exerciſing civil offices; thoſe who profeſs ſuch a doctrine muſt neceſſarily follow it; the practice cannot be ſeparated from the theory; there are no diſtinctions, nor equivocations. It is therefore a true conſtraint; it is not a tranſient mortification, like that of thoſe who diſcipline themſelves once a year; it is a perpetual and continual ſtate. We may therefore affirm that thoſe Italian refugees were no cheats: they were deceived by their ſubtilties, and by relying too much upon the natural light of their reaſon; and if they kept only part of the Chriſtian doctrines, it is becauſe their firſt principle, whereby they will admit nothing that is directly againſt their reaſon, led them to it. This is apparently the cauſe of their choice; had they been meer cheats, greedy of followers, they would

(24) See the article ABELIANS, citat. (3).

(25) See l'Eſprit de Mr Arnaud, Tom. i, cap. vi, pag. 211.

(26) According to Cæſar, de Bello Civili, lib. ii, cap. iv, that ſtate would be vitious. Communi ſit vitio naturæ, ſays he, ut inviſis, latitantibus atque incognitis rebus magis confidamus, vehementiuſque exterreamur.

(27) Madam de Sablé, ſays in one of her Maxims (it is the xxxixth) We eſteem thoſe men moſt, the extent of whoſe ability we know not; for we always preſume the beſt of what we ſee but by half.

(28) That author ſays, that el Heroe platique incomprehenſibilidades de caudal; and that he diſcovers himſelf without being comprehended. Gran treta en el arte de entendidos oſtentarſe al conocimiento, pero no a la comprehenſion. See Father Bouhours, Entretiens d'Ariſte, pag. m. 54.

(29) Lactant. lib. vi, cap. xx, pag. m. 426.

is daily practiſed. They alledge ſome other reaſons [I] very proper to ſhew that this ſect is not like to increaſe. Thoſe, who ſay that the Socinians have a full liberty of conſcience in the United Provinces, are little acquainted with Hiſtory [K], and will plainly ſee the contrary, if they read the anſwer that was made to Mr Stoupp's letters (e): they will find in it (f) the dates of many ordinances publiſhed againſt the ſectaries. I ſhall ſay (g) ſomething of thoſe which concern the Socinians, and I ſhall dwell ſomewhat longer would have gone another way to work. Let us therefore condemn their principle, as a deceitful one, and not uſurp the place of him that ſearcheth the reins and hearts. Their principle debaſes religion, and changes it into Philoſophy. The greatneſs, authority and ſovereignty of GOD require that we ſhould here walk by faith and not by ſight. A Spaniſh politician hath wiſely ſaid, that it is an excellent qualification to keep ſecret one's thoughts and reſolutions. Si todo exceſſo en ſecreto, lo es en caudal; ſacramentar una voluntad ſera ſoberania . . . Arguye eminencia de caudal penetrar toda voluntad agena; y concluye ſuperioridad ſaber celar la propria. See Father Bouhours, at page 201, of his Entretiens d'Ariſte & d'Eugene.

The Heathens ſaid, that myſteries better diſcover GOD's majeſty, and are an image of his nature, becauſe he cannot be perceived by our ſenſes. Ἡ κρύψις ἡ μυστικὴ τῶν ἱερῶν σεμνοποιεῖ τὸ θεῖον, μιμουμένη τὴν φύσιν αὐτοῦ ἐκφεύγουσαν ἡμῶν τὴν αἴσθησιν. Myſtica ſacrorum occultatio majeſtatem numini conciliat imitans ejus naturam effugientem ſenſus noſtros. They are Strabo's words, page 322, of the 10th book.

But what I am going to ſay may undeceive thoſe, who flatter themſelves that the averſeneſs of the Socinians for military and civil offices will always be a great obſtacle to the progreſs of that ſect. It is no article of the Socinian faith, that one ought to renounce civil and military offices. The Socinians are, in that reſpect, more indulgent than the Mennonites. They do not ſcruple to exerciſe public employments in Tranſylvania, and it is likely they would bear arms as other men do, if they had a prince of their religion.

[I] They alledge ſome other reaſons.] For if it be conſidered, that moſt men are more inclined to acquieſce in the inward ſentiments, than to follow the thread of innumerable conſequences methodically connected, and proceeding from diſtinct notions, and that they may be quickly and eaſily offended by the paradoxes which reaſon throws them upon, it will appear ſomewhat probable that the Socinian ſyſtem is not very proper to gain the people. It may rather lead ſtudious and ſpeculative men to Scepticiſm. There will always be ſomething defective in that ſyſtem, whereby people may be kept from it. The eternity of matter, GOD's extenſion, the limitation of this extenſion, and of the Divine knowledge, and of hell torments, are Socinian doctrines, which being eloquently repreſented to princes and their ſubjects, will always inſpire them with great horror. If it be a convenient thing to each private perſon not to be afraid of being puniſhed after this life, yet it is more inconvenient to think that one is daily converſant with people who are not afraid of it. And therefore it is not the intereſt of private perſons, that any doctrine tending to leſſen the fear of hell torments ſhould be admitted in their country; and it is probable that the preachers of ſuch a looſe doctrine will always be more offenſive than acceptable to the public. A certain author ſays, that the ſame perſons, who reject the Goſpel by reaſon of the auſterity of it's moral precepts, would expreſs a greater horror for a religion enjoyning them to plunge themſelves into the moſt infamous diſorders, if it was offered to them, when they are able to reaſon, and before they are blinded by the prejudices of education (30). He has made ſome reflexions upon this, but he has omitted one of the beſt; for he ſays nothing of ſelf-love, and perſonal intereſt. It is true, that a wicked man would like a doctrine, with reſpect to his own conſcience, that ſhould allow him to be a poiſoner, and to commit adultery, perjury, &c. but he would not like it upon many other accounts. He has a mother, a wife, a ſiſter, and nieces, who would vex him horribly, if they grew infamous for their leudneſs. There are more people, who can poiſon, rob, and cheat him, &c. than there are againſt whom he can commit the ſame crimes. Every body is more capable of being offended than of offending others; for of twenty equal perſons, it is evident that every one of them is leſs ſtrong againſt nineteen than nineteen againſt one (31). It is therefore the intereſt of each private perſon, tho' never ſo wicked, that men ſhould be taught ſuch doctrines as will terrify the conſcience.

[K] Thoſe who ſay that the Socinians have a full liberty of conſcience in the United Provinces, are little acquainted with Hiſtory.] The Unitarians made ſeveral attempts to ſettle in Holland. The firſt is aſcribed to Eraſmus Johannes, rector of a college at Antwerp, who publiſhed a book in the year 1585, without putting his name to it. That book is intituled, Antitheſis doctrinæ Chriſti & Antichriſti de uno vero Deo. Zanchius confuted it the year following. The ſecond attempt was that of Cornelius Daems, a Civilian of Mechlin, who removed from Tergow, where he reſided, to Utrecht, in order to diſperſe there ſome manuſcript tracts of Socinus. The magiſtrates having notice of it, reſolved to arreſt him; but he ran away, and his papers were ſeized. He recovered them ſome months after, becauſe the government of the town came into other hands. The third attempt was that of Oſtorodus and Vaidovius, who came from Poland to Amſterdam in the year 1598, with many Socinian books printed and manuſcript, which they began to get tranſlated into Dutch (32). The magiſtrates having cauſed all thoſe books to be ſeized, ſent them to the univerſity of Leyden, and then to the States-General; having firſt given a ſevere reprimand to thoſe two Socinians, and commanded them to leave the country. The States-General being informed of the judgment paſſed upon thoſe books by the Divines of Leyden, ordered them to be burnt in the preſence of Oſtorodus and Vaidovius, and commanded thoſe two men to depart from the United Provinces within ten days (33). The judgment of the Leyden Divines imported, that thoſe books were little different from Mahometiſm, and that they contained ſome blaſphemies, that could not be tolerated among Chriſtans without great impiety. Scripta iſta ad Turciſmum proxime accedere, & veram æternamque Deitatem Chriſti Filii Dei, & Spiritus Sancti, officium Chriſti, beneficia ejus ſalutaria, & Baptiſmi ſancti inſtitutionem, & noſtrum Religioſum erga eum officium evertere, & ſimilia multa adeo blaſphema, ut ſine graviſſima impietate nec in vulgus ſpargi, nec inter Chriſtianos ferri poſſint continere (34). Adolphus Venator, a Miniſter of Alcmaer, was confined to an iſland in 1617, for writing a book, that favoured of Socinianiſm, quod portenta Sarmatica ſaperet (35). The ſchiſm of the Arminians favoured the introduction of Socinianiſm into Holland; for they do not refuſe to hold an eccleſiaſtical communion with the Socinians. Inſomuch that the latter might reſide in many towns of the United Provinces without being known. The Prince of Tranſylvania intercepted a letter in 1638, wherein the Socinian John Sartorius (36), who lived at Amſterdam, acquainted a miniſter of his ſect (37), that there were in Holland many perſons (38) of their perſuaſion (39). It is certain that they had gained ſome followers at that time, and that their books were diſperſed up and down. In order to put a ſtop to it, the magiſtrates of Amſterdam condemned ſome pieces of Volkelius to be burnt in the year 1642 (40). The ſynods of Holland have appeared very zealous to prevent the propagation of that hereſy. They preſented a petition to the States of the province in 1628, wherein they alledged ſeveral reaſons why they ſhould not tolerate it (41), and repreſented, among other things, that ſuch a toleration would make the common-wealth of the United Provinces (42) ſtink all over Chriſtendom. That remonſtrance was publiſhed, and confuted. Thoſe who confuted it, ſaid in anſwer to that particular reaſon, that Poland then muſt be very ſtinking (43), ſince it granted liberty of conſcience to the Socinians. Whereupon Voëtius ſays, that it is not true they ever had ſuch liberty in Poland; and that the contrary appeared ſome years after by the ill uſage they there met with. (44) Sed infelices illi hiſtorici perperam

(e) Apologie pour la Religion des Hollandois, by John Brun, printed in the year 1675.

(f) Page 173.

(g) In the remark [L].

(30) Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 189, pag. 592.

(31) Even without ſuppoſing that the nineteen, act in concert againſt the twentieth.

(32) Taken from Giſbertus Voëtius, Diſputat. Tom. iii, p. 811.

(33) Hoornbeeck, Apparatu, ad Controverſias Socinianas, pag. 98.

(34) Id. ibid.

(35) Voëtius Polit. Eccl. Tom. ii, lib. iv, p. 533.

(36) So Hoornbeeck, and Voëtius, below citation (44), call him; but they ſhould have ſaid John Statorius.

(37) Adam Francus, miniſter of Clauſemburg.

(38) Magnam in his terris Socinianorum meſſem eſſe. Hoornbeeck, ubi infra.

(39) Hoornbeeck, Apparatu ad Controverſias Socinianas, p. 97.

(40) See the article VOLKELIUS.

(41) Voëtius, ubi ſupra, Tom. ii, pag. 532.

(42) Inter alias motivas hanc ſuggererent, quod hac ratione toti orbi Chriſtiano fœtidum redderetur fœderatum Belgium. Id. ibid.

(43) Oportere ut Regnum Poloniæ admodum fæteat. Id. ibid.

(44) Id. ibid.

longer upon that of the year 1653 [L]. The accuſation publiſhed by a modern author, is perperam præſupponebant Regis & regni conceſſionem; quæ nulla erat (45), nec unquam fuerat: & paucis annis poſt ſatis oſtendit regnum Polonicum quid iſtic libertatis cuivis ſectæ, & inter eas Socinianæ conceſſum ſit. Quærant modo ex fratribus ſuis Sartorio, Jona Slichtingio, aliiſque, quo loco nunc ſit libertas ipſorum.

[L] I ſhall dwell ſomewhat longer upon the ordinance of the year 1653.] I do not know what the States of Holland anſwered, in the year 1628, to the remonſtrances of their ſynods; but I have read the acts of what was done in a like caſe in the year 1653. The deputies of the ſame ſynods repreſented to them that the followers of Socinus, a ſort of men who deſtroyed all Chriſtianity, the reſurrection of the dead, the hopes of an eternal life, &c. were ſo bold as to come into the United Provinces, and particularly into Holland, that there to pervert the Faithful, and rend the Church; that it was well known how zealous the Ragotſki's had been againſt thoſe Heretics in Tranſylvania, and what decrees had been made againſt them in Poland in the years 1638, and 1647. That they had been expelled from Poland; that their church, their library, and their printing-houſe had been deſtroyed, becauſe they had in the preſs a very ſcandalous book againſt the myſtery of the Trinity. Quemadmodum Rakociana domus in Tranſylvania adverſus hos errorum ſeminatores zelaverit; quid Anno 1638, & 1647, in Polonia contra ipſos actum ſit, quomodo ex Polonia ſint ejecti, & ipſorum bibliotheca diſperſa, ipſorum cœtus disjectus, templum, ſchola, typographeum, ipſis ademta, quòd librum ſub prelo haberent hac inſcriptione, Tormentum throno Trinitatem deturbans, in recenti memoria eſt (46). That the States-General proceeded ſeverely againſt them in the year 1598. That in 1639, by the ſuggeſtion of the Engliſh ambaſſador, all the provinces were informed of the arrival of ſome Socinians, and deſired, in time, to prevent the evil by their decrees. That in the year 1640, the States of Holland acquainted the Synod of Amſterdam with their reſolution, importing that in what concerned the proſcription of the Socinians and their books, all neceſſary orders would be given about it, as ſoon as the ſtate of the thing ſhould be more exactly known. Anno 1640 Synodo Amſterodamenſi hoc decretum Illuſtrium & Præpotentum Ordinum intimatum eſt: Quod attinet Socinianorum excluſionem & librorum ejus Sectæ ſcitum eſt, ſi accuratius illuſtres Ordines doceantur, Socinianos aut libros ipſorum in hac provincia apparere, ipſos tunc promtè adverſus ipſos & ipſorum libros, prout res exegerit, ſtatuturos (47). That the States-General ordered, the 17th of July 1651, purſuant to the advice of the States of the province of Holland, given the 12th of April foregoing, that the inſolence of the ſectaries ſhould be effectually repreſſed, and good edicts publiſhed againſt the Socinian books, &c (48). After this, the deputies of the ſynods repreſent, that it is plain thoſe Heretics go all over the country, they uſe all their endeavours to get proſelytes, and diſperſe many ill books (49); that they are the moſt dangerous enemies the Church can have, ſince, beſides their being cunning, and apparently devout, they teach a doctrine that is not above the reach of reaſon. They conclude, 1. With moſt humbly beſeeching their illuſtrious lordſhips to prevent the evil in due time, by proceeding againſt the perſons, and forbidding the conventicles, and prohibiting the books: 2. With intimating that they hope that at laſt their lordſhips will execute the ordinances already made. Rogant ſubmiſsè Illuſtrium VV. DD. cultores, Deputati Synodorum Auſtralis & Borealis Hollandiæ, ipſarum nomine, ut huic malo in tempore obviam eatur, ut in perſonas ſtatuatur, ut conventicula ipſorum & libri prohibeantur, ut præla & typographiæ iſto ſtercore non contaminentur, & officinæ tam damnoſa merce vacuentur (50). The States of Holland communicated this ſynodal petition to the Faculty of Divinity of Leyden, deſiring to have their opinion about it. The Faculty anſwered, that nothing could be more horrid and abominable than the Socinian ſect; that it differed but little from Paganiſm (51); that it was certain it crept into the country, and that there was a neceſſity to pray to GOD that he would inſpire the States with a ſteady and holy reſolution of removing all thoſe blaſphemies, and ſuppreſſing ſuch wicked books. Conſilium ſapiens, utile avertendis omnibus Blaſphemiis & abolendis tam noxiis libris. Whereupon the States made an edict, whereby all perſons, whatever condition they might be of, were forbidden to bring any of the Socinian hereſies into the country, or to impart them to others, or to hold any aſſembly with ſuch an intent. They declared that all offenders ſhould be baniſhed the firſt time from the province, as blaſphemers of GOD's name, and diſturbers of the public peace; and in caſe of a relapſe they ſhould be puniſhed as ſhould be thought fit. They alſo forbad, under ſevere penalties, the impreſſion and the ſale of the Socinian books, and ordered that this edict ſhould be publiſhed, and poſted up wherever it ſhould be requiſite, that none might pretend to be ignorant of it. This is what they decreed the 19th of September 1653. The magiſtrates of Utrecht publiſhed a like edict in the year 1655 (52).

The Socinians were not ſilent: they employed one of their ableſt pens (53) to compoſe an apology, that came out in the year 1654, with this title, Apologia pro veritate accuſata ad illuſtriſſimos & potentiſſimos Hollandiæ & Weſt-Friſiæ Ordines, conſcripta ab Equite Polono. That piece is well written; and with a great deal of art; there is in every part of it a great air of moderation, with an artful boldneſs in denying the accuſations. The author alledges the ſame general reaſons (54) made uſe of by Tertullian in his Apology, and by Calvin in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Inſtitutions, and by ſeveral other Reformers in their books againſt the Sorbonne. This is an unavoidable inconveniency: a falſe Church, which pleads for Toleration, and complains of the penal laws, alledges the ſame common topics with the true Church in like circumſtances. The true Church, which deſires that the ſovereigns would extirpate a falſe one, uſes the ſame motives and arguments alledged by the falſe one for the extirpation of the true Church. It were to be wiſhed, that communions ſo different in the main, ſhould not be like one another in uſing the ſame ſtile and the ſame topics; but ſuch a thing is not to be expected in this world. The evil is paſt curing in that reſpect: man, among other exerciſes, is obliged to ſearch after truth, in the midſt of a hundred pretenders, who expreſs themſelves the ſame way as to general reaſons. But I proceed to another obſervation.

When people preſent petitions againſt a party, they ought to take ſpecial care not to alledge any facts whereof they are not well informed, or which are only equivocal proofs; for ſome time after they are confuted in a manner very diſpleaſing. For inſtance, the Poliſh knight maintains, 1. That the Ragotſki's never perſecuted the Socinians (55), and always maintained them in the liberty of conſcience which they had promiſed them, and did ſtill maintain them in it (56). 2. That no advantage ſhould have been taken of the oppreſſion the Socinians were expoſed to in Poland, nor of the deſtruction of their church at Racovia, ſince the Evangelics met with the ſame troubles in that country, and received at Vilna a treatment like that of Racovia two years after, and under the ſame pretence. (57) Poloniam deinde, infauſto omine commemorant, patriam noſtram; quæ dum non tantum nobis, ſed etiam Evangelicis (58) & aliis, contra jurisjurandi & fœderum fidem, templa adimit, exercendæ religionis libertatem labefactat, & variis preſſuris, ob diverſum in ſacris ſenſum, infeſtam ſeſe præbet; vindicem Dei manum in ſe provocavit . . . . . (59) Everſum nobis fuerit Racoviæ templum, quanquam de everſione templi decretum nihil habet, eo quo dicunt anno: ſed eodem exemplo everſum eſt & Vilnæ Evangelicis biennio poſt ſuum templum. Pulſi fuerint Miniſtri Racovia, quanquam miniſtri Racovia decreto pulſi non ſunt, ſed ſoli Profeſſores; pulſi ſunt & Vilna; proſcripti fuerint illi; proſcripti ſunt & iſti; & quidem illi ipſi, qui paulo ante Racoviano caſui ex ambone inſultaverunt. Sic in nobis cœptum, in Evangelicis, qui permiſerant, ulterius progreſſum eſt exemplum. Exempla enim tramites quærunt, nec ibi conſiſtunt, ubi cœpere. Occaſio & prætextus utriuſque injuriæ & calamitatis innocentibus inferendæ fuit idem, nempe imago juvenili quorundam temeritate violata. 3. That what happened at Racovia was not grounded upon the impreſſion of a book, whoſe title was injurious to the Trinity. He proves it demonſtratively by the decree of the Diet, which mentioned no ſuch book, and would have certainly mentioned it, if it had been the reaſon of inflicting ſuch a puniſhment upon is altogether improbable, viz. that the Socinian Hereſies were privately taught at Port-Royal; and it is certain the ſtory he has told about it is falſe. The public has ſeen the refutation

---

(45) The Socinians maintain the contrary in the paſſages above quoted remark [A]. See alſo the remark [L], citat. (56).

(46) See Cocceius's anſwer, ad Apologiam Equitis Poloni, fol. * 2 verſo.

(47) Ibid.

(48) Decretum eſt, ut non tantum protervia & inſolentia Sectariorum, ut oportet, corrigatur, ſed & idonea Edicta adverſus omnia gravia peccata, ſcandaloſos libros, & ſcripta Sociniana, & ſimilia, publicentur & proponantur. Ibid.

(49) Several of them are ſpecified in the Remonſtrance.

(50) Cocceius, in Reſponſ. ad Apologiam Equitis Poloni, fol. * 3 verſo.

(51) Nihil exitiabilius & magis horrendum iſta hæreſi excogitari poteſt . . . . nihil aut parum differt à Paganiſmo

(52) Voëtius, Polit. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. i, pag. 533.

(53) That of Jonas Slichtingius. See Biblioth. Antitrinitaires, pag. 130.

(54) I uſe this epithet, becauſe the circumſtances with reſpect to the ſeverity of the penal laws, &c. are not the ſame as here in Tertullian's and Calvin's apologies.

(55) Apolog. pro Veritat. accuſata, pag. 39.

(56) Quibus hæc illuſtriſſima Domus pacem & libertatem conſcientiæ ac religionis juratam, ſacroſancte cuſtodivit ſemper, & etiamnum cuſtodit. Ibid.

(57) Ib. p. 40.

(58) See John Lætus, in Compend. Hiſtoriæ, pag. m. 532, & alibi, where he ſhews the Evangelics of Poland loſt their churches in ſeveral places, ſometimes by popular commotions, and ſometimes by unjuſt pretences.

(59) Apolog. pro Veritat. accuſata, pag. 41. What I have omitted, is found above, citation (12).

upon their ſect. He adds, that John Lætus, the only author who mentions the pretended impreſſion of that book, yet does not ſay that it occaſioned the deſtruction of their ſchool, and of their printing-houſe. 'Nam cauſa diſturbationis Racovianæ, quam accuſatores noſtros coram vobis pro vera venditare non pudet, ipſo Decreto Comitiali manifeſtæ vanitatis coarguitur. Ajunt enim cauſam fuiſſe, quod librum habuerimus ſub prælo, hoc titulo, Tormentum throno Trinitatem deturbans. Nullus liber unquam hoc titulo inter nos extitit, nedum ut ſub prælo fuerit. . . . Auctor * iſtius commenti fuit Lætus quidam, Moravus, qui profugum ſeſe ex Moravia, religioniſve an rebellionis cauſa oblitus; ſed odii in nos ex ſuorum diſciplina concepti non immemor, in ipſa patria noſtra, quæ exulem benigne ſuſcepit & fovit, eo proterviæ progreſſus eſt, ut nobis patriæ civibus inſultare auſus fuerit, edito fumorum pleno libello; inter quos & hæc de libro iſto fabula eſt. Et tamen hic ipſe, quamvis vanus Auctor, dicit quidem illo ipſo tempore, quo res Eccleſiæ noſtræ Racoviæ ſunt everſæ, deſudaſſe noſtros in extrudendo iſto peſtifero, quem ait, libello: ſed hanc fuiſſe cauſam adverſariis illarum evertendarum non dicit: Juventus, inquit, Scholæ anſam præbuit, quæ effigiem crucis dejecerat. Sed narrationi illius per ſe vanæ, quo ſpecioſior eſſet, aſſuendum aliquid fuit ab accuſatoribus (60). - - - - For the cauſe alledged of our diſturbance at Racovia, which our enemies are not aſhamed to maintain for truth, is manifeſtly convicted of falſhood by the decree of the ſenate. For they ſay, that we had a book in the preſs with this title, Tormentum Throno Trinitatem deturbans. There was never any book with ſuch a title amongſt us much leſs was there any ſuch in the preſs. . . . . The author of this fiction was one Lætus, a Moravian, who, forgetting whether he had fled his country for religion, or rebellion, but not unmindful of his hatred to us, even in our country, which had ſo favourably received and entertained him, when exiled from his own, had the impudence to inſult us in our own country, by publiſhing a book full of ſtories, among which is this fable concerning that book. And yet this very man, tho' he ſays, that at the time when our our churches at Racovia were deſtroyed, we were labouring to haſten the publiſhing of that prenicious book, as he calls it; yet that this was the cauſe our enemies did ſo, he ſays not. The youth of the ſchool, ſays he, which had thrown down a picture of the croſs, gave occaſion thereto. But to this relation of his, ridiculous in itſelf, ſomething was to be tacked by our enemies, that it might have the better appearance.' Cocceius publiſhed a very ſolid anſwer to that manifeſto of the Socinians, in the year 1656. I have conſulted it particularly upon thoſe three heads; for I expected there to find the apologiſt confounded: but I have found nothing in it neither upon the firſt, nor upon the ſecond head; and as for the third, all that Cocceius ſays, is, that there was a report, that the Socinians had ſuch a book in the preſs, when they were ſo ill uſed at Racovia. Quam cauſam habuerint Poloni eripiendæ vobis Racoviæ, non diſputo. Certum eſt, eo tempore vulgatum fuiſſe rumorem, tale, quale libellus Deputatorum memorat, ſcriptum ſub prælo ſudaſſe (61). Uncertain reports ſhould never be depended upon in juridical pieces, ſuch as the remonſtrance of a ſynod to their ſovereign, deſigned to obtain the ſuppreſſion of a ſect. In accuſations that concern doctrines, it is more eaſy to juſtify an unexact aſſertion: for inſtance, it was poſitively ſaid in the remonſtrance, that the Socinians denied the reſurrection of the dead, and eternal life. The Faculty of Divinity at Leyden affirmed likewiſe that they deny, as the Sadduces do, the life of the ſoul ſeparated from the body, and the reſurrection of the wicked. The Poliſh knight maintained that ſuch an accuſation was a calumny (62). Quis non cupiat animas etiam corporibus carentes vivere, agere, intelligere; Dei conſpectu & gaudiis cæleſtibus perfrui, pro nobis, in corpore adhuc, tanquam in carcere agentibus, Deum orare, noſtrique curam gerere? quis non pedibus in hanc ſententiam eat? . . . . (63) Nos animarum, quamdiu ſine corporibus ſunt ſtatum, Deo relinquimus, certiſſima fide, quæ propria Chriſtianorum eſt, mortuorum reſurrectionem complexi . . . Negare nos ajunt impiorum reſurrectionem. Nos vero cum Apoſtolo † ſpem habemus in Deo, reſurrectionem fore mortuorum, juſtorum & injuſtorum; juſtorum ad vitæ æternæ gaudia; injuſtorum ad ignis æterni ſupplicia. Et ‡ hunc terrorem Domini, (qui haudquaquam vanus in ullis futurus eſt) ſcientes, homines ſuademus, Deo autem manifeſti ſumus, ſperamus vero etiam conſcientiis veſtris fore manifeſtos (64). Cocceius was not ſilenced by this denial, grounded upon a book, in ſome meaſure liturgical and at leaſt authentic, ſince it was an apology for the confeſſion of faith: he confeſſed he knew nothing of that book (65), but alledged ſeveral quotations, and had ſomething to ſay.

CONSIDERATION, on the Doctrine of the eternity of Hell torments.

I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that nothing has proved more prejudicial to the Socinians, than a certain doctrine which they thought very proper to remove the greateſt difficulty a Philoſopher can find in our Theology. A thinking man, who only conſults reaſon, and the bright idea of infinite goodneſs, which, morally ſpeaking, makes up the principal character of the divine nature, will be offended at what we read in the Scripture concerning the eternity of hell torments; eſpecially if he adds to it the paraphraſes, and the many explications that are to be found in ſeveral books (66).' Deus optimus maximus were the current and uſual titles of the Divine Nature among the antient Heathens: It was their ſet form, when they ſpoke of God, and they never ſaid Deus ſeveriſſimus, implacabiliſſimus. The two epithets Optimus and Maximus, properly ſpeaking, were only the image and expreſſion of one ſole quality, I mean a ſupreme goodneſs; for goodneſs ought to be attended with greatneſs to appear in all it's luſtre. But what, I pray you, is greatneſs? Is it any thing elſe beſides magnanimity, generoſity, liberality, magnificence, and pouring out of favours? This natural idea, which made the Heathens ſpeak in that manner, is confirmed by the Scripture, wherein the goodneſs of God is all along extolled above his other attributes. Doing good, ſhewing mercy, is the daily and pleaſant work of God, according to the Scripture: chaſtizing, puniſhing, ſhewing ſeverity, is to him unuſual and unpleaſant work. And therefore ſo long as a man ſhall adhere to his natural reaſon, and not humbly ſubmit to ſome paſſages in the goſpel, he will look with abhorrence upon that doctrine of the infinite torments and puniſhments of the whole human race, except a few only. The Socinians, relying too much upon reaſon, have limited thoſe torments, ſo much the more carefully, becauſe they conſidered that men would be made to ſuffer only for ſufferings ſake, ſince no advantage would accrue from thoſe torments to the ſufferers or the ſpectators; a thing never done by any well regulated legiſlature. They hoped to bring over to Chriſtianity by that means thoſe, who are offended with a notion, that ſeems little conſiſtent with the ſupreme goodneſs. But thoſe Heretics were not aware that this very thing would make them more odious, and more unworthy of a toleration than all their other tenets. After all, few people are offended with the doctrine concerning the eternal duration of hell torments, and are like Theodorus Camphuſius (67). He was a miniſter, born at Gorcum in Holland: he turned Socinian, and publickly declared he ſhould have had no religion, had he not met with ſome books, wherein he found that hell torments will not laſt for ever. Memini, meminerunt & alii, fuiſſe quendam Didericum Camphuſium, qui in epiſtola typis expreſſa, & canticis ipſius adjuncta, profiteretur, ſe pronum fuiſſe ad relinquendam omnem religionem, donec inciderit in illos libros, qui docerent, perpetuos ignes nihil eſſe & eternos cruciatus (68).

[M] A modern author hath publiſhed, that the Socinian Hereſies were privately taught at Port-Royal.] The author of the Politique du Clergé de France affirms, that there is a third party, from which the Gallican Church has every thing to fear. They profeſs, ſays he (69), to believe that the Church of Rome is the true Church, to which one ought to be inſeparably united, and ſhould never be ſeparated from it; and yet they do not follow her doctrines, and have no reſpect for her worſhip. Such men were never ſo numerous in that kingdom as they refutation of it (b). There are very few people that would not be extremely concerned, if

---

* Joan. Læti Compend. Hiſt. Leidæ 1643. pag. 766, and it is pag. 543, of the edition of 1661.

(60) Apolog. pro Veritat. accuſata, pag. 42.

(61) Cocceius, in Examine Apologiæ Equitis Poloni, pag. 138.

(62) Apologia Equitis Poloni, pag. 73, 74.

(63) Ib. p. 76.

† Act. xxiv. 15.

‡ 2 Cor. v. 11, 12. Vide Confeſſ. vindic. cap. xx.

(64) This may ſerve as a proof of what I obſerved in the article of ORIGEN, remark [C], at the end.

(65) Negari à ſuis impiorum reſurrectionem, negat Eques. Citat in margine Confeſſ. vindic. cap. xx. Ipſa Confeſſio Belgica, quæ Apologiæ adjungi ſolet, in capita diſtincta non eſt. Quid libri ſit Confeſſ. vindic. adhuc ignoro. Cocceius, in Examine Apolog. Equitis Poloni, pag. 220.

(66) See the book, intituled, Les Merveilles de l'autre Monde, written by a canon of Riez called Arnoux.

(67) In the vulgar Tongue, Dirk Raphaels Camphuyſen. He was born in the year 1586, and died at Dockum in Frieſland in the year 1627. See the Biblioth. Antitrin. p. 112, and therein mend Worcomi denatus. He wrote ſeveral pieces in Dutch, and among others one printed above twenty times in ſeveral ſizes, which conſiſts of ſongs, and other Spiritual Poems, very much eſteemed by thoſe who are ſkilled in Dutch Poetry. The author dexterouſly inſerted in them his opinions about ſeveral Chriſtian Doctrines, eſpecially upon thoſe that concern morality.

(68) Cocceius, in Examine Apolog. Equitis Poloni, pag. 305.

(69) Politiq. du Clergé de France, pag. m. 90.

(b) See below the paſſage quoted citation (103).

---

they are now. Some of them carry their unbelief ſo far as to call in queſtion the moſt important doctrines of Chriſtianity. They are Socinians; they believe neither the myſtery of the Trinity, nor that of the Incarnation. I know ſome things about it, that are ſo particular that I cannot doubt of it: I ſhall not impart them to you, for fear of ſcandalizing you. And what is moſt terrible is, that it is not only the religion of our young Abbots, but alſo of ſome grave and wiſe ſocieties, that make a great ſhew of the purity of their morals, and of their adherence to the Catholic Faith. Let us ſee what Mr Arnauld anſwered to that author. ‘A man muſt have neither honour nor conſcience, who aſcribes diſmal and odious crimes to many perſons, when every body may eaſily know that ſuch horrid accuſations are only grounded upon a meer calumny. But who does not ſee that no other thoughts can be entertained of this writer? There may be in France, and even among Abbots, ſome perſons that are ſo impious as to believe neither the Trinity nor the Incarnation: but ſomething elſe is requiſite to ſay, without being guilty of a notorious calumny, that it is now the religion of our young Abbots. He muſt be ſure that there are at leaſt many of thoſe young Abbots, who have no other religion but that. But how could he know it? If any of them were ſo unhappy as to entertain ſuch impious opinions, would they be ſo imprudent as to declare them up and down, and thereby expoſe themſelves to the dangerous conſequences of it? Could ſuch a folly be common to ſo many perſons, that one might ſay, without fearing to be accounted an impoſtor, that it is the religion of young Abbots? And yet he is ſo impudent as to ſuppoſe it as a thing ſo well known, that it ſerves him only for a prelude to authorize a more horrid calumny; for he affirms it as a thing, of which he is very ſure, that ſome grave, wiſe, and orderly ſocieties, very regular in their life, and which are accounted Catholic, believe neither the Trinity nor the Incarnation no more than thoſe Abbots. And what is more terrible, ſays he, is, that it is not only the religion of our young Abbots, but alſo of ſome grave and wiſe ſocieties, that make a great ſhew of the purity of their morals, and of their adherence to the Catholic Faith. This exceeds all impudence to impute not to ſome private perſons, but to ſocieties, and not to one only, but to ſome ſocieties, whom he very much commends for their wiſdom and morals, that they do not believe the firſt myſteries of the Chriſtian religion; and to ſuppoſe that thoſe, who could put a ſtop to ſo great a diſorder, know nothing of it, or knowing it are unwilling to ſuffer it; and laſtly, to fancy that the world will be ſo ſilly as to believe ſuch an incredible thing, upon the credit of an inconſiderable writer, who ſays in an anonymous book: I know ſome things about it that are ſo particular, that I cannot doubt of it, adding with a ſorry craftineſs, I ſhall not impart them to you, for fear of ſcandalizing you. One can hardly conceive how a man can carry boldneſs and calumny to ſuch a degree. However, the thing is not ſo ſurprizing in a Calviniſt, he hath only, &c (70).’

The author of the Politique du Clergé could not well be ſilent after ſuch a vigorous anſwer: I ſhall ſet down what he ſaid in his vindication. He thought, ſays he (71), ſpeaking of Mr Arnauld, that the author meant the Janſeniſts by thoſe grave and wiſe ſocieties, that make a great ſhew of the purity of their morals, and of their adherence to the Catholic Faith. Perhaps he is not in the wrong. I do not know the thoughts of the author of the Politique du Clergé (72); but I do very well know that there is ground to ſuſpect thoſe gentlemen of having a Theology not agreeable to Chriſtianity, and bordering upon Socinianiſm. I am ſorry I am obliged to ſay what we think on this, and what we have altogether reaſon to think. We do not love to oppreſs thoſe unhappy men, who are already loaded with the public hatred. And indeed, were it not that we are forced to it by thoſe gentlemen, we would not expoſe to the public view, what may confirm that ſuſpicion. But they force us to it; and if they are diſpleaſed with what we are going to ſay, they muſt blame themſelves for it. We would not be ſo poſitive as Filleau, and the Jeſuite Meynier, who ſay that thoſe who go by the name of Janſeniſts are downright Deiſts, enemies to the myſteries of the Chriſtian religion. But it is certain they have dropped ſome words againſt the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, which give ground to ſuſpect that they harbour dreadful monſters in their breaſts. Pray, mind the proofs he alledges. Thoſe gentlemen, ſays he (73), do not ſcruple to confeſs that the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt is not ſufficiently proved in the holy Scripture. . . . . . (74) The author of the Perpetuité de la Foy, aſks, ‡ Why did not Jeſus Chriſt diſcover his Divinity in ſuch clear words that they might not be eluded? From thoſe words, and from theſe, God was not willing that the Chriſtian doctrines ſhould be propoſed with the utmoſt evidence, the author of the Politique du Clergé infers, that the Janſeniſts admit this principle: The Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Trinity, are not clearly expreſſed in the Scripture (75). Afterwards he tells us, 1. That this principle is utterly falſe; for it is not true that the paſſages which prove Jeſus Chriſt's Divinity, may be any ways eluded. We know there are no paſſages, tho' ever ſo clear, but what the Heretics may cavil upon. If this be called eluding, there is nothing in the holy Scripture, nor in any book in the world, or language of men, but what may be eluded. This he proves by ſhewing how one might cavil about ſome texts in the goſpel, wherein Chriſt's humanity is aſſerted, and about the canons of the council of Nice (76), and a paſſage contrived on purpoſe (77), to be the cleareſt and the moſt diſtinct proof of the Trinity and Incarnation that can be imagined. In the ſecond place he ſays (78), that it is the moſt ſhameful thing, and the greateſt prevarication an orthodox Divine can be guilty of againſt the eternal Divinity of the Son of God, thus to give it up to the Hereticks, by acknowledging a thing ſo falſe, ſo dangerous, and ſo proper to confirm them in their errors. . . . . . (79) This confeſſion, that the Divinity of the Son is not ſufficiently explained in the written Revelation, is that very thing which confirms the Socinians in their Hereſy, and may induce others to embrace it. In the 3d place he ſays (80), that Mr Arnauld ought to acknowledge, That until the council of Nice, it was lawful to deny the Divinity of Chriſt without running the hazard of one's ſalvation, and that if the Divinity of the Son was not an article of faith, neceſſary to ſalvation, for the ſpace of three hundred years, it could not become ſo by the deciſion of a council; becauſe, according to the wiſeſt Doctors of the Romiſh Church, among whom the gentlemen of Port-Royal are to be reckoned, the Church, the Pope, nor the Councils, cannot make new articles of faith. From whence it follows, that to this very day the Divinity of the Son is not an article of faith, for which thoſe who deny it deſerve to be anathematized. Thus, by proceeding from one principle to another, it is plain it is not unreaſonable to ſuſpect that Mr Arnauld does not believe the myſteries of the Incarnation and Trinity, or at leaſt, that he does not look upon them as eſſential parts of the Chriſtian religion. In the 4th place he proves (81), that thoſe gentlemen have made it appear that they have no great regard for the authority of the Church. Which being ſo, concludes he (82), ſince on one ſide the myſteries of the Trinity and Incarnation cannot be proved by any paſſages of the Scripture, but what may be eluded, according to thoſe gentlemen; and, on the other hand, ſince they are only grounded upon deciſions, to which they do not think themſelves obliged blindly to ſubmit; it is plain thoſe myſteries are built upon no ſolid foundation, and are only meer problems according to the Theology of the Port-Royal. In the fifth and laſt place, he entertains us with a ſtory, to which he prefixes a preamble worth its weight in gold. I ſhall add a ſtory, ſays he (83), which I publiſh with reluctancy, and after long debating with myſelf. If thoſe gentlemen had not provoked us ſo unjuſtly and ſo cruelly, we would have been more reſerved; but we are not obliged to ſhew any regard to ſuch a man as Mr Arnauld, who ſo plainly tranſgreſſes againſt the laws of charity and ſincerity.

Here follows a ſhort account of that ſtory. ‘(84) About 15 or 20 years ago (85), a young man, the ſon of a treaſurer of France in the Generality of Orleans, whoſe name was Picaut or Picot, and who was deſigned for the Church, ſtudied at Paris, in the houſe of the gentlemen of Port-Royal.’ The converſation of a miniſter, who had changed his religion, and (70) Arnauld, Apologie pour les Catholiq. Part. ii, ch. iv, pag. 31, & ſeq.

(71) Eſprit de Monſr. Arnauld, Tom. i, ch. vi, pag. 196.

(72) Obſerve how little that author ſcruples to lie; for he wrote the Politique du Clergé, tho' he denies it.

(73) Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, ch. vi, pag. 197.

(74) Id. ibid. pag. 198.

‡ Pag. 103.

(75) Eſprit, ubi ſupra, p. 201.

(76) Ibid. pag. 203, & ſeq.

(77) Ibid. pag. 205, & ſeq.

(78) Ibid. pag. 209.

(79) Ibid. pag. 211.

(80) Ibid. pag. 212, 213.

(81) Pag. 213, to 219.

(82) Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, ch. vi, pag. 220.

(83) Ibid.

(84) Ibid.

(85) Note, that the author wrote his book in the year 1683.

if they had publiſhed a ſtory as ill circumſtantiated as that which concerns young Picaut, the and the reading of ſome books, convinced him that the Pope is Anti-Chriſt; whereupon he wrote a piece for his own uſe, and being informed that it was come into the director's hands, and that his family had notice of it, he run away. 'He came into Perche, where he had a living, to try whether he could get ſome money by it. He fell, by chance, into the hands of a Proteſtant gentleman, a perſon diſtinguiſhed by his birth, and particularly by his merit. That gentleman being very well ſkilled in matters of religion, aſked him ſeveral queſtions about the motives of his change; and as he proceeded from one ſubject to another, he perceived that this young man had the notions of the Socinians about the Trinity and Incarnation, and knew all their ſorry objections; but otherwiſe, he was very fond of the opinions of the Church of Rome, and very little diſpoſed to embrace the doctrines of the Reformed, excepting this, that the Pope is Anti-Chriſt. The gentleman was very much ſurprized to find this young man a Socinian, and aſked where he had learned that doctrine. The young man anſwered, very freely, that he had learned it at Port-Royal, where he had ſtudied; that ſeveral perſons had the ſame opinions in that houſe; that the Novices and the Students were not allowed to read the books of Calvin and of the Calviniſts, and that he had never read them; but for the Socinian books they were not ſhut up by themſelves in the library, and every body might read them. Afterwards the young man made his eſcape into a remote province, and at laſt left the kingdom to avoid being moleſted by his relations. And it has been known ſince, that thoſe who went about to inſtruct him, could never cure him of his Socinianiſm (86).' What follows is the moſt curious part of the ſtory, and therefore I muſt not forget it. 'The author of the apology for the Catholics, who falls into a violent paſſion when he meets with a word that vexes him ever ſo little, will doubtleſs call this ſtory a piece of impudence, an impoſture and a calumny. He will ſay, that all the fire in hell will not be ſufficient to puniſh the author of ſo horrid a ſlander. But I muſt tell him, that I only warrant the truth of theſe two things. 1. That this young man told that ſtory, and even to many perſons very credible, and of known probity. 2. That this young man was truly Socinian, when he left the Divines of Port-Royal, and that he learned Socinianiſm in their houſe. As for what he adds, that his maſters were infected with the ſame Hereſy, I cannot tell whether it be true. But I ſee no reaſon why that Student ſhould invent ſo horrid a calumny. And this, together with their way of ſpeaking of the Trinity and Incarnation, may form, if not a proof, at leaſt a very ſtrong ſuſpicion. This is what we know of the matter, and what we had to ſay about it. The public will judge of it, as they think fit. This is what people get by provoking others (87).'

This author did not think that Mr Arnauld's reply would contain but few words; he expected abundance of reflexions and exclamations, for he believed his Hiſtory would produce great effects. But Mr Arnauld was contented to confute it in a few words, and with great moderation, tho' he knew very well how to be paſſionate. His anſwer runs thus: He had a mind to make people believe that the Divines of Port-Royal had an averſion for Calviniſm, but that they were very much inclined to the Socinian Hereſy, for which he gives this proof. Some young children of quality were inſtructed at Port-Royal, in human learning, and at the ſame time care was taken to give them a pious education. Moſt of them were but ten, twelve, or fourteen years of age, and the oldeſt was hardly ſixteen. The Greek and Latin methods, and the Greek roots in French verſe were made for them. Now let us ſee what Mr Jurieu tells us in his famous book, intituled, L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld. He ſays the books of the Calviniſts were carefully kept from them; but that they had a full liberty to read thoſe of the Socinians, as much as they would; and that by the reading of thoſe books, one of thoſe children whom he names, and who was a native of Orleans, as he ſays, taking a liking to the Socinian errors, left the church, and turned Huguenot. But this ſtory is utterly falſe. There never was a child at Port-Royal of ſuch a name and family as this is ſaid to be; nay, there never was there any of the city of Orleans. The ground on which he builds that ſtory, viz. that children of that age were allowed to read the Socinian books, ſufficiently ſhews that one may expect any thing from a man, who does not ſcruple to publiſh ſuch horrid and incredible lies (88).

Many reflexions might be made on the pains the author of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld took to convict the gentlemen of Port-Royal of Socinianiſm; but I ſhall only make three.

The firſt is, that if any one accuſed that writer of the ſame thing, he would find the proofs of his accuſation in L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, for he needs only form this ſyllogiſm.

A man who believes on the one ſide, that the myſteries of the Trinity and Incarnation cannot be proved by any paſſages of the ſcripture, but what may be eluded, and who on the other ſide does not blindly ſubmit to the deciſions of councils (89), is a Socinian.

But the author of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld believes ſo, and makes no ſuch ſubmiſſion.

Therefore he is a Socinian.

The major propoſition of this ſyllogiſm is plainly the doctrine of that author; for intending to juſtify what he had ſaid (90), that Socinianiſm was the Theology of ſome grave ſocieties, meaning the gentlemen of Port-Royal, he alledges for a proof their teaching that Chriſt's Divinity has not been revealed with a ſufficient evidence, and their giving ground to ſuſpect that they do not believe one ought to ſubmit to councils. He muſt therefore look upon this as an undoubted ſign of the Socinian Hereſy, otherwiſe he could not clear himſelf of calumny; his accuſation would be ill proved, and he would be a falſe accuſer. Wherefore I need only prove the minor propoſition. It conſiſts of two parts: the laſt does not want to be proved; for it is manifeſt enough that a Proteſtant miniſter does not blindly ſubmit to councils: And the following words afford the proof of the firſt. I am far from deſigning to leſſen the force and clearneſs of thoſe characters of the Divinity of the ſcripture; but I dare ſay that there is none of them but may be eluded by prophane men. None of them makes a proof, to which ſomething may not be anſwered; and if they be conſidered together, tho' they have a greater force than when they ſtand by themſelves, yet they are not ſtrong enough to form a moral demonſtration (91). It were needleſs to object to me that this paſſage does not concern Chriſt's Divinity; for it were in vain to pretend that GOD has evidently revealed to us the Divinity of his Son in the ſcripture, if it was affirmed that it does not clearly appear, that the ſcripture is the word of GOD. But, beſides, that author has (92) a diſpute with another miniſter (93) about this queſtion, Whether the belief of our myſteries ſuppoſes the evidence of the teſtimony; and does not only deny it, but alſo maintains that the affirmative is a pernicious opinion. I am going to ſhew that he may receive another wound with his own weapon. You have ſaid that it is not true that the paſſages, which prove Chriſt's Divinity, cannot be any ways eluded (94). You have ſaid that they are as clear as the paſſages which concern his humanity, and as clear as the deciſion of the council of Nice, or any text that one could contrive on purpoſe. The meaning of which is, that the cavils that might be raiſed againſt them are as inſignificant, as thoſe that ſhould be raiſed againſt a text made on purpoſe. How come you then to confeſs (95) that the characters of the Divinity of the ſcripture may be eluded? How come you to ſay that the objections of the Socinians are conſiderable? Theſe are your words: The proofs of the ſcripture, on which the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the neceſſity of Grace, are grounded, have not the utmoſt degree of evidence: Thoſe myſteries are liable to and admit of difficulties, not only with reſpect to human reaſon, but alſo in relation to the holy ſcripture, wherein there are ſeveral paſſages that want to be reconciled with the truth. Thoſe, who take the objections of the Socinians againſt myſteries, and thoſe of the Pelagians againſt Grace, to be vain and inconſiderable, are miſtaken, and do not conſider the thing with a due attention. They are real difficulties, and deſerve to be cleared (96). Remember that in the book, intituled, L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, it is the greateſt baſeneſs, the chief witneſs alledged by the modern author I ſpeak of [N]. I do not give a particular account of what concerns the opinions and books of Socinus: it may be ſeen in general in Moreri's Dictionary. A German Hiſtorian (i) has reduced the doctrine of the Socinians into 229 Propoſitions.

---

(86) Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, ch. vi, pag. 222.

(87) Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, p. 224.

(88) Arnauld, Diſſertation ſur le prétendu bonheur du plaiſir des ſens, pag. 13, 14.

(89) See l'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, pag. 220.

(90) In the Politique du Clergé, pag. 90.

(91) Jurieu, Traité de la Nature & de la Grace, pag. 246.

(92) I write this in July 1696.

(93) See his two books againſt Mr Saurin.

(94) Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, p. 201.

(95) Above citation (91).

(96) Jurieu, Defenſe de la Doctrine Univerſelle de l'Egliſe, pag. 467.

(i) Daniel Hartnaccius, in Continuatione Jo. Micrælii Syntagm. Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſt.

The moſt general objection, raiſed againſt them, is, that by refuſing to believe what they think to be contrary to Philoſophical truths, and by denying the unconceivable myſteries of the Chriſtian religion, they open a way to Scepticiſm, Deiſm, and Atheiſm. Perhaps it might be objected to them, that they do the ſame, at leaſt indirectly, by their way of explaining the paſſages of the Scripture, which concern the conſubſtantiality of the Word. For it ſeems to follow from their explications that the apoſtles, being animated with an ardent zeal for the glory of JESUS CHRIST, made uſe of the moſt ſtrained figures and expreſſions that devotion can ſuggeſt, when they ſpoke of his perfections. Thus the votaries of the Holy Vigin have carried it as high, and as near a true and real deification as ever they could. But if the expreſſions of the Apoſtles were to be aſcribed to an Enthuſiaſtic zeal, and not to the immediate direction of the Holy Spirit, it is plain the Scripture would be of little more authority than the panegyrics upon the ſaints. But by over-throwing the inſpiration of the ſacred writers, the whole revelation comes to nothing, and then every thing will be a meer Philoſophical diſpute.

I forgot

baſeneſs, and the higheſt prevarication an orthodox Divine can be guilty of againſt the eternal Divinity of the Son, thus to give it up to the Heretics, by making a confeſſion ſo falſe, ſo dangerous, and ſo proper to confirm them in their errors (97), that is, by confeſſing as you do, that Chriſt has not diſcovered his Divinity in words ſo clear as not to be eluded (98).

My ſecond reflexion is, That if thoſe proofs alledged to ſhew that the gentlemen of Port-Royal are Socinians, were good, it would follow from thence that the whole Romiſh Church is Socinian; for what has been ſaid by thoſe gentlemen concerning the obſcurity of the ſcripture, is the general doctrine of that Church. Beſides, few Roman Catholics believe the Pope's infallibility in matters of fact; nay, they do not aſcribe that privilege to univerſal councils. The Janſeniſts never denied the infallibility of thoſe councils in point of doctrine, and even have acknowledged that the five propoſitions were heretical, in the ſenſe they pretend the Popes have condemned them. What they have ſaid in particular to juſtify ſome Nuns, who refuſed to ſubſcribe to certain formularies, and to ſubmit to ſome epiſcopal mandates, is of ſuch a nature, that all Monks would ſay the ſame, if they were moleſted by Biſhops. How often have they been at law with their Prelates? How often have they appealed againſt them to ſynods, or to the Pope? Is it not a plain demonſtration, that they do not believe one ought to ſacrifice one's knowledge to the authority of inferior tribunals? I confeſs, ſome ſay that a Monk ought blindly to obey his ſuperior; but it is only in what concerns the diſcipline and obſervances; and they would not think themſelves obliged to obey him, if he commanded them to believe what they know to have been condemned by the councils. And therefore if the gentlemen of Port-Royal are Socinians, becauſe they ſay, on the one ſide, that our myſteries are not evidently contained in the ſcripture; and, on the other, that one ought not to ſubſcribe againſt one's conſcience an epiſcopal mandate, or a bull that decides only a matter of fact, there is no univerſity, nor religious community in the Church of Rome, but what is Socinian. Let us therefore admire the diſcerning faculty of Mr Arnauld's adverſary; and let us confeſs that no man was ever more lucky than he in the choice of his proofs. It is not to be doubted, that if the Jeſuits found themſelves in the ſame circumſtances with the Divines of Port-Royal, they would do what thoſe Divines have done (99). Would that prove their being Socinians?

My third reflexion concerns the great care that writer takes to excuſe himſelf to the public, for revealing the ſecret of one Picaut, or Picot. He is afraid of undoing Port-Royal; he declares he has been a long time doubtful whether he ſhould ſtrike ſuch a blow; he would never have done it, had thoſe gentlemen been leſs unjuſt, and leſs cruel to his party: However, he applauds himſelf for his victory; this is what people get, ſays he, by provoking others. Does it not look like a convincing proof? Would not one think it is one of thoſe productions, that put an end to all cavils, and further proceedings in a cauſe? But, after all, it appears that the only thing he objects againſt the gentlemen of Port-Royal is a ſtory, which he dares not warrant: He knows not whether it be true. Who will then believe it, ſince he himſelf doubts of it, being otherwiſe ſilly enough to fancy that his tale would caſt ſo ſhameful a blot upon thoſe gentlemen, that he is afraid of being guilty of a piece of cruelty? But let not that trouble his conſcience: He may be very ſure that ſuch ſtories will never make any impreſſion upon impartial men, nor even upon the Jeſuits. I would not deny that Picaut ſaid ſo; but he muſt be compared to thoſe deſerters, who tell a thouſand lies to the beſiegers about the ſtate of the towns that are beſieged out of which they eſcaped. I have a book printed at Cologn for Peter Marteau in the year 1679, and intituled, Traité des Parlemens ou Eſtats generaux, composé par Pierre Picault. This is doubtleſs our fugitive; for there is a great deal of Socinianiſm in that book. When a grave man, who has a great reputation, leaves his country and his Church, what he ſays may be depended upon. This is what makes me believe that the author of the Politique du Clergé knew not what he ſaid when he ſpoke of a third party, and of that vaſt number of Socinians of which he ſuppoſes France is full; for when I aſked two or three years ago (100) a famous Father of the Oratory (101), whether it was true that there were many Socinians among the Clergy of France, he anſwered me that there was hardly any body who knew the works and doctrines of that ſect. There are every where Unbelievers and Sceptics; but they are not Socinians.

Let us conclude, That the author of the Politique du Clergé not being able to prove the heinous accuſation publiſhed by him againſt Port-Royal, is duly convicted of being a downright calumniator. The proofs alledged by him, ought to be compared with thoſe of a man, who having ſaid that the governor of a place is a traitor to his ſovereign, ſhould prove it; Firſt, By imputing to him a conduct like that of all other governors, and of thoſe whoſe fidelity he could not deny. Secondly, By publiſhing ſome ſilly ſtory, which a ſoldier, who deſerted from the place, told the enemies.

[N] What concerns young Picaut, the chief witneſs alledged by the modern author I ſpeak of.] Here follows what Mr le Vaſſor did me the honour to write to me, the ſecond of January 1697. ‘ If you had told me ‘ that you deſigned to ſpeak of Picaut's adventure, ‘ which Mr Jurieu relates very wrong, I would have ‘ given you a good account of it. He was my countryman (102), and I was very well acquainted with ‘ him. His eldeſt brother married a near relation of ‘ mine. He was a young man, whom Aubert de Verſé ‘ ſpoiled with Socinianiſm, not at Port-Royal, but in ‘ a houſe of the Oratory, where they happened both ‘ to be. The Fathers of the Oratory ſent away de ‘ Verſé as ſoon as they perceived that he dogmatized, ‘ and they kept Picaut for ſome time in order to cure ‘ him, but they could not do it.’ This account does perfectly agree with a printed letter of Mr Simon, who ſays (103), ‘ I can aſſure you that there are in that ‘ libel (104); many falſe ſtories, which could not be ‘ ſpoiled by M. J. (105). For inſtance, can any ‘ thing be more falſe and more ridiculous than that, ‘ which is to be found at large in the two hundred

‘ and

(97) Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, pag. 209.

(98) See l'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, ibid. pag. 198.

(99) During the congregation de Auxiliis, Clement VIII, being not favourable to them, they publickly maintained at Rome, that it was no article of faith, to believe that Clement VIII was Pope. Others taught that he was not infallible. See the Hiſtory of that Congregation printed in the year 1687, pag. 49. Matthieu, Hiſt. de France, book ii, is quoted in it.

(100) I write this in July 1696.

(101) Viz. Mr le Vaſſor, who is now at London, and is very well known by his works, who profeſſed Divinity in the Oratory, and is perfectly acquainted with the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical State of France.

(102) Mr le Vaſſor is a Native of Orleans.

(103) Lettres Choiſies de Mr Simon, pag. 145.

(104) That is, L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld.

(105) This refers to theſe words of the ſame page. The man being vexed at that blunder, anſwered me very ingenuouſly, and without much conſideration on what he ſaid, ſpeaking of Mr J..... That man ſpoils every thing that is ſent to him.

I forgot to ſay that there are ſome of the Orthodox who have complained that certain refutations of his books have notably conduced to the increaſing of his ſect [O].

and twenty firſt page, and the following, of the firſt volume. He ſuppoſes the gentlemen of Port-Royal had a houſe in Paris, where they taught their ſcholars Socinianiſm, and permitted them to read the books of the Socinians. That romance is ſo well circumſtantiated, that any body would think at firſt, it is rather a true hiſtory than a fictitious ſtory. And yet it is certain, the gentlemen of Port-Royal have had no ſchool in Paris where they taught youth. Here is what gave occaſion to that romance. The young man ſpoken of in that book, called Picaut, was in the inſtitution of the Fathers of the Oratory, which is properly a place for the novices, who deſire to be admitted into that congregation. A man very well known in the world, who had been a miniſter in Burgundy, and was expelled by his brethren, being convicted of Socinianiſm, happened to be there at the ſame time. The Fathers of the Oratory, who took him to be a converted miniſter, admitted him into their inſtitution. It was he who turned the young man's brains with what he told him about the Apocalypſe and Socinianiſm. Thus that Socinianiſm proceeded from your people, and not from the gentlemen of Port-Royal, nor from the Fathers of the Oratory. That ſchool, wherein the Socinian books are not locked up, is a meer dream of your men, who give out through the whole book manifeſt lies for true ſtories.'

[O] They have complained that certain refutations of his books have . . . . . conduced to the increaſing of his ſect.] This is the judgment of Druſius (106) concerning a work publiſhed againſt Socinus by Sibrandus Lubbertus in the year 1611. 'Credebat ille (Lubbertus) . . . . rectè ſe facere atque utiliter, quòd Socinum de Servatore integrum ederet cum prolixa refutatione. Sed vide quid collega ipſius J. Druſius de facto iſto judicaverit: Plures ſolâ libri Socini lectione, & parum accuratâ ejus confutatione, Socinianos brevi tempore factos fuiſſe ſcribit, quàm multis ante annis per cæteros libros eorum facti fuerant. Nec mirum. Qui enim argumenta adverſarii ſui, cum nervis ſuis omnibus vibrata ac torta, validè non retorquet, is proponendo illa, plus obeſt cauſſæ ſuæ, quàm confutando prodeſt (107). - - - Lubbertus thought he did an uſeful thing in publiſhing the book of Socinus, de Servatore, entire, with a large refutation of it. But ſee what his collegue Druſius thought of it. He writes, that in a little time more people were made Socinians, by the reading of Socinus's book only, and its inſufficient refutation, than for many years paſt by all their other writings. And no wonder. For whoever does not ſufficiently anſwer all the arguments ſkilfully propoſed and managed by an adverſary, does more hurt to his own cauſe by propoſing, than good by refuting them.' This we find in a work printed in the year 1624. The ſame thing is to be found in a letter which Arnold Poëlenburg publiſhed in the year 1655. I will give you his own words, which cenſure two other authors who refuted the Socinians. 'Laudant vulgò & magnificè deprædicant Reformati conſilium Magiſtratus Amſtelodamenſis, quô libros Crellii & Volckelii de vera religione juſſit exurere. At à quo decretum iſtud Ampliſſimi Magiſtratus majore contemptu violatur, quàm a D. Mareſio, qui nobis duas jam partes iſtius operis combuſti ac intermortui in lucem vitámque revocavit? Qua in re aliorum Reformatorum exemplum imitari ſe dicit; nec dubium eſt, quin hunc quoque alii ſecuturi ſint, qui pro ſua parte diligenter incumbant, ut plurima Socinianorum ſcripta protrudant in lucem. Adjicitur quidem, fateor, in pleriſque adverſariorum libris refutatio; ſed ut eſt hominum indoles ad deteriora proclivior, multò faciliùs hæreſin, quàm veritatem allubeſcere vulgo creditum eſt. Deinde addita refutatio interdum uſque adeò frigida & infirma eſt, ut nulla res efficaciùs errorem in animos inſtillet, quàm ejuſmodi refutatio. Hinc cùm Sibrandus Lubbertus Socini librum de Servatore edidiſſet integrum, additâ prolixâ reſponſione, Vir Clar. Joan. Druſius ipſius collega hoc factum ſanè quàm ægerrimè tulit, ſcripſitque ejus libri editione, & parum accuratâ refutatione, plures ad Socinianiſmum brevi ſpatio temporis adductos, quàm omnibus Socinianorum libris, qui multis retrò annis exſtitiſſent. Conſtat mihi ex relatu viri cujuſdam & docti, & pii, & à Socinianiſmo alieni, D. Gomarum (at qualem virum!) olim in Academia Leidenſi prælegentem, argumenta quædam Socini refutâſſe; ſed ita infeliciter, ut multô facturus fuiſſet ſatiùs, ſi ea penitus intacta reliquiſſet. Quod idem affirmare poſſis de pleriſque ſcriptoribus hodiernis, qui ex Socini refutatione ſtudent inclareſcere, magnúmque nomen (imperitiæ credo ſuæ) ad poſteros tranſmittere, cùm paſſim paucas rationes, & multa convitia, velut de plauſtro, in adverſarios congerant. Junium tamen, Placæum, alióſque his ſimiles ſemper excipio, qui non maledictis, ſed ut Theologos decuit, argumentis Socinum oppugnârunt (108). - - - The methods taken to ſuppreſs the Socinian ſect and their writings, by burning or anſwering their books, was ſo far from ſucceeding, that thereby their numbers were more increaſed, and their books became more known and ſought after. That after the magiſtrates of Amſterdam had ordered the books of Crellius and Volckelius de vera religione to be burnt publickly, Mareſius began to reprint them, and had publiſhed two parts. That there was no doubt that example would be followed by others of the Reformed. That when Sibrandus Lubbertus had publiſhed the entire book of Socinus de Servatore, together with a long confutation, the famous Joannes Druſius, his colleague, was exceedingly diſpleaſed, and wrote to him, that by his publiſhing that book, and his inſufficient anſwer, more people had been turned to Socinianiſm, than for many years paſt. That a certain learned and pious perſon, who alſo was averſe from Socinianiſm, had told him, that Gomarus, formerly a Profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Leyden, had endeavoured to refute ſome of the arguments of Socinus, but ſo unhappily, that he had done much better not to attempt it. And, finally, that the like might be ſaid of moſt of the writers at that time, who thought to tranſmit their names to poſterity by refuting Socinus; who may indeed be famous (or rather infamous) for uſing reproaches inſtead of arguments. But that Junius, Placæus, and others like them, who oppoſed to the Socinians not foul language but ſtrong arguments, as it became Divines, were always to be excepted.' See alſo the preface which Chriſtian Hartſoeker (109) hath prefixed to this letter. Druſius, who is there quoted on the ſame account, is ſtiled doctiſſimus & ὀρθοδοξότατος, moſt learned and moſt orthodox.

I leave my reader to judge of all this, and content myſelf to obſerve in general, that a ſlight refutation of a book, does only ſerve the more to recommend it. Mezerai has ſaid the ſame thing many years ago. 'Du Pleſſis Mornai . . . . . had written a large volume againſt the Maſs: the importance of the ſubject, the quality of the author, the politeneſs of his ſtile, and ſtrength which appeared in his arguments, and the authorities taken from the Fathers, to the number upwards of four thouſand, had acquired him a great reputation; and it had been ſtill heightened by the weak attacks of all who had attempted to refute him (110).'

Others have obſerved that nothing is more pernicious than to uſe bad arguments againſt impious perſons (111). The author of Religio Medici obſerves (112) that a man who would confirm himſelf in his opinions ought to diſpute with ſuch as are not well able to defend themſelves, and that every one is not qualified to maintain the truth, there being ſuch as know not the firſt principles, and that ſuffer themſelves to be led by a prepoſterous zeal. They give occaſion to the erroneous to attack ſome truths, which weak defenders are not able to ſupport. Obſerve what St Auguſtine (113) acknowledges concerning diſputes wherein he triumphed over the orthodox. It muſt not be forgot, that the moſt underſtanding authors chooſe rather to be ſilent than to attack a book which they find too hard. In this reſpect they take that courſe, which a great Politician would have to be purſued, when abuſes are ſo confirmed by long cuſtom, that a magiſtrate who would attempt a reformation, would but diſcover his own want of power, and indiſcreetly expoſe his authority (114). Theſe things were taken into conſideration by Father Paul, when he was deſired to write againſt the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta (115).

Neverthe leſs I think, that this aſſertion, It is better to give no anſwer at all to a dangerous book than a bad one, admits of a diſtinction; it is better, I ſay, with (106) See his Letter, ad Fratres Belgas, it is the CCLIIId of the collection of Letters publiſhed by the Remonſtrants, Edit. Amſt. 1684.

(107) Bodecherus ineptiens, pag. 15, apud Crenium Animadv. Part. xi, pag. 120, 121.

(108) Arnoldus Poelenburg, in Epiſtola ad C. H. that is, Chriſtianum Hartſoekerum, pag. 59, apud Crenium, ibid. pag. 122.

(109) He was miniſter of the Arminians at Rotterdam, and is the father of Mr Hartſoeker the Philoſopher.

(110) Mezerai, Abrégé Chron. Tom. vi, at the year 1600, pag. m. 223.

(111) See the remark [A] of the article GARASSE, and what I quote from Monconis, in the remark [M] of the article HOBBES.

(112) Religio Medici, §. vi, pag. m. 36.

(113) See the remark [D] of his article.

(114) Omittere potius prævalida & adulta vitia quam hoc adſequi ut palam fieret quibus flagitiis impares eſſemus. Tiberius, apud Tacitum, Annal. lib. iii, cap. liii. See in the remark [L] of the article NESTORIUS, the application I have made of this paſſage of Tacitus.

(115) See the Abbot de St Real, pag. m. 37, of the Conjuration des Eſpagnols contre Veniſe.

with regard to thoſe, who, laying aſide prejudice, compare the objections and their anſwers, and who attentively conſider every thing. But good ſouls, pious, and eaſy to be ſatisfied in matters which they believe, are much more ſcandalized with no anſwer than a weak one. They do not readily diſcern when an anſwer is inſufficient: they always find ſome occaſion to triumph; for there is no refutation ſo pitiful as not to diſcover ſome defects in the book of an adverſary. Theſe obſervations, I own, will ſignify little, and will be no deciſion of the principal queſtion: but, however, they will pleaſe, and give ſatisfaction by an idea of ſuperiority, to the prepoſſeſſed readers, and ſuch as compare not one whole book to another whole book.

For the reſt, the quotation from Mezerai brings to my memory what hath been ſaid of the famous Count de Tilli, that he often acquired honour, partly by his own good conduct, and partly by the bad conduct of thoſe he had to do with (116). He is not the only perſon of whom this may be ſaid, Cæſar obſerved that Pompey, by a very ſingular good fortune, had acquired the ſirname of Great, for having vanquiſhed ſome people that knew nothing of war (117). It hath been ſaid of ſome princes that they were great by their own virtues, and by the evil qualities of others, magni ſuis virtutibus & vitiis aliorum.

[P] . . . .] The treatiſe de Auctoritate S. Scripturæ, which Vorſtius cauſed to be reprinted at Steinfurt in the year 1611, in 8vo, with ſome additions, is a work of Fauſtus Socinus, who publiſhed it in the year 1588, under the name of Dominicus Lopez Societatis Jeſu. They put in the title that it was printed at Sevil, Hiſpali ex officina Lazari Ferrerii. This work was printed in French at Baſil without the author's name in the year 1592. In the advertiſement of the Bookſeller it is ſaid that the Divines of Baſil had approved it after a careful examination, and that they had only diſallowed three places, the cenſure whereof was inſerted (118). The care of Vorſtius to procure a new edition of it was uſed as a proof of his Socinianiſm. It cannot be denied that the doctrine of Socinus is to be found in that book; but it is otherwiſe full of very good proofs of the truth of the Chriſtian Religion.

(116) Soldat Suedois, pag. 133. See alſo what I quote from Mr de la Rochefoucaut in the Penſées ſur les Cometes, pag. 793.

(117) See Appian. de Bello Civili, lib. ii, pag. m. 793: and Suetonius, in Cæſare, cap. xxxv.

(118) See the preface to the edition of Steinfurt.

SOMMONA-CODOM. So the Siameſe call a certain extraordinary man, whom they think to have attained to the ſupreme felicity (a). I mention him only to have an opportunity of examining a very ſubtile objection which Mr du Rondel propoſed to me [A] againſt what I have ſaid in the article of Lucretius (b), that the belief of GOD's exiſtence without the belief of a providence, cannot be an inducement to virtue.

Father

(a) See Mr de la Loubere, Relation de Siam. Tom. i, ch. xxii, num. 4, 5, pag. m. 500, 501.

(b) At the end of the remark [K], of the article LUCRETIUS, the Philoſopher.

[A] I mention him only to have an opportunity of examining an objection . . . . which Mr du Rondel propoſed to me.] Mr du Rondel having read what I have ſaid at the end of the remark [I], in the article of Lucretius, was pleaſed to write to me, that he thought it would be oppoſed both by examples and arguments. ‘For in the firſt place, at Siam, and in other countries, where they believe in Sommona-Codom, it is an undoubted doctrine that this GOD concerns himſelf with nothing in his Nireupan, and ſuffers every thing upon earth to take its own courſe; and yet they pray to him, call upon him, and uſe all their endeavours to imitate him in the practice of virtue. See the firſt tome of Mr de la Loubere's relation. But in the ſecond place, ſuppoſing there was no Sommona-Codom, nor any other god in this world, the bare ſpeaking of the gods, and annexing to thoſe ideas all the beauty of morals, would induce many people to aſpire to that degree of glory (1).’ Being under a neceſſity of laying aſide a great many things till another time, I am forced, to my great grief, to ſuppreſs the ſequel of Mr du Rondel's fine letter; but I ſhall give the ſubſtance of it in theſe few words: he in a lively manner ſets forth the power of admiration, and ſhews by great examples, that the bare deſire of imitating an excellent model, has induced men to very difficult actions (2).

I. I ſhall anſwer firſt the objection he grounds upon the conduct of the Siameſe; and the better to clear the matter, I ſhall firſt of all ſet down the words of the Hiſtorian. ‘Sommona-Codom ordered, before he died, that ſtatues and temples ſhould be conſecrated to him, and ſince his death he is in that ſtate of reſt, which they expreſs by the word Nireupan. It is not a place, but a manner of being; for, ſay they, to ſpeak properly, Sommona-Codom is no where, and enjoys no felicity: he has no power, and is not in a condition to do men either good or harm: the Portugueſe call it annihilation. Nevertheleſs, the Siameſe believe on the other ſide, that Sommona-Codom is happy, they put up prayers to him, and aſk him whatever they want: whether it be that their doctrine is inconſiſtent with itſelf, or that they carry their worſhip beyond their doctrine: but in whatever ſenſe they aſcribe a power to Sommona-Codom, they are agreed in this, that he has no power, but over the Siameſe, and does not concern himſelf with nations, that worſhip other men than him (3).’ By this it plainly appears, that the Siameſe ſpeak inconſiſtently of their Sommona-Codom. They ſay that he enjoys no felicity; and, on the other hand, they think he is happy. One may therefore believe, that though they ſay he has no power, they take him to be very powerful: and therefore, it is no wonder if they pray to him; their notions are ſo confuſed, that they allow them to affirm contradictory things of one and the ſame object. When they conſider it in a certain ſenſe, they ſay one thing of it, and when they conſider it in another ſenſe, they deny it. Their notions are different from their inward ſentiments, which is the reaſon why their theory does not agree with their practice: however it be, we ought to believe that they do not invoke Sommona-Codom, as a Being to which they aſcribe no power, and which minds nothing, but as a Being in which they acknowledge ſome power in ſome reſpects, by virtue of an inward ſentiment, which commonly has a greater influence upon people, than the clear doctrines of ſpeculative men. The Hiſtorian does clearly inſinuate, that they aſcribe ſome power to him; in whatever ſenſe, ſays he, they aſcribe it to him, they are agreed in this, that he has no power but over the Siameſe. This is my firſt remark, to which I add this obſervation. They are fully perſuaded that ſome things lead the ſoul to an eternal happineſs or miſery, and that whatever they can do in the honour of Sommona-Codom is fine, praiſe-worthy, juſt, and proper to make one attain to the ſupreme good. And therefore, though they ſhould teach conſtantly, and without any appearance of contradiction, that he concerns himſelf with nothing, that he has no power, and does not hear the prayers put up to him, yet they would apply themſelves to him in their neceſſity, and practiſe ſuch virtues as he was pleaſed with; for it muſt, in their opinion, be the way to the ſupreme felicity. And therefore, I ſay, that their devotion and their practical morality are not contrary to what I advance; for they believe both an exiſtence and a providence. It is true, they aſcribe no providence to Sommona-Codom; but it is ſufficient for my purpoſe, that they attribute it to ſomething elſe, from which they expect to be rewarded for their good works. They have loſt the idea of GOD, as well as the Chineſe: but they have nevertheleſs preſerved that antient maxim according to which virtue is to be rewarded, and vice to be puniſhed (4). They aſcribe therefore that diſtributive Juſtice to a blind fatality. It is from this fatality they expect their happineſs, if they live virtuouſly; and they are perſuaded it will reward them for the honours paid to Sommona-Codom. To have a right notion of their impious doctrine, one needs only conſider the opinions of the Literati among the Chineſe: they are thoſe, who have degrees of literature, and the only men who have a ſhare in the government. They are grown altogether impious, and though they have not altered the language of their predeceſſors, yet have made the ſoul of the heavens, and all other ſouls, to be I know not what aërial ſubſtances, deſtitute of intelligence: and they have eſtabliſhed a blind fatality, as the only judge of mens actions.

(1) A Letter of Mr du Rondel, of the 28th of January, 1696.

(2) See the anſwer to the ſecond part of the objection, below.

(3) La Loubere, Relation de Siam, Tom. i, ch. xxiv, pag. m. 533, 534.

(4) Id. ibid. ch. xxiii, num. 15, pag. 515.

Father Tachard relates ſeveral things of this Sommona-Codom, whom he calls Sommonokhodom. He is, ſays he (c), the god whom the Siameſe worſhip at this time.
They ſuppoſe he ‘ was born a god by his own virtue, and that immediately after his ‘ birth, without any maſter to inſtruct him, he acquired, by a bare intuition of his mind,
‘ a perfect knowledge of whatever concerns Heaven and Earth, Paradiſe and Hell,
‘ and of the moſt impenetrable ſecrets of nature; that he remembred at the ſame time,
‘ whatever he had done in all the ſeveral lives he had lived; and that after he had taught ‘ thoſe

actions, that does, as they believe, what an omnipotent and moſt wiſe juſtice could do. They pretend that it is a thing conſonant to the principles of nature, that virtue ſhould be always attended with happineſs, and vice with miſery, by a certain, though unknown, ſympathy between virtue and happineſs, and between vice and miſery (5). Thus the Chineſe and Siameſe very much differ from Epicurus: they deny the exiſtence of God, and acknowledge a providence (6), whereas Epicurus rejected a providence, and acknowledged the exiſtence of a Deity. It is not therefore ſtrange that the Siameſe ſhould invoke Sommona-Codom, and endeavour to imitate his virtuous life; but one might wonder at Epicurus, if he had prayed to Jupiter, and laid a great conſtraint upon himſelf to honour the gods; for he was perſuaded that his prayers and endeavours would be of no uſe to him. On the contrary, the Siameſe believe that their worſhip of the heroe will bring them an ample reward. The blind fatality, the natural laws and ſympathies they acknowledge between virtue and happineſs, and between vice and miſery, are as powerful a motive and as great a curb as the belief of a knowing providence.

That the Doctrine of a natural and blind connection betwixt virtue and happineſs, and between vice and miſery, would have a greater influence on men, than the Chriſtian doctrine, concerning providence.

I go farther ſtill, and I ſay that according to the courſe of nature (7), that belief has not ſo great an influence as the opinion of the Siameſe. A natural connexion between virtue and happineſs, and between vice and miſery, would be more proper to act upon a mercenary mind, than the perſuaſion of the orthodox, without the divine grace. That connexion would never fail to produce it's full and perfect effect, ſince it would not be ſubmitted to a cauſe, which thinks fit ſometimes to derogate from it's laws, to extend or confine them, and to haſten or retard the execution of them, in a word, to diſpoſe of them according to it's deſigns and various circumſtances. That connexion, for that very reaſon that it were only a blind fatality, would afford good men a perfect certainty of a quick reward, and fill the wicked with a neceſſary fear of a quick puniſhment. But by ſuppoſing a providence, which diſpoſes of all things according to it's will, and with a wiſdom, all the deſigns of which we do not comprehend, one cannot be certain that a good action will be profitable, or a bad one detrimental; for one may think, in each particular juncture, that it is one of the caſes, wherein God is not pleaſed to follow the general law of rewarding good actions, or that of puniſhing evil ones. Chriſtians are agreed that God ſuſpends the execution of thoſe laws as long as he thinks fit. They even ſay, that an old ſinner, who has enjoyed all the pleaſures of life, will be eternally happy, provided that on his death-bed he perform one act of true repentance; and that whoever in his old age departs from the way of virtue, tho' he hath purſued it for a long time through many troubles, will be eternally damned (8). Doubtleſs this may be the reaſon why the fear of God's judgments, or the hope of his rewards, make no great impreſſion upon worldly people. If there was an indiſſoluble connexion between devoutly aſking a good thing of God, and obtaining it, none could doubt of the efficacy of a devout prayer; but, according to the doctrine of divines about that part of Divine worſhip, none can be ſure that the moſt earneſt and devout prayers of a mother for the recovery or converſion of her ſon, or for the deliverance of her huſband unjuſtly impriſoned, will be heard. Thoſe, who have heard ſome Divines preach about the efficacy of prayer, or who have read ſome books upon that ſubject, know that the proofs alledged and grounded either upon arguments or examples, are very ſtrong and cogent: however, the difficulties muſt be examined at laſt. Preachers do not conclude without ſuppoſing that it will be aſked, How comes it that ſome things are not obtained tho' they be aſked with faith, and for the greateſt glory of God? Their anſwer is, That God refuſes us what we aſked of him upon ſeveral occaſions, in order to try us, or humble us more and more, or becauſe he knows that the favours we pray for would be prejudicial to us, and becauſe our wants, and what concerns his glory, are better known to him than to us. There is no caſe in which every body may not judge that his prayers may not be granted thro' one of thoſe motives; hence it is that the hope of being heard is always mixed with great uncertainty, and that many people grow remiſs in the practice of prayer, or only aſk of God the general grace of acquieſcing in his will. Men would act quite otherwiſe, were they perſuaded that there is a neceſſary connexion between a devout prayer, and the obtaining of what is prayed for; they would apply themſelves to providence in all their wants, as they come near a fire, when they are troubled with cold. And therefore ſince the Siameſe are perſuaded that there is a fatal, immutable, and neceſſary connexion between virtue and happineſs, and between vice and miſery, that doctrine ſhould be a more powerful inducement to virtue among them, than religion is in other countries. They ſhould apply themſelves to virtue in order to be happy, as they have recourſe to food, when they are hungry; and they ſhould depart from vice to avoid miſery, as they keep off from the fire when they are afraid of being burnt. But then their morals would be wholly mercenary. The pure notions of honeſty would not be their principle. I muſt obſerve, by the by, that it is very ſtrange they ſhould believe what is told of them concerning that fatal connexion. Is there no man among them that grows rich by unlawful means, or is poor without being accounted vicious, or that is wounded by endeavouring to ſave another man's life? I fancy, if they were preſſed hard upon this head, they would come off with ſome Stoical notions, viz. that diſeaſes, vexation, and poverty, are no evils, and that riches, pleaſure, and health, are not good things (9). I could eaſily believe that the common people do not follow that opinion of a natural ſympathy between virtue and happineſs, and between vice and miſery; and that it is only a doctrine of their men of letters, who have denied a providence, and nevertheleſs were ſenſible that it is an uſeful thing to preſerve the common opinion concerning rewards and puniſhments.

Whether the admiration of an excellent Being, that can do neither good nor harm, may be of any uſe to make us virtuous.

II. I come now to examine the other part of the objection. I grant, that a man may admire and honour an object without expecting any reward for it, beſides the ſatisfaction of doing juſtice to merit; but I cannot grant that any man will invoke it againſt his inclinations, and offer ſacrifices to it in order to pleaſe it, and appeaſe it's anger, if he be well perſuaded, 1, That it concerns itſelf with nothing; takes care of nothing; that the ill lives of men do not diſpleaſe it, and that their good lives are not acceptable to it. 2. That there is no other Being that can reward the honours paid to that Being, or puniſh men for indulging their paſſions. This is the ground of the maxim I have advanced, that the belief of the exiſtence of GOD without the belief of a providence, cannot be an inducement to virtue, nor a curb to vice. But, will ſome ſay, May not men full of admiration for an excellent, holy, and happy being, that is honoured all over the world, propoſe it to themſelves as the model of their lives, and reſiſt their bad inclinations, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours to practiſe virtue in order to imitate it? I anſwer, they may do it, if they believe that this painful imitation will make them like that being, or procure them ſome other advantage of great value. But then their belief of the Divine exiſtence will be attended with the belief of a providence: they will believe, either as the Siameſe and Chineſe do, that nature has inſeparably united, by a blind fatality, happineſs with virtue, and miſery with vice; and that the imitation of one Sommona-Codom will in time put them in a ſtate like his; or they will believe that an intelligent legiſlator has deſigned rewards for thoſe, who ſhall chuſe the holy and happy life of the immortal gods for their pattern. At

---

(c) Tachard, Voiage de Siam, book vi, p. 205, Dutch Edit.

(5) Id. ibid. num. 14. p. 514.

(6) That is, a law whereby evil is puniſhed, and virtue rewarded.

(7) That is, without conſidering the operation of the Divine Grace, upon ſouls predeſtinated.

(8) Compare with this the xviiith chapter of Ezekiel.

(9) Compare what is ſaid before remark [E] of the article SADUCEES.

‘ thoſe great things, he left them in writing, that poſterity might be benefitted by them. He ſays in thoſe books, that being a god, he deſired one day to manifeſt his divinity to men by ſome extraordinary prodigy . . . . . (d). That immediately he found himſelf carried through the air on a throne ſhining with gold and precious ſtones, that came out of the earth in the very ſame place where he was; and that the angels at the ſame time coming down from Heaven paid him the honour and worſhip due to him . . . . . . (e). That ever ſince he aſpired to be a god, he returned into the world five hundred and fifty times under different ſhapes; that in each new birth, he had always been the firſt, and as it were the prince of thoſe animals under whoſe ſhapes he came into the world; that he had often given his life for his ſubjects, and that being an ape he delivered a town from a horrid monſter which deſolated it; that he had been a moſt potent king, and that ſeven days before he obtained the empire of the world, he removed, in imitation of a certain anchoret, with his wife and his two children, into remote ſolitudes, where he renounced the world and his paſſions . . . . . (f) That he had gone all over the world teaching men what is good and evil, and the true religion, which he writ down to leave it to poſterity. He had ſeveral diſciples, who, in the quality of prieſts, where to imitate him in a moſt particular manner by wearing an habit like his, and obſerving the rules he preſcribed to them, when at laſt he attained to the eighty ſecond year of his age . . . . . He was ſeized with a violent cholic of which he died. His ſoul aſcended into the eighth Heaven [B].’ We ſhall ſee below what is related of his brother [C].

leaſt, they will hope that mankind will be ſo equitable as to admire their virtue, and to beſtow glorious rewards upon it; and that, perhaps, ſome time or other they ſhall be deified. The glory of Miltiades had a great influence over Themiſtocles, tho' Themiſtocles expected nothing from Miltiades; I grant it: May not at this day the memory of the Alexanders and Cæſars have ſuch a power over the paſſions of ſome men, as to make them undertake the moſt difficult things? And yet they are fully perſuaded that thoſe conquerors know not what paſſes upon earth, and can do neither good nor harm. I own all this; but did not Themiſtocles know that by imitating Miltiades, he would attain to the ſame glory he did? Could thoſe who ſhould now tread in the ſteps of Cæſar and Alexander, be ignorant that trophies, panegyrics, and the immortality of their name would be the price and glorious reward of their labours? And therefore all the examples of the power of admiration and imitation, that can be alledged, ſuppoſe the exiſtence of a cauſe, which rewards the trouble of the admirer and the imitator; and conſequently they are not contrary to my aſſertion. Here is another reflexion. The belief of the Divine exiſtence, without a belief of a providence, ought not to be accounted an inducement to virtue, if whatever it can produce, may be produced by the meer idea of what is honeſt, and by the meer deſire of being praiſed: but the meer idea of what is honeſt, and the meer deſire of being praiſed, may produce whatever the admiration and imitation of the gods of Epicurus could effect. This is manifeſt if it be attentively conſidered. Therefore, &c. I would not take advantage of this, viz. That a follower of Epicurus could not flatter himſelf, that by imitating the virtues of the gods, he would be in time as happy as they were (10). That had been to no purpoſe, ſince Mr du Rondel does not ſuppoſe that Epicurus is alſo concerned in the objection. See the margin (11).

[B] His ſoul aſcended into the eighth heaven.] ‘ It is properly the paradiſe called Nyruppaam: the ſoul is no longer ſubject to pain and miſery, and enjoys a perfect felicity; and therefore ſhe will never be born again: this is what they call being annihilated, For they do not underſtand by that word the entire deſtruction of a thing, whereby it is reduced to nothing; but they only mean that it appears no longer upon earth, though it lives in heaven. As for his body it was burnt; and his bones, as they ſay, have been preſerved to this preſent time. They are partly in the kingdom of Pegu, and partly in that of Siam. They aſcribe a wonderful virtue to thoſe bones, and affirm that they ſhine with a divine ſplendor (12).’ It may be inferred from theſe laſt words, that the worſhip which the Siameſe pay to that god, is attended with the hopes of ſome advantage accruing from it.

[C] We ſhall ſee below what is related of his brother.] His name was Thevathat (13). ‘ (14) He was always born anew with his brother Sommonokhodom, of the ſame kind with him; but always inferior in dignity, becauſe Sommonokhodom was the prince of the animals, whoſe figure he aſſumed. But Thevathat aſpiring likewiſe to become a god, and not being able to bear any thing above him, would never ſubmit to his brother. On the contrary, he endeavoured, by continual revolts, to diſturb his reign, and left nothing unattempted to deprive him of the empire: at laſt he accompliſhed his deſign in ſome meaſure, for he killed him when they were both apes (15). . . . . (16) Having a great deal of wit and addreſs he found means to form a new ſect, in which he engaged ſeveral kings, and ſeveral nations, who followed him, to be his imitators. This occaſioned a ſchiſm, which divided the world into two parts, and gave birth to two religions, whereas before there was but one. Some . . . became diſciples to Thevathat, and others to Sommonokhodom. Thevathat, tho' the younger brother, finding himſelf ſupported by ſo many princes, who had undertook to defend him, made uſe of open force, as well as treachery, to deſtroy his brother, and invented the moſt horrid calumnies to blaſt his reputation; but he did not ſucceed in his deſigns. Nay, he was overcome more than once, when, in order to confirm his followers in his doctrine, he durſt contend with his brother, who ſhould work the greateſt miracles. His ambition made him wiſh to be a god; but not being truly one, he was ignorant of many things, whereof his brother had a perfect knowledge; and becauſe his pride did not permit him to hear Sommonokhodom, he did not learn of him what paſſed in paradiſe and in hell, nor the doctrine of tranſmigration, nor the changes which had happened and were to happen in all ages.’ The Siameſe (17) believe that the doctrine of Thevathat, as a ſource of ſchiſm and diviſion, has produced ſeven other ſects, which have a great affinity one with another. ‘ . . . (18) Thevathat having done ſo many injuries to his brother, without any reſpect for the rights of nature, and for the deity itſelf, it was juſt he ſhould be puniſhed for it. Accordingly the writings of the Siameſe mention his puniſhment; and Sommonokhodom alſo ſays in thoſe books, that being made a god, he ſaw his impious brother in the deepeſt part of hell. I ſaw him, ſays he, overwhelmed with evils, and groaning under the weight of his miſery. He was in the eighth abode, that is, in the place where the greateſt malefactors are tormented, where he expiated, by a horrid puniſhment, all the ſins he had committed, eſpecially the injuries he had done me. Afterwards, explaining the puniſhment he inflicted upon Thevathat, he ſays he was faſtened to a croſs with large nails (19), which piercing his hands and his feet, gave him violent pain; that he had a crown of thorns on his head, that his body was full of wounds, and to compleat his miſery, the infernal fire burnt him without conſuming him. He was moved with compaſſion at the ſight of ſuch a dreadful ſpectacle; he forgot all the injuries his brother

---

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 206.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 207.

(f) Ibid. pag. 214.

(10) Epicurus and his followers taught that the ſoul dies for ever with the body.

(11) I propoſe this only as a problem, which Mr du Rondel may examine, and I deſire him to confute it as much as he will think fit, for the further inſtruction of my readers.

(12) Tachard, Voiage de Siam, book vi, pag. 215, Dutch Edit.

(13) Id. ibid. pag. 206.

(14) Id. ibid. pag. 208.

(15) This ſtory ſeems to be derived from the Hiſtory of Cain and Abel.

(16) Tachard, ubi ſupra, pag. 209.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 211.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 212, 213.

(19) This makes them believe that Jeſus Chriſt is the ſame with Thevathat, and what confirms them moſt in that opinion (theſe are Father Tachard's words, ubi ſupra, book vi, pag. 214,) is that we worſhip the image of the crucified Saviour, which does perfectly repreſent the puniſhment inflicted upon Thevathat.

had done him, and he could not ſee him in that condition without reſolving to come to his aſſiſtance. In order to it, he propoſed to him to adore theſe three words, Pputhang, Thamang, Sangkhang: words ſacred and myſterious, for which the Siameſe have a profound veneration; the firſt whereof ſignifies God, the ſecond the word of God, and the third the imitator of God; promiſing him, that if he would accept ſuch reaſonable and eaſy terms, he would deliver him from all the torments to which he was condemned. Thevathat conſented to adore the two firſt words, but utterly refuſed to adore the third, becauſe it ſignified prieſt, or imitator of God, proteſting that prieſts were ſinful men, who deſerved no reſpect. It is for a puniſhment of ſuch a pride that he is under ſufferings to this day, and will ſuffer in hell for the ſpace of many years.

Judge by this whether the Siameſe can ſay, without contradicting themſelves, that he is a god who has no power. Do they not acknowledge that he can deliver from the moſt horrid torments of hell thoſe, who accept the conditions he propoſes to them? If you anſwer me, that this concerns the time when he was not yet in the eighth heaven; I will reply, that the example of Thevathat may make them afraid of being miſerable, if they do not conform to the good pleaſure and to the rules preſcribed to them by Sommonokhodom; and conſequently, their worſhip is not free from ſelf-intereſt. They fancy (20) that the Chriſtians are Thevathat's diſciples (21), and they are ſo afraid of being thrown into hell with Thevathat, if they follow his doctrine, that they cannot be perſuaded to embrace Chriſtianity.

(20) Tachard, ubi ſupra, book vi, pag. 209.

(21) Id. ibid. pag. 213.

SOPHRONIA, is the name that is given to a Roman lady, whom Euſebius commends for her courage and chaſtity. I cannot tell where they have found her name; for Euſebius does not name her either in the xivth chapter (a) of the viiith book of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, or in the xxxivth chapter of the firſt book of Conſtantine's life. He only ſays that this lady was married to the governor of Rome, and that knowing that the ſoldiers whom Maxentius made uſe of to bring him the woman he intended to raviſh, were already got into her houſe, with a permiſſion extorted from her huſband; ſhe demanded a little time under pretence of dreſſing her ſelf; and afterwards finding ſhe was alone in her chamber, ſhe thruſt a ſword into her breaſt, and ſhewed by this action, to that and the following ages, that nothing but Chriſtian virtue is invincible and proof againſt death. This is Euſebius's account. He does not ſay that ſhe aſked her huſband's leave, and GOD's pardon, for what ſhe was going to do; nor that the Church has given a teſtimony of the truth of her martyrdom by the declaration of her holineſs. They are meer gloſſes, which Moreri, being deceived by Charles Stephens [A], falſely aſcribes to that Hiſtorian.

(a) Moreri quotes the 17th after Charles Stephens, and ſeveral other Dictionaries.

[A] Moreri, being deceived by Charles Stephens.] The article of Sophronia not being very long in Charles Stephens, I ſhall ſet it down at length. ‘ Sophronia matrona Romana, altera Lucretia Chriſtiana, cum vim Decii Principis videret ſe paſſuram, conſentiente viro arrepto gladio ſeipſam transfixit, ac inter ſanctas mulieres eſt relata. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 17. - - - - Sophronia, a Roman lady, another Chriſtian Lucretia, perceiving that, with her huſband's conſent, ſhe was to be raviſhed by Decius, ſhe ſtabbed herſelf with a ſword, and was numbred amongſt the holy women.’ Moreri had from thence, that Sophronia is called the Chriſtian Lucretia; which is one fault, for he gives too large an extent to the words of the Latin Dictionary. The words conſentiente viro, which ought to be referred to paſſuram, and not to arrepto gladio, was a trap for Moreri; a comma ill placed, which made him believe that this lady did not kill herſelf without aſking her huſband's permiſſion to do it, cauſed his miſtake. Perhaps the comma ſignifies nothing to the matter; for if you put one next to paſſuram, and one next to viro, as Lloyd and Hofman do, the ambiguity will be the ſame. An exact and careful writer would have placed paſſuram next to viro, and then the reader would not have been uncertain. I need not take notice of the other miſtakes. I ſhall only ſay, that Moreri has not tranſcribed all the miſtakes of Charles Stephens; he has left out Decii Principis, and put the tyrant Maxentius in the room of Decius. Lloyd and Hofman have not corrected one ſyllable. I wonder Rivetus ſhould ſay, that Euſebius tells us, that Sophronia having prayed to God upon her knees, as it were to ſacrifice her chaſtity to Jesus Christ, killed herſelf in the preſence of the tyrant Maxentius. Euſeb. lib. 8. Hiſtoriæ refert de Sophronia præfecti Romanæ urbis uxore quod cum animadverteret maritum metu mortis perterritum, prodidiſſe pudicitiam ſuam Maxentio Tyranno, cum prius defixis genibus Deum oraſſet, tanquam pudicitiam ſuam Chriſto immolaturam, pectus coram eo ferro transfixiſſe (1). From whence I learn that he is alſo one of thoſe, who quote from the modern writers, without conſulting the originals. I had a better opinion of him. I was not ſurprized that Raviſius Textor in his Officina, and Decimator in his Sylva Vocabulorum, had committed the ſame faults with Charles Stephens. Thoſe authors did not think of verifying their quotations. Decimator ſeems to me more exact than all the reſt as to the alluſion to Lucretia; he does not ſay, as Moreri does, that Saphronia was called the Chriſtian Lucretia; but that ſhe might juſtly be called ſo: Caſtitatis nomine celebris, ita ut altera Lucretia Chriſtiana non immerito dici poſſit.

(1) Andr. Rivet. in Geneſ. Exercit. lxxiii, Oper. Tom. i, pag. 281. I have referred coram eo, to Maxentius; perhaps it ſhould be referred to maritus. Rivetus has committed a ſoleciſm in this place.

SORANUS (Quintus Valerius) flouriſhed in the VIIth century of Rome (a). He was eſteemed for his eloquence, but much more for his learning. He was the moſt learned man, that had been ſeen among the Latin authors. Though he was born near Rome (b), he had the country pronunciation [A], which doubtleſs did ſome prejudice to his eloquence. He had obſerved in his works a method, which Pliny followed

(a) See the remark [A], citation (2).

(b) See the ſame remark, citat. (4).

[A] The moſt learned man . . . . . he had the country pronunciation.] The proof of all this is to be found in the IIId book de Oratore; where Cicero ſays, that the moſt agreeable pronunciation of the Greek tongue was that of the Athenians (1). They ſpoke better without any learning, than the moſt learned Aſiatics. This is not to be underſtood as if their words had been better placed; it concerns only the tone of their voice, and their accent. Cicero ſays the ſame to the praiſe of the city of Rome: he obſerves that the moſt ignorant Roman ſurpaſſed in that reſpect the learned Soranus; learned, did I ſay, I ſhould rather call him the moſt learned man of that time. Hanc dico ſuavitatem, quæ exit ex ore, quæ quidem ut apud Græcos Atticorum, ſic in latino ſermone hujus eſt urbis maxime propria . . . . Noſtri minus ſtudent literis quàm Latini, tamen ex iſtis quos noſtis; urbanis, in quibus minimum eſt literarum, nemo eſt quin literatiſſimum togatorum omnium Q. Valerium Soranum lenitate vocis, atque ipſo oris preſſu & ſono facile vincat (2). Theſe words plainly inſinuate that Soranus was then living; and therefore I had reaſon to ſay, that he flouriſhed in the VIIth century of Rome; for Cicero ſuppoſes that the diſcourſes, which make up his work de Oratore, were made in the year 662.

(1) Eruditiſſimos homines Aſiaticos quivis Athenienſis indoctus, non verbis, ſed ſono vocis, nec tam bene quam ſuaviter loquendo facile ſuperabit. Cicero, lib. iii, de Oratore, folio. 90, D.

(2) Id. ib.

followed [B], for he added ſeveral ſummaries to his books, whereby the reader could chuſe what he had a mind to, without giving himſelf the trouble of reading them all over. It is ſaid he was ſo bold as to divulge a myſtery which the Romans kept very ſecret; it was the name of the tutelar god of their city. It is ſaid that he was puniſhed with death upon that account [C]. Perhaps he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from that Quintus Valerius, whom Pompey cauſed to be put to death [D]. I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that the reaſon why the Romans concealed the name of their tutelar god, has little ſolidity

662. Many believe that this Soranus was a friend of Cicero, and underſtand the following paſſage of him: Q. & D. Valerii Sorani, vicini & familiares mei non tam in dicendo admirabiles, quam docti & græcis literis & latinis (3). What goes before, ſhews that thoſe two Soranus's were not born at Rome, but in the Latium. I believe they were natives of Sora, a town of that country, according to Pliny and Ptolomy (4).

[B] A method which Pliny followed.] Theſe are his words in his preface to Titus ſon of Veſpaſian: ‘Quia occupationibus tuis publico bono parcendum ‘erat, quid ſingulis contineatur libris huic epiſtolæ ‘ſubjunxi: ſummaque cura, ne perlegendos eos habe‘res, operam dedi. Tu per hoc & aliis præſtabis ne ‘perlegant: ſed ut quiſque deſideraverit aliquid, id ‘tantum quærat & ſciat quo loco inveniat. Hoc ‘ante me fecit in litteris noſtris Valerius Soranus, in ‘libris quos ἐποπτίδων inſcripſit (5). - - - Becauſe ‘your time was to be ſaved for the public good, I have ‘ſubjoined to this epiſtle the contents of each book, and ‘endeavoured to ſpare you the pains of reading them over. ‘And hereby others may by you be benefitted; not being ‘obliged to read them over: but as any thing is wanted, ‘to look only for that, and know where to find it. This ‘was done before me, by Valerius Soranus, in the books ‘which he intituled, ἐποπτίδων.’ I muſt not forget the note of Father Hardouin: Epoptides ſcripſerat, hoc eſt, ut Turnebus quidem interpretatur, de Grammatica libros: tanquam de myſteriis literarum & doctrinæ. Erat enim ἐπόπται qui ad inſpicienda ſacra occulta admittebantur (6). It is certain our Soranus wrote ſome grammatical books. See Varro (7), and Aulus Gellius (8).

[C] To divulge a myſtery .... that he was puniſhed with death upon that account.] Pliny does not ſay in expreſs terms that Soranus divulged the name of the tutelar god of Rome; but it may be inferred from his words; Cujus (Romæ) nomen alterum dicere arcanis cæremoniarum nefas habetur: optimaque & ſalutari fide abolitum enunciavit Valerius Soranus luitque mox pœnas (9). He ſays the city of Rome had two names: one that was known to every body; and the other ſo myſterious that religion did not permit it ſhould be revealed, and that Soranus having divulged it, was immediately puniſhed for it. It is not to be doubted, but that the myſterious name was the ſame with that of the tutelar god of the town, or at leaſt, that it was looked upon as a thing that protected it (10). Solinus, who tranſcribes Pliny, took the liberty to ſpecify the puniſhment inflicted upon Soranus for his profanation: he ſays that he was condemned to death (11); but ſpeaks only of the unknown and myſterious name of the city, and does not ſay it was the name of the tutelar god of Rome. I am going to quote two authors, who are more particular upon this point, and leave us not to the trouble of making inferences: Verum nomen ejus numinis quod urbi Romæ præeſſet, ſciri ſacrorum lege prohibetur, quod auſus quidam tribunus plebis enuntiare, in crucem levatus eſt (12). This is the ground on which ſome ſay that our Soranus was tribune of the people; and that he was crucified (13). They are obliged to add ſomething of their own, for Servius names no body. The other paſſage, which I am to quote, is out of Plutarch. Διὰ τί τὸν Θεὸν ἐκεῖνον ᾧ μάλιστα τὴν Ῥώμην σώζειν προσήκει καὶ φυλάττειν, εἴτε ἐστὶν ἄῤῥην εἴτε θήλεια, καὶ λέγειν ἀπείρηται καὶ ζητεῖν καὶ ὀνομάζειν; ταύτην δὲ τὴν ἀπόῤῥησιν ἐξάπτουσι δεισιδαιμονίας, ἱστοροῦντες Οὐαλέριον Σωρανὸν ἀπολέσθαι κακῶς διὰ τὸ ἐξειπεῖν. Cur tutelarem Romæ Deum, maſne ſit an femina, dicere aut quærere, ejuſque nomen efferre nefas eſt? quod quidam interdictum à ſuperſtitione repetunt, narrantes Valerium Soranum malè periiſſe, quod nomen illud edidiſſet (14). - - - - Why is it a crime to ſpeak or aſk, whether the tutelar god of Rome is male or female, and to pronounce his name? Which prohibition ſome aſcribe to ſuperſtition, ſaying that Soranus miſerably periſhed for divulging his name. Note, that according to Plutarch, it was not allowed to inquire into the ſex or the name of the tutelar god of Rome. Note alſo, that ſome authors find ſomething more myſterious in Soranus's puniſhment; for they ſay, that as ſoon as he uttered that concealed name, he fell dead upon the place. They affirm (15) that this is to be found in Pliny, and ſeveral other writers. It is falſe that Pliny ſays ſo. We ſhall ſee in the remark [D] that, perhaps, Soranus's indiſcretion was not the occaſion of his death. Finally, take notice of a great miſtake in Gyraldus. Having ſaid, 1, (16) That Pliny and Solinus relate that Valerius Soranus was condemned to death for being ſo bold as to pronounce the occult name of Rome (17); 2, That Sempronius (18) wrote the ſame thing; he adds, that others affirm, that this Soranus was crucified, which occaſioned the worſhip of the goddeſs Angerona, the patroneſs of Silence. Alii in crucem ſublatum tradunt, & PROPTEREA cultam Deam Angeronam ſilentii præſidem (19). Servius is the only author who mentions the crucifixion of that impious perſon who divulged that myſtery; but neither he, nor any other, hath obſerved that this puniſhment gave occaſion to the worſhip of the goddeſs Angerona. It plainly appears from Pliny that this was a very antient worſhip, grounded upon the myſtery of the occult name of Rome. Exemplum religionis ANTIQUÆ ob hoc maxime ſilentium inſtitutæ. Namque Diva Angerona, &c (20). Solinus expreſſes himſelf more clearly ſtill: Inter ANTIQUISSIMAS ſane religiones Sacellum colitur Angeronæ (21). There is hardly any illuſion more dangerous than that of the particles termed cauſales by the Grammarians. They have occaſioned horrid blunders in the moſt learned compilers; and when a man goes about to give a different turn to what he tranſcribes, and to ſhorten it as much as he can, he will be apt to perplex and confound himſelf, unleſs he be very attentive. The learned Gyraldus was miſtaken for want of duly conſidering Pliny's words.

[D] Perhaps he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from that Quintus Valerius, whom Pompey cauſed to be put to death.] If I am not miſtaken, Plutarch is the only author who informs us of this particular. He ſays that Pompey being well informed of that man's learning, took him aſide, and walked with him. Note, that Pompey was then in Sicily, and that very day judging the criminals, that is, thoſe of Marius's party who were to be put to death. When he ſaw Quintus Valerius brought to the tribunal, he roſe up to diſcourſe with him in private; but as ſoon as he knew of him what he deſired to know, he ordered him to be killed. Plutarch relates this only upon the credit of an author, whom he miſtruſts as to thoſe things which concerned the friends or enemies of Cæſar (22). Γάϊος δὲ Ὄπιος, ὁ Καίσαρος ἑταῖρος, ἀπανθρώπως φησὶ καὶ Κοΐντῳ Οὐαλερίῳ χρήσασθαι τὸν Πομπήϊον. ἐπιστάμενον γὰρ ὡς ἐστι φιλολόγος ἀνὴρ καὶ φιλομαθὴς ἐν ὀλίγοις ὁ Οὐαλέριος, ὡς ἤχθη πρὸς αὐτὸν, ἐπισπασάμηνον καὶ συμπεριπατήσαντα, καὶ πυθόμενον ὧν ἔχρῃζε καὶ μαθόντα, προστάξαι τοῖς ὑπηρέταις εὐθὺς ἀνελεῖν ἀπαγαγόντας. Addit C. Oppius Cæſaris familiaris ſævum Pompeium etiam in Q. Valerium extitiſſe: quum enim ſciret humanitatis & literarum inter paucos ſtudioſum Valerium, ut actus ad ipſum eſt, ſeduxiſſe illum & deambulaſſe una, ubi accepit & didicit ab eo quæ cupiebat, imperaſſe lictoribus ut illicò auferrent eum & interficerent (23). May not one ſuppoſe, 1, That it was upon this occaſion that our Soranus divulged the unknown name of the city of Rome? 2, That Oppius omitted this particular, not to afford a pretence to excuſe Pompey? For if it might have been alledged that Soranus revealed to him ſuch a ſecret, he who cauſed him to be put to death might have been cleared, and his ſeverity might have been looked upon as an act of devotion, and a holy zeal againſt prophane men. I affirm nothing, and leave it to the judgment of the Critics.

I ſhall

---

(3) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 283.

(4) See Corradus, in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 284.

(5) Plinius, in Præfat. in fine.

(6) Harduin. in hunc locum Plinii.

(7) Varro de Lingua Latina, lib. vi, pag. m. 71.

(8) Aulus Gellius, lib. ii, cap. x.

(9) Plinius, lib. iii, cap. v, pag. m. 330, 331.

(10) See the paſſage of Macrobius in the remark [E].

(11) Valerium denique Soranum, quòd contra interdictum id eloqui auſus foret ob meritum profanæ vocis neci datum. Solin. cap. i, pag. 1.

(12) Servius, in lib. i, Georg. ver. 499.

(13) Vives in Auguſt. de Civitate Dei, lib. vii, cap. ix.

(14) Plut. in Quæſt. Romanis, pag. 278, E.

(15) Hermolaus, apud Gyraldum de Poëtis, Dialogo vi, p. 192, Edit. Lugd. 1696.

(16) Gyraldus, de Poët. Hiſtoria, Dial. iv, pag. 192.

(17) Pliny does not ſay ſo.

(18) It were to be wiſhed that Gyraldus had more clearly expreſſed what Sempronius he means; for Sempronius Tuditanus, and Sempronius Aſellio, who wrote books, lived before Valerius Soranus, mentioned by Cicero.

(19) Gyraldus, ubi ſupra.

(20) Plin. lib. iii, cap. v, pag. 331.

(21) Solin. p. 1.

(22) Ὀπίῳ μὲν, ὅταν περὶ τῶν Καίσαρος πολεμίων ἢ φίλων διαλέγηται, σφόδρα δεῖ πιστεύειν μετὰ εὐλαβείας. Cæterum Oppio quum de Cæſaris hoſtibus vel amicis agit non temere adjungenda fides eſt. Plut. in Pompeio, pag. 623, E.

(23) Plut. in Pompeio, pag. 623, E.

ſolidity in it [E]. It appears from two verſes of Soranus, which are ſtill extant, that he believed that God is the immanent cauſe of all things. That opinion does not differ from

I ſhall only ſay, that it is not to be imagined that Pompey had a mind to learn of him ſome political ſecrets, and ſome intrigues of Marius; for his deſire of having a private diſcourſe with him, was only grounded upon his knowing that he was a man of great learning. Plutarch obſerves it in expreſs words. Now it is certain that the knowledge of the Belles Lettres, and the ſtudy of Antiquity enabled Soranus to diſcover to Pompey a ſecret of religion, an unknown law, an old ceremony; but not the moſt private intrigues of Marius's factions. On the other ſide, it is not improbable that, as things ſtood then, Pompey was willing to know the occult name of Rome. His party, which was that of Sylla, had lately taken that town. Was Pompey ſure that the other party would never conquer it again? Did not Pompey ſee that the Republic would be expoſed to civil wars? was he not ſenſible of his own ambition? Could he think that the diſcovery of the name of the tutelar god would be of no uſe to him? However it be, if Quintus Valerius in Plutarch, and Soranus in Pliny are one and the ſame man, which is very likely, there is little reaſon to ſay that the profane indiſcretion of the man, who divulged the unknown name of Rome, was immediately puniſhed; for, according to Plutarch, he was puniſhed as one of Marius's accomplices. It is not true that Plutarch calls him a Philoſopher (24). Ludovicus Vives (25), Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, are in the wrong to ſay ſo. Note, that Florus reckons the death of the Prætor Soranus among the cruel actions of Sylla's party. Piget poſt hæc referre, ſays he (26), ludibrio habita fata Carbonis, fata Sorani prætoris, &c. This might be of ſome uſe to thoſe, who would prove that our Soranus was Prætor, and the ſame Valerius whom Pompey cauſed to be put to death.

[E] The reaſon why the Romans concealed the name of their tutelar god, has little ſolidity in it.] They had called forth, on ſome occaſions, the tutelar gods of other towns, and were afraid the like would be done to them. This was the reaſon why they were not willing that the name of their tutelar deity ſhould be known. They hoped the ignorance of that name would ſecure his protection to them, as the Tyrians believed they might keep their gods from removing by loading them with chains. This is one of Plutarch's anſwers to the queſtion above-mentioned (27). Πότερον, ὡς τῶν Ῥωμαϊκῶν τινὲς ἱστορήκασιν, ἐκκλήσεις εἰσὶ καὶ γοητεῖαι Θεῶν; αἷς νομίζοντες καὶ αὐτοὶ Θεούς τινας ἐκκεκλῆσθαι παρὰ τῶν πολεμίων, καὶ μετῳκηκέναι πρὸς αὐτοὺς, ἐφοβοῦντο τὸ αὐτὸ παθεῖν ὑφ' ἑτέρων; ὥσπερ οὖν Τύριοι δεσμοὺς ἀγάλμασι λέγονται περιβαλεῖν, ἕτεροι δὲ αἰτεῖν ἐγγυητὰς ἐπὶ λουτρὸν ἢ καθαρμόν τινα προπέμποντες, οὕτως ᾤοντο Ῥωμαῖοι τὸ ἄῤῥητον καὶ τὸ ἄγνωστον ἀσφαλεστάτην εἶναι Θεοῦ καὶ βεβαιοτάτην φρουράν. An quia, ut nonnulli rerum Romanarum ſcriptores tradunt, carmina quædam ſunt & præſtigiæ quibus dii eliciuntur: quibus uſi Romani cùm putarent ſe quoſdam hoſtium deos ad ſe traduxiſſe, cavere voluerunt ne idem ſibi ab aliis eveniret? Itaque ſicut Tyrii (28) vincula injicere ſimulacris dicuntur, alii autem cùm ea ad lavacrum aut luſtrationem aliquam deducunt, fidejuſſores pro reditu exigunt: ita Romani tutiſſimè ac conſtantiſſimè adſervari deum crediderunt, qui neque de nomine notus aliis eſſet. I have found in Pliny a paſſage ſo full of particulars, that the reader will be well pleaſed to find it here: ‘Verrius Flaccus auctores ‘ponit, quibus credat, in oppugnationibus ante omnia ‘ſolitum à Romanis ſacerdotibus evocari Deum, cujus ‘in tutela id oppidum eſſet: promittique illi eundem, ‘aut ampliorem apud Romanos cultum. Et durat in ‘Pontificum diſciplina id ſacrum: conſtatque ideo ‘occultatum, in cujus Dei tutela Roma eſſet, ne qui ‘hoſtium ſimili modo agerent (29). - - - Verrius ‘Flaccus relates from thoſe he can credit, that the firſt ‘thing done by the Romans in beſieging a city, was, by ‘their prieſts, to call forth the deity, in whoſe protection it ‘was, and to promiſe him the ſame, or a more ſumptuous ‘worſhip. And this religious ceremony ſtill remains in ‘the rituals of the prieſts: and therefore the god peculiar ‘to Rome was kept ſecret, leſt her enemies ſhould do the ‘like.’ Macrobius informs us of two things: one is (30), that every town is under the protection of a god, and that the Romans perceiving that it was likely the towns they beſieged, would be obliged to ſurrender, called forth their tutelar gods, whether they believed they could not take a town without it, or becauſe they thought it an impious thing to make the gods priſoners. The other is, that for theſe reaſons they concealed the name of the tutelar god of Rome, and the Latin name of that town. He adds, that the name of that deity was nevertheleſs ſeen in the books of ſome Antients: It is true they mentioned it differently; but as for the occult name of Rome, it was never known, no not to the moſt learned men; for the Romans took an effectual care to prevent their being treated as they had treated others, by calling forth the gods who protected them. Propterea ipſi Romani & deum in cujus tutela urbs Roma eſt ut ipſius orbis Latinum nomen ignotum eſſe voluerunt, ſed dei quidem nomen nonnullis antiquorum licet inter ſe diſſidentium libris inſitum: & ideo vetuſta perſequentibus quidquid de hoc putatur innotuit .... Ipſius vero urbis nomen etiam doctiſſimis ignotum eſt: caventibus Romanis ne quod ſæpe adverſus urbes hoſtium feciſſe ſe noverant, idem ipſi quoque hoſtili evocatione paterentur, ſi tutelæ ſuæ nomen divulgaretur (31). I wonder Macrobius did not know what Pliny and Plutarch relate of Soranus. He knew it not, ſince he ſays the myſterious name of Rome was always unknown even to the moſt learned men. I wonder alſo at his diſtinction between the tutelar god of Rome, and the concealed name of that city, to which he aſcribes likewiſe the ſame protection. But I wonder more ſtill, that having ſaid what I have juſt now mentioned, he ſhould give us the formulary of calling forth tutelar gods; for it appears by that formulary that there was no neceſſity to know the name or the ſex of the deities who protected a town. They called them forth without naming them, and with this clauſe, Whether you be a god or a goddeſs. Eſt autem carmen hujuſmodi, quo di evocantur cum oppugnatione civitas cingitur. SI. DEUS. SI. DEA. EST. CUI. POPOLUS. CIVITAS. QUE. KARTHAGINIENSIS. EST. IN. TUTELA. TE. QUE. MAXIME. ILLE. QUI. URBIS. HUJUS. POPOLI. QUE. TUTELAM. RECEPISTI. PRECOR. VENEROR. QUE. VENIAM. QUE. A. VOBIS. PETO. UT. VOS. POPOLUM. CIVITATEM. QUE. KARTHAGINIENSEM. DESERATIS. LOCA. TEMPLA. SACRA. URBEM. QUE. EORUM. RELINQUATIS. ABSQUE. HIS. ABEATIS. &c (32). Was not I in the right to ſay that the reaſon why the Romans kept the name of their tutelar god ſecret, was not a ſolid one? They knew not the names, nor even the ſex of the tutelar gods they called forth, and yet they called them forth; and therefore, what could it avail them that their enemies ſhould not know the name of the god who was the protector of Rome, or the true name of that city? Could this prevent practiſing againſt the Romans what they had done againſt other towns? Macrobius in particular is leſs excuſable than the other writers, ſince, in the very ſame page where he ſpeaks as they do, he recites a formulary of evocation, which confutes what he ſays. It is moſt certain that the conditional particle ſi Deus, ſi Dea, undeniably proves that they knew not the name of the god whom they called forth; for Varro affirms that they uſed thoſe words, when they were afraid of miſtaking the name of one deity for that of another. They made uſe of them when they offered ſacrifices upon occaſion of an earthquake; becauſe they knew not the name of the god, who was the cauſe of ſuch a calamity. Aulus Gellius is my author for it. Propterea, that is, becauſe the name of that god was unknown, veteres Romani .... ubi terram moviſſe ſenſerant, nunciatumve erat, ferias ejus rei cauſa edicto imperabant; ſed dei nomen, ita uti ſolet, cui ſervari ferias oporteret, ſtatuere & edicere quieſcebant; ne, alium pro alio nominando, falſa religione populum alligarent, eas ferias ſi quis polluiſſet, piaculoque ob hanc rem opus eſſet, hoſtiam, SI. DEO. SI. DEAE. immolabat. idque ita ex decreto pontificum obſervatum eſſe M. Varro dicit: quoniam & qua vi & per quem deorum dearumve terra tremeret incertum eſſet (33).

---

(24) He calls him a Philologer, and not a Philoſopher.

(25) Lud. Vives in Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. vii, cap. ix.

(26) Florus, lib. iii, cap. xxi.

(27) Plut. in Quæſt. Roman. pag. 278, 279.

(28) See Quintus Curtius, lib. iv, cap. iv, num. 22, & ibi Freinſhemius.

(29) Plin. lib. xxviii, cap. ii, pag. 559, 560.

(30) Conſtat omnes urbes in alicujus Dei eſſe tutela, moremque Romanorum arcanum & multis ignotum fuiſſe, ut cum obſiderent urbem hoſtium eamque jam capi poſſe confiderent, certo carmine evocarent tutelares deos: quod aut aliter urbem capi poſſe non crederent, aut ſi poſſet nefas æſtimarent deos habere captivos. Macrob. Saturnal. lib. iii, cap. ix, pag. m. 323.

(31) Id. ibid.

(32) Macrobius, ubi ſupra. He ſays he takes it from the fifth book Rerum reconditarum, of Sammonicus Serenus, who had found it in a book of Furius.

(33) Aulus Gellius, lib. ii, cap. xxviii.

from Spinoziſm [F]. I muſt alſo obſerve (c) why ſome think that he was tribune of the people. I make no doubt that he was related to D. VALERIUS SORANUS, who, as well as he, made himſelf more conſiderable for his learning, than for the beauty of his diſcourſes (d).

(c) In the remark [C].

(d) See the remark [A], citation (3).

[F] That opinion does not differ from Spinoziſm.] I need only quote a paſſage of St Auguſtin to prove this: (34) ‘Jovem ut Deus ſit, & maximè ut rex deorum, non alium poſſunt exſtimare, quàm mundum: ut in diis cæteris ſecundum iſtos ſuis partibus regnet. In hanc ſententiam etiam quoſdam verſus Valerii Sorani exponit idem Varro, in eo libro, quem ſeorſum ab iſtis de cultu deorum ſcripſit, qui verſus hi ſunt.

Jupiter omnipotens regum rex ipſe, deuſque (35),
Progenitor, genitrixque deum, deus unus, & omnis.

Exponuntur autem in eodem libro, ita ut eum marem exiſtimarent, qui ſemen emitteret, fœminam quæ acciperet: Jovemque eſſe mundum, & eum omnia ſemina ex ſe emittere, & in ſe recipere, qua cauſa, inquit, ſcripſit Soranus: Jupiter progenitor genitrixque: nec minus cum cauſa unum & eundem omnia eſſe. Mundus enim unus, & in eo uno omnia ſunt. - - - - They think that Jupiter, as a god, and eſpecially as king of the gods, can be nothing elſe but the world, that he reigns by the other gods in their ſeveral reſpects: in this ſenſe, the ſame Varro likewiſe explains ſome verſes of Valerius Soranus, found in that book, which he wrote ſeparately from his books concerning the worſhip of the gods. Theſe are the verſes:

Omnipotent Jove, king and god of kings, Progenitor and progenitrix of the gods, one god, and containing all.

And in that book they are ſo explained, as if he was underſtood to be the male who emitted, and the female who received the ſeed: and as if Jupiter was underſtood to be the world, and the being who emitted ſeeds of all kinds, and who received them. For this reaſon ſays he, Soranus wrote Jupiter Progenitor genitrixque; and that the world is nevertheleſs one and the ſame with it's cauſe: for the world is one, and in it are all things.’

(34) Auguſtin. de Civitate Dei, lib. vii, cap. ix, pag. m. 637.

(35) There is in the old manuſcripts, as Lodovicus Vives obſerves, rerumque deumque, and I find the ſame reading in the 11th chapter of the ſame book of St Auguſtin in my edition.

SOUBISE, a town in Saintonge. Many perſons of quality had their name from it. In 1575, it fell to the houſe of Rohan by the marriage of Catherine de Parthenai, daughter and heireſs of John de Parthenai-l'Archeveſque, with Renatus de Rohan II of that name. This John de Parthenai, known by the name of Soubiſe, will be the ſubject of the following article.

SOUBISE (JOHN DE PARTHENAI LORD OF) is one of the heroes of the XVIth century among the Proteſtants of France. He began to learn their doctrine at the court of the Duke of Ferrara (a); when Renata of France, daughter of Lewis XII, and wife of that Duke, received there ſome preachers of the Reformed Religion, and embraced their opinions. Being returned into France, he laboured with great zeal [A] to propagate the truths he had learned; and Catherine de Medicis was like to become his proſelyte [B]. In the very begining of the criſis, which made the war unavoidable between the two religions in 1562, he was one of the moſt conſiderable aſſociates of the Prince of Condé, who choſe him to command at Lyons, when that great town, which had declared for the Cauſe, did not ſeem to be ſafe in the hands of the Baron des Adrets. Soubiſe wonderfully juſtified the choice that was made of him to keep ſuch a place; for notwithſtanding all the difficulties he went through, he preſerved it, and gave a good account of it. He performed there many valiant and maſterly actions (b). The Duke of Nemours beſieged that town to no purpoſe, and the queen-mother endeavoured in vain to impoſe upon him by negotiations (c). He was very much ſuſpected of having a hand in the murder of the Duke of Guiſe; and it appears that Poltrot laid many things to his charge in his depoſitions: nevertheleſs, it is the opinion of the moſt equitable writers of the Church of Rome [C], that he was not concerned in that abominable action. He had

(a) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſ. lib. x, towards the end.

(b) See Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. i, pag. 212, 215, Dutch edition; but ſee particularly, Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. book xi.

(c) Varillas. ibid. pag. 225.

[A] He laboured with great zeal.] The author of the hiſtory of the Reformed Churches, makes the following obſervation concerning the Reformation of the town of Soubiſe (1). ‘As for the town of Soubiſe, the lord of that place, who was a man of an extraordinary piety, had ſo ordered it, that many people, living in his lands, were already very well inſtructed. Which that good old man (2) perceiving, he ſo earneſtly laboured in the work of the Lord, that every body looked upon his labours as a miraculous thing. He never ſlept in the night, (becauſe they durſt not meet but in the night, and very ſecretly) and then went through all the adjacent places, being often obliged to make his eſcape into the woods, where he ſpent whole nights. In ſhort, the lord did ſo effectually employ him in his work, that in a little time a great part of the people forſook the maſs in the neighbouring country.’

(1) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. ii, ad ann. 1559, pag. 199.

(2) He means a miniſter, called Michael Mulot, who was above ſixty years old.

[B] Catherine de Medicis was like to become his proſelyte.] I ſhall quote an author (3), who read a manuſcript life of Soubiſe, wherein, doubtleſs, he found many particulars. ‘The admiral, ſays he, was only miſtaken in believing that Catherine de Medicis was a Calviniſt in her heart; but any body elſe would have been deceived in it Soubiſe acquainted him with the long conferences he daily had with that princeſs about Calviniſm. He aſſured him that ſhe was as well inſtructed in it as the Queen of Navarre. He ſuppoſed at leaſt, that ſhe was no leſs inclined to it . . . The Ducheſs of Montpenſier was always preſent at thoſe converſations, and ſeemed to be ſo well perſuaded of Soubiſe's diſcourſes, that ſhe oppoſed, as much as ſhe could, the deſign of her huſband, who intended to put into a nunnery their three laſt daughters. . . . . And, indeed, the ducheſs being at the point of death, when diſſimulation can be of no uſe, ſent for John Malot, a miniſter of Paris, and deſired to receive the ſacrament in the Calviniſtical way, which was denied her.’ Varillas informs us in another place (4), that Soubiſe, who left the queen at laſt, being weary of her delays, affirmed, that tho' ſhe wanted courage to declare herſelf a Calviniſt, ſhe would not be ſorry to be forced to it. He was not much miſtaken in thinking ſo, witneſs what ſhe ſaid (5), when ſhe heard the falſe news that the Proteſtants had won the battle of Dreux, Well, we muſt then pray to GOD in French; to which I add, the great fondneſs ſhe ſhewed to the friends of the new opinions. She would have quickly reſolved to abjure Popery, if it had been worſted, and to procure to Soubiſe the glory of a great converter. Varillas owns (6), that ſhe ſided with the Catholic party more out of neceſſity than out of choice.

(3) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. i, pag. 60.

(4) Ibid. pag. 139.

(5) Mezerai, Abrége Chronol. Tom. v, pag. m. 72, ad. ann. 1562.

(6) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 332.

[C] It is the opinion of the moſt equitable writers of the Church of Rome.] Mr Le Laboureur made no ſcruple to publiſh theſe remarkable words. ‘The Admiral had been gentleman of the kings chamber (d), and was made knight of the order the ſeventh of December 1561 (e). He had commanded the army of Henry II, in Tuſcany [D]; and to uſe Le Laboureur's words (f), he was a man of great conduct and experience. He died in 1566 (g), being about fifty-four years of age (h). He had married Antoinette Bouchard, eldeſt daughter of the houſe of Aubeterre. She was a lady very zealous for her religion [E]. They left but one daughter; viz. Cartherine de Parthenai, whom I have mentioned in it's proper place. The firſt huſband ſhe had, viz. the Baron du Pont in Bretagne, took the name of SOUBISE: it is he who makes a glorious figure in the moſt remarkable actions of the ſecond and third civil wars. He was taken priſoner at the battle of Jarnac in 1569; but he dextrouſly made his eſcape (i). La Nouë being wounded at the ſiege of Fontenai-la-Comte the year following (k), Soubiſe commanded in chief, and made himſelf chief maſter of the place. In the ſame year he received two wounds at the ſiege of Saintes (l). He was killed during the Paris maſſacre [F], after he had defended himſelf like a lion. The ladies (m) were curious to ſee what ground there was for the action (n) that was brought againſt him. I ſpeak of it in another place (o).

(d) Beza, Hiſt. Eccl. book iii, pag. 257.

(e) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſteln. Tom. i, pag. 378.

(f) Le Labour. ibid. pag. 804.

(g) Id. Ibid. pag. 378.

(h) Varillas, Charles IX, Tom. i, pag. 275.

(i) D'Aubigné, Tom, i, p. 396.

(k) Vraye Hiſt. des Troubles, lib. xiii.

(l) D'Aubigne, Tom. i, pag. 475.

(m) Id. ibid. pag. 546.

(n) It was a proceſs about impotency.

(o) In the article QUELLENEC, and in the remark [C] of the article PARTHENAI.

'miral de Chatillon, the Count de la Rouchefoucaut, 'and the Sieurs de Soubiſe and Feuquieres had no hand 'in Poltrot's conſpiracy . . . One cannot belive ſuch 'a thing of men of their quality; and it is ſo ill 'proved by the interrogatories of the murderer, that 'it is plain, his only deſign in accuſing them was to 'make the world believe, that ſome leaders of a 'faction that was actually in arms, had a hand in 'that plot (7).'

[D] The army of Henry II in Tuſcany.] If we believe Brantome, he was brought into trouble when he had that employment. That Hiſtorian ſays (8), that as to the affair of Poltrot, Mr de Soubiſe was by many accuſed of ingratitude; for being charged by the Svieneſe with ſeveral things he had done in Tuſcany, when he was employed there in King Henry's reign, the Duke of Guiſe interceded for him. I cannot tell why Varillas amplifies and paraphraſes thoſe words in the following manner (9). After the war of Siena, in which it was ſaid that Soubiſe had been guilty of a miſdemeanour, both as to the war, and the diſtribution of money, ſome accuſations were brought againſt him by his enemies, tending to deprive him of his honour and life; but the Duke of Guiſe openly protected him.

[E] A lady very zealous for her religion.] A report being ſpread that the Catholics deſigned to take her, to carry her to the gates of Lyons, and to threaten to ſtab her and her daughter in the ſight of her huſband, if he refuſed to ſurrender that place; Soubiſe ſent to her Poltrot, who came back with ſome letters of that lady, wherein ſhe intreated him to ſuffer them both to be killed, and to remain faithful to his party (10). She was a worthy wife of a man, who expreſſed an unſurmountable averſion for all ſeparate treaties, and proteſted he would never ſign none but ſuch as ſhould be already ſigned with the Prince of Conde's hand (11). She was likewiſe a worthy ſiſter of the viſcount d'Aubeterre, who forſook all for the Proteſtant religion, and ſubmitted to a very hard life. Brantome ſpeaks of him in the following manner (12): 'He was a refugee at 'Geneva, and a Button-maker by trade; for there 'was a law in that town, that every body ſhould 'have a trade and live by it, tho' he were a gentleman or a lord. The ſaid Aubeterre, tho' a man of 'a noble family, was a Button-maker: I ſaw him 'once, as I went through Geneva, very poor and 'miſerable. Afterwards he was taken, during the 'conſpiracy of Amboiſe, and condemned like the reſt; 'but the duke of Guiſe, at the requeſt of the Mare'chal de St André, procured him his pardon, and 'ſaved his life.' Some have ſaid (13) that by the recommendation of the lady de Soubiſe, counſellor Fumée was ſet at liberty, when he run the ſame danger as counſellor du Bourg; but others (14) aſcribe it to the expedients ſuggeſted by Soubiſe to the Queen-mother, who had been kind to him long before. Catharina, they are Thuanus's words (15), in gratiam Joannis Parthenæi Soubiſæ reguli ſibi percari, & Fumeo amiciſſimi ſua commendatione apud judices illius cauſam non parum ſublevaſſe creditur. It is very likely d'Aubigné miſtook the wife for the huſband.

[F] Was killed during the Paris maſſacre.] Varillas ſays, that after Poltrot's attempt, Soubiſe went but once to court, which he left before he had been taken notice of, being afraid that the Guiſes were not perſuaded of the truth of what was publiſhed, to invalidate the depoſition of an aſſaſſin, who had been his domeſtic. If this be true, he would not have gone to the King of Navarre's wedding, or to the Pariſian Veſpers, if he had been living; and it would be a new proof that Soubiſe mentioned by d'Aubigné, was the Baron du Pont (16).

(7) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſteln. Tom. ii, pag. 225.

(8) Mémoir. Tom. iii, in the life of the Duke of Guiſe.

(9) Varill. Charl. IX, Tom. i, pag. 327.

(10) The manuſcript life of Soubiſe, quoted by Varillas, Charles IX, Tom. i, pag. 331.

(11) Varillas, Charles IX, pag. 277, upon occaſion of the truce which des Adrets concluded for the Proteſtants of Dauphiné, and to which he endeavoured to have Soubiſe's conſent.

(12) Memoirs, ubi ſupra.

(13) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, p. 123.

(14) La Planche, Hiſt. de Franç. II, pag. 147. Beza, Hiſt. Eccl. lib. iii, pag. 257.

(15) Thuanus, lib. xxiii, pag. m. 467.

(16) This is undeniable.

SOUBISE (BENJAMIN DE ROHAN, DUKE OF [A]) grand-ſon of the foregoing, and the ſon of Renatus de Rohan II of that name, and of Catherine de Parthenai vigorouſly ſeconded the enterpriſes of the Duke of Rohan his brother, both to relieve Rochelle, and to ſupport the Proteſtant party in France. He had learned the art of war in Holland, under Prince Maurice, and he was one of the French gentlemen who threw themſelves into Bergue (a), when the Spaniards beſieged that place in the year 1606. He ſuſtained the ſiege of St Jean d'Angely in 1621, againſt an army commanded by Lewis XIII in perſon; and when he ſurrendred the place, obtained an amneſty for what was paſſed, upon promiſe of obedience for the time to come [B]. Nevetheleſs he made himſelf maſter of Royan towards the latter end of the ſame year. In the month of February

(a) Grotius, Ann. lib. xv.

[A] Duke of Soubiſe.] I give him that title in imitation of the author who publiſhed the life of theDuke of Rohan in 1666. That writer only follows the common road. Nevertheleſs, it muſt be acknowledged, that the lordſhip of Soubiſe was never erected into a duchy, and that the Geographer du Val, who affirms it (1), does it without reaſon. It is an abuſe that ſtrangely prevails in the noble families of France, to annex ſometimes one title, and ſometimes another to an eſtate, without expecting letters of erection. Do not we ſee that the ſons of dukes bear, under the title of marquiſate, the name of the eſtates of which their fathers ſtyle themſelves dukes? Nay, there are ſome eſtates that belong no longer to a family, and yet the perſons belonging to that family take the name of thoſe eſtates; one calls himſelf Marquis, another Count, another Viſcount or Baron, &c. of the ſame eſtate. Mr le Laboureur exclaims very juſtly againſt it (2).

[B] Upon promiſe of obedience for the time to come.] The author who anſwered the Duke of Soubiſe's manifeſto in 1625, pretends (3), that the duke aſked the king's pardon when he came out of St Jean d'Angeli, and that he ſwore to be for ever his moſt faithful ſubject and ſervant; to bear arms no longer againſt his ſervice, upon any pretence whatſoever; and to adhere no more to the aſſociations and aſſemblies that ſhould be made without his majeſty's authority. He pretends alſo that the Proteſtant Hiſtorians took care not to inſert in their Hiſtories the

(1) In his book, intituled, la France, in the chapter of Xaintonge.

(2) Addit. à Caſteln. Tom. ii, pag. 793.

(3) Mercure Franç. Tom. xi, pag. 262.

February 1622, he ſeized upon Olonne, and was ſo fully maſter of the country in the lower Poitou, that his parties went and made ſome priſoners within five leagues from Nantes. This good fortune was of ſhort continuance, for he was ſo vigorouſly attacked in the iſle of Rié [C], ſoon after he had ſubdued it, that all his forces were there ſcattered. He retired to Rochelle, where the inhabitants expreſſed ſome contempt and diſſatisfaction againſt him; which moved him to go the ſooner into England to aſk for ſuccours. The court of France being informed of it, he was declared guilty of high-treaſon the fifteenth of July 1622. He found means to fit out ſome ſhips, notwithſtanding the refuſal of his Britannic Majeſty; but they were caſt away at Plymouth. In the beginning of the year 1625 (b), he ſeized on the iſle of Ré, and made an attempt upon Blavet or Port-Louïs in Bretagne, in which he had but an imperfect ſucceſs; for it was commonly his fate not to be very fortunate [D] in the vaſt projects he formed. He took the port and ſix men of war he found in it; the landing forces took the town; but meeting with ſome reſiſtance in the fort, he re-embarked his troops, and went away, not without leaving behind him ſome ſhips that run a-ground [E]. One of thoſe he took, called the Virgin Mary, carried eighty guns, and coſt above two hundred thouſand crowns. He had the mortification of being diſowned by the Proteſtants, though it was not doubted that he had concerted every thing with the Duke of Rohan his brother, in the conferences he had with him at Caſtres, during the autumn of the year 1624. He publiſhed a manifeſto, which was aſcribed to La Milletiere, who ſtyled himſelf intendant of the Church's Admiralty: and while he waited a proper time to make a deſcent near Bourdeaux, he made himſelf formidable by taking ſeveral merchant-ſhips, and kept all the coaſt in awe from the mouth of the Garonne to the mouth of the Loire. He entered the Garonne the eleventh of June 1625 with a fleet of ſeventy-four ſail, and making a deſcent into the Medoc, poſſeſſed himſelf of Caſtillon. After all, this undertaking ſignified but little; he was quickly obliged to return into the iſle of Ré, from whence advancing ſome days after towards the fleet of the enemy's, he burnt the Dutch Admiral [F], which made the court haſten the preparations that were making to clear that coaſt. The Duke of Montmorency, Admiral of France, ſupported by the Dutch ſhips, beat Soubiſe's fleet. He was driven from the iſle of Ré, and then from that of Oleron, and forced to retire into England (c). He was there very inſtrumental to procure to the Rochellers the ſuccours that were ſent to them; and when that town was taken, notwithſtanding that aſſiſtance, he did not care to enjoy the benefit of the amneſty in France, but rather choſe to ſtay in England, where he died without iſſue, and from whence the oath taken by M. de Soubiſe, and by thoſe that came out of St Jean d'Angeli with him, but that it is to be found in the regiſtry of the Provoſtſhip of the Hôtel, and in the memoirs of the Sieur de Modene, great Provoſt of France, printed at Toulouſe in the year 1621.

(b) This event is placed in the year 1624, in the Miniſtere du Card. de Richelieu.

(c) Taken from ſeveral volumes of the Mercure François.

[C] In the iſle of Rié.] Mr de Puyſegur has confounded that defeat with the loſs which the Duke of Soubiſe ſuſtained in the iſle of Ré in the year 1625. After the ſiege of Montpellier, ſays he (4), there was no war againſt the Proteſtants for the ſpace of four years. The king cauſed a fort to be built near Rochelle . . . . . . and then he went into the iſle of Ré with his army commanded by the Prince of Condé. The Duke of Soubiſe, who had four thouſand men in that iſland, was beaten. Thus you ſee how the reſemblance of names occaſions Anachroniſms. The victory of the iſle of Rié, wherein Lewis XIII was in perſon, was obtained before the ſiege of Montpellier; but neither he nor the Prince of Condé were preſent at that of Ré, which happened after that ſiege.

(4) Memoires, pag. 37, Dutch Edit.

[D] It was his fate not to be very fortunate.] If this was the only thing charged upon him in the relations of the Roman Catholic writers, they could not be ſuſpected of being too paſſionate; but they go ſo far as to accuſe him of want of courage. It is too great an inſult. They pretend that a great lord told the king, Sir, M. de Soubiſe having ſhunned your preſence at Rié, and now that of your admiral in the iſle of Ré, there is reaſon to believe that if he goes on, he will be, one day, the oldeſt captain in your kingdom (5). It is ſaid in the ſame relations (6), that he did not engage in the fight of the iſle of Ré, and that as ſoon as he ſaw the ill ſucceſs of it, he haſtily made his eſcape in a ſhallop, without his hat and his ſword. Nay, we are told, that his captain of the guards having ſeen that ſword, ſaid it had certainly dropt from his belt, becauſe he was ſure he had not drawn it. The ſatires upon the defeat in the iſle of Ré are ſtill more injurious (7). He has been reproached with another thing very different from that, viz. That at his return from England, he made a gentleman belonging to him ſwear, that if he ſaw his ſhip ready to be taken, and if they could not make their eſcape, he would ſet the powder on fire to burn them all, chuſing to die in ſuch a manner, rather than make their enemies triumph by their being made priſoners (8). But that the reader may have a better reaſon to miſtruſt the Hiſtories publiſhed by the Catholic party, I ſhall mention a ſlander that looks like one of thoſe calumnies, that are ſpread among the people to keep up their zeal by ſtirring their paſſions. It was given out (9), that when the inhabitants of Olonne deſired to capitulate, Mr de Soubiſe anſwered them haughtily and impudently, that he would have them chuſe the moſt handſome maids they had, to be beſtowed on his favourites, after he had ſatiated himſelf, or give him a hundred thouſand crowns; that both conditions being rejected, he promiſed to exempt them from being plundered for twenty thouſand crowns, eighty pieces of canon, and three ſhips, and that he plundered them, tho' they had granted him all his demands.

(5) Merc. Franc. Tom. xi, pag. 891.

(6) Ibid. pag. 882. See alſo the Miniſtere du Cardinal de Richelieu, at the year 1625, pag. 179, Dutch Edit.

(7) See the Mercure Franç. Tom. viii, pag. 559.

(8) Mercure Franç. Tom. xi, pag. 281.

(9) Claudius Malingre Hiſt. de la Rebellion, Tom. ii, pag. 225.

[E] Not without leaving behind him ſome ſhips that run a-ground.] To ſhew the partiality of thoſe relations, I ſhall ſet down here what a Catholic author (10) tells us about that attempt upon Blavet. He ſays that the Duke of Soubiſe with only three hundred ſoldiers and a hundred ſeamen, ſo vigorouſly attacked the large ſhip called the Virgin, that, after ſome reſiſtance, he boarded her ſword in hand, took her, and then all the reſt. . . . . . And that the Port having been ſhut up with men, and with an iron chain and a large cable, he was confined in it three weeks; but the wind turning about, he made uſe of it, and cauſed the chain and the cable to be cut with hatchets, notwithſtanding the fire that was made upon him, and went out with the king's ſhips, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the iſle of Oleron. How come theſe paſſages that are glorious to him, to be omitted in the Mercure François?

(10) The author of the Hiſtory of the Duke of Rohan, printed at Paris 1666. I have ſaid in another place that this Hiſtory is aſcribed to M. Fauvelet du-Toc.

[F] He burnt the Dutch Admiral.] I have ſeen no author yet, that makes a ſolid anſwer to thoſe, who ſay that the Duke of Soubiſe broke his word to the Dutch admiral. We are told (11) they had agreed to undertake nothing one againſt another, during the negotiations for a peace that were carrying on at the court; but that Soubiſe taking advantage of the promiſe the Admiral had made him, came up with him in half an hour's time by the help of the wind and tide, took

(11) Miniſt. du Card. de Richelieu, p. m. 177.

whence he endeavoured to prejudice the court of France as much as he could [G]. The name of Soubise continues ſtill in the houſe of Rohan, in the perſon of Francis de Rohan, ſon of Hercules de Rohan Duke of Mombazon, which Francis de Rohan ſtyles himſelf Prince of Soubise. He married the ſixteenth of April 1663 Anne de Rohan, daugther of Henry Chabot and of Margaret de Rohan, heireſs of the Duke of Rohan. He is captain of the Gendarmes, and has ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, for inſtance, at the battle of Seneſ, where he had his leg broke. The Princeſs of Soubiſe, his conſort, was lady of honour to the late Queen of France, and has been accounted one of the greateſt beauties of the court (d). She has been very much praiſed by the authors of that time, and no leſs admired for her virtue and wiſdom than for her beauty. The news writers in Holland gave out that the Prince of Soubiſe was one of thoſe, who laid down their commiſſions of lieutenants-general, becauſe they were not comprehended in the promotion of the Mareſchals of France, that was made in March 1693.

The Abbot de Soubise, his ſon, diſtinguiſhed himſelf during the courſe of his ſtudies. He was made coadjutor of the biſhopric of Straſburg ſome months ago (e). His elogy may be ſeen in the epſtile dedicatory of the poſthumous works of the Chevalier de Meré.

(d) See Cotin's Oeuvres Galantes. Mr Menage made ſome Greek verſes upon that lady's being adviſed to bath herſelf in the ſea, after ſhe had been bitten by a dog. They are very fine verſes, and may be ſeen at pag. 178, of his Poems, Edit. Amſtel. 1687.

(e) I write this in May 1701. The Prince of of Rohan, elder brother of this coadjutor, was made Field-Marſhal, in 1702; and married the heireſs of Ventadour, (Mercure Galant, January 1702, pag. 421, 422) widow of the Prince de Turenne killed at the battle of Steinkerk. Ibid. July 1701, pag. 345.

took his ſhip, when he expected no ſuch thing, and burnt it by means of two pinaces full of fire-works. It is further ſaid in the Mercure François (12) that hoſtages had been given on both ſides. It is likely the aggreſſor was not without an anſwer, when he was charged with unfaithfulneſs in that reſpect. The Catholic writer of the Duke of Rohan's life makes no mention of that reproach: he ſays that Soubiſe being informed that Manty, and Hautin, Admiral of Zealand, came upon him with forty ſhips, he went to meet them, ſunk five of their ſhips, and killed above fifteen hundred men. I have juſt now read what the Proteſtant author, who took the fictitious name of Theophile Miſathée, publiſhed in Soubiſe's vindication (13). It is ſomething, but I could deſire a better diſcuſſion, and a more exact verification.

[G] To prejudice the court of France as much as he could.] For it appears by a declaration of Lewis XIII, dated the eighth of June 1641 (14). That it was a year ſince ſome of thoſe who had been ſent by the Sieurs de Soubiſe and la Valette, to corrupt the fidelity of ſeveral Frenchmen, fell into his majeſty's hands, and had confeſſed, that the ſaid Soubiſe and la Valette . . . . were treating with the king of Spain to make a deſcent into Bretagne and Aulnis, or into the river of Bourdeaux.

(12) Tom. xi, pag. 874.

(13) Apologie pour les Egliſes Réformées de France, printed in 1625, chap. x.

(14) See Montreſor's Memoirs, pag. 366.

SOUCHES (Lewis Rattuit, Count de) ſon of a gentleman of Rochelle [A] called John Rattuit Sieur de Barres, left France after the war of the Proteſtants, and went through Holland and Germany in his way to Sweden. He was no ſooner arrived there but he had a proſpect of being raiſed by the good offices of Count de la Gardie, who quickly procured him a regiment of Dragoons, and then a regiment of Foot. After he had ſerved ſome years, he had a quarrel with his General (a), laid down his commiſſion, and fought him; and intending to return into France by the way of Auſtria and Italy, he ſtaid ſome days at Vienna; and becauſe the Arch-Duke William, brother

(a) Called Stallhans.

[A] He was ſon of a gentleman of Rochelle.] The author of the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary was ſadly deceived by what he had heard in common diſcourſe; when he affirmed that Count de Souches was the ſon of a Grocer of Rochelle. There is not any occaſion, wherein a hear-ſay is more to be miſtruſted, than when it concerns the birth of a perſon raiſed to great poſts, whoſe anceſtors are not mentioned in Hiſtory. This ſilence proves only that they did not appear at court, or had no conſiderable employments in their provinces; but it is no proof that they were not gentlemen. And yet through I know not what baſe or malicious inclination to tell lies, people take delight in vilifying, as much as they can, the birth of a favourite, a miniſter of ſtate, or a general of an army, who is the firſt of his family, that was raiſed to great preferments (1). Some ſay, his father was a Peaſant, a Fiſherman, or a Servant; others will have it, that he was the ſon of a Shoemaker, a Pedlar, or at moſt, of a Scrivener, or an Attorney's Clerk. They are ſometimes in the right, and very often miſtaken; and therefore prudence requires one ſhould miſtruſt thoſe common reports; for when the thing is narrowly examined, it commonly appears that this pretended ſon of a Pedlar, or Fiſherman, is of a very noble family, but little known out of its diſtrict. However it be, here are the proofs of Count de Souches's nobility, as they have been communicated to me (2).

The ſixth of Auguſt 1686, before Gabriel Beraudin Eſq; lord of Grandjai, counſellor to the king, and his lieutenant-general in the Senechauſſée, and preſidial court of the city and government of Rochelle; at the requeſt of Meſſire Amathée Huet, Knt. lord of Rivau, captain of the Marines, appeared fourteen of the moſt eminent perſons of the country d'Aunix, whoſe names and offices are ſpecified in the act whereof I have a copy, collated with the original at Vienna in Auſtria the 18th of September 1692, by Henry Caſtellani d'Aviſter, ſworn apoſtolical protonotary. The lieutenant-general in the Senechauſſée of Rochelle abovenamed declares, that thoſe fourteen perſons all living and ſettled in Aunix have certified to all thoſe, whom it may concern, that Meſſire Lewis Ratuit Count de Souches, was born a gentleman, being the ſon of John Ratuit, Eſq; Sieur de Barres, and of the Lady Margaret de Bourdigale, and that they have good and certain knowledge, that the ſaid late John Ratuit, father of the ſaid late Lord Count de Souches, was deſcended from a noble family, and one of the moſt conſiderable in the city of Rochelle, where he and his predeceſſors made their abode, and kept their rank among other gentlemen, ſuitable to their noble extraction. In witneſs whereof they have ſigned this preſent declaration, and put to it the ſeal of their arms; which declaration we have received, and given a copy of it to the ſaid lord at his requeſt, for his uſe and ſervice, which we have alſo ſigned, and for a greater approbation we have cauſed his majeſty's ſeal to to be put to it in this preſidial chancery of the city of Rochelle. I need not name all thoſe, who ſigned that act; it being ſufficient to ſay that Mr Millet, marſhal de camp, governor of the principality of Chateau-Renaud, and lieutenant-general in the government of Aunix; Mr Arnou, intendant of the province; Mr Gabaret, firſt Commodore; Mr de Chaſtellaillon, commander for the King at Rochelle, were ſome of thoſe who certified it.

Here follows another atteſtation: I have a copy of it collated with the original at Vienna in Auſtria the 18th of September 1692, by the ſame Henry Caſtellani d'Aviſter above-mentioned. 'We whoſe names 'are under-written, atteſt and certify that we certainly know, that Mr Lewis Ratuit de Souches is of a 'noble extraction both by the father's and mother's 'ſide, and of one of the moſt ancient families of this 'country, and that they have enjoyed the honours, 'privileges and exemptions granted by our kings to

(1) See the remark [A] in the article TOUCHET, and the end of the remark [A] of the firſt article SFORZA.

(2) They have been ſent from Vienna to the Bookſeller by Mr * *. See the marginal note (b).

brother of the Emperor Ferdinand III propoſed to him to ſerve in the Emperor's armies, he agreed to it, and accepted a regiment of Dragoons, that was vacant and profered him. He made a great fortune in the ſervice of his Imperial Majeſty; for he was ſucceſſively raiſed to the dignities of Gentleman of his Chamber, Counſellor of War and State, Field-Marſhal, and Commander-General of the frontiers of Sclavonia. He died in Moravia in the year 1682, being ſeventy-four years of age, and left children as we ſhall ſee below [B]. Theſe are the contents of a memoir communicated to me, which comes from very good hands (b). I ſhall add to it a thing, which very much heightens the glory of Count de Souches, viz. that he was the principal cauſe of the long reſiſtance of the town of Brin againſt the Swedes, who were forced to raiſe the ſiege upon that account. This proved of great ſervice to the Emperor [C]. I ſhall take notice of ſome miſtakes in Moreri's Dictionary [D], and make ſome obſervations on what concerns the Count

'the nobles and gentlemen of this kingdom, and that 'they always kept their rank among other gentle-'men. In witneſs whereof we have ſigned the pre-'ſent atteſtation for his uſe and ſervice. Done at 'Rochelle the 12th of March 1687.' This atteſtation was ſigned by eighteen perſons: the firſt is the Biſhop of Rochelle (3); the ſecond Mr de Chaſtellaillon, Commander for the King in Aunix and at Rochelle; the third Mr Beraudin lieutenant-general of Rochelle. Amongſt the others are Mr Villette Commodore, the Chevalier de Blenac, the Chevalier d'Arbouville, Captain of a Ship of War; Mr d'Oſmont Knight of Malta, &c. I add that I have ſeen the copy of a letter written by the Bailif of la Vieuville from Paris the 29th of March 1699, to Count de la Tour, ſon-in-law to Count de Souches. He writes to him, that he has been very well pleaſed to find an opportunity to write to Malta what he had heard, being at Rochelle, of the family of Count de Souches, whoſe anceſtors, ſays he, without much raiſing themſelves in the war, have always enjoyed the privileges of nobility, and never done any thing derogatory to it.

Note, that Mr Menage obſerves that the name Souches is the name of a lordſhip belonging to the Count I ſpeak of. He ſays the antient name was Des-Ouſches. I ſhall ſet down his words, which I take from a chapter, wherein he proves by ſeveral examples, that proper names are not always pronounced according to the antient and true Orthography. 'Likewiſe 'they always ſay de Souches inſtead of Des-Ouſches, 'ſpeaking of the governor of Moravia, who com-'mands now the Emperor's troops in Flanders. Sou-'ches is the name of that General's lordſhip, for his 'name is Rattuit. Rattuit is a family of the city of 'Rochelle, where that lord was born; and Ouſche is 'an old French word, which ſignifies a garden incloſ-'ed with a hedge, and full of trees, under which 'they ſow pulſe, or hemp. And that French word 'is derived from the Latin ulca, which is to be found 'in Gregorius Turonenſis, much in the ſame ſenſe (4).'

[B] He left children as we ſhall ſee below.] He was married twice, firſt to Anne Elizabeth Counteſs of Hoffkirk, and then to Anne Salome Counteſs of Aſpermont and Reckheim (5). He had two ſons and one daughter by his firſt wife. JOHN LEWIS, his eldeſt ſon, is ſtill living, and is married to Eve Eleonora de Notthafft and Werenberg, Counteſs of the Empire, by whom he has had three daughters, viz. 1, LOUISA, lady of honour at the Empreſs's court, and now the wife of Count de Horn. 2, CLAUDIA, lady of honour at the Empreſs's court in her ſiſter's room. 3, THERESA, a Carmelite Nun in Stiria. The ſecond ſon of Count de Souches was called CHARLES. He was General of the Emperor's Infantry, and died of a wound he received at the battle of Salankemen in Hungary in the year 1691. He had loſt his wife Marianne Counteſs de Bucham, by whom he left two ſons, LEWIS and CHARLES-JOSEPH. The latter has been admitted Knight of Malta in the priory of Bohemia. The daughter of Count de Souches is married to Count Charles de la Tour, and has ſeveral children (6).

[C] He was the principal cauſe of the long reſiſtance of the town of Brin .... againſt the Swedes .... which proved a great ſervice to the Emperor.] Torſtenſon having beaten the Imperialiſts in February 1645, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places in Moravia, and was ſo dreaded, that upon the news of his march the enemies raiſed the ſiege of Olmutz; and then he beſieged Brin, the only ſtrong place that was ſtill for the Emperor in that province (7). The beſieged made ſuch a vigorous defence, that his Imperial Majeſty had time to ſettle his affairs which were in a very ill poſture. He made a treaty with Ragotzki, Prince of Tranſylvania, and yielded to him ſeven lordſhips in Hungary: ninety churches were opened in his conſideration, wherein the Proteſtants were to teach their doctrine publickly, and the privileges of the Hungarians were reſtored to them. This treaty ſeemed diſadvantageous to the Catholics; but it proved more prejudicial to the Swedes: for the Emperor having removed this rub out of his way, relieved Brin, and forced Torſtenſon to raiſe the ſiege. Then Lewis Count de Souches, a French gentleman, who had been the principal cauſe of its preſervation, was made governor of it as a reward for ſo great a ſervice (8). An Hiſtorian obſerves that Torſtenſon loſt more ſoldiers before that place, than he would have loſt in a pitched battle: he adds that in the mean time the Emperor repaired his forces. Longa illic difficiliſque obſidio, atque ad extremum irrita fuit. Ac ſatis conſtat plus ibi militum, quam ſi juſta acie depugnatum foret, Dorſtenſohnio periiſſe. Interea Cæſari ſpacium datum reparandi vires, colligendique & conſcribendi novum exercitum, quem hoſti opponeret (9). Never was ſervice more ſeaſonable than that, and Count de Souches did certainly deſerve to be rewarded for it. Note, that the town of Brin was alſo rewarded as it deſerved; for the Emperor gave it the firſt rank among the towns of Moravia: that rank formerly belonged to the town of Olmutz, which was deprived of it by reaſon of their weak reſiſtance againſt the Swedes. This obſervation is to be found in the voyage of Count de Brienne. Cracovia relicta Vindobonam verſus pergimus, per Sileſiam, & Moraviam: ubi præter Olomutium & Brinnum nihil notatu dignum: illud, ſede Epiſcopali; hoc, obſidione quam adverſus Suecos tam fortiter ſuſtinuit, ut inde ob memoriam facti extiterit caput regionis, virtutis præmium; dignitate illa Olomutio ſublata, nota vecordiæ (10).

[D] I ſhall take notice of ſome miſtakes in Moreri's Dictionary (11).] I. The firſt concerns the extraction of Count de Souches, and has been ſufficiently confuted in the remark [A]. II. He ſhould not have been called General of the Empire; he was only the Emperor's General. III. It is certain, from the memoir communicated to me, out of which I have compoſed the text of this article, that his father did not give him to a German gentleman, and that he entred not into the Emperor's ſervice before he had fought that gentleman. IV. An exact Hiſtorian will take care not to ſay that this Count was defeated at the battle of Senef by the Prince of Condé, in the year 1674. For, properly ſpeaking, that battle was neither won nor loſt by either of the parties. The Allies, as well as the French, aſcribed the victory to themſelves, and cauſed Te Deum to be ſung, and bonefires to be made: both did it out of policy, being fully convinced that there was no ground to boaſt of any advantage (12). The beginning of that bloody battle was advantageous to the French, and the end proved advantageous to their enemies. Many are of opinion that the Prince of Condé behaved himſelf like a great captain for ſome hours, and then like Orlando; but which Orlando, him of Boiardo or of Arioſto? Orlando Furioſo, Roland the furious, Roland like Hercules in Seneca, Hercules furens, Hercules in a fury? Was it not a kind of Enthuſiaſm, and Delirium (13), ſay they, to leave the beſt troops ſo long expoſed to the fire of the enemy well covered with hedges and hop-fields; I ſay, to leave them expoſed to a perfect ſlaughter, which they could not avoid, and to ſuſtain, as it were, with folded

---

(b) Mr * * ſent it from Vienna, whilſt he was there Envoy Extraordinary of the United Provinces. He ſent alſo the acts mentioned by me in the remark [A].

(3) Henry de Laval.

(4) Menage, Obſervations ſur la Langue Françoiſe, Tom. i, pag. 307, Paris 1675.

(5) See, above, the remark [A] of the article RECKHEIM.

(6) Taken from the Memoir, quoted in the margin of the text of this article, noto (b).

(7) See John Cluverius's Univerſal Hiſtory, in the Appendix, p. 759. Edit. of 1668.

(8) Lewis du Mai, Diſcours Hiſtorique & Politique ſur les cauſes de la Guerre de Hongrie, pag. m. 283.

(9) Appendix Joh. Cluveri, pag. 759.

(10) Lud. Hen. Lomenii Briennæ Comitis Itinerar. pag. 58. Edit. 1662.

(11) See alſo the article LEUWENTZ.

(12) We went near Mons, where Te Deum was ſung as it was at Paris; both parties pretended to have got the victory. For my own part I have always been of opinion that neither party had reaſon to boaſt of it. Mémoires de Chavagnac, pag. 388, 389, Dutch Edit. This is perhaps the beſt thing that is in thoſe Memoirs.

(13) Compare what is above, citation (37), of the ſecond article PYRRHUS.

Count de Souches in Chavagnac's memoirs [E]. That book was reprinted in Holland in the year 1700, after the ſtyle had been mended in ſeveral places.

As it does not plainly enough appear in a paſſage which I have quoted (a) whether he was governour of Brin when that town reſiſted the Swedes, I ſhall produce another which will folded arms, a dreadful ſhower of muſket-ſhots? At laſt he was forced to retire, and he left behind him a vaſt number of dead bodies (14). They add, that the Prince of Condé was much diſpleaſed with himſelf on occaſion of that battle, and did not care to hear it mentioned: the remembrance of it made him uneaſy. This is the opinion of many people; I do not pretend to give my judgment upon ſuch things. However it be, whether he was well pleaſed with that journey or not, whether he obtained or loſt the victory, this at leaſt is no problematical thing, that Count de Souches had no hand in the misfortune of the Allies, and very much contributed to their advantages. The Dutch and Spaniſh troops ſuſtained the whole loſs, the Imperial troops commanded by him did not begin to fight till the reſt were diſordered; and after they had joined their allies the enemy loſt his advantage, and was much worſted in his turn. V. What has been added to Moreri's Dictionary in the Dutch editions (15) is not right. Theſe words have been foiſted into it: by refuſing to expoſe his troops he occaſioned the victory obtained by the Prince of Condé. They can only be underſtood of the battle of Senef; but the enemies of France do not uſe to own that ſhe got the victory on that day. However it be, it is not true that ſhe got it becauſe our Count refuſed to expoſe his troops; for it was by expoſing them that he put a ſtop to the progreſs of the enemy. The Dutch relations agree in this, that (16) Count de Souches, who was gone before with the Imperialiſts, and was at ſome hours diſtance from the army, being informed of what paſſed, went back with great diligence, and came at one a-clock in the afternoon near the main body of the Allies; ſo that his Highneſs (17) placed the Imperialiſts and Spaniards in an advantageous poſt on the left hand, and his own troops in the right wing, and then it was that the battle was renewed with greater fury than before. . . . . . . (18) The Prince of Condé endeavoured firſt to make his men turn to the left, but Mr de Fariaux, a man of a known valour, and major-general of the Dutch army, was ſent thither with ſome battalions, and being ſupported by Count Chavagnac, who commanded a ſquadron of horſe near that place, he made ſuch a reſiſtance that the French were forced to retire; ſo that the ſaid Count cauſed four pieces of canon to be placed there, and by that means did very much annoy the French. The left wing, the greateſt part whereof was made up of Imperialiſts and Swiſs (19), gave ſo many proofs of their valour, that above one half of the Swiſs were killed upon the ſpot, according to the report of the priſoners. Count de Souches, their General, threw himſelf wherever the enemies were thickeſt, and gave proofs of an extraordinary valour, as he had done before on many other occaſions. The Prince of Lorrain did the ſame, and was ſeen ſeveral times fighting in the firſt ranks, but this was not without loſs of blood, for he was ſo much wounded in the head that he was forced to retire. Prince Pio, who was near the village of Senef with his ſquadron, being attended by the Marquis de Grana, and Count Starnberg, ſhewed a wonderful bravery, and was alſo wounded in the thigh with a muſket-ſhot. The Marquis de Grana, and the ſon of Count de Souches, fought ſo valiantly at the head of their ſquadrons, that the Swiſs could not get an inch of ground from them, ſo that they contributed much to the happy iſſue of that battle. This account is confirmed by the Prince of Orange's letter to the deputies for the ſecret affairs of the States-General (20); for having deſcribed what paſſed before the Germans came back again, he adds (21): 'The enemies endeavoured at firſt to wheel a little to 'the left, but ſome battalions were detached to 'oppoſe them; and Mr de Chavagnac, who was 'there with a body of Imperial horſe, repulſed them 'with all imaginable vigour, and kept that poſt, 'where at the ſame time he placed four pieces of 'canon, which much annoyed the enemy. . . . . . . '(22) Among the Imperial troops Count de Souches 'has given proofs of the courage and bravery he has 'diſcovered on ſo many other occaſions. The Prince 'of Lorrain has no leſs ſignalized himſelf, but at laſt 'he was wounded in the head, and Prince Pio in 'the thigh. The vigorous reſiſtance of the Marquis 'de Grana, who was near the village with his battalion, has much contributed to the happy ſucceſs of 'the battle; as well as the bravery of the battalions 'of the regiment of Souches commanded by the ſon 'of the ſaid Count.' How then can it be ſaid that Count de Souches, by refuſing to expoſe the Imperialiſts, occaſioned the victory obtained by the French?

There are ſtill three faults in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary, which ought to be corrected. VI. Count de Souches did not live fourſcore years, but only ſeventy-four. VII. His ſon did not command the armies of the empire; he has been only employed in the Emperor's troops. VIII. He was not killed at Rhinfeld in 1678, but in Hungary in the year 1691.

[E] Upon what concerns Count de Souches in Chavagnac's Memoirs.] He is there deſcribed (23) as the moſt ſilly and moſt cowardly man in the world; and after having mentioned whatever may induce one to think that he was a traytor, he nevertheleſs ſays, I do not think he was; but he was a malicious and ignorant man, and the greateſt robber that ever lived (24). Many reaſons convince me that theſe ſlanders ought not to be minded. 1. The author of thoſe memoirs commends himſelf eternally. He pretends to have given all the counſels that have proved ſucceſsful; if a thing does not ſucceed, it is becauſe they would not believe him; he has frequently prevented great inconveniencies; he takes upon him the boldeſt and the moſt laborious enterprizes; in a word, every thing goes well, and always ſucceeds when he is concerned in it, and every thing goes ill without him. His commending himſelf ſo much, ſhews he had a great opinion of his merit, and was willing others ſhould have the ſame. It appears from his own hiſtory that he was a haughty, ambitious, fantaſtical, and impatient man. From whence it may be inferred, that whoever was his enemy could not miſs being ſlandered by him. I obſerve in the ſecond place, that he was at variance with Count de Souches from the beginning of the campaign of 1674 (25); and that probably his rude way moved ſometimes that General to make him ſenſible of his inferiority. Thus ſubaltern officers expoſe themſelves to ſeveral mortifications, when they have not that deference for their General which they owe him. This irritated Count de Chavagnac more and more, and diſpoſed him to ſpeak ill of Count de Souches. Note, in the third place, that he loved to ſpeak ill of Generals. He gives us a moſt wretched character of Count Montecuculi (26); and that with reſpect to the moſt fortunate, moſt glorious, and brighteſt campaign that can be found in the long life of that renowned General: I mean, the campaign of 1673, in which he diſappointed all the deſigns of M. de Turenne, and deſtroyed by the taking only of one town (27), all the advantage the French had gotten in Holland in the year 1672. Can any body give credit to ſuch ſlanders? Are they not contrary to the rules of probability? And therefore muſt we not conclude that what ſuch a writer ſays of his enemies ought to be ſuſpected? I omit many ſharp and ſatirical ſtories, to be found in his memoirs againſt the chief officers of the imperial troops, which ſeem to proceed from a reſentment, that made him unwilling to do them juſtice. For every body owns that the imperial armies have been above theſe hundred years one of the beſt ſchools of war, and that there are very few that form ſo many good officers. Note, in the fourth place, that he is often miſtaken in his accounts, even when he does not deſign to ſpeak ill of thoſe with whom he was diſpleaſed. Conſult the notes inſerted in the Dutch edition, which concern what paſſed in Germany in the year 1675. The Marquis de  who is the author of thoſe notes, and who commanded one of the beſt French regiments in that year, contradicts him in ſeveral important points: If other officers would give themſelves the trouble of criticizing him, doubtleſs they would find matter enough for it. In the fifth place, there are ſo many incredible things in what he ſays againſt Count de Souches, that this alone is ſufficient to confute him. 'Souches, who had received 'orders

(a) In the remark [C].

(14) The battle of Senef was with reſpect to the French, as the picture mentioned by Horace, de Arte Poet. ver. 3.
--- ut turpiter atrum
Deſinat in piſcem mulier formoſa ſuperne.
At the beginning, it wore a ſmiling face of beauty, but it ended in blackneſs and horrour.

(15) This addition is alſo to be found in Moreri's Dictionary, printed at Paris in 1699.

(16) Mercure Hollandois, for the year 1674, pag. 451.

(17) That is the Prince of Orange.

(18) Mercure, ubi ſupra, pag. 452, 453.

(19) It ſhould not be, and Swiſs, but oppoſed to the Swiſs, or ſomething like it; for it appears by the whole thread of the diſcourſe, that the author means the Swiſs in the French army.

(20) Ibid. pag. 457.

(21) Ibid. pag. 462, 463.

(22) Ibid. pag. 464.

(23) See Chavagnac's Memoirs from page 390, to page 401, Dutch edition.

(24) Ibid. pag. 401.

(25) Ibid. pag. 371.

(26) Ibid. from page 339, to page 358.

(27) Bonn in the country of Cologn. He took it jonitly with the Dutch troops, commanded by the Prince of Orange now King of England.

will put it out of doubt, and let us into the knowledge of ſome circumſtances very much to the glory of that brave man [F]. It hath been falſely publiſhed in one of the pamphlets that appeared in Holland in the year 1702, concerning the inſurrection in the Cevennes, that he was a native of that country.

‘orders from the Emperor not to paſs the Maeſe upon any pretence whatſoever, to act only between the Maeſe and the Moſelle, and to give four thouſand horſe, with a General, if the Allies wanted them, ordered me to ſtay in the camp, whilſt he went and dined with all the Generals in the camp of the Spaniſh troops (28). . . . . Souches decamped to go and beſiege Mont-Olympe; but becauſe the Prince of Orange demanded the four thouſand horſe which the Emperor had promiſed him, I was detached to command them; ſo that I went back and encamped in the ſuburb of Namur: I cannot tell what jealouſy he had upon my account; but he himſelf came thither with his whole army. Every body who knew that the orders were poſitive, could not imagine what he meant; but he was not long unreſolved, for he brought the army through Namur. Monterey and the Prince of Orange joined him, and aſked him what good angel had moved him to paſs the Maeſe: He anſwered that he paſſed the Moſelle and not the Maeſe. I could not forbear laughing, and telling him that I pitied him, and that the Moſelle was above fifteen leagues from thence. He told me that I was not a man of a ſufficient capacity to teach him the country, and fell into a great paſſion againſt me. Caplieres, our Commiſſary-General, and the Emperor's agent, came upon this, and aſked him what was the matter. This gentleman, ſaid he, uſes me like a child, but I will complain of it to his Imperial Majeſty. I told Caplieres what was the ſubject of his diſcontent, and Caplieres told him that I was in the right: Whereupon he grew angry again, and aſked his guides what river we had paſſed: They told him it was the Maeſe; which made him change his countenance, and cry out, I am undone (29)’. The falſity contained in thoſe words is ſo plain and obvious, that one may perceive it on firſt reading, without any examination; but whoever conſiders the circumſtances of the narrative, when, I ſay, one conſiders that this General brought his army into the country of Liege (30), that he went and dined in the camp of Count Monterey (31), which he could not do without paſſing the Maeſe, that he went up again towards Charleville to form the ſiege of Mont-Olympe, a place ſituated on the Maeſe (32), that he came again near Namur, another place ſtanding on the Maeſe (33), will think it impoſſible that he ſhould have been ignorant of the ſituation of that river. The moſt ſtupid ſoldiers could not be ignorant of it, after ſo many marches and countermarches of that nature; how then can one believe that a General above ſixty years old knew it not, he who had received an expreſs order to act only between the Moſelle and the Maeſe (34). Whoever can believe ſuch a thing muſt be more credulous than a child of four years of age. The abſurdity of Chavagnac's narrative will be more evident, if it be conſidered that Count de Souches had raiſed himſelf to ſo high a poſt in the Emperor's court. He was a Frenchman, and this was an obſtacle not eaſily to be removed in that court. He was a gentleman born; but his nobility not being attended with a title, and ſupported by the credit and wealth of his family, would hardly have been of greater uſe to him to become a General in the French armies, than if he had been a citizen's ſon: Much more was it inſignificant to him in Germany. He had therefore no other way to raiſe himſelf but his valour, and the art of war; and he muſt needs have excelled in it to overcome all the obſtacles which a meer French gentleman could meet with at the Emperor's court. We ſhould therefore be very ſilly to believe that a General beſieges and takes a town upon a river (35), and goes along that river for whole months, without knowing its name, nor thoſe of the fortreſſes that are waſhed by it; without knowing, I ſay, that Namur, to which he hath ſeveral times approached, is ſituated upon the Maeſe, and not upon the Moſelle. Had he behaved himſelf in that manner, when he had a particular reaſon to be well informed of the ſituation of the Maeſe, ſince he had been ordered not to ſerve beyond that river, he would have been the moſt ridiculous man in the world; but we ſhould be very near as ridiculous as he, ſhould we believe that he thought he went over the Moſelle, when his troops croſſed the Maeſe at Namur (36). We may therefore look upon this as one of thoſe romances, which to ſome never appear too extravagant, when they intend to give out a ſingular thing, or to ridicule an enemy. I omit ſaying that it is not likely the Emperor gave expreſs orders to Count de Souches not to paſs the Maeſe. Did not the Emperor deſign to do as much miſchief to the enemy as ever he could? Why then ſhould he have forbidden his General to join with the Dutch and the Spaniards, if ſuch a conjunction was neceſſary to ſtrike a greater blow? To which I add, that if Count de Souches had perceived that he had been ſurpriſed, he would have ordered his army to repaſs immediately. He would have choſe rather to mend his fault in ſuch a manner, than to expoſe himſelf to loſe his head for having acted againſt the expreſs orders of his Imperial Majeſty. How comes it that Count de Chavagnac, having ſaid that this General cried out, I am undone, forgets to tell us whether his fault was approved or excuſed? This was neceſſary in an accurate account; but the writer of thoſe memoirs did not much trouble himſelf about it. All this confirms the ſuſpicion that there are numberleſs falſhoods in this part of Count de Chavagnac's memoirs.

After all the obſervations I have made, the reader will be apt to give no credit to the ſatirical deſcription he gives of Count de Souches's conduct before Oudenarde (37). I am willing to believe according to the moſt common opinion that this General would not follow the advice of the reſt, nor take with them the neceſſary meaſures for the good ſucceſs of that enterprize; but none can believe the extravagance and cowardly ſtupidity that he is taxed with in Chavagnac's memoirs. It is plain that author was angry when he wrote that paſſage. The reader perceives that his pen was guided by the reſentment of ſome offence, and is confirmed in that opinion by conſidering the conduct of the Imperial court. The puniſhment inflicted upon Count de Souches was ſo ſlight and ſo diſproportioned to what he deſerved, were Chavagnac's memoirs true, that this very thing is ſufficient to convince us that this author has much aggravated matters. I do not think the relations of Count de Souches need give themſelves any trouble to juſtify him againſt the reflections of ſuch an enemy (38), who knew not how to obſerve any appearance of probability or equity; for it is not to be thought that he was ignorant of the reaſons on which the Count de Souches grounded his opinions and his conduct. Why did not he ſay ſomething of the matter at leaſt to confute him? equity required it of him.

[F] I ſhall produce another paſſage, which will put it out of doubt, and let us into the knowledge of ſome circumſtances very much to the glory of that brave man]. ‘The Swedes took Crembs by ſtorm, and laid ſiege to Brin. It was here their good fortune made a ſtand, gave time to the Imperialiſts to take breath, to take care of themſelves, and of the people beyond the river, and to put themſelves in a better poſture. The commander in the place was Mr de Souche a Rocheller, who, upon ſome great diſcontent, had left the Swedes, whom he had ſerved with a religious zeal, and affection, and had the poſt of a colonel, which he alſo enjoyed on the other ſide. Torſtenſon, after a ſiege of three weeks, ordered the place to be ſummoned, and gave notice, that if they refuſed to ſurrender, they ſhould have no quarter: He made anſwer, that neither would he demand, neither would he grant any . . . . Torſtenſon, after having ſeveral times ſtormed the place, mined, ſapped, and thrown a great number of grenades into it, was forced to retire. That ſiege laſted four months, coſt the Swedes four thouſand men, without reckoning the deſerters, acquired immortal honour to the governor, and the favour of his Imperial Majeſty, who being deſirous to diſtinguiſh a man of ſo rare virtue, made him a Baron, raiſed his fortune, and gave him a place in the privy-council (39).’

SOZOMENUS

(28) Mémoires de Chavagnac, pag. 372, 373.

(29) Ibid. pag. 374, 375.

(30) Ibid. pag. 372.

(31) Ibid. pag. 373.

(32) Ibid. pag. 374.

(33) Ibid.

(34) Ibid. pag. 373, 374.

(35) Dinant, which he took before his army paſſed the Maeſe at Namur. See the Mercure Hollandois, ubi ſupra, pag 436.

(36) To confirm all this, I add that if he had thought that he was paſſing the Moſelle, when he went thro' Namur, he muſt have believed that he had not yet followed the order of acting between the Maeſe and the Moſelle, or he muſt have thought that he was paſſing the Moſelle to go towards Philliſburg or Nancy, which are monſtrous ſuppoſitions.

(37) Chavagnac, Memoires, pag. 390, & ſeq.

(38) Perhaps they apply to him what the Janſeniſts ſaid of the Jeſuit Briſacier, above, citation (40), of the article SIXTUS IV.

(39) Parival, Abrége de l'Hiſtoire de ce Siecle de fer, Tom. i, pag. 401, Edit. of Bruſſels, 1658.

SOZOMENUS (JOHN) a Civilian of Venice in the XVIIth century, was originally of the iſle of Cyprus, from whence his anceſtors retired when it fell under the power of the Turks (a). He hath given a new Latin tranſlation of the ten books of Plato's Republic, which he has reduced to a continued diſcourſe, being originally in the form of a dialogue. This renders the work clearer and ſhorter. That tranſlation was printed at Venice in the year 1626 in 4*to*.

(a) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his tranſlation of Plato de Republica.

SPANHEIM (FREDERIC) profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, was a man of great merit. He was born at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate the firſt day of January 1600 (a); and very carefully bred up under the eye of a father, who was not only a learned man, but alſo very much eſteemed at the Electoral Court [A]. After he had ſtudied in the college of Amberg till the year 1613, he was ſent the next year to the univerſity of Heidelberg, which was then in a very flouriſhing condition, where he made ſo great a progreſs both in the languages and Philoſophy, that it appeared he would one day prove a great man. He returned to his father's houſe in 1619, and ſoon after was ſent to Geneva to ſtudy Divinity. The unhappy ſtate of the Palatinate made him reſolve to ſave his father the charges of his maintenance; and therefore he went into Dauphiné in the year 1621, and was three years in the houſe of the governor of Ambrun (b) in the quality of preceptor. He had twice a ſet conference about matters of controverſy (c), which was an uſual thing at that time, and came off glorioully. He returned to Geneva, and then went to Paris, where he found a kinſman, who was miniſter of Charenton [B], and diſſuaded him from accepting the profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy at Lauſanne, which the magiſtrates of Berne offered him. He took a journey into England for four months in 1625, and after he had made a further ſtay at Paris, he returned to Geneva, where he diſputed for a chair of Philoſophy in 1626, and carried it. The year following he married a gentlewoman originally of Poitou [C]. Some time after he was admitted miniſter, and in the year 1631, he ſucceeded Benedict Turretin in his profeſſorſhip of Divinity which was vacant. He diſcharged the duties of thoſe places both as an able, and an indefatigable man; ſo that his great reputation, ſpreading every where, made ſeveral univerſities deſirous to have him, that by his means they might become more famous. That of Leyden ſucceeded beſt in their ſuit, for he accepted their offers: but the utmoſt endeavours were uſed to keep him at Geneva, and the marks of eſteem and affection he received at his departure cannot be expreſſed. He took his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Baſil, to comply with the uſe of the country he was going to; for neither at Geneva nor in the Proteſtant academies of France, the profeſſors of Divinity were admitted doctors; it had been of no uſe to them. He ſet out from Geneva in the year 1642, after he had been profeſſor of Divinity eleven years ſucceſſively. He happened to be rector, when they celebrated the jubilee or the ſecular year of the Reformation, and he made a very fine oration upon that ſubject. He arrived at Leyden the third of October 1642, where he kept up, and even increaſed, the reputation he had got; but he died in May 1649. His great labours ſhortened his days. His lectures, his academical diſputations, his ſermons (d), the books he wrote, and ſeveral domeſtic cares, and ſeveral viſits he made, did not hinder him from holding a great correſpondence by way of letters. Beſides, he was obliged to make viſits to the Queen of Bohemia and the Prince of Orange; he was very much eſteemed in thoſe two courts. Queen Chriſtina did him the honour to write to him, in order to let him know her great eſteem for him, and how much ſhe was pleaſed with the reading of his works. He publiſhed ſeveral

(a) Ut ita annos cum ſeculo computaverit, qui lucem cum incipiente anno & ſeculo primam vidit. Heidanus, in Orat. fun. Fr. Spanhemii. He is miſtaken in taking the year 1600, to be the firſt of the XVIIth century. It is the laſt of the XVIth. Many commit the ſame fault.

(b) John de Bonne, Baron de Vitrolle.

(c) Firſt with Father Hugo, a Jeſuit of Avignon, who preached the Lent Sermons at Ambrun, and then with a Franciſcan of Naples.

(d) He was miniſter of the Walloon church at Leyden.

[A] He was born .... of a father, who was not only a learned man, but alſo very much eſteemed at the Electoral Court.] His name was WIGAND SPANHEIM; he was Doctor of Divinity, and eccleſiaſtical counſellor to the Elector Palatine. He married Renata Toſſan, daughter of Daniel Toſſan, miniſter of Orleans, and then profeſſor of Divinity at Heidelberg. Daniel Toſſan had married Mary Coüet, a Pariſian, daughter of Philibert Coüet, advocate in the parliament of Paris, who had fled to Orleans for her religion with her mother and two ſiſters in the year 1562. Toſſan, in order to avoid the perſecution, retired through ſeveral by-ways to Montargis, where his wife was brought to bed of a daughter, and Renata of France, Ducheſs of Ferrara, was her god-mother. That ducheſs, daughter of Lewis XII, being extremely zealous for the Reformed Religion, received at Montargis as many refugees as ſhe could; but it is not true, as Heidanus will have it, that ſhe kept there Daniel Toſſan till the year 1575. We ſhall ſee in the article of TOSSAN in what year he retired to Montargis, and when he went away from thence. His daughter Renata (god-daughter of the Ducheſs of Ferrara) was married to Wigand Spanheim, and was the mother of our Frederic and of two daughters (1). Wigand was a very pious man, a learned Divine, and a good Philologer, as it appears from his letters to Chriſtian Becman (2). He died in the year 1620, having in his hands a letter of his ſon, which made him cry with joy. Freherus mentions (3) this particular as being taken from the funeral oration of Frederic Spanheim; but he is miſtaken, for it is not there. Lecto affixus poſtquam literas à filio Geneva accepiſſet eas præ gaudio totas lachrymis conſperſit, & tenaciter ambabus manibus retinuit, donec in Chriſto exſpiravit A. 1620.

[B] A kinſman, who was miniſter of Charenton]. His name was Samuel Durant: I cannot tell in what degree he was related to him, for the Latin words of my author are ambiguous. Humaniſſimè à Samuele Durantio ---- cognato ſuo (erat enim Durantii mater ſoror aviæ parentis ejus) exceptus eſt (4). The ambiguity lies in the parentheſis. For it is uncertain whether the word parens ſignifies there the father or the mother; beſides, every man having two grand-mothers, we muſt look back into many families, in order to find the grand-mother of our Spanheim, ſiſter to Durant's mother. The beſt of it is, that Durant left his whole library to our Frederic Spanheim (5).

[C] He married a gentlewoman originally of Poitou.] Heidanus (6) calls her in Latin Carlottam à Portu, which I take to ſignify Charlotte du Port She was the daughter of Peter du Port, Lord of Mouillepied and Boiſmaſſon, counſellor to the king, and commiſſary for proviſions in his majeſty's armies, only ſon of Joachim du Port, a gentleman of Poitou, Lord of

(1) Ex Heidano, in Orat. funebr. Frid. Spanhem. pag. 6, 7.

(2) De Wigando Spanhemio nihil aliud mihi compertum eſt niſi ſingularis planè & exquiſitæ pietatis hominem fuiſſe, nec Theologica ſolum ſed & Philologica eruditione inſtructiſſimum, & linguarum Latinæ imprimis & Græcæ callentiſſimum. Id quod ex literis ἀμοιβαίαις quæ in operibus Philologicis Chriſtiani Becmanni ... leguntur conſtat. Heidanus, Orat. funebr. pag. 7.

(3) Theatr, pag. 406.

(4) Heidanus, ibid. pag. 17.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 18.

(6) Ibid. pag. 19.

ſeveral books [D]. He left ſeven children (e), whereof the two eldeſt are become very famous [E]. He was rigid in point of innovations [F], and in that reſpect, ſpared neither friends nor foes. He could not forbear writing againſt Amyraldus, and did not live long enough to reply to him in the manner he intended. His adverſaries boaſted of it [G]. A man who cannot be ſuſpected of flattery, hath beſtowed upon him praiſes which will be ſeen below [H].

Mouillepied. The mother of Peter du Port, called Joan du Chêne, was the only daughter of Joſeph du Chêne (Sieur de la Violette, Counſellor and phyſician to the king) and of Anne de Trie, daughter of Margaret Budé, whoſe father was the learned William Budé (Budæus) (7).

[D] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] At the requeſt of the Envoy of Guſtavus Adolphus, at Geneva, he wrote a book intituled, Le Soldat Suedois (8), which ſold very well. That book was quickly followed by the Mercure Suiſſe (9). He publiſhed in 1639, a Commentaire Hiſtorique de la vie & de la mort de Meſſire Chriſtofle Vicomte de Dhona, at the widow's requeſt: I ſhall ſpeak of it hereafter. He publiſhed ſix years after, ſome memoirs upon the life and death of the moſt Serene Princeſs Louiſa Juliana, Electreſs Palatine, born Princeſs of Orange. He undertook that work, at the requeſt of the Queen of Bohemia, all theſe books are anonymous (10). Le Throne de Grace, de Jugement, & de Gloire, are three ſermons exceſſively long, and written in pretty old French, but they contain excellent things. The firſt was preached at Charenton. His Dubia Evangelica, in three parts, written at Geneva, on occaſion of the objections diſperſed among the ſtudents of Divinity, by one Antoine, who being a Chriſtian, had turned Jew, is a good book. He compoſed his Chamierus Contractus, for the benefit of the ſtudents of Divinity, who could not conveniently make uſe of Chamierus's vaſt Panſtratia. Whilſt he lived at Leyden, he wrote againſt Amyraut's hypotheſis Exercitationes de gratia univerſali, in three volumes, in 8vo. Item Epiſtolam ad Cottierum de conciliatione gratiæ univerſalis. He alſo wrote a letter ad Buchananum de Controverſiis Anglicanis, and Vindiciæ de Gratia univerſali (11). It is a reply to M. Amyraut, which he could not finiſh, and it ſavours of a poſthumous piece. The author I quote has omitted a letter, which M. Spanheim wrote to Prince Edward, when he changed his religion. Since he mentions a conſolatory letter upon the death of an only ſon (12), he might alſo have mentioned this other letter. I muſt not forget M. Spanheim's ſpeeches, which are very good, eſpecially his funeral oration of Frederic Henry, Prince of Orange. See Balzac's letter of thanks to him, after he had read that oration (13).

I have ſaid that this Profeſſor of Divinity, is the author of the Commentaire Hiſtorique de la vie & de la mort de Meſſire Chriſtofle Vicomte de Dhona. But I muſt add, that the word Viſcount he made uſe of, is very improper, and does not anſwer the title of Burggrave, which has been given to the illuſtrious family of DHONA for ſeveral ages. It is a nobler title than than that of Viſcount. See the Nouveau Journal des Sçavans, publiſhed at Berlin, by Mr Chauvin (14), in 1696: and look for the extract of the firſt and ſecond volumes of Mr Manget's (15) Bibliotheca Practica, dedicated to Count Alexander de Dhona, governor to the Electoral Prince of Brandenbourg, where you will find ſome things very inſtructive concerning the Burggraves. This is not a proper place to enlarge upon the great merit of that count, and the glory of the houſe of Dhona. I ſhall only refer the reader to Moreri's Dictionary, and occaſionally obſerve that a fault has crept into it; for inſtead of ſaying that Count Alexander's mother was Counteſs de Terraſſieres Montbrun, it ſhould be de Feraſſieres Montbrun. She was the only daughter of Count de Feraſſieres, Lieutenant-General in the French armies, and brother to Mr de St André Montbrun, who was General of the Venetians in Candia, and whoſe hiſtory was printed at Paris, in the year 1698 (16).

[E] He left ſeven children, whereof the two eldeſt are become very famous.] The firſt (17) has a perfect knowledge of medals, and all ſorts of literature: beſides, his embaſſies give him a glorious rank among ſtateſmen. He is a perſon of an extraordinary merit. The ſecond (18) died within theſe few days (19), being Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden. He had been a long time in that employment, and was juſtly accounted one of the moſt conſiderable men in the Reformed Church. He has written ſeveral books, which have procured him a great reputation. The Journaliſts have often made honourable mention of him. That of Paris, tho' it ſeldom ſpeak of books written by Proteſtant miniſters, yet has given large extracts of this learned man's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory: you will find them in the twenty-eighth volume of the Journal des Sçavans. Whoever deſires to be informed of the great learning of Mr Spanheim the eldeſt, need only read his book de Præſtantia & uſu Numiſmatum, which I have quoted before (20); the five letters he wrote to Mr Morel, a famous Antiquarian, and a great Medaliſt, which have been printed with the Specimen univerſæ rei nummariæ antiquæ, publiſhed by the ſame Mr Morel at Leipſic, in 1695; his notes upon Callimachus, and Julian's Cæſars, and ſome other tracts, the titles whereof may be ſeen in Moreri's Dictionary of the Paris edition 1699; together, with a liſt of all his employments in the courts of princes (21), till he was ſent the fourth time to the court of France after the peace of Ryſwic. He was at Paris from that time till the beginning of the year 1701, that is, till his Electoral Highneſs of Brandenbourg became King of Pruſſia. He took then his audience of leave, becauſe the change of the ceremonial was not yet regulated at the court of France. He is lately (22) gone into England by order of the new king, his maſter. I ſhall obſerve by the by, that this new epoch of the royalty of Pruſſia will ſignalize the beginning of the XVIIIth century, and that there was in it a remarkable concourſe of circumſtances; for about the ſame time that the Electreſs of Brandenbourg was crowned Queen of Pruſſia, the Electoreſs of Brunſwic, her mother, daughter to the King of Bohemia, was named to ſucceed to the crown of England. Never have two princeſſes better deſerved than theſe to fill a throne, or to renew the glory acquired by Queen Elizabeth.

[F] He was rigid in point of innovation.] It was a maxim with him, that we ought to make war even againſt our own brethren, whenever they act againſt Orthodoxy: The neglect of little evils, ſaid he, will ſometimes occaſion the greateſt diſorders. Sæpe profitentem audivimus ſe licet mallet cum Eccleſiæ hoſtibus congredi, tamen & bellum illis etiam fratribus indicendum judicare, qui vel data opera, vul ex ignorantia & infirmitate per cuniculos illam ſubruerent. Quod enim initio parvum videtur, id ſæpe neglectum magna incendia dare in progreſſu. Cum cui quis ſemel patrocinium commodavit ei mordicus inhæret, & ſæpe error non detectus cum occultè ſerpat, placere incipit, & tandem pudor eſt retractare quæ ſemel defenderis (23). A hundred fine reaſons may be alledged to maintain this common topic, and this great maxim: but, in order to perſuade, they ought to be attended with choler. With ſuch an ingredient they generally produce a conviction; but without it, they are weak, and are confuted by a hundred other fine maxims. Heidanus obſerves, that the perſon he praiſes, was a man of a fiery temper (24). That fire is a wonderful light to ſhew that the reaſons alledged for toleration, are bad ones, and that thoſe who cry out, to arms, to arms, bella, horrida bella, have well dived into the bottom of things. Tros Rutuluſve fuat, nullo diſcrimine habebo (25); no matter tho' they be friends, allies, or relations; let us fall upon them, per calcatum perge patrem (26); this is the cauſe of truth.

[G] His adverſaries boaſted of it.] See the paſſage quoted by Colomeſius out of a book of M. Amyaut (27).

[H] A man . . . . . hath beſtowed upon him praiſes which will be ſeen below.] Sorbiere is the perſon I ſpeak of: what he ſays of M. Spanheim deſerves to be tranſcribed; it contains ſome particulars that will be acceptable to the curious; and beſides, they belong to the deſign of this Dictionary. Barlæus, ſays he (28), having made a funeral oration in verſe, upon the death of the Prince of Orange, and Dr Spanheim having delivered one in proſe, was very much diſpleaſed with the unequality of their reward; for, as Salmaſius wittily ſaid,

(e) Taken from his Funeral Oration, ſpoken by Heidanus, the 21ſt of May 1649. It is a fine piece.

(7) Heidanus, Orat. funebr. Fr. Spanheim. pag. 19, 20.

(8) Printed in 1633.

(9) Printed in 1634.

(10) The Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Commentaire Hiſtorique, is ſigned F. S. that is, Frederic Spanheim. He made uſe of the ſame ſignature in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Geneva reſtituta. The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, places thoſe two books under the unknown name of F. S. If it be reprinted, theſe words may be added to it, id eſt Fridericus Spanhemius.

(11) Heidanus, in Orat. funeb. Spanhemii, pag. 38, & ſeq.

(12) He obſerves that it was tranſlated out of French into Dutch and German.

(13) It is the 19th Letter among thoſe that are at the end of the collection of his Letters to Conrart.

(14) He is profeſſor of Philoſophy at Berlin.

(15) A Phyſician of Geneva.

(16) See an Extract of it in the Journal des Sçavans, of the fourth of Auguſt 1698, pag. 551, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

(17) EZECHIEL SPANHEMIUS.

(18) FRIDERICUS SPANHEMIUS.

(19) I write this the 26th of May 1701.

(20) In the text of the article ABDERA.

(21) That liſt had already appeared in the Dutch edition of Moreri's Dictionary, down to the year 1693.

(22) I write this in May 1701.

(23) Heidan. in Orat. fun. Fr. Spanhem. p. 32.

(24) Οξὺχολος, etiam ut ipſe fatebatur, fuit & ſubtilis choleræ nonnihil habuit, quæ inſtar flammulæ ſalpetræ momento incendebatur, at ſine fumo & nidore momento diſpergebatur. Ibid. pag. 33.

(25) Virgil. Æn. lib. x, ver. 108.

(26) Ita apud illum præponderabat amor veritatis ut nulla amicitiæ jura, nullæ neceſſitudines, nullus metus illum à defendenda illa avertere potuiſſent. Heidan. in Orat. funeb. Fr. Spanhemii, pag. 32.

(27) Colomeſ. in Gallia Orientali. pag. 206.

(28) Sorbiere, Letter lxiv, pag. 442, 445.

ſaid, it was a great overſight to give the pay of a trooper to a foot-ſoldier, and that of a foot-ſoldier to a trooper. Barlæus received but five hundred livres, and the other five hundred crowns. All that I can tell you of the latter, is what was ſaid of him after his deceaſe, viz. That Salmaſius had killed him, and that Morus had been the dagger. It is a long ſtory, and, to be ſhort, I ſhall only tell you that Salmaſius did not love the late Mr Spanheim, from a jealouſy of merit and reputation for learning; that, in order to mortify him, he cauſed Mr Morus to be ſent for into Holland, whom he only knew by his name, but he was the ſcourge and the averſion of his colleague; that the doctor left no ſtone unturned to prevent his coming, and that he died when he heard that his adverſary was ſet out on his journey. However I muſt do this juſtice to that learned German, even by Salmaſius's confeſſion, who was not prodigal of his praiſes, that he had a ſtrong head, and full of learning; that he was fit for buſineſs, ſteady and dexterous, zealous and laborious. He read public lectures of Divinity four times in a week; and beſides made private ones upon different ſubjects to his ſcholars; he heard the probation ſermons of the ſtudents of Divinity; he preached in two languages, German and French; he viſited the ſick; he wrote a vaſt number of letters; he compoſed at the ſame time, two or three books upon quite different ſubjects; he aſſiſted every Wedneſday at his Highneſs's council, who ſent for him to the Hague; he was rector of the univerſity; and notwithſtanding ſo many occupations, he kept an account of all the expences of his houſe, that was full of boarders.

SPIFAME (James Paul) Biſhop of Nevers in the XVIth century, left his biſhopric, and retired to Geneva, in order to profeſs the Reformed Religion. He went by the name of Monſieur de Paſſi (a), and at laſt he became miniſter, to have, as it is ſaid, a more eaſy acceſs into the councils, and a greater ſhare in affairs (b). The parliament of Paris iſſued out a warrant againſt him in the year 1559 (c). He was very ſerviceable to the Proteſtant cauſe in Germany, whither the Prince of Condé ſent him to juſtify his taking up arms (d). He publiſhed there the four letters which Catherine de Medicis had written to that prince, to recommend to him the welfare of the kingdom, and the intereſt of the king her ſon (e); he diſcovered many ſecrets, obtained great ſuccours of the Princes of Germany (f), and harangued the Emperor at the Diet of Francfort in the year 1562, with ſo much force, that it proved one of the beſt manifeſto's of the Proteſtants (g). He cauſed the Reiſters and Lanſquenets to be recalled, and Count de Rocquendolfe, and other chiefs, who commanded them in the king's ſervice, to be put to the ban of the empire (h). He made three ſpeeches in that country. His end was not anſwerable to ſuch a noble beginning (i); for he found himſelf involved in ſome crimes, for which he was beheaded at Geneva the twenty-third of March 1566 [A]. His birth, his parts, and his learning, might have raiſed him to the higheſt dignities in France, where he had quickly gone through ſeveral employments [B]. Nothing can be more abſurd than what Moreri ſays, that Calvin cauſed him to be put to death [C]. Others aſcribe his tragical end to Beza's jealouſy [D], but cannot prove it. I have confuted in another book

(a) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 29.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 53.

(c) Spondan. Annal. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1559, num. 18. See alſo Thuanus, lib. xxii, pag. 453.

(d) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. i, pag. 796.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) Id. ibid. Tom. ii, pag. 29.

(g) You will find his Oration in Le Laboureur's additions, ibid. pag. 29.

(h) Id. ibid. pag. 42.

(i) Thuan. lib. xxxiii, pag. 675.

[A] . . . In ſome crimes for which he was beheaded at Geneva the twenty-third of March, 1566.] Mr Spon gives the following account of it (1): 'James Paul Spifame, Biſhop of Nevers, having left his biſhopric, and a yearly income of forty thouſand livres, retired to Geneva, to profeſs the doctrine of the Proteſtants. He preſented a petition to be made a citizen, which was granted him, and even was admitted into the counſels of two hundred and of ſixty. The magiſtrates, and the men of letters, had a great eſteem for him on account of his learning. Some time after he was ſent into France to ſerve there as a miniſter; but the magiſtrates of Geneva were informed that he privately endeavoured to get another biſhopric. Wherefore at his return, his conduct was more narrowly obſerved, and his former life examined. It was found out that before his marriage he had a child by the woman he married, and leſt it ſhould be accounted a baſtard, he cauſed a falſe contract of marriage to be made and antidated, and a falſe ſeal to be put to it, that his ſon might inherit his eſtate, which was pretty conſiderable. For all theſe cauſes he was impriſoned, and having confeſſed the whole matter, he was beheaded in the place du Molard, with a great repentance of his faults, which he ſhewed by a fine diſcourſe he made to the people upon the ſcaffold. Some will have it that thoſe accuſations were only a pretence to condemn him, but that he was really executed to gratify Catherine de Medicis, who had bribed the Syndics, being ſolicited to it by the Pope.' See the paſſage of Mr de Rocolles in the remark [E].

[B] His birth, his parts, and his learning, might have raiſed him . . . . he had . . . . gone through ſeveral employments.] 'He was of a noble family, originally come from Lucca, and ſettled at Paris in the year 1350, when Bartholomew Spifame was living, from whom are deſcended all thoſe of that name, lords of Biſſeaux, Granges, and Paſſy. His father was John Spifame, Sieur de Paſſy, ſecretary to the king, and pay-maſter-general to the army; and his mother Jaquette Ruzé: he was the youngeſt of five brothers . . . . The progreſs he made in learning procured him an office of counſellor in the parliament of Paris; afterwards he became preſident of the inqueſts, maſter of the requeſts, and counſellor of ſtate; and he ſhewed ſo great a capacity and learning in all his employments, that having devoted himſelf to the Church, there was no dignity above the great reputation he was in. From a canon of Paris, chancellor of the univerſity, and and abbot of St Paul of Sens, he became great vicar of Charles Cardinal de Lorrain, Archbiſhop of Rheims, and in that quality, he was named by Henry II, to the biſhopric of Nevers, of which he took poſſeſſion in the year 1548 (2) . . . . Being intoxicated with his learning and reputation, he followed the new opinions as ſome of the moſt learned prelates had done, and left the Romiſh Church to take a wife (3).

[C] Nothing can be more abſurd than what Moreri ſays, that Calvin cauſed him to be put to death.] See with what rhetorical flouriſhes he adorned his Dictionary. Calvin, who was then the great Califf of Geneva, the infamous receptacle of Hereſy and Heretics, being acted by an intolerable vanity, thought that every body was to ſubmit to him, and was not ſatisfied with the civility Spiſame ſhewed him, and perhaps, having obſerved that Spiſame repented of his Apoſtacy, he falſly accuſed him of ſome crimes, eſpecially of being a meer ſpy at Geneva, and cauſed him to be beheaded to be revenged of him. This happened on the 25*th of March* 1565 (4). That paſſionate author might be confuted ſeveral ways; but I ſhall only uſe this chronological reaſon. Calvin died the 27th of May 1564, and Spifame was beheaded the 23d of March 1566, according to Mr Spon, who, in that reſpect, is a more credible author than thoſe who place that execution on the 25th of March 1565 (5). Though we ſhould prefer this date to that of Mr Spon, and ſuppoſe it agrees with the cuſtom of beginning the year in January, it were ſtill moſt certain, that Calvin died above nine months before this late Biſhop of Nevers was executed.

[D] Others aſcribe his death to Beza's jealouſy.] Le Laboureur ſpeaks of it as confidently as if he had ſome proofs for it. Beza, ſays he (6), who envied him mortally, did ſo narrowly obſerve him, when that man (7) was vexed to be reduced to a miſerable and private life, that

(1) Spon, Hiſtoire de Geneve, book iii, pag. 263, Utrecht 1685. See alſo Mr Leti, Hiſtoria Genevrina, Tom. iii, p. 162.

(2) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 51, 52.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 53.

(4) Moreri, at the word Spifame. This paſſage has been left out in the Dutch editions.

(5) Mr Le Laboureur, Tom. ii, pag. 53, is one of them.

(6) Le Laboureur, ibid.

(7) Man refers to Spifame. A good author would not have left ſo fallacious an equivocation.

book (k) Maimbourg's reflexions, and therefore I need not do it again. One of thoſe, who wrote againſt his Hiſtory of Calviniſm, wants to be rectified. He has given us ſeveral curious particulars concerning the true cauſe of that biſhop's execution [E]. It is not true that Spiſame wrote a book under the name of Peter Richer [F]. Some ſay he aſſiſted at the council of Trent, and was afterwards miniſter of Bourges and Iſſoudun (l). It is certain, that when the Reformed received the communion in the town-houſe of Bourges, towards the beginning of the year 1562, it was he who officiated. He went thither from Iſſoudun, with a guard of 150 troopers (m). The author, who informs me of this, ſays, in a letter dated from Paris the eleventh of December 1561, that Spiſame had been called by the Reformed Church of Lyons, to be their miniſter, and that four years before he had been accuſed of Lutheraniſm, for which he would have been put to death, had he not quickly fled to Geneva (n).

(k) See the Nouvelles Lettres de la Critique Générale du Calviniſme de Mr Maimbourg, pag. 460, & ſeq.

(l) Catherinot, Calviniſme de Berri, pag. 3.

(m) Huber. Languetus, Epiſtola lxvii, lib. ii, pag. 197.

(n) Ibid. Epiſt. lxiv, ejuſd. lib. pag. 184.

that he made him ſuſpected of keeping intelligence with Queen Catherine and the Catholics, and of intending to leave Geneva. He was impriſoned, tried, and beheaded the 25th of March 1565, and was the firſt victim of the liberty he had procured to that city (8). Beza, who was his enemy, not contented with his execution, made the following Latin verſes againſt his memory, wherein he could not forbear reflecting upon him, contrary to the maxims of his religion, for preferring a wife to a biſhopric; and beſides, he owns, that ſhe was rather a concubine than a lawful wife. That author quotes ten Latin verſes, which he aſcribes to Beza, upon the death of James Spiſame, with a cruel anſwer that was made to them likewiſe in Latin verſe. I queſtion whether it can be proved that the epigram of ten verſes has been juſtly aſcribed to Beza. It will not be improper to ſee what he anſwered to Claudius de Sainctes, who had reproached him with ſome things relating to James Spiſame: ‘Spiſamius mihi nunquam collega fuit, & cur ego illum odiſſem, à quo nunquam injuriam acceperam? num, ſicut in alterius nomine ineptus ille tuus monitor mihi exprobrat, quòd vererer ne meis luminibus officeret? Atqui, neque hoc ille unquam cogitavit, opinor, neque (abſit verbo invidia) cauſa ulla fuit cur id timerem. Ais tamen illi à me intentata vana crimina fuiſſe proditionis, illiciti matrimonii, & ſtupri, quum longe gravius ipſo in iſtis deliquiſſem. Quòd ſi vana illa fuerunt, quomodo ille minùs quàm ego graviter deliquerit? an quòd apud vos iſta pro nihilo ducantur? At tu hominum vaniſſime, vide quàm teipſum fallas. Num enim ego accuſator, num ſubſcriptor in iis fui quæ nunquam in illius cauſa in diſceptationem venerunt? Nam de proditione vel ſtupro nulla quòd ſciam fuit mentio. Sciunt autem omnes ex hujus civitatis more qua quiſque de cauſa damnetur. Nec de adulterio quæſitum eſt. De quo igitur dices? hoc verò tu ex me non audies, qui ne hæc quidem niſi à te coactus commemoro. Jure tamen damnatum fuiſſe ſi mihi non credis, ipſimet ſaltem credere te oportuit (9). - - - Spiſame was never my colleague, and why ſhould I hate him who never did me any injury? Is it, what your fooliſh monitor upbraids me with in the name of another perſon, becauſe I am afraid leſt he ſhould eclipſe my glory? But he never had ſo much as any thoughts of doing it, in my opinion, nor (to ſpeak without envy) had I any ground to fear it. But you ſay that I have charged him with the vain crimes of treaſon, unlawful marriage, and fornication, when I am much more guilty of theſe crimes than Spiſame. If theſe are vain crimes, how could he be more innocent of them than I am? Are they accounted trivial with you? But, moſt vain man, ſee how you deceive yourſelf. Could I accuſe him of any thing, or could I ſubſcribe to any thing which was never conſidered in his trial? For as to treaſon or fornication, in my knowledge there was no mention made of them. And every body knows, according to the cuſtom of this city, for what crimes any man is condemned. Nor was he charged with adultery. With what then ſay you? But this you ſhall not know from me, who would not have mentioned theſe things, if you had not forced me to it. But if you will not believe me, that he was juſtly condemned, you ought to believe himſelf.’ There are three things in this Latin paſſage. 1. That Spiſame was not a man who pretended to eclipſe Beza's glory, and that Beza had no ground to be afraid of ſuch a thing. 2. That Beza did not ſet up for an accuſer of Spiſame. 3. That Spiſame was not accuſed either of adultery, or of fornication, or of treaſon. Mezerai is therefore to blame for ſaying that upon I know not what umbrage that was taken at him, at Geneva, he was accuſed of adultery, and beheaded for that pretended crime (10).

[E] Rocoles wants to be rectified. He has given us ſome curious particulars about the true cauſe of that biſhop's execution.] ‘Spiſame . . . . . having retired to Geneva could not be quiet. Having formed an intrigue with the counſellors of the Queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, to get the Catholics reſtored in the town, and to enable the biſhop to come into it with main force, in hopes of being provided with a new biſhopric, better than that of Nevers, his treacherous practices were diſcovered by Grillon, Colonel of the regiment of guards, who gave notice of it to the agent of Geneva who attended the court. The agent took care to acquaint the magiſtrates of Geneva with it: whereupon Spiſame was arreſted; and the pretence on which he was brought to his trial, was that he kept a married woman, and not, as Maimbourg brutiſhly ſays, that he had made a falſe contract, or falſe ſeals. Spiſame not being guilty of any ſuch crime; but adultery may be puniſhed with death according to the law Julia de adulteris. It was upon this juſt pretence that he was beheaded in the place du Molard, without mentioning his conſpiracy, for fear of diſpleaſing the court of France. And to prevent that court from concerning themſelves for him, and ſending an expreſs to ſave his life, the council made a quick diſpatch of his trial, which ended the third day after he had been arreſted (11).’ You ſee here a ſevere reflexion upon Maimbourg without a cauſe; for that Jeſuit goes upon the credit of a Proteſtant writer (12). The ſame author tells us that Spiſame was condemned under pretence of adultery, which is not true. He takes no notice of a falſity in Maimbourg. The Prince of Condé, ſays he (13), employed Spiſame in other things beſides making ſermons; for he ſent him into Germany to demand the ſuccours, which he could not obtain. It is certain he obtained them. Beza (14), d'Aubigné (15), Le Laboureur (16), and ſeveral others ſay ſo. And Maimbourg himſelf mentions above three hundred Reiſters, and four thouſand Lanſquenets (17), whom the Prince of Condé received from Germany.

[F] It is not true that Spiſame wrote a book under the name of Peter Richer.] Du Verdier Vau-Privas ſays (18), that James Spiſame, who left his biſhopric, wrote, under the name of Peter Richer, a confutation of the idle fancies and lies of Nicholas Durand, called the Chevalier de Villegaignon, in the year 1562, in 8vo. Moreri affirms the ſame thing. But I have ſhewed before (19) that Peter Richer is a real man, and not a fictitious name.

---

(8) It is not true that Spiſame procured the liberty of Geneva.

(9) Theod. Beza, Apologia altera ad F. Claudium de Xaintes, pag. m. 361.

(10) Mezerai, Abrége Chronol. Tom. vi, towards the end, pag. m. 450.

(11) Rocolles, l'Hiſtoire véritable du Calviniſme, pag. 444, 445.

(12) Mr Spon. See the remark [A].

(13) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, lib. iv, pag. 285.

(14) Beza, Hiſt. des Egliſes, book, vi, pag. 88.

(15) D'Aubigné Hiſt. Univ. Tom. i, book iii, ch. xii, pag. 226.

(16) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 42. See the text of this article.

(17) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, book iv, pag. 285.

(18) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 620.

(19) In the article of this RICHER.

SPINA (Alphonsus) a Spaniſh Jew being converted to the Chriſtian religion became a Franciſcan Friar, and was rector of the academy of Salamanca, and at laſt Biſhop of Orenſe (a). He wrote a book intituled, Fortalitium Fidei contra Judæos, Saracenos, alioſque Chriſtianæ Fidei inimicos [A]. He tells us himſelf that he was compoſing it at Valladolid in the year 1458 (b).

[A] He wrote a book intituled Fortalitium Fidei, &c.] Some have been of opinion that a Dominican Friar, called William Totan, was the author of it; but they ſhould only have ſaid that he publiſhed a new edition of it, which is that of Lyons in 1511. The firſt is printed at Nuremberg in 1494, in 4to. The name of the author was not put to it, only it was ſaid in the title, that it was compoſed per quemdam Doctorem eximium Ordinis Minorum anno 1459 in partibus Occidentis. Mariana hath informed us, that it is a work of Francis Spina (1). Mr Wharton, who hath made an analyſis of it (2), cenſures thoſe who have aſcribed it to Thomas Patriarchæ Barbarienſi. He might have cenſured thoſe who attribute it to Bartholomew de Spina who lived in the XVIth century. Selden and Mr Hoornbeeck give it, either to that Bartholomew, or to William Totan (3). Mr Hoornbeeck has been cenſured (4) for having ſaid that this work was printed in the year 1490. He might alſo have been criticized for having ſaid that this Bartholomew de Spina was a Carmelite Friar of Cologn (5): he was a Dominican and a native of Piſa. Theophilus Raynaud affirms that this ſame Bartholomew hath ſet his name to the Fortalitium Fidei, in order to appropriate the work to himſelf (6); but he doe not name the edition where that is to be ſeen.

The opinion of Mr du Pin concerning the Fortalitium Fidei, is as follows. ‘It is a work which promiſes more in the title than is to be found in the body of the book; for it is not well done: there is nothing in it ſufficiently examined, and he often brings very weak proofs, reaſonings, and anſwers. Neverthleſs there is ſome learning in it, and it may be of ſome uſe (7).’

(a) A city of Gallicia.

(b) Fortalit. Fidei, lib. ii, Conſider. vi, Hær. v, fol. 61, apud Henr. Wharton, Append. ad Cave de Scriptor. Eccleſ. pag. 143.

(1) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpan. lib. xxii, cap. xiii.

(2) Whart. Append. ad Cave de Script. Eccl. pag. 143.

(3) See Crenii, Animadv. Philol. & Hiſt. Part. xiii, pag. 87.

(4) Ibid. pag. 88.

(5) Hoornb. de convert. Judæis, in Prolegom. p. 9.

(6) Theoph. Rayn. de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 272, pag. m. 166.

(7) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. xii, pag. 100, Edit. of Holland.

SPINA (a) (John de) in Latin Spinæus, a Proteſtant miniſter in the XVIth century, had been a Monk. I ſhall obſerve upon what occaſion he forſook his order [A], and ſided with the Proteſtants. He did many ſervices to the cauſe. He was one of the deputies at the conference of Poiſſi: I have ſaid in another place (b), that he was diſtinguiſhed from the miniſters that were called factious, and that he and du Roſier diſputed with two Catholic doctors in the year 1566 (c). The Church of Rochelle deſired him to be their miniſter in the year 1561, and ſent ſome deputies to him at Fontenai le Comte (d); but the conſequences of that deputation are not known. He wrote very edifying books [B], full of piety and good morality. He died at Saumur in 1594 (e). Anjou was his native country, as La Croix du Maine obſerves. He eſcaped the Paris maſſacre, becauſe the murderers were too eager in running after a lady whom he accompanied, and killing her in the river (f). I do not think he was then ſeventy-eight years old, as it is affirmed in a marginal note of Varillas's Hiſtory of Charles IX, of the Paris edition in 12*mo* 1684.

[A] I ſhall obſerve upon what occaſion he forſook his order.] Mr Vincent's grandmother by his mother's ſide ſaid, that John Rabec was taken at Chateau-Gontier, in Anjou, in her father's houſe. Mr de l'Eſpine, who was then a Carmelite, and was going to preach at Angers, happened to be in that houſe, where he was known and well beloved, as one who had a great reputation, though he was but a young man. He had been there ſome days with Rabec, without knowing him; but being well pleaſed with his converſation, he was very much concerned for his impriſonment: which moved him to pay him ſeveral viſits in his priſon, in order to diſſuade him from the Reformed Religion, and bring him back to the Catholic. His viſits had an effect quite contrary to his intention; for Rabec's arguments convinced him, and prevailed upon him by degrees. Beſides, he was extremely moved with the admirable conſtancy Rabec expreſſed when he was burnt, and with the wonder GOD wrought in him; for though his tongue had been cut off, he ſung at the place of execution with an audible voice, the LXXIXth Pſalm.

> O God, the Gentiles do invade
> Thine heritage, to ſpoil, &c.

As he was continually reflecting upon thoſe things, he made no doubt that the doctrine, againſt which he had ſo much diſputed with Rabec, was that which he ought to embrace. He therefore preached it at Angers above a year, though without openly profeſſing it, and quitting his habit. He cenſured ſeveral abuſes; and inſtead of inſiſting, as others of his profeſſion did, upon Indulgences, Pilgrimages, and the Interceſſion of the Saints, he exhorted his hearers to repent, and to implore the Divine Grace through JESUS CHRIST. He was very much followed at firſt; but at laſt he was ſuſpected, which made him think of removing. He went to Renata of France, Ducheſs of Ferrara, who was a Proteſtant and reſided at Montargis. This is what Mr Vincent, a miniſter of Rochelle (1), heard his grandmother ſay ſeveral times. He obſerves, that ſhe was twelve or thirteen years of age, when Mr de l'Eſpine and Rabec happened to meet at Chateau-Gontier, and that ſhe died in the year 1624, being about 80 years old (2). This Chronology is not very exact; and indeed a great accuracy is ſeldom minded in ſuch narratives. We read in Beza, that Rabec was arreſted at Chateau-Gontier the firſt of Auguſt 1555, and that he ſuffered martyrdom the 24th of April 1556 (3). Mr Vincent's grandmother muſt therefore have been then younger than ſhe ſaid, or muſt have lived more years than her grandſon gives her. Note, as he obſerves (4), that L'Eſpine had been an Auguſtin Monk, if we rely upon the preface of his tracts. Others ſay, he had been a Dominican (5). D'Aubigné (6) ſays he did not make an open profeſſion of the Proteſtant religion, until the conference of Poiſſi.

[B] He wrote very edifying books.] Here follow the titles of them: Traicté des tentations, & moien d'y reſiſter, Lyons 1566, in 8vo. Traicté conſolatoire contre toutes afflictions, qui adviennent ordinairement aux fideles Chreſtiens, Lyons 1565, in 8vo. Traicté pour oſter la crainte de mort, & la faire deſirer à l'homme fidele, Lyons 1558, in 8vo. He publiſhed alſo ſome controverſial pieces, among others, Diſcours du vrai ſacrifice & du vrai ſacrificateur, Lyons 1564. Defenſe & Confirmation du Traicté du vrai ſacrifice & ſacrificateur à l'encontre des frivoles reſponſes & argumens de René Benoiſt Docteur en Theologie, Geneva 1567, in 8vo (7). Some of his works were tranſlated into Latin; for we have of him the following books in that tongue, De tranquillitate animi libri 7. De juſtitia Chriſtiana, de confeſſione peccatorum, de ægrotis conſolandis & de Providentia Dei. He made an excellent Sermon at Rochelle in 1587, upon the LORD's Supper, which Mr Vincent intended to publiſh (8). Simon Goulart of Senlis publiſhed in 1591, a collection of excellent diſcourſes made by John de l'Eſpine, to which, as he uſed to do, he added notes and ſummaries. They are the ſame ſeven books concerning the tranquillity of the mind, which, as has been ſaid above, were tranſlated into Latin (§ a).

[(§ a) The edition of Rochelle in 16mo printed by Jerom Haûtin, 1594, hath an Epiſtle Dedicatory of Simon Goulart to Mr de la Noüe, dated in the year 1587. Rem. Crit.]

(a) He is alſo called de L'Eſpine.

(b) In the article CHARPENTIER, remark [A].

(c) In the article ROSIER, remark [B].

(d) Vincent, Recherches ſur les commencemens de la Reformation de la Rochelle, p. 65.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 68.

(f) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. ii, pag. m. 458. See alſo Thuanus, lib. lii, pag. m. 1078.

) Vincent, Reerches ſur les mmencemens la Reforma-
n en la Ville
la Rochelle,
g. 65, & ſeq.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 68.

(3) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. book ii, pag. 108.

(4) Vincent, Recherches, &c.

(5) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, book xxiv, pag. m. 254.

(6) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. i, book ii, ch. xxv, pag. 146.

(7) Taken from Du Verdier's, Bibliotheque Françoiſe. pag. 688.

(8) Vincent, Recherches, &c. pag. 69.

SPINOSA (John de) lived in the XVIth century. He was born at Belovado in the province of Rioja in the kingdom of Caſtile, and at fourteen years of age was taken into the houſe of the Marquis d'Alarcon. He became an able man, and ſhewed ſo much integrity, that the marquis conceived a particular affection and eſteem for him, ſo far as to entruſt him with the greateſt ſecrets, and to conſult him on the moſt important affairs. After the deceaſe of that lord, Don Pero Gonçalez de Mendoça, his ſon-in-law, ſucceeded him in his offices, and was afterwards made Captain-General in Sicily by the Emperor Charles V. He made John de Spinoſa ſecretary of the cyphers, and of ſtate affairs, and was very well ſatisfied with his conduct; for when Barberouſſe's fleet occupied all the ſtreights of Meſſina, John de Spinoſa was ſo fortunate and dexterous as to croſs the Streights, and bring into Sicily the emperor's orders, and the money due to the ſoldiers. Some time after he quelled the mutiny of the troops in the kingdom of Naples. He followed the ſame Mendoça in the wars of Piedmont, and was his ſecretary; and after the death of that lord, he was ſent twice to Venice for the affairs of the Milaneſe. That employment made him ſtay twelve years at Venice, and gave him occaſion to diſcover ſome qualities, which procured him the approbation and the praiſes of the Venetians. He alſo received ſeveral marks of a particular eſteem from the Emperors Charles V, and Ferdinand, and from Philip II. He commanded in ſome provinces of Lombardy under the Duke de la Cueva, governor of the Milaneſe, and General of the Spaniards in Italy. He had before commanded in a part of Abruzzo with great probity, where he cauſed two famous robbers to be puniſhed [A]. He loved ſtudy, applied himſelf to it as much as his employments and journies could permit him; and even wrote ſome pieces (a) [B].

(a) Taken from the preface which Jerome Serranus prefixed to the Gynæcepænos, of John de Spinoſa, printed at Milan in 1580.

[A] Where he cauſed two famous robbers to be puniſhed.] One of them was ſo cruel, that he drank the blood of thoſe whom he killed; the other added a horrid leudneſs to his robberies and murders, for he raviſhed as many women as he could get. Here are the Spaniſh words of my author. 'Gouernò en Abruzzo el eſtado de la valle Siciliana, dando de ſu integridad muy grandes ſennales, con ſu pobreza: De ſu prudentia con diverſos juizios, y ſententias notables: y de ſu juſtitia con la muerte de Proſpera Camisòla cruelíſſimo homicida, e, inſolentiſſimo violador de mugeres, y de Entino de Baxan, atroce ſalteador de caminos, (y tan inhumano, que como fiera ſaluaje acoſtumbraua beuer la ſangre de aquellos aquien por los boſques heria, ò mataua:) y con la cabeça de ſcachia diabolo pueſta por terròr de los mal hechores, en una pica a las almenas; y ſu cuerpo en quatro partes, en los pàſſos mas peligroſos del eſtado (1). - - - He governed in Abruzzo, in the Sicilian valley, and gave very great proofs of his integrity, notwithſtanding his poverty; of his prudence by ſeveral remarkable ſentences and puniſhments; and of his juſtice by putting to death Proſpero Camiſola, a moſt cruel murderer, and a moſt inſolent raviſher of women, and Entino de Baxan, a notorious highwayman, (ſo inhuman that, like a wild beaſt, he uſed to drink the blood of thoſe whom he wounded or murdered in the woods) he ordered his head to be placed on a pole for the terror of wicked men, his body to be quartered, and his quarters to be placed in the moſt ſuſpicious roads of the country.'

(1) Hieronymus Serranus, in Præfat. Dialogi en laude de las Mugeres.

[B] And even wrote ſome pieces.] I have only ſeen his Gynæcepænos, or his Dialogo en laude de las Mugeres. It was printed at Milan in 4to, in the year 1580, and dedicated by the author to Mary of Auſtria, daughter of the Emperor Charles V, and wife of the Emperor Maximilian II. Women are highly praiſed in that book, which is ſtuffed with examples and quotations; the choice whereof is none of the beſt. The author promiſed a ſecond part, wherein he was to beſtow encomiums upon ſeveral illuſtrious ladies of that age. I wiſh he had performed his promiſe, and that I might ſee his book. He wrote another book, intituled, Micracanthos, wherein he inſerted the actions and memorable ſayings of great men, and obſerved the tragical end of the wicked, that his book might teach his readers how to attain to glory, and how to avoid infamy. He inſerted in it a digreſſion concerning thoſe, who take delight in ſpeaking ill of a book. It will be thought to be good, if we judge of it by the following words. They are very judicious, and teach us how to make a difference between cenſures and flatteries, and then between cenſures that may be uſeful, and thoſe that can be of no uſe. 'Pero contra aquellos que . . . quiſieſſen por ventura en otras coſas tacharme: dexare por agora de hazer excuſationes, ò, reſpueſta defenſiua; refiriendome ala apologia que enel micracanthos tengo ſcrita. Donde ſuficientemente ſe tratta delas ſpecies de maldicientes, y detractores; y dela reprehenſion que deue (excluſas todas las de mas) aceptarſe, y como obra ſaludable, y virtuoſa, agradeſcerſe. Alo qual remi tiendome, ſolamente dire agora, que ſin deſear contra los mal dicientes, y arrogantes burladores; mas venganza de aquella con que la ſcriptura los amenaza diziendo, † parata ſunt deriſoribus judicia. Y ſin admitir por otra parte, las alabanzas engannoſas delos aduladores: ſperare gratamente con deſeo, y humildad la correction delos buenos, y ſabios varones. Teniendo para ello ſiempre enla memoria, aquellas divinas palabras del Eccleſiaſte, que dizen, ‡ Melius eſt à ſapiente corripi: quàm ſtultorum adulatione decipi (2). - - - As for what relates to detraction, I ſhall not enter now upon that ſubject, but refer to what I have ſaid in my Micracanthos, wherein I treat of the different ſpecies of ſlanderers and detractors, and of the reproofs that are to be thankfully received, as wholſome and virtuous. I ſhall only ſay as to ſlanderers and proud ſcoffers, that they ſhall meet with a due chaſtiſement, as the Scripture threatens them, Judgments are prepared for ſcorners. And, on the other ſide, as we ought not to give ear to the deceitful praiſes of flatterers, ſo we muſt receive with gratitude, pleaſure, and humility, the corrections of good and wiſe men, always remembring theſe divine words of Eccleſiaſtes, It is better to hear the rebuke of the wiſe, than for a man to hear the ſong of fools.' Nicolas Antonio (3) never ſaw that Micracanthos; add, that our Spinoza made a large collection of proverbs, and filled it with moral reflexions. He did not publiſh it, and gave his reaſons for it in the ſecond part of the Micracanthos. 'Ha ſcrito algunas otras obras. Entre las quales (allende de los Dialogos dichos): no es de poca importantia, la que yo he viſto de mas de ſeiſmil proverbios vulgares que ha recogido, y parte dellos compueſto; (aunque no acabada de comentar, ni imprèſſa; por las cauſas que in los poſtreros razonamientos de la ſegunda parte del Micracanthos, ſe dize) obra çierto de marauilloſa Doctrina, y provecho, y muy agradable: (ainſi como las otras) por la copia, y diverſidad de las materias, Todas ellas puramente aplicadas ala virtud (4). - - - He wrote ſome other works; among which (beſides the above-mentioned dialogues) the moſt conſiderable part which I have ſeen, contains more than ſix thouſand proverbs, which he collected, and part of which he himſelf compoſed (tho' he did not finiſh his comments on them, nor publiſh them, for the reaſons he gave in his laſt diſcourſes in the ſecond part of the Micracanthos), a work ſurely of wonderful doctrine, profitable, and very entertaining, (as well as his other works) by the copiouſneſs and variety of matters which they contain. He employed them for the advancement of virtue.'

This author may be therefore added to thoſe, who were mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for the year 1686. I ſhall ſet down the paſſage, without minding the moroſe humour of thoſe, who will † Prov. Salom. cap. xix.

‡ Eccl. cap. vii.

(2) John de Spinoſa, advertiſement to the reader prefixed to the Gynæcepænos.

(3) See his Bibl. Scriptor. Hiſpaniæ, at the word Joannes de Eſpinoſa, Tom. i, pag. 521.

(4) Hieronym. Serranus, in Præfat. Dialogi en laude de las Mugeres.

Authors, w have written on Proverbs.

will not like it: I rather chuſe to have a regard for thoſe, who will be very well pleaſed with it. ‘Mr Menage promiſes to publiſh an etymological treatiſe upon the French proverbs. There are few ſubjects that are ſo curious as that is, and that require a greater ſkill in the knowledge of hiſtory. There has been a vaſt number of proverbs in all languages. Dydimus made a collection of them in ten books, which he dedicated to thoſe, who had writ upon that ſubject. Aldus Manutius publiſhed ſomething of Didymus's work with Tharræus's proverbs, in the year 1505. But it is to be obſerved, that Greek and Latin proverbs are not ſo numerous, as Eraſmus, and thoſe who have collected what was omitted by him, would make us believe; for it is certain, and they have been ſufficiently cenſured for it, that they took for a proverbial expreſſion what was not ſo. Oudin made a pretty large collection of French proverbs, intituled, Curioſitez Françoiſes, but he does not give their etymologies. The dialogues between a clown and a Philoſopher have been often reprinted at Paris; they contain the origin of a conſiderable number of proverbs, ſometimes right, and ſometimes wrong. The edition of 1665 is intituled, Les illuſtres Proverbes nouveaux & Hiſtoriques expliquez par diverſes Queſtions curieuſes & morales 2 vol. in 12mo. Mr Furetiere, who has publiſhed a ſecond caſe very ſatirical againſt ſeveral members of the French academy, pretends that the proverbs of his Univerſal Dictionary are not taken from that of the academy, and that in order to remove their meanneſs, he has enriched moſt of them by enquiring into their origin, or applying to them curious hiſtories, and comparing them with the proverbs of other nations, which Paquier, Belinghen, and other grave authors, have not thought unworthy of their pen (5).’ A good ſupplement might be made to this long paſſage. It might be ſaid that Belinghen, mentioned by Furetiere, ſhould have been called Fleury de Bellinghen, which was his true name. I think he taught French in Holland. He publiſhed at the Hague in 1656, L'Etymologie ou Explication des Proverbes François, divided into three books by way of a dialogue. It is a book in 8vo of 363 pages. The Premiers eſſais des Proverbes, publiſhed by that author in 1653, having met with a good reception, he reſolved to put out a ſecond edition much larger, viz. that whoſe title I have juſt now mentioned. Mr de Brieux publiſhed at Caën the origins of ſome proverbs in the year 1672, in 12mo. If we go higher, we ſhall find at the end of Nicod's Dictionary (6) the Explications morales d'aucuns Proverbes communs en la Langue Françoiſe, with a tranſlation of ſome French proverbs into Latin verſe, by Joannes Ægidius Nucerienſis. You will find in Morhofius's Polyhiſtor many things upon this ſubject; you will find there that Angelus Monoſinius has treated at large of the Italian proverbs in a book printed at Venice in the year 1604, and (7) that Julius Varini wrote a book, intituled, Scuola del Volgo (8), wherein the Italian proverbs are placed according to the order of human actions, and attended with ſome prudential precepts. You will ſee there that the alphabetical collection of Italian proverbs, made by Orland Perſquet, is to be found in Gruterus's Theſaurus, and that one Thomaſo Buoni, who is mentioned, publiſhed a collection of Italian proverbs, in two volumes (9). But you will not find there the origine de volgari Proverbii, publiſhed by Aloyſio Cinthio, at Venice, in the year 1526 (10). Morhofius had forgot the name of a modern author, who has collected the Italian proverbs, and is mentioned in the Journals (11): This new author is no other than Mr Menage. It does not appear that Morhofius was well acquainted with the writers of our French proverbs. He only mentions the collection of an anonymous author, and that of Joh. Ægidius Nucerienſis, and the firſt edition of Belinghen's proverbs, and laſtly, of one le Duc, who put out a book (12), intituled, Proverbes en Rimes, ou Rimes en Proverbes. Morhofius knew the collection of Spaniſh proverbs made by Ferdinand Nunnez, Profeſſor of Eloquence and of the Greek tongue at Salamanca, and the Filoſophia vulgar of Juan de Mal Lara (13), and the Medicina Eſpannola contenida en Proverbios vulgares de nueſtra Lengua, compoſed by Juan Soropan de Rieros. That Filoſophia vulgar is a collection of a thouſand proverbs, with their explication. I do not wonder he does not mention the book of our Spinoſa; for it is loſt. He does not forget the compilers of German, Engliſh, and Dutch proverbs. I know no author that mentions Polydore Virgil, who pretends to have broke the ice, both with reſpect to proverbs, and to the inventors of things. His treatiſe of proverbs came out in 1498, and was dedicated to Guido Ubaldo, Duke of Urbino (14). I have an edition of it reviſed and enlarged the fourth time. It was printed at Baſil 1541, it contains 456 pages in 8vo.

SPINOZA (BENEDICT DE) a Jew by birth, who forſook Judaiſm, and at laſt became an Atheiſt, was a native of Amſterdam. He was a ſyſtematical Atheiſt, and brought his Atheiſm into a new method, tho' the ground of his doctrine was the ſame with that of ſeveral antient and modern Philoſophers, both in Europe and the Eaſtern countries, [A]. As for the latter, one needs only read what I have ſaid

[A] He was a ſyſtematical Atheiſt, and brought his Atheiſm into a new method, tho' the ground of his new doctrine was the ſame with that of ſeveral antient and modern Philoſophers, both in Europe and the eaſtern countries.] I think he is the firſt who reduced Atheiſm into a ſyſtem, and formed it into a body of doctrine, ordered and connected according to the manner of the Geometricians; but otherwiſe his opinion is not new. It has been believed long ago, that the whole univerſe is but one ſubſtance, and that God and the world are but one Being. Pietro della Valle mentions certain Mahometans, who call themſelves Ehl Eltahkik, or men of truth, men of certainty, who believe that there is nothing exiſtent but the four elements, which are GOD, man, and every thing elſe (1). He alſo mentions the Zindikites, another Mahometan ſect. They come near the Sadducees, and have their name from them. They do not believe a providence, nor the reſurrection of the dead, as Giggoius ſhews upon the word Zindik (2). . . . . One of their opinions is, that whatever is ſeen, whatever is in the world, whatever hath been created is GOD (3). There have been ſuch Heretics among Chriſtians; for we find in the beginning of the XIIIth century, one David of Dinant, who made no diſtinction between God and the firſt matter. It is a miſtake to ſay that he is the firſt who vented ſuch a fooliſh doctrine (4). Does not Albertus Magnus mention a Philoſopher, who had done the like? ‘Alexander Epicureus dixit Deum eſſe materiam, vel non eſſe extra ipſam, & omnia eſſentialiter eſſe Deum, & formas eſſe accidentia imaginata; & non habere veram entitatem, & ideo dixit omnia idem eſſe ſubſtantialiter, & hunc Deum appellavit aliquando Jovem, aliquando Apollinem, & aliquando Palladem; & formas eſſe peplum Palladis, & veſtem Jovis; & neminem ſapientum ajebat ad plenum revelare poſſe ea quæ latebant ſub peplo Palladis & ſub veſte Jovis (5). - - - - Alexander the Epicurean held, that GOD was matter, or was not different from it, and that all things were eſſentially GOD, and that forms were imaginary accidents, and had no real entity, and therefore he ſaid all things were ſubſtantially the ſame; and this GOD he called ſometimes Jupiter, ſometimes Apollo, and ſometimes Pallas: and that forms were the robe of Pallas, and garment of Jupiter; and he aſſerted that none of the wiſe men could fully reveal what was concealed under the robe of Pallas, and the garment of Jupiter.’ Some believe that this Alexander lived in Plutarch's time (6); others ſay in expreſs words, that he lived before David of Dinant. Secutus fuit Alexandrum qui fecit librum de materia, ubi probare conatur omnia eſſe unum in materia. This we find in the margin of the treatiſe, in which Thomas Aquinas confutes that monſtrous and extravagant opinion (7). Perhaps, David of Dinant knew not that there was ſuch a Philoſopher of the Epicurean ſect,

---

(5) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for February 1686, Art. iii. In the Abſtract of the Etymologies of the Italian tongue written by Mr Menage, at the end of which there is an explication of ſeveral Italian Proverbs.

(6) The edition I make uſe of is that of Paris 1606, in folio.

(7) Morhofius, Polyhiſt. lib. i, cap. xxi, pag. 256.

(8) Printed at Verona 642, in 12mo.

(9) Printed at Venice in 8vo, in the year 1604 and 1606.

(10) See Nicolas Antonio, Bibl. Hiſp. Tom. i, pag. 559.

(11) Mentio etiam fit, ſi rectè memini, in poſtremis Ephemeridibus Gallicis novi cujuſdam autoris qui Proverbia Italica congeſſerit, cujus mihi nunc nomen excidit. Morhofius, Polyhiſtor. lib. i, cap. xxi, pag. 256. The Journal des Sçavans, 1686, pag. 164, Dutch Edit. and the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for the ſame year pag. 64, mention that collection of Mr Menage.

(12) Printed at Paris, 1665, in 12mo.

(13) It ſhould be Mallara.

(14) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the book de Inventoribus Rerum, written by Polydore Virgil.

A LIST of ſome perſons who had the ſame opinion with Spinoza.

(1) See the article ABUMUSLIMUS, remark [A].

(2) Beſpier, Remarques curieuſes ſur Ricaut, Etat préſent de l'Empire Ottoman, pag. 648.

(3) Pietro della Valle, pag. 394, of the iiid Tom. apud Beſpier, ib.

(4) Aſſeruit Deum eſſe materiam primam, quod nemo ante eum deliraverat. Theoph. Raynaud. Theol. Naturali, Diſtinct. vi, num. 6, pag. 563.

(5) Albertus in I Phyſ. Tract. iii, cap. xiii, apud Pererium de communibus Principiis, lib. v, cap. xii, pag. m. 309, 310.

(6) Is eſt, opinor, quem inter ſodales ſuos memorat Plutarchus II, ſympoſ. 3. Thomaſius, Diſſertat. XIV, ad Phil. Stoic. pag. 199.

(7) Ad lib. i, Tomæ contra Gentil. cap. xvii, f. 23 ed. Lugd. A. 1586. Thomaſ. ibid. p. 200.

ſaid in the remark [D] of the article JAPAN, and what I ſhall ſay below concerning the Theology

ſect; but at leaſt it muſt be granted me, that he knew very well he had not invented that doctrine. Had he not learned it of his maſter? Was he not the diſciple of that Amalricus, whoſe dead body was dug up and burnt in the year 1208, and who taught that all things were God, and but one Being (8)? 'Omnia ſunt Deus: Deus eſt omnia. Creator & creatura idem. Ideæ creant & creantur. Deus ideò dicitur finis omnium, quòd omnia reverſura ſunt in ipſum, ut in Deo immutabiliter conquieſcant, & unum individuum atque incommutabile permanebunt. Et ſicut alterius naturæ non eſt Abraham, alterius Iſaac, ſed unius atque ejuſdem: ſic dixit omnia eſſe unum, & omnia eſſe Deum. Dixit enim, Deum eſſe eſſentiam omnium creaturarum (9). - - - - All things are GOD, GOD is all things. Creator and creature the ſame. Ideas create and are created. GOD is therefore ſaid to be the end of all things, becauſe they all return into him, that they may reſt unchangeably in GOD, and continue one individual and unalterable. And as Abraham is not of one nature, Iſaac of another, but of one and the ſame: ſo he aſſerted that all things were one, and all things were GOD. For he affirmed GOD to be the eſſence of all creatures.' I dare not affirm that Strato, a Peripatetic Philoſopher, was of the ſame opinion; for I do not know whether he taught that the univerſe or nature was a ſimple and only ſubſtance: I only know, that he believed it to be inanimate, and that he acknowledged no other God than nature. 'Nec audiendus ejus (Theophraſti) auditor Strato, is qui Phyſicus appellatur, qui omnem vim divinam in natura ſitam eſſe cenſet, quæ cauſas gignendi, augendi, minuendi habeat, ſed careat omni ſenſu ac figura (10). - - - - - Neither is Strato, Theophraſtus's diſciple, to be heard, he who is called the Natural Philoſopher, who thinks that all divine power was lodged in nature, in which are the cauſes of producing, increaſing, and diminiſhing, but is without any ſenſe or figure.' As he laughed at Epicurus's atoms and vacuum, one might think that he made no diſtinction between the ſeveral parts of the world; but this is no neceſſary conſequence. All that can be concluded is, that his opinion comes a great deal nearer Spinoziſm, than the ſyſtem of atoms. Here follows a paſſage, wherein it is more largely ſet forth. 'Negas ſine Deo poſſe quicquam, ecce tibi è tranſverſo Lampſacenus Strato, qui det iſti Deo immunitatem magni quidem muneris. Sed quum Sacerdotes Deorum vacationem habeant, quanto eſt æquius habere ipſos Deos? Negat opera Deorum ſe uti ad fabricandum mundum. Quæcunque ſint docet omnia effecta eſſe natura, nec ut ille qui aſperis, & levibus, & hamatis, uncinatiſque corpuſculis concreta hæc eſſe dicat interjecto inani, ſomnia ſenſet hæc eſſe Democriti non docentis, ſed optantis. Ipſe autem ſingulas mundi partes perſequens, quicquid aut ſit, aut fiat, naturalibus fieri, aut factum eſſe docet ponderibus & motibus: ſic ille & Deum opere magno liberat, & me timore (11). - - - You deny any thing to have power but GOD; behold, on the contrary, how Strato of Lampſacus, gives to that GOD an immunity from acting. And ſeeing the prieſts of the gods enjoy a vacation, how much more reaſonable is it that the gods themſelves ſhould have it? He denies that he uſes the operation of the gods in fabricating the world. All things that exiſt, he ſays, are effected by nature, not as he who ſaid, that all things were formed by the coalition of rough, ſmooth, crooked, and hooked particles, vacuities being interſperſed, he thinks theſe to be the dreams of Democritus. But, conſidering all the parts of the world, he aſſerts that all things which exiſt, or are made, are produced by weights and motions: ſo he hath exempted GOD from great labour, and me from fear.' There is even ground to believe that he did not teach, as the Atomiſts did, that the world was a new work, and produced by chance; but that he taught, as the Spinoziſts do, that nature has produced it neceſſarily and from all eternity. I think the following words of Plutarch, if rightly underſtood, ſignify, that nature made all things of itſelf, and without knowledge, and not that it's works began by chance. Τελευτῶν τὸν κόσμον αὐτὸν οὐ ζῶον εἶναι τὸ δὲ κατὰ φύσιν ἕπεσθαι τῷ κατὰ τύχην. ἀρχὴν γὰρ ἐνδιδόναι τὸ αὐτόματον, εἶτα οὕτω περαίνεσθαι τῶν φυσικῶν παθῶν ἕκαστον. Denique mundum ipſum animal eſſe negat (Strato) vultque naturam ſequi temerarios fortunæ impetus, initium enim rebus dare ſpontaneam quandam naturæ vim, & ſic deinceps ab eadem natura phyſicis motibus imponi finem (12). - - - Finally, Strabo denies that the world itſelf is an animal, and will have it, that nature obeys the caſual impulſes of fortune, for a certain ſpontaneous power of nature gives to things a beginning, and in like manner afterwards, an end is put by the ſame nature to Phyſical motions. This tranſlation, which I have found in page 58 of Leſcaloperius's commentary upon Cicero de Natura Deorum, and to which I have added enim after initium, is better than that of Amyot, and that of Xylander: nevertheleſs, there is ſomething in it that does not ſuit the notion one ought to have of the opinion of that famous Philoſopher, the greateſt of all the Peripatetics (13). The words temerarii fortunæ impetus ſpoil the ſymmetry of his ſyſtem; and we ſee that Lactantius diſtinguiſhes it from that of the Epicureans, and aſcribes no chance to it. 'Qui nolunt, ſays he (14), divina providentia factum eſſe mundum, aut principiis inter ſe temerè coëuntibus dicunt eſſe concretum, aut repente natura extitiſſe. Natura verò (ut ait Straton) habere in ſe vim gignendi, & vivendi, ſed eam nec ſenſum habere ullum, nec figuram: ut intelligamus, omnia quaſi ſua ſponte eſſe generata, nullo artifice, nec authore. Utrumque vanum, & impoſſibile. - - - - Thoſe who will not have the world to have been made by divine providence, ſay, that it either proceeded from the fortuitous concourſe of principles, or, on a ſudden, exiſted by nature. But nature (as Strato ſays) has in itſelf the power of producing, and of living, but hath neither any ſenſe nor figure: that we may underſtand all things to be produced ſpontaneouſly, without any artificer or author. But both theſe opinions are frivolous and abſurd.' Note, that Seneca repreſents Plato's doctrine and that of Strato, as two oppoſite extremes: one of them deprived God of a body, and the other deprived him of a ſoul (15). I think I have read in Father Salier's book upon the ſpecies of the Euchariſt, that ſeveral antient Philoſophers or Heretics taught the unity of all things; but becauſe I have not that book now, I only mention this by the by. Father Salier is a French Minime. His book printed at Paris, in the year 1689, is intituled, Hiſtoria Scholaſtica de Speciebus Euchariſticis, ſive de formarum materialium natura ſingularis obſervatio ex profanis ſacriſque Autoribus. It has been mentioned in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, for September 1690, page 13.

The doctrine of the ſoul of the world, which was ſo common among the Antients, and made the principal part of the ſyſtem of the Stoics is, at the bottom, the ſame with that of Spinoza. Which would more clearly appear, if it had been explained by authors verſed in Geometry; but becauſe the books wherein it is mentioned, are written rather in a rhetorical than a dogmatical method; whereas Spinoza is a preciſe writer, and avoids the figurative ſtyle, which often hinders us from having a juſt notion of a body of doctrine; hence it is that we find ſeveral material differences between his ſyſtem, and that of the ſoul of the world. If any one ſhould maintain that Spinoziſm is more coherent, he ſhould alſo maintain that it is not ſo orthodox; for the Stoics did not deprive God of his providence; they re-united in him the knowledge of all things; whereas Spinoza aſcribes to him only ſeparated and very limited knowledge. Read theſe words of Seneca. 'Eundem quem nos Jovem intelligunt, cuſtodem RECTOREMQUE univerſi, animum ac ſpiritum, mundani hujus operis dominum & artificem, cui nomen omne convenit. Vis illum fatum vocare? non errabis. Hic eſt, ex quo ſuſpenſa ſunt omnia, cauſa cauſſarum. Vis illum providentiam dicere? recte dices. Eſt enim, cujus conſilio huic mundo providetur, ut inconcuſſus eat, & actus ſuos explicet. Vis illum naturam vocare? non peccabis. Eſt enim, ex quo nata ſunt omnia, cujus ſpiritu vivimus. Vis illum vocare mundum? non falleris. Ipſe enim eſt, totum quod vides, totus ſuis partibus inditus, & ſe ſuſtinens vi ſua (16). Quid eſt autem, cur non exiſtimes in eo divini aliquid exiſtere, qui Dei pars eſt? Totum hoc quo continemur, & unum eſt, &

'Deus,

(8) See Prateolus, in Elencho Hæreſum, Voce Almaricus, pag. m. 23. He ſays, that according to ſome authors, that Heretic and his adherents were burnt alive.

(9) Hæc de Amalrico Gerſon tract. de Concord. Metaph. cum Leg. Part. IV, Oper. alphab. 20, lit. N. ex Hoſtienſi & Odone Tuſculano. Thomaſius, Diſſert. XIV, ad Phil. Stoïc. 200.

(10) Cicero de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, cap. li.

(11) Idem, Academ. Quæſt. lib. ii, cap. xxxviii.

(12) Plutarchus adverſus Colotem, p. 1115, B.

(13) Τῶν ἄλλων Περιπατητικῶν ὁ κορυφαιότατος Στράτων. Peripateticorum reliquorum ſummus Strato. Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

(14) Lactant. de ira Dei, cap. x, pag. 533.

(15) Ego feram aut Platonem aut Peripateticum Stratonem, alter fecit Deum ſine corpore, alter ſine animo? Seneca, in Libro contra Superſtitiones, apud Auguſtin. de Civit. Dei, lib. vi, cap. x.

(16) Seneca, Quæſt. Natur. lib. ii, cap. xlv.

Theology of a ſect of the Chineſe [B]. I have not been able to learn any particulars relating Deus, & ſocii ejus ſumus & membra (17). - - - They mean the ſame Jupiter as we, the preſerver and GOVERNOR of the univerſe, a mind and ſpirit, the Lord and artificer of this mundane fabric, to whom every appellation doth agree. Will you call him Fate? You will not be miſtaken. It is he upon whom all things depend, the cauſe of cauſes. Will you name him Providence? You will be in the right. For it is he by whoſe care this world is ſo ordered that it goes on ſteadily, and exerts it's operations. Will you give him the name of Nature? You miſtake not. For it is he from whom all things receive their beginning, by whoſe ſpirit we live. Will you call him the World? You ſpeak the truth. For he is all what you ſee, all diffuſed through all it's parts, and ſupporting himſelf by his own power. Why therefore do not you believe that there is ſomething divine in that which is a part of God? All that in which we are contained, is both one, and God, and we are his companions and members.' Read alſo Cato's diſcourſe in the ninth book of Lucan's Pharſalia, eſpecially theſe three verſes:

Eſtne Dei ſedes niſi terra, & pontus, & aër,
Et cœlum & virtus? Superos quid quærimus ultra?
Juppiter eſt quodcunque vides, quocunque moveris (18).

Is not the ſeat of Jove, earth, ſea, and air,
And heaven, and virtue? Where wou'd we further trace
The god? Where'er we move, whate'er we ſee
Is Jove. - - - - -

I ſhall obſerve, by the way, an abſurdity of thoſe, who maintain the ſyſtem of the ſoul of the world. They ſay, that all the ſouls both of men and brutes, are particles of the ſoul of the world, which are re-united to their whole, by the death of the body: And to make us underſtand it, they compare animals to bottles full of water; floating upon the ſea. If thoſe bottles were broke, their water would be re-united to its whole; thus it is with particular ſouls, ſay they, when death deſtroys the organs in which they were ſhut up. Nay, ſome ſay that extaſies, dreams, and intenſe meditations, re-unite a man's ſoul to the ſoul of the world, and that this is the reaſon why people foretel things to come by compoſing figures of Geomancy. Nihil heic attingo de arte illa prophetica deque Geomantia, quibus ipſe Fluddus quam plurimum tribuit. Etſi enim mens cogitando ſic in ſeipſam colligi, ac veluti abſtrahi poſſit, ut humanas res contempletur velut è quadam ſpecula: attamen quod illa poſſit, quandiu hoc mortali circumveſtitur corpore, ita uniri animæ mundanæ, ut ſicut illa omnia cognoſcit, ita ipſa particeps fiat cognitionis hujuſmodi: quòd illa item in hac extaſi digitos regat ad exprimenda varia punctula, ex quibus effectus ſive arbitrarios, ſive fortuitos colligere liceat: hoc aut longe fallor, aut fabulam ſapit (19). - - - - It is no difficult thing to perceive the falſity of this parallel. The matter of the bottles floating in the ſea is an incloſure, which keeps the ſea water from touching the water they are full of; but if there was a ſoul of the world, it would be diſperſed through all the parts of the univerſe, and therefore nothing could prevent the union of the ſoul to its whole, and death could not produce that re-union. I ſhall ſet down a long paſſage of Bernier, whereby it will appear, that Spinoziſm is only a particular method of explaining a doctrine, which very much prevails in the Eaſt Indies.

'You are not ignorant of the doctrine of many antient philoſophers concerning the great ſoul of the world, whereof they ſay our ſouls and thoſe of Brutes are portions. Should we thoroughly examine Plato's and Ariſtotle's doctrine, perhaps we ſhould find that it was their opinion. This is in a manner the univerſal doctrine of the Pendets, Pagans in the Eaſt Indies; and that very ſame doctrine conſtitutes to this day the cabala of the Soufys, and of the greateſt part of the men of letters in Perſia, and is explained in Perſian verſes very ſublime and emphatical in their Goult-chez-raz, or parterre of myſteries; as it has been the doctrine of Flud, which our great Gaſſendus has ſo learnedly confuted, and that wherein moſt of our Chymiſts are bewildred. Now thoſe Cabaliſts, or Indian Pendets, carry the extravagance farther than all thoſe philoſophers, and pretend that God, or that Supreme Being, which they call Achar, immutable, immoveable, has not only produced or taken ſouls out of its own ſubſtance, but alſo whatever is material and corporeal in the univerſe, and that their production was not made in the way of efficient cauſes, but as a ſpider produces a cob-web out of its own bowels, and re-aſſumes it whenever it pleaſes. Creation therefore, ſay theſe imaginary doctors, is only an extraction or extenſion, which God makes of his own ſubſtance, of thoſe webs which he draws, as it were, out of his own bowels, in the ſame manner as deſtruction is only his re-aſſuming that divine ſubſtance, thoſe divine webs into himſelf; ſo that the laſt day of the world, which they call Maperlé, or Pralea, in which they believe there will be a general deſtruction of all things, will only be a general re-aſſuming of all thoſe webs which God had thus emitted out of himſelf. And therefore, ſay they, there is nothing real and effective in any thing which we think we ſee, hear, ſmell, taſte, or touch: this world is nothing but a kind of dream, and a meer illuſion, becauſe that multitude and great variety of things, that appear to us, are but one and the ſame thing, viz. God himſelf, as all our different numbers, ten, twenty, one hundred, a thouſand, and ſo of others, are but one and the ſame unity repeated ſeveral times. But if you aſk them a reaſon of ſuch a fancy, and if you deſire them to explain that emanation and return of ſubſtance, that extenſion, that apparent diverſity, or how it comes to paſs that God, who is not corporeal, but Biapek, as they own, and incorruptible, ſhould neverthеleſs be divided into ſo many portions of bodies and ſouls; their anſwer conſiſts only in compariſons, that GOD is like an immenſe ocean, in which many vials full of water ſhould move; that thoſe vials, wherever they ſhould go, would be always in the ſame ocean, in the ſame water; and that if they ſhould break, the waters contained in them would then be united to their whole, to that ocean of which they are portions. Or they will tell you, that it is with GOD as it is with light, which is the ſame all over the world, and yet appears a thouſand ways different, according to the variety of the objects (20) on which it falls, or according to the different colours and figures of the glaſſes thro' which it is conveyed. They will anſwer you, I ſay, only with theſe compariſons, which have no proportion to GOD, and are only fit to caſt a miſt before the eyes of ignorant people; and no ſolid anſwer can be expected from them. If they be told that thoſe vials would indeed be in the like water, but not in the ſame (21), and that there is indeed a like light all over the world, but not the ſame; and ſo with many other ſtrong objections, with which they are perpetually confounded; they repeat ſtill the ſame compariſons, and the ſame fine words, or, as the Soufys do, the fine poems of their Goult-chez-raz (22)'.

It appears from the following paſſage that Peter Abelard is accuſed of aſſerting that all things are GOD, and that GOD is all things. 'Primam elementorum concordiam eſſe Deum & materiam ex quâ reliqua fierent, docuit Empedocles...... Hæc erat illius ætatis Theoſophia, hæc notitia quæ de Cauſa principe habebatur. Jam tandem obſoleverat, & inter veterum ſomnia & phantaſmata recenſebatur. Eam inter veteris Philoſophiæ parietinas & rudera revocavit Petrus Abailardus, ingenio audax, & famâ celeber: Sepultam cineribus invenit, & quaſi Eurydicen Orpheus ab inferis tandem revocavit. Teſtor Vazquezium i. part. quæſt. 3. art. 8. numb. 28. & Smiſingum de Deo uno tract. 1. diſp. 2. quæſt. 2. numb. 54. Deum eſſe omnia, & omnia eſſe Deum, eum in omnia converti, omnia in eum tranſmutari aſſeruit, quia Empedoclœâ, aut fortè Anaxagoricâ præventus Theoſophiâ, diſtinguebat ſpecies ſecundum ſolam apparentiam, nempe quia aliquot Atomi in uno ſubjecto erant eductæ quæ latebant in alio (23)..... Empedocles taught, that the firſt amicable conjunction of the elements was GOD and matter, of which the other beings were made - - - - This was the Theology of that age, this their opinion of the firſt cauſe. But at laſt it grew obſolete, and was reckoned amongſt the dreams and chimeras of the antients. This among the ruins and rubbiſh of the antients was revived by Peter Abelard, relating to Spinoza's family; but there is ground to believe it was mean and inconſiderable

---

(17) Idem, Epiſt. XCII, pag. m. 381.

(18) Lucan. Pharſal. lib. ix, ver. 578.

(19) Gaſſendus, in Examine Philoſoph. Fluddanæ, num. 29, Operum Tom. iii, pag. 247.

(20) There is here an error of the preſs in the original.

(21) Note, that the Spinoziſts make no better anſwer to the diſtinction between ſame and like.

(22) Bernier, Suite des Memoires ſur l'Empire du grand Mogol, pag. 202 & ſeq, Dutch Edit.

(23) Caramuel, Philoſophiæ Realis, lib. iii, §. iii, pag. 175.

‘a man bold, and famous: he found it buried in aſhes, and, as Orpheus did Eurydice, brought it back from hell. My authors are Vaſquez and Smiſingus. He aſſerted, that GOD was all things, and all things were GOD, that GOD was converted into all things, and all things transformed into God, becauſe prepoſſeſſed with the Theology of Empedocles, or perhaps of Anaxagoras, he diſtinguiſhed the ſpecies according to appearance only, namely, becauſe ſome atoms appear in one ſubject which lay hid in another.’

[B] What I ſay concerning the Theology of a ſect of the Chineſe.] The name of that ſect is Foe Kiao. It was eſtabliſhed by royal authority among the Chineſe in the year 65 of the Chriſtian Æra. Its firſt founder was a ſon of the King In fan vam, and was at firſt called Xe, or Xe Kia (24); and afterwards when he was thirty years of age, Foe, that is, no man (25). The Prolegomena of the Jeſuits prefixed to Confucius's book publiſhed by them at Paris, treats of that founder at large. It is ſaid there, that ‘(26) having retired into a deſart, as ſoon as he came to be nineteen years of age, and having put himſelf under the diſcipline of four Gymnoſophiſts to learn Philoſophy of them, he remained under their direction till the age of thirty years, when riſing in the morning before break of day, and contemplating the planet Venus, that bare ſight gave him immediately a perfect knowledge of the firſt principle; ſo that being full of a divine inſpiration, or rather of pride and folly, he betook himſelf to inſtruct men, gave out himſelf as a god, and drew after him fourſcore thouſand diſciples .... At ſeventy-nine years of age, being upon the point of death he declared to his diſciples, that for the ſpace of forty years that he had preached to the world, he had not told them the truth; that he had concealed it under the vail of metaphors and figures; but that it was time now to declare it to them. There is nothing, ſaid he, to be inquired after, and on which one may place ones hopes, but nothingneſs and a vacuum *, which is the firſt principle of all things.’ Here is a man very different from our unbelievers: they do not leave off ſpeaking againſt religion but towards the latter end of their life; they only renounce their Libertiniſm, when they think the time of departing this life draws near (27). But it was then that Foe began to declare his Atheiſm. Teterrimum virus Atheiſmi jam moriturus evomuiſſe perhibetur, diſerte profeſſus, ſe per annos quadraginta eoque amplius non declaraſſe mundo veritatem, ſed umbratili & metaphorica doctrina contentum, figuris, ſimilibus, & parabolis nudam veritatem occultaſſe; at nunc tandem, quando eſſet morti proximus, arcanum ſenſum animi ſui ſignificare velle: extra vacuum igitur & inane, primum ſcilicet rerum omnium principium, nihil eſſe quod quæratur, nihil in quo collocentur ſpes noſtræ (28). His method was the reaſon why his diſciples divided his doctrine into two parts: one is outward, and is that which is publickly preached and taught; the other is inward, which is carefully concealed from the vulgar, and diſcovered only to thoſe that are initiated. The outward doctrine, which, as the Bonzes expreſs it, ‘is only like the wooden frame on which an arch is built, and that is afterwards removed, when the building is finiſhed, conſiſts 1. In teaching that there is a real difference between good and evil, juſtice and injuſtice: 2. That there is another life wherein men ſhall be puniſhed or rewarded for what they have done in this world: 3. That happineſs may be attained by thirty two figures and fourſcore qualities. 4. That Foe or Xaca is a deity and the ſaviour of men, that he was born for their ſake, out of compaſſion for the errors he ſaw them in, that he has expiated their ſins, and that by virtue of his expiation they ſhall obtain ſalvation after death, and ſhall have a new and more happy birth in another world (29). They add to this five moral precepts, and ſix works of mercy, and threaten with damnation thoſe who neglect thoſe duties.

‘The inward doctrine, which is never imparted to the vulgar, becauſe they ought to be kept to their duty by the fear of hell, and ſuch like ſtories, as thoſe Philoſophers ſay, is however in their opinion, the ſolid and true one. It conſiſts in laying down, as the principle and end of all things, a certain vacuum and real nothingneſs. They ſay, our firſt parents iſſued from that vacuum, and returned into it when they died, and that it is ſo with all men, who are reſolved into that principle by death; that men, all the elements, and all creatures, make part of that vacuum; and that therefore there is but one and the ſame ſubſtance, which is different in all particular beings only by figures and qualities, or an internal configuration, much like water, which is always eſſentially water, whether it has the form of ſnow, hail, rain, or ice (30).’ If it be a monſtrous thing to aſſert that plants, brutes, and men are really the ſame thing, and to ground ſuch an opinion upon this that all particular beings are not diſtinct from their principle (31), it is ſtill more monſtrous to ſay, that this principle has no thought, no power, no virtue. And yet, this is the doctrine of thoſe Philoſophers, they place the ſupreme perfection of that principle in its inaction, and abſolute repoſe. Hoc autem principium cum doceant eſſe prorſus admirandum quid, purum, limpidum, infinitum, ſubtile, quod nec generari poſſit nec corrumpi, quod perfectio ſit rerum omnium ipſumque ſumme perfectum & quietum; negant tamen, corde, virtute, mente, potentia ulla inſtructum eſſe: imo hoc eſſe maxime proprium eſſentiæ ipſius, ut nihil agitet, nihil intelligat, appetat nihil (32). Spinoza was not ſo abſurd: the only or ſole ſubſtance he admits, is always acting, always thinking; and his moſt general abſtractions could not enable him to diveſt it of action and thought. The foundations of his doctrine do not allow it.

QUIETISM taught and practiſed by ſome Chineſe.

Obſerve, by the by, that the followers of Foe teach Quietiſm; for they ſay that all thoſe, who ſeek true happineſs, ought to be ſo far abſorbed by profound meditations, as to make no uſe of their intellect, and that they ought, through a perfect inſenſibility, to ſink into the repoſe and inaction of the firſt principle; which is the true way of being perfectly like it and partaking of happineſs. They further ſay, that thoſe, who have attained to that ſtate of quietude, may follow the uſual courſe of life as to the outſide, and teach others the doctrine commonly received. It is only in private and inwardly, that one ought to practiſe the contemplative inſtitute of the beatifical inaction. Quocirca quiſquis bene beateque vivendi ſit cupidus, huc aſſidua meditatione, ſuique victoria eniti oportere, ut principio ſuo quam ſimillimus, affectus omnes humanos domet ac prorſus exſtinguat, neque jam turbetur, vel angatur re ulla, ſed ecſtatici prorſus inſtar abſorptus altiſſima contemplatione, ſine ullo prorſus uſu vel ratiocinio intellectus, divina illa quiete, qua nihil ſit beatius, perfruatur: quam ubi nactus fuerit, communem vivendi modum & doctrinam tradit aliis, & ipſemet ſpecie tenus ſequatur, clam vero ſibi vacet ac veritati, & arcana illa quiete vitæque cæleſtis inſtituto gaudeat (33). Thoſe who were moſt intent upon this contemplation of the firſt principle, formed a new ſect, called Vu guei Kiao, that is, the ſect of the idle or ſlothful, nihil agentium. Thus among Monks thoſe, who pretend to the moſt ſtrict obſervance, form new communities, or a new ſect. The greateſt lords and the moſt illuſtrious perſons ſuffered themſelves to be ſo infatuated with this Quietiſm, that they believed inſenſibility to be the way to perfection and beatitude, and that the nearer a man came to the nature of a block or a ſtone, the greater progreſs he made, the more he was like the firſt principle, into which he was to return. It was not enough that the body ſhould be without motion for ſeveral hours; the ſoul was alſo to be unmoveable, and deſtitute of all manner of ſenſe. What I have ſaid comes ſhort of the Latin which follows: Optimates imperii & ſummos quoſque viros hac inſania adeo occupatos, ut quo quiſque propius ad naturam ſaxi truncive acceſſiſſet, horas complures ſine ullo corporis animique motu perſiſtens, ſine ullo vel ſenſuum uſu vel potentiarum, eo profeciſſe felicius, propiorque & ſimilior evaſiſſe principio ſuo aërio, in quod aliquando reverſurus eſſet, putaretur (34). A follower of Confucius refuted the impertinences of that ſect, and fully proved this maxim of Ariſtotle, that nothing can be made out of nothing (35), nevertheleſs they maintained and ſpread themſelves, and there are many people to this day, who apply themſelves to thoſe vain contemplations (36). Did we not know the extravagances of our Quietiſts (37), we ſhould be apt to think that the writers, who mention thoſe ſpeculative Chineſe, neither well underſtood nor faithfully related what they ſay of them; but if we conſider

(24) The Japoneſe call him Xaca.

(25) See the Acta Eruditor. 1688, pag. 257, in the Extract of the book of Confucius, printed at Paris in the year 1687.

(26) Biblioth. Univerſ. Tom. vii, pag. 403, 404, in the Extract of the ſame book of Confucius.

* P. 29. Vacuum & inane, Cum hiu in the Chineſe Language.

(27) See, above, remark [E] of the article BION the Boryſthenite.

(28) Acta Eruditor. Lipſienſ. 1688, pag. 257.

(29) Biblioth. Univerſelle, Tom. vii, pag. 404, & ſeq. See alſo the remark [C], of the article JAPAN, and the Nouveaux Mémoires ſur l'etat préſent de la Chine par le Pere le Comte, Tom. ii, pag. 103, Amſt. 1698.

(30) Bibl. Univerſelle, Tom. vii, p. 406.

(31) Omnia, quæcunque exiſtunt, vita, ſenſu, mente prædita, quamvis inter ſe uſu & figura differant, intrinſece tamen unum quid idemque eſſe, quippe à principio ſuo indiſtincta. Acta Erudit. Lipſ. 1688, pag. 258.

(32) Ibid.

(33) Acta Eruditor. 1688, pag. 258. See alſo the remark [K] of the article BRACHMANS.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Copioſe probans Ariſtotelicum illud ex nihilo nihil fieri. Ibid.

(36) Ibid.

(37) See the remark [K] in the article BRACHMANS.

able [C]. He learned the Latin tongue of a Phyſician (a) who taught it at Amſterdam, and applied himſelf early to the ſtudy of Divinity (b), and beſtowed many years upon it: and afterwards he wholly devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. Having a Geometrical Genius, and being deſirous to have a good reaſon for every thing, he quickly diſliked the Doctrine of the Rabbins: ſo that the Jews eaſily perceived, he did not approve ſeveral articles of their religion; for he was againſt any conſtraint in matters of belief, and a great enemy to diſſimulation, and therefore he freely declared his doubts and his opinions. It is ſaid that the Jews offered to tolerate him, provided he would comply outwardly with their ceremonies, and even that they promiſed him a yearly penſion; but he could not reſolve upon ſuch an hypocriſy. However, it was only by degrees that he left their ſynagogue; and perhaps he would not have broke with them ſo ſoon, had he not been treacherouſly attacked coming from a play, by a Jew, who gave him a thruſt with a knife. The wound was ſlight but he believed the aſſaſſin deſigned to kill him. From that time he left them altogether, which was the reaſon of his excommunication. I have enquired into the circumſtances of it, but have not been able to find them out (c). He wrote, in the Spaniſh tongue, an apology for his leaving the ſynagogue, which has not been printed. However it is known that he inſerted ſeveral things in it, that have appeared ſince in his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (d), printed at Amſterdam (e) in the year 1670, a pernicious and execrable book, which contains all the ſeeds of the Atheiſm he plainly diſcovered in his Opera Poſthuma. Mr Stoupp has no reaſon to inſult the miniſters of Holland for not anſwering the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus [D]. What he ſays of him is not always true [E]. When Spinoza

(a) Called Francis Vanden Ende. Note, that Mr Kortholt, in the preface to the ſecond edition of his father's book de tribus Impoſtoribus, ſays that a young woman taught Spinoza Latin, and that ſhe was afterwards married to Mr Kerkering, who was her ſcholar at the ſame time with Spinoza.

(b) See the remark [F].

(c) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(d) See the book of Mr Van Til, miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity at Dort, intituled, Het Voorhof der Heidenen voor de Ongeloovigen geopent. That book is mentioned in the Acta Erudit. 1695, pag. 393.

(e) And not at Hamburgh, as it is in the title page.

what paſſes among Chriſtians, we cannot with reaſon diſbelieve the extravagancies aſcribed to the ſect Foe Kiao, or Vu guei Kiao.

I am apt to believe either that the ſenſe, which thoſe men put upon Cum hiu, is not exactly expreſſed, or that their notions are contradictory. They tell us that thoſe words ſignify emptineſs and nothingneſs, vacuum & inane; and in order to confute that ſect, this axiom, Nothing can be made out of nothing, has been alledged againſt them; therefore thoſe who alledged it, muſt have believed that, according to that ſect, nothing is the principle of all Beings. I cannot believe that thoſe Chineſe take the word nothing in its proper ſignification, and I fancy they underſtand it, as people do, when they ſay that there is nothing in an empty trunk. We have ſeen that they aſcribe ſome attributes to the firſt principle, which ſuppoſe that they conceive it as a liquid (38). And therefore it is likely they only diveſt it of the groſs and ſenſible parts of matter. If it be ſo, the diſciple of Confucius would be guilty of the ſophiſm called ignoratio elenchi; for he would have underſtood by the word nihil, what has no exiſtence; whereas his adverſaries underſtood by it what has not the properties of ſenſible matter. I fancy they meant by that word, near the ſame as what the moderns mean by the word ſpace; I ſay, the moderns, who being neither Carteſians nor Ariſtotelians, maintain that ſpace is diſtinct from matter, and that its indiviſible, unpalpable, penetrable, unmoveable, and infinite, extenſion is ſomething real. The diſciple of Confucius would have eaſily proved that ſuch a thing cannot be the firſt principle, if it is beſides deſtitute of activity, as the ſpeculative Chineſe will have it. An extenſion, tho' never ſo real, can produce no particular Being, unleſs it be moved; and if it be ſuppoſed that there is no mover, the production of the world will be equally impoſſible, whether there be an infinite extenſion, or nothing at all. Spinoza would not deny that poſition; but he does not admit of a firſt principle without action. The abſtracted extenſion he gives it in general is only, properly ſpeaking, the idea of ſpace; but he adds motion to it, which may produce the varieties of matter.

[C] His family . . . . was poor and very inconſiderable.] It is well known that Spinoza would not have had a ſufficient ſubſiſtence, if one of his friends had not left him by his will, wherewithal to maintain himſelf. The penſion that the ſynagogue offered him, ſhews that he was not rich.

[D] Mr Stoupp has no reaſon to inſult the miniſters of Holland for not anſwering the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus.] He is the author of ſome letters, intituled, La Religion des Hollandois. That book was written at Utrecht in the year 1673, whilſt the French were maſters of it. Mr Stoupp was then lieutenant-colonel of a Swiſs regiment. He raiſed himſelf afterwards ſo far as to be made a Brigadier, and would have been promoted to higher offices, had he not been killed at the battle of Steinkerken (39). He had been formerly a miniſter, and had officiated in the French Church of the Savoy at London in Cromwell's time. He affected in the letters I ſpeak of to make an odious deſcription of the great number of ſects that are in Holland. Here follows what he ſays of Spinoziſm. 'I ſhould think that I have not mentioned all the religions of this country, if I ſhould ſay nothing of a famous and learned man, who, as I have been aſſured, has many followers wholly devoted to his opinions. His name is Spinoza; he was born a Jew, and has not abjured the Jewiſh religion, nor embraced the Chriſtian: and indeed he is a very bad Jew, and not a better Chriſtian. He has publiſhed within theſe few years a Latin book intituled, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, wherein the chief thing he ſeems to aim at is, to deſtroy all religions, particularly the Jewiſh and the Chriſtian, and to introduce Atheiſm, Libertiniſm, and a full liberty for all religions. He maintains that all of them have been invented for the public good, to the end that all citizens may live honeſtly and obey their magiſtrates, and practiſe virtue, not in hopes of any reward after death, but for the excellency of virtue itſelf, and the advantages that accrue in this very life to thoſe who follow it. He does not openly declare in that book what he thinks of the Deity; he only gives ſome hints of it, and thereby diſcovers it, whereas in converſation he plainly declares that GOD is not an intelligent, and a moſt perfect and happy Being, as we fancy; but only the power of nature, diffuſed all over the world. Spinoza lives in this country; he has been ſome time at the Hague, where he was viſited by all the curious, and even by ſome women of quality, who pretend to more wit than is allotted to their ſex His followers dare not diſcover themſelves, becauſe his book wholly overthrows the foundations of all religions, and has been condemned by a public decree of the States, and the ſale of it is forbidden, tho' they ſell it ſtill publickly. Among all the Divines that are in this country, none has ventured to confute the opinions contained in that treatiſe. I am the more ſurpriſed at it, becauſe the author diſcovers a great knowledge of the Hebrew tongue, of all the ceremonies of the Jewiſh religion, of all the cuſtoms of the Jews, and of Philoſophy; and therefore thoſe Divines cannot ſay that it is a book that deſerves no anſwer. If they continue to be ſilent, it will be ſaid that they have no charity, ſince they leave ſuch a pernicious book unanſwered, or that they approve the opinions of the author, or have not the courage and ability to confute them (40).'

The reader may be pleaſed to obſerve, that whereas in the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I quoted this paſſage, according to my own tranſlation, from the Italian, in this I give it according to the words of the original, (38) Purum, limpidum, ſubtile, See before the citation (32), aërium, ſee above, citation (34).

(39) In the beginning of Auguſt, 1692.

(40) Religion des Hollandois, Letter iii, pag. 65, & ſeq.

Spinoza betook himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, he quickly grew out of conceit with the common ſyſtems, and was wonderfully pleaſed with that of Des Cartes (f). He felt ſo ſtrong an inclination to inquire after truth [F], that he renounced the world in a manner, the better to ſucceed in that enquiry. Not contented to free himſelf from all original, ſuch as Mr Des Maizeaux (41) did me the favour to communicate to me.

(f) Præfat. Operum poſthum.

An anſwer to thoſe letters of Mr Stoupp was printed in 1675. It is intituled, La veritable Religion des Hollandois, avec une Apologie pour la Religion des Etats Genereaux des Provinces Unies . . . . par Jean Brun (42). The ſubſtance of what concerns Spinoza in that anſwer is as follows (43); ‘ I think Stoupp is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Spinoza has not abjured the Jewiſh religion, ſince he has not only renounced the opinions of the Jews, having forſaken all their practices and ceremonies; but alſo eats and drinks every thing that is ſet before him, be it even ſwine's fleſh, or wine come from the Pope's cellar, without enquiring whether it be Caſcher or Neſech. It is true, he profeſſes no other religion, and he ſeems to be very indifferent for all religions, unleſs GOD moves his heart. I ſhall not enquire whether he maintains all the opinions which Stoupe aſcribes to him; and it had been more edifying if Stoupe had ſaid nothing of it: let him juſtify himſelf, if he will. Neither ſhall I enquire whether he is the author of the book, intituled, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. However I am aſſured that he does not own it; and if we may believe the title-page, it has been printed at Hamburgh, and not in theſe provinces. But ſuppoſe this wicked book had been printed in Holland; the States endeavoured to ſtifle it in it's birth, they have condemned it, and have prohibited the ſale of it by a public decree, as ſoon as it came out in their country, as Stoupe himſelf confeſſes, pag. 67. I know it has been ſold in England, in Germany, and France, and even in Swiſſerland as well as in Holland; but I do not know whether it has been prohibited in thoſe countries. The States, whilſt I am writing this, expreſs their piety by forbidding that book again, with many others of the ſame ſtamp.’ As for what concerns the reproaches and complaints, that this book had not been confuted, the author anſwers, 1. (44), That ſince it has been printed at Hamburgh, at leaſt according to the title, Stoupp ſhould rather complain of the Divines of that city, than of the Dutch. 2. (45) That ſince that pernicious book tends to the ſubverſion of Chriſtianity, the Roman Catholics and the Lutherans were no leſs obliged to confute it than the Reformed, and among the Reformed, the Divines of Germany, France, England, and Swiſſerland, ſhould have done their duty in that reſpect as well as the Dutch Divines. 3. That Mr Stoupe may be blamed for the ſame thing. Why did he not anſwer it himſelf? 4. (46) That Spinoza's book is not more pernicious than his; for, if the firſt teaches Atheiſm openly, the other does it covertly: both of them ſhew the ſame indifference for religion. An enemy, who attacks us privately, and under the appearance of friendſhip, is much more dangerous than an open enemy. It is neceſſary to cry out againſt a private enemy, that every body may know of it, whereas every body ſtands upon his guard againſt a profeſſed enemy. Perhaps, this is the reaſon why the Divines of Holland and Swiſſerland have been of opinion that there was no neceſſity to make a ſpeedy anſwer to Spinoza, believing that the horror of his doctrine is a ſufficient confutation of it; the more, becauſe there is nothing new in that treatiſe, what is contained in it having been a thouſand times repeated by prophane men, and yet, thanks be to God, the Church has received no great harm by it. 5. (47), That he (John Brun) has written ſeveral remarks upon that execrable book, which, perhaps, he would have publiſhed, had not the war prevented it: Tho', ſays he, I think I have ſpent my time much better upon ſome other works: nay, I never took Spinoza's book to be ſo pernicious as the defamatory libel of Stoupe's. 6. (48) That, in fine, Spinoza's tract has been confuted in Holland by an excellent man, who was a very good Divine, and a great Philoſopher, viz. by the late Mr Mansfeldt, Profeſſor at Utrecht. Doubtleſs that confutation had been ſooner publiſhed, had not the author been prevented by death. And I do not queſtion that others would have confuted it long ago, had not Stoupe, and his accomplices, hindered it by this bloody war. I ſhall ſet down below (49) the titles of ſome other anſwers to that book of Spinoza.

[E] What he ſays of him, is not always true.] Does he not ſay, that, according to Spinoza, religions have been invented to induce men to the practice of virtue, not in hopes of being rewarded in another world, but becauſe virtue is an excellent thing in itſelf, and profitable in this life? Is it not certain that this Atheiſt had no ſuch thoughts, and that he could not have argued thus without making himſelf ridiculous? All the religions in the world, both the true and the falſe ones, turn upon this great hinge, That there is an inviſible Judge, who rewards and puniſhes after this life, as well the outward, as the inward actions of men. The great uſe of religion is ſuppoſed to derive from that; and if religion had been invented, this had been the chief motive of the contrivers of it. It is plain enough that in this life good actions do not generally procure temporal advantages to men, and that bad ones are the moſt uſual and moſt effectual way to wealth and power; and therefore in order to inſpire men with the love of virtue, and prevent their running into vice, it had been neceſſary to propoſe to them rewards and puniſhments after this life. This is the craft which the libertines aſcribe to thoſe, whom they pretend to have been the firſt contrivers of religion. This is what Spinoza ſhould have believed, and doubtleſs he believed it; and therefore Mr Soupp did not underſtand him in that reſpect, but took him in the quite contrary ſenſe to what he meant. I wonder this fault was left in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, in an article that bears Mr Simon's name. Note, that thoſe who deny the immortality of the ſoul, and providence, as the Epicureans did, are thoſe who maintain, that virtue ought to be followed by reaſon of it's excellency, and becauſe the practice of morality is attended in this life with ſo conſiderable advantages, that we have no reaſon to complain. Doubtleſs, this is the doctrine Spinoza would have taught, if he had been ſo bold as to dogmatize publickly.

[F] He found himſelf ſo ſtrongly inclined to enquire after truth.] The proof of theſe words, and of ſeveral others in the text of this article, is to be found in the preface to the poſthumous works of this author. ‘ Fuit ab ineunte ætate literis innutritus, & in adoleſcentiâ per multos annos in Theologiâ ſe exercuit; poſtquam verò eo ætatis pervenerat, in quâ ingenium matureſcit, & ad rerum naturas indagandas aptum redditur, ſe totum Philoſophiæ dedit: quum autem nec preceptores, nec harum Scientiarum Auctores pro voto ei facerent ſatis, & ille tamen ſummo ſciendi amore arderet, quid in hiſce ingenii vires valerent, experiri decrevit. Ad hoc propoſitum urgendum Scripta Philoſophica Nobiliſſimi & ſummi Philoſophi Renati des Cartes magno ei fuerunt adjumento. Poſtquam igitur ſeſe ab omnigenis occupationibus, & negotiorum curis, veritatis inquiſitioni magnâ ex parte officientibus, liberaſſet, quò minus à familiaribus in ſuis turbaretur meditationibus, urbem Amſtelædamum, in quâ natus, & educatus fuit, deſeruit, atque primò Renoburgum, deinde Voorburgum, & tandem Hagam Comitis habitatum conceſſit, ubi etiam IX Kalend. Martii anno ſupra milleſimum & ſexcenteſimum ſeptuageſimo ſeptimo ex Pthiſi hanc vitam reliquit, poſtquam annum ætatis quadrageſimum quartum exceſſiſſet. Nec tantum in veritate perquirendâ totus fuit, ſed etiam ſe ſpeciatim in Opticis & vitris, quæ Teleſcopiis ac Microſcopiis inſervire poſſent, tornandis, poliendiſque exercuit; & niſi mors eum intempeſtiva rapuiſſet, (quid enim in his efficere potuerit, ſatis oſtendit) præſtantiora ab eo fuiſſent ſperanda. Licet verò ſe totum mundo ſubduxerit, & latuerit, plurimis tamen doctrinâ, & honore conſpicuis Viris ob eruditionem ſolidam, magnumque ingenii acumen innotuit: uti videre eſt ex Epiſtolis ad ipſum ſcriptis, & ipſius ad eas Reſponſionibus. Plurimum temporis in Naturâ rerum perſcrutandâ, inventis in ordinem redigendis, & amicis communicandis, minimum in animo recreando inſumpſit: quin tantus veritatis expiſcandæ in eo ardor exarſit,

‘ ut,

(41) Of whom I have ſpoken in citation (90) of the article RAMUS.

(42) The author of that anſwer was then miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity at Nimeguen. He is profeſſor at Groningen. His Latin name is Braunius, and has appeared in the title of ſeveral books.

(43) Pag. 158.

(44) Pag. 160.

(45) Ibid. pag. 161.

(46) Ibid. pag. 162.

(47) Brun, Veritable Religion des Hollandois, pag. 163.

(48) Ibid. pag. 164.

(49) In the remark [M].

all manner of buſineſs, he alſo left Amſterdam, becauſe the viſits of his friends too much interrupted his ſpeculations, and retired into the country, where he meditated without any hindrance, and made Microſcopes and Teleſcopes. He continued in the ſame courſe of life after he had ſettled at the Hague; and was ſo well pleaſed with meditating, and putting his meditations into order, and communicating them to his friends, that he ſpent very little time in any recreation, and was ſometimes three whole months without ſtepping out of doors. Though he lived a very retired life, his name and his reputation flew every where. Free-thinkers reſorted to him from all parts [G]. The Palatine court deſired to have him, and offered him a profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy at Heidelberg [H]. But he refuſed it, as being an employment little conſiſtent with his great deſire of inquiring into truth without any interruption. He fell ſick of a lingring diſeaſe, of which he died at the Hague, the twenty-firſt of February 1677, being ſomewhat above forty-four years of age (g). I have heard ſay that the Prince of Condé being at Utrecht in the year 1673, ſent him word that he would be glad to ſee him (b). Thoſe who have been acquainted

(g) Taken from the Preface of his Poſthumous Works. See the remark [F].

(b) See the remark [G].

‘ ut, teſtantibus iis apud quos habitabat, per tres continuos menſes in publicum non prodierit: Quinimò, ne in veritatis indagine turbaretur, ſed ex voto in eâ procederet, Profeſſoratum in Academiâ Heidelbergenſi, ei à Sereniſſimo Electore Palatino oblatum, modeſtè excuſavit, uti ex Epiſtola quinquageſimâ tertiâ (50) & quartâ perſpicitur (51). - - - - He was brought up to learning from his youth, and for many years ſtudied Theology; but when he came to greater maturity of underſtanding, he applied himſelf wholly to Philoſophy; but neither his teachers, nor the authors of theſe ſciences, anſwering his expectations, or being able to ſatiate his ardent deſire of knowledge, he reſolved to try the ſtrength of his own reaſon. To further this deſign, the Philoſophical works of the moſt renowned and excellent Philoſopher Renatus Des Cartes were a great aſſiſtance. Wherefore after he had laid aſide all ſort of buſineſs and care of affairs, which greatly hindered his ſearch after truth, that he might not be interrupted in his meditations by his acquaintance, he left the city of Amſterdam, where he was born, and educated; and after having often changed his reſidence, went at laſt to live at the Hague, where he died of a conſumption in February 1677, in the forty-fifth year of his age- He alſo exerciſed himſelf in turning and poliſhing optic glaſſes for Teleſcopes and Microſcopes; and, had he not been removed by an utimely death, greater things might have been expected of him, for he had ſufficiently ſhewn his ability. But tho' he had altogether withdrawn himſelf from the world, yet he was known to many learned and honourable perſons, for his great learning and capacity; as appears by the letters ſent to him, and his anſwers. He ſpent much time in ſearching into the nature of things, and communicating what he had found to his friends, but very little in recreation: yea, he was inflamed with ſuch an ardent deſire of finding out the truth, that he hath not been ſeen in public for three whole months, as hath been teſtified by thoſe with whom he lived. Beſides, that he might not be interrupted in his purſuit of truth, he modeſtly excuſed himſelf from accepting a profeſſorſhip, in the univerſity of Heidelberg, offered him by the Elector Palatine, as appears from the fifty-third, and fifty-fourth epiſtles.’ The Theology he ſtudied ſo long was that of the Jews. It is ſaid that he was not well verſed in their Literature, and in the critical knowledge of the Scripture (52). However it is certain that he underſtood Hebrew (53) better than Greek (54).

[G] Free-thinkers reſorted to him from all parts.] I have named one in another place (55). I omit the reſt, and I ſhall only ſay that the Prince of Condé, whoſe learning was almoſt as great as his courage, and who loved the converſation of Free-thinkers, deſired to ſee Spinoza, and procured him a paſs to come to Utrecht. He commanded there the troops of France. I have been told, that he was obliged to go and viſit a poſt the day Spinoza was to come, and that the term of the paſs expired before that prince returned to Utrecht: ſo that he did not ſee the author of the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus; but he had given orders, that, in his abſence, Spinoza ſhould meet with a good reception, and ſhould not go without a preſent. The author of the anſwer to the book, intituled, La Religion des Hollandois, mentions this in the following manner. ‘ Before I leave this ſubject, I muſt needs ſay that I wonder Stoupe ſhould ſo much inveigh againſt Spinoza, and ſay that he is viſited by many people in this country, ſince he contracted ſuch a ſtrict friendſhip with him when he was at Utrecht. For I have been aſſured that the Prince of Condé, at his ſollicitation, ſent for him from the Hague to Utrecht on purpoſe to diſcourſe with him, and that Stoupe praiſed him very much, and was very familiar with him (56).’

Having more exactly informed my ſelf in this matter, I learned that the Prince of Condé was returned to Utrecht before Spinoza left it, and that it is very true that he diſcourſed with that author.

[H] The Palatine court .... offered him a profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy at Heidelberg.] M. Chevreau ſays thereupon a thing that wants to be rectified. ‘ Being at the court of the Elector Palatine, ſays he (57), I gave a good character of Spinoza, though I then knew that Proteſtant Jew only by the firſt (58) and ſecond parts of Des Cartes's Philoſophy, printed at Amſterdam for John Rieuwertz in 1663. The Elector had that book; and after I had read ſome chapters of it to him, he reſolved to call him to his univerſity of Heidelberg to teach Philoſophy, on condition that he ſhould not dogmatize. Mr Fabricius, who was then profeſſor of Divinity, was ordered to write to him; and though Spinoza was not in very good circumſtances, yet he refuſed to accept that honourable employment. The reaſons of his refuſal were enquired into; and I conjectured from ſome letters I received from the Hague and Amſterdam, that theſe words, on condition that he ſhould not dogmatize, had frighted him’. M Chevreau is miſtaken as to the condition that he ſhould not dogmatize, and Mr Bernard rightly obſerves that it had been a contradiction. Theſe are his words, ‘ One may very well wonder, that ſince Spinoza was already ſo well known, the Elector ſhould have been willing to entruſt him with the care of teaching young people Philoſophy, and much more to require from him that he ſhould not dogmatize; for ſince his impious doctrine was built upon the grounds and principles of his Philoſophy, how could he have taught Philoſophy without inſtilling his poiſonous errors? Such a propoſal, together with the law impoſed on him, implied a kind of contradiction (59)’. It is certain, that this condition was not required from him, and that Mr Chevreau is miſtaken in that particular: We may eaſily prove it by the letter that was written to him. Mr Fabricius, who was ordered to write it, promiſed Spinoza a full liberty of philoſophizing; of which, adds he, the Elector thinks you will not make an ill uſe to the prejudice of the religion by law eſtabliſhed. If you come hither, you will live a pleaſant life, and ſuch as becomes a Philoſopher. Philoſophandi LIBERTATEM habebis AMPLISSIMAM, quâ te ad publice ſtabilitam Religionem conturbandam non abuſurum credit ..... Hoc unum addo, te, ſi huc veneris, vitam Philoſopho dignam cum voluptate tranſacturum, niſi præter ſpem & opinionem noſtram alia omnia accident (60). Spinoza anſwered, that if he had ever wiſhed to be a Profeſſor, he could not have wiſhed for any other profeſſorſhip than that which was offered him in the Palatinate, eſpecially on account of the liberty of philoſophizing, which his Electoral Highneſs granted him. Si unquam mihi deſiderium fuiſſet alicujus facultatis profeſſionem ſuſcipiendi, hanc ſolam optare potuiſſem quæ mihi à Sereniſſimo Electore Palatino per te offertur, PRÆSERTIM OB LIBERTATEM PHILOSOPHANDI quam Princeps Clementiſſimus concedere dignatur (61). I confeſs, that among other reaſons for which he declares he does not find himſelf diſpoſed to accept that profeſſorſhip, acquainted with Spinoza, and the peaſants of the villages where he lived a retired life for ſome time, do all ſay that he was a ſociable, affable, honeſt, friendly, and a good moral man [I]. This is ſtrange; but after all, it is nota more ſurpriſing thing than to ſee men live an ill life, though they be fully perſuaded of the truth of the Goſpel (i). Some will have it that he followed the maxim, Nemo repente turpiſſimus, and that he became an Atheiſt only by degrees, and that he was very far from being ſo in the year 1663, when he publiſhed the Geometrical demonſtration of Des Cartes's principles (k). He appears as orthodox in that book upon the nature of GOD, as Des Cartes himſelf; but we muſt know that he did not then ſpeak according to his perſuaſion [K]. There is ground to believe that the ill uſe he made of ſome maxims of that Philoſopher, occaſioned his Atheiſm. Some ſay that the pſeudonymous piece de Jure Eccleſiaſticorum, printed in 1665,

---

(50) Mr Fabricius, profeſſor of Divinity at Heidelburg, and counſeller to the Elector Palatine, wrote that letter to Spinoza, by his maſter's order, the 16th of February 1673. The following letter is Spinoza's anſwer to Mr Fabricius. Note, that he was then known to be the author of the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus.

(51) Præfat. Oper. poſthumor. B. D. S.

(52) See the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, at the word Spinoza.

(53) See at the end of his Opera Poſthuma, his abridgment of the Hebrew Grammar.

(54) Tam exactam linguæ Græcæ cognitionem non habeo, ut hanc Provinciam ſuſcipere audeam. Spinoza, in Tractatu Theologico-Politico, cap. x, ſub fin. pag. 136.

(55) See the article HENAULT.

(56) Brun, veritable Religion des Hollandois, pag. 164.

(57) Chevræana, Tom. ii. pag. 99, 100. Dutch Edit.

(58) To ſpeak like an orthodox, Mr Chevreau ſhould have ſaid, becauſe I only knew that Proteſtant Jew by the firſt, &c.

(59) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for September, 1700, pag. 301.

(60) Epiſt. liii, Spinozæ, pag. 562, Oper. poſthumor.

(61) Ibid. Epiſt. liv.

feſſorſhip, he ſays, he does not know within what bounds he muſt confine himſelf, that he might not ſeem to be a diſturber of the religion eſtabliſhed by law. Cogito deinde, me neſcire, quibus limitibus libertas iſta philoſophandi intercludi debeat, ne videar publice ſtabilitam Religionem perturbare velle (62). But this does not prove that the condition mentioned by Mr Chevreau was required from him. This ſhews that even good authors are very apt to give a wrong account of a fact. Mr Chevreau ſhould have been contented to ſay, that Spinoza was given in a civil manner to underſtand, that if he ſhould impugn the principles of the Reformed Church, it would be taken amiſs. Inſtead of which he uſes a general propoſition, importing a formal prohibition of dogmatizing: This is a perfect contradiction in the terms. However, it is certain that the clauſe inſerted in the letter written to Spinoza, ſeemed very inconvenient to him: and this is what I meant to expreſs in a general way, when I ſaid, That he refuſed that profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy, being an employment little conſiſtent with his great deſire of inquiring after truth without any interruption; for he had reaſon to believe he ſhould be continually interrupted, and that the divines of the Palatinate would make him loſe a great deal of time in juſtifying to the prince what he ſhould dictate to his ſcholars, or what he ſhould ſay in his lectures. They would have found in them ſometimes one thing directly contrary to the catechiſm of the country, and ſometimes another indirectly contrary to it. Which would have occaſioned many complaints and accuſations: He knew not how far the thing would go, and therefore he could not be ſure of living a quiet life; and though he had not fore-ſeen that it would make him loſe a great deal of time, he was ſenſible that his meditations would be very much interrupted by the obligation he would be under of giving lectures at ſtated times, and by many other functions belonging to a profeſſor. I deſire my reader to join with this explanation, which has been publiſhed in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (63).

[I] He was . . . . . a good moral man.] If you except what he told his intimate friends, who were very deſirious to be his diſciples, he ſaid nothing in converſation but what was edifying. He never ſwore; he never ſpoke diſreſpectfully of God; he went ſometimes to hear ſermons, and exhorted others to go conſtantly to church (64). He did not care for wine, good chear, or money. What he paid for his lodgings at a Painter's at the Hague was very inconſiderable. He minded nothing but ſtudy, in which he ſpent the greateſt part of the night. He lived a perfect ſolitary life. It is true, he did not refuſe the viſits occaſioned by his reputation; and that ſometimes he viſited conſiderable perſons, not to talk of trifling things, or for his diverſion, but to diſcourſe of ſtate-affairs. He underſtood them well, though he had no ſhare in them, and gueſſed pretty right what courſe general affairs would take. I find all theſe particulars in a preface of Mr Kortholt (65), who in a journey he made to Holland, informed himſelf of Spinoza's life as well as he could. ‘Vacavit interdum doctis & principibus viris, ſays he (66), quos non tam convenit, quam admiſit, cum iiſque de rebus civilibus ſermones inſtituit. Politici enim nomen affectabat, & futura mente ac cogitatione ſagaciter proſpiciebat, qualia hoſpitibus ſuis haud rara prædixit . . . . . Se profeſſus eſt Chriſtianum, & vel Reformatorum vel Lutheranorum cœtibus non modo ipſe adfuit, ſed & aliis auctor ſæpenumero & hortator extitit, ut templa frequentarent, domeſticiſque verbi quoſdam divini præcones maximopere commendavit. Nec unquam jusjurandum aut petulans de Deo dictum ex ore Spinoſæ exiit; nec largiore uſus eſt vino, & ſatis duriter vixit. Ideoque hoſpiti quavis anni parte LXXX, aureos Belgicos tantummodo perſolvit, & ſummum CCCC, quotannis impendit. Auro plane non inhiabat. - - - - - He ſometimes paſſed his ſpare hours in converſing with learned and conſiderable men, whoſe company he rather admitted than deſired, and with whom he talked of political affairs. For he loved the name of a Politician, and ſagaciouſly pierced into futurity, and foretold his friends ſeveral events. He profeſſed to be a Chriſtian, and not only went himſelf to the churches of the Calviniſts or Lutherans, but likewiſe frequently exhorted and encouraged others to go to church and greatly recommended ſome preachers to his domeſtics. Nor did ever an oath, or indecent expreſſion concerning GOD, come from the mouth of Spinoza. He uſed wine very moderately, and lived an abſtemious life. Thus he paid his landlord only eighty guilders in the quarter, and ſpent about 400 guilders yearly. He was certainly not covetous of money.’

[K] He did not then ſpeak according to his perſuaſion.] On the contrary, he believed then the ſame things which are to be found in his poſthumous works, viz. That our ſouls are but modifications of the ſubſtance of God. This may be certainly inferred from the preface of the book, by any perſon who knows Spinoza's ſyſtem. I ſhall ſet down the paſſage of that preface, wherein it is ſaid, that having a ſcholar to whom he had promiſed to explain Des Cartes's Philoſophy, he ſcrupled to depart ever ſo little from the opinions of that Philoſopher, though he did not approve of them in ſeveral things, eſpecially in what concerns the will, and human liberty. ‘Cum Diſcipulum ſuum Carteſii Philoſophiam docere promiſiſſet, religio ipſi fuit, ab ejus ſententia latum unguem diſcedere, aut quid, quod ejus dogmatibus aut non reſponderet, aut contrarium eſſet, dictare. Quamobrem judicet nemo, illum hic, aut ſua, aut tantum ea, quæ probat, docere. Quamvis enim quædam vera judicet, quædam de ſuis addita fateatur; multa tamen occurrunt, quæ tanquam falſa rejicit, & à quibus longè diverſam fovet ſententiam. Cujus notæ inter alia, ut ex multis unum tantùm in medium afferam, ſunt, quæ de voluntate habentur. Schol. Prop. 15. part. 1. Principior. & cap. 12. part. 2. Appendic. quamvis ſatis magno molimine atque apparatu probata videantur: Neque enim eam diſtinctam ab intellectu, multò minus tali præditam eſſe libertate exiſtimat. Etenim in his aſſerendis, ut ex Diſſertat. de Method. part. 4. & Meditat. 2. aliiſque locis liquet, tantùm ſupponit, non probat Carteſius, mentem Humanam eſſe ſubſtantiam abſolutè cogitantem. Cum contrà author noſter admittat quidem, in Rerum natura eſſe ſubſtantiam cogitantem: Attamen neget illam conſtituere eſſentiam Mentis humanæ; ſed ſtatuat, eodem modo quo Extenſio nullis limitibus determinata eſt, Cogitationem etiam nullis limitibus determinari: adeòque, quemadmodum corpus humanum non eſt abſolutè, ſed tantum certo modo ſecundum leges naturæ extenſæ per motum & quietem determinata extenſio; ſic etiam mentem ſive Animam humanam non eſſe abſolutè, ſed tantùm ſecundum leges naturæ cogitantis per ideas certo modo determinatam cogitationem: quæ neceſſario dari concluditur, ubi corpus humanum exiſtere incipit. Ex quâ definitione, non difficile demonſtratu eſſe putat, Voluntatem ab intellectu non diſtingui, multò minus eâ, quàm illi Carteſius adſcribit, pollere libertate; quin imò ipſam affirmandi & negandi facultatem prorſus fictitiam (67). . . . . . When he had promiſed to teach his diſciple the Philoſophy of Des Cartes, he religiouſly obſerved this rule, not to depart in the leaſt from Des

(i) Taken from the Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(k) Here is the title of that work: Renati Des Cartes Principiorum Philoſophiæ Pars I, & II, more Geometrico demonſtratæ per Benedictum de Spinoza Amſtelodamenſem. Acceſſerunt ejuſdem Cogitata Metaphyſica, in quibus difficiliores, quæ tam in parte Metaphyſices generali, quàm ſpeciali occurrunt, Quæſtiones breviter explicantur.

(62) Ibid. pag. 563.

(63) In December, 1700, pag. 689, 690.

(64) See the remark [Y].

(65) Sebaſtian: he is profeſſor of Poetry at Kiel, ſince the month of February 1701.

(66) Sebaſtianus Kortholtus, Præfat. Editionis 2 Tractatus Chriſtiani Kortholti patris ſui de tribus Impoſtoribus.

(67) Ludovicus Meyer, Præfat. Renati Des Cartes, &c. Principiorum more Geometrico demonſtr. per Benedictum de Spinoza.

1665, was the fore-runner of the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus [L]. All thoſe, who have confuted the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, have diſcovered in it the ſeeds of Atheiſm; but none has done it ſo clearly as Mr John Bredenburg [M]. It is not ſo eaſy to anſwer all the difficulties contained in that book, as utterly to deſtroy the ſyſtem ‘Cartes's opinions, nor dictate any thing which either was not agreeable, or was contrary to them. Therefore let no man think that he here teaches his own opinions, or even ſuch as he approves. For though he judges ſome things in this book to be true, and owns that he has added ſome of his own, yet it contains many tenets which he rejects as falſe, and which are very different from thoſe he entertains. Of this I ſhall give one inſtance among many, in what concerns the Will, though that ſeems to be copiouſly proved. For he does not believe the will to be diſtinct from the underſtanding, much leſs does he believe it to be endowed with ſuch a liberty. For it appears from ſeveral places in Des Cartes's books that in theſe aſſertions he only ſuppoſes that the human mind is an abſolutely thinking ſubſtance; but does not prove it. Whereas our author admits indeed that there is in nature a thinking ſubſtance: but he denies that it conſtitutes the eſſence of the human mind, and lays it down that Thought, like Extenſion, is not determined by any limits. Thus, as the human body is not extenſion abſolutely, but extenſion determined in a certain manner by motion and reſt, according to the laws of extended nature, after the ſame manner the human mind or ſoul is not thinking abſolutely, but thinking determined in a certain manner by ideas, according to the laws of thinking nature; which thinking is concluded neceſſarily to be in the human body when it begins to exiſt. From this definition it appeared to him not difficult to demonſtrate that the will is not diſtinct from the underſtanding, much leſs that it has that liberty which Des Cartes aſſigns to it; nay even that the faculty of affirming and denying is fictitious.’ - - - - It appears from a letter of Spinoza (68), that he deſired the author of the preface ſhould uſe the advertiſement we have juſt now read. From which you may conclude, that a Divine might have taken many thoughts and phraſes from that book of Spinoza, without being heterodox. See the book, intituled, Burmannorum Pietas (69), printed at Utrecht in 1700.

[L] The pſeudonymous piece de Jure Eccleſiaſticorum, which was printed in the year 1665, was the fore-runner, &c.] Mr Dartis inſerting in his journal ſome objections againſt a book of M. de la Placette (70), ſays that ſincere men, ‘who depreſs the eccleſiaſtical authority, and at the ſame time ſo much the more raiſe the temporal one..... do not obſerve that they fall into the firſt ſnare laid by Spinoza, to open the way to his impious doctrine. This conjecture is grounded upon the date of two books publiſhed by that pernicious man, one in 1665, and the other in 1670. The firſt is intituled, Lucii Antiſtii Conſtantis de jure Eccleſiaſticorum liber ſingularis quo docetur: Quodcumque Divini humanique juris Eccleſiaſticis tribuitur, vel ipſi ſibi tribuunt, hoc aut falsò impieque illis tribui, aut non aliundè quàm à ſuis, hoc eſt ejus Reipublicæ ſivè Civitatis Prodiis, in qua ſunt conſtituti, accepiſſe. The ſecond is his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, which made a much greater noiſe than the firſt. The ſtyle and the principles of thoſe two books are ſo like, that one needs only compare them together, to be fully convinced that they were written by the ſame author. And the bare reading of them is ſufficient to ſhow, that he has only diſcredited the authority of the Clergy in the firſt, and at the ſame time raiſed that of Kings and Magiſtrates, only to make way for the impious doctrines which he aſſerts in the ſecond (71).

[M] All thoſe, who have confuted the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, have diſcovered in it the ſeeds of Atheiſm . . . but none has done it ſo clearly as Mr John Bredenburg.] I have already mentioned the poſthumous anſwer of a profeſſor of Philoſophy in the univerſity of Utrecht (72). To which I add, that a Socinian called Francis Cuper, who died at Rotterdam in 1695, intituled his anſwer to that book of Spinoza, Arcana Atheiſmi revelata, philoſophicè & paradoxè refutata. It is a book in 4to, printed at Rotterdam, in 1676. Mr Yvon, a diſciple of Labadie, and miniſter of the Labadiſts, at Wiewert in Frieſland, confuted the ſame book of Spinoza, in a work which he intituled, L'Impieté convaincuë, and publiſhed it Amſterdam in 1681, in 8vo. It is ſaid in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, 1. That Mr Huet, in his Demonſtratio Evangelica, and Mr Simon, in his book concerning the Inſpiration of the Sacred Writings, have confuted the impious ſyſtem contained in the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. 2. That this Tractatus has alſo been tranſlated into French, and printed with this title, Reflexions curieuſes d'un Eſprit deſintereſſé ſur les matieres les plus importantes au ſalut tant public que particulier. I add, that this tranſlation, printed in the year 1678, in 12mo, came out with two other titles (73), as it has been rightly obſerved in the catalogue of the library of the Archbiſhop of Reims, and that the Latin original has been reprinted in 8vo, with ſeveral odd and chimerical titles, as the Bookſellers thought fit, to deceive the public, and elude the prohibitions of the magiſtrates. I further add, that Father le Vaſſor (74) has very well confuted Spinoza, in his treatiſe concerning the true religion, printed at Paris, in the year 1688. See the Journal des Sçavans of the thirty-firſt of January, 1689; the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, and the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans of the ſame year. Mr Van Til, a miniſter of Dort, wrote very good books in Dutch, to maintain the Divinity and authority of the Scripture againſt that impious man (75). The paſſage I am going to quote out of Mr Saldenus, a miniſter at the Hague, will inform us of the names of ſome other writers againſt Spinoza. That miniſter does not approve that Spinoza ſhould be confuted in the vulgar tongue; he is afraid that perſons curious, and lovers of paradoxes, will learn by that means, what it were better for them never to know all their life. ‘Neque defuêre, qui ſe abominandis ipſius Hypotheſibus (76) voce calamoque oppoſuerunt. Hos inter fuêre, Batelerius (77), Manſveldius, Cuperus, Muſæus, &c. qui omnes an æque feliciter contra eum decertârint, non ſine ratione à quibuſdam dubitatur. Hos ſecutus poſtmodum eſt Guilielmus Blyenbergius (78), civis Dordracenus, qui idiomate etiam vernaculo confodere ipſum laboravit; licet neſciam, an conſilio ſatis tuto; tum quod, quem oppugnat, Adverſarius Sermone illo non ſcripſerit, tum quod periculo vix careat, ne peſtilentiſſimum impudentiſſimi Novatoris venenum, quod ſub linguâ ignotâ latere hactenus plurimos poterat, Sermone vulgato in ipſum etiam vulgus, plus juſto fere curioſum, & in paradoxo proclive, proſerpat tandem & tranſeat (79). - - - - Nor were there wanting men who both preached and wrote againſt his abominable tenets; among whom were Batelerius, Manſvelt, Cuper, Muſæus, &c. Some very reaſonably doubt whether all theſe writers attacked Spinoza with equal ſucceſs. After them appeared William Blyenberg, a citizen of Dort, who endeavoured to refute him in Dutch; tho' I know not whether this was ſafely done, both becauſe the adverſary whom he attacked, wrote not in that language, and becauſe there is ſome danger, leſt the poiſonous venom of that impudent innovator, which, till then, might have lain hid from ſeveral people, in an unknown language, ſhould, by being brought into the common language, creep, and diffuſe itſelf among the generality of people who are too curious and prone to embrace paradoxes.’

An anonymous writer, who denoted his name by theſe initial letters, J. M. V. D. M. publiſhed a Latin letter at Utrecht, in the year 1671, againſt the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. As for thoſe, who have inſerted in ſome books, which they did not write deſignedly againſt that tract of Spinoza, ſeveral things whereby they confute his principles, I cannot name them all, they are ſo many: I ſhall only point out two famous profeſſors of Divinity, Mr Witzius, and Mr Majus, one in Holland, and the other in Germany, and Mr de la Mothe, a French miniſter at London.

I ſhall now ſpeak of Mr John Bredenburg. He was a citizen of Rotterdam, who publiſhed there a book in 1675, intituled, Joannis Bredenburgii Enervatio Tractatus Theologico-Politici, una cum Demonſtratione, geometrico ordine diſpoſita, NATURAM NON ESSE DEUM, cujus effati contrario prædictus Tractatus unice innititur

(68) It is the ninth.

(69) Pag. 41, & ſeq.

(70) His book concerning conſcience.

(71) Journal de Hambourg, Monday the 26th of October, 1694, pag. 133.

(72) Called Regnier de Manſvelt. His book was printed at Amſterdam 1674, in 4to.

(73) One of them is, Traité des Ceremonies ſuperſtiteuſes des Juifs tant anciens que modernes, and the other La clef du Sanctuaire.

(74) He was then Father of the Oratory: He is turned Proteſtant ſince.

(75) See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, for March 1696, Art. iii.

(76) See how he ſpeaks of the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, p. 23.

(77) He ſhould have ſaid Batalerius (Jacobus): his book was printed at Amſterdam 1674, and contains 103 pages in 12mo. It is intituled, Vindiciæ Miraculorum per quæ divinæ Religionis & Fidei Chriſtianæ Veritas olim confirmata fuit, adverſus profanum auctorem Tractatus Theologico-Politici.

(78) I think he wrote againſt the Poſthumous Works, and not againſt the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus.

(79) Saldenus, in Otiis Theologicis, pag. 25.

ſyſtem of his Opera poſthuma; for it is the moſt abſurd and monſtrous hypotheſis that can be imagined, and the moſt contrary to the moſt evident notions of our mind [N]. It ſeems as if providence puniſhed in a particular manner the boldneſs of that innititur (80). He ſet in a full light what Spinoza had endeavoured to wrap up and diſguiſe, and made a ſolid confutation of it. The readers were ſurprized that a man, who was no profeſſed ſcholar, and who had very little learning (81), ſhould have been able to dive into all the principles of Spinoza, and to confute them ſo ſucceſsfully, after he had repreſented them in their full ſtrength, by a fair analyſis. I have heard of a remarkable thing, viz. That this author having many times conſidered his anſwer, and the principle of his adverſary, found, at laſt, that his principle might be brought to a demonſtration. Whereupon he undertook to prove, that there is no other cauſe of all things, but a Being, which neceſſarily exiſts, and acts, by an immutable, unavoidable, and unalterable neceſſity. He followed the method of the Geometricians, and after he had drawn up his demonſtration, he examined it all manner of ways; he endeavoured to find out the weak ſide of it, and could never think of any way to confute it, nor even to weaken it. Which made him very uneaſy; he groaned, and ſighed, he was angry with reaſon, and deſired his moſt learned friends to help him to find out the fault of that demonſtration. Nevertheleſs, he ſuffered no body to take a copy of it. Francis Cuper tranſcribed it by ſtealth, tho' he had promiſed not to do it (82). That man, perhaps, moved by the mutual jealouſy of authors, for he had writ againſt Spinoza, and had not been ſo ſucceſsful as John Bredenburg, made uſe of that copy ſome time after to accuſe him of Atheiſm. He publiſhed it in Dutch with ſome reflexions; Bredenburg defended himſelf in the ſame language: ſeveral pieces were publiſhed on both ſides, which I have not read, for I do not underſtand Dutch. Orobio, a Jew, who was an able Phyſician (83), and Aubert de Verſé (84) engaged in that quarrel, and ſided with Cuper. They maintained that the author of the demonſtration was a Spinoziſt, and conſequently an Atheiſt. As far as I have been able to underſtand by what I have heard, the latter defended himſelf, by alledging the common diſtinction between faith and reaſon. He pretended that as the Proteſtants and the Catholics believe the myſtery of the Trinity, tho' inconſiſtent with the light of nature, he believed free-will, tho' reaſon afforded him ſtrong proofs that every thing happens by an unavoidable neceſſity, and conſequently that there can be no religion. It is no eaſy thing to drive a man out of ſuch an entrenchment. It may be ſaid that he is not ſincere, and that is impoſſible to believe, as a truth, what is contrary to a Geometrical demonſtration: but can this be ſaid without ſetting yourſelf up for a judge in a caſe, wherein incompetency may be objected againſt you? Have we a right to decide what paſſes in other mens hearts? Have we a ſufficient knowledge of a man's ſoul, to be poſitive that ſuch and ſuch combinations cannot be found in it? Have we not many inſtances of abſurd combinations, and ſuch as come nearer to a contradiction than that which John Bredenburg alledged? For it ought to be obſerved that there is no contradiction between theſe two things: 1, Reaſon teaches me that this is falſe; 2, And yet I believe it, becauſe I am perſuaded that reaſon is not infallible, and becauſe I had rather follow an inward ſenſe, and the impreſſions of conſcience, in ſhort, the word of GOD, than a metaphyſical demonſtration. This is not believing, and diſbelieving at the ſame time one and the ſame thing. Such a combination is impoſſible, and no man ought to be admitted to alledge it for his vindication. However it be, the man I ſpeak of made it appear that the ſenſe of religion, and the hopes of another life prevailed in his ſoul againſt his demonſtration; and I have been told that the marks he gave of it, during his laſt ſickneſs, put his ſincerity out of all doubt. The Abbot de Dangeau (85) ſpeaks of ſome men, whoſe religion is in their mind, and not in their heart; they are perſuaded of the truth of it, but their conſcience is not affected with the love of GOD. I think it may likewiſe be ſaid that there are ſome men, whoſe religion is in their heart, and not in their mind. They loſe ſight of it, when they make uſe of reaſon to come to the knowledge of it; it eſcapes the ſubtilties and ſophiſms of their Logic; they know not which way to turn whilſt they proclaim the arguments pro and con: but when they leave off diſputing, and mind only their inward ſenſe, the inſtinct of conſcience, the power of education, &c. they are perſuaded that there is a religion, and conform their lives to it as much as human infirmities can permit. This was the caſe of Cicero: one can hardly doubt it who compares his other books with thoſe de Natura Deorum, wherein he makes Cotta triumph over all the interlocutors, who maintained the exiſtence of the gods.

Whoever deſires to know the ſhifts and equivocations made uſe of by Spinoza to conceal his Atheiſm, needs only read Chriſtian Kortholt's book de tribus Impoſtoribus magnis (86), printed at Kiel in 1680, in 12mo. The author has there collected ſeveral paſſages of Spinoza, and ſhown all the venom and artifice that lie in them. This is not the leaſt curious part of the hiſtory and character of that Atheiſt. He quotes (87), among other things, his letter (88), wherein Spinoza complains that there was a report (89) that he had a book in the preſs to prove that there is no GOD.

[N] The moſt abſurd and monſtrous hypotheſis . . . . the moſt contrary to the moſt evident notions of our mind.] He ſuppoſes (90) that there is but one ſubſtance in nature, and that this only ſubſtance is endowed with infinite attributes, and among others, with extenſion and thought. Afterwards he affirms, that all bodies in the univerſe are modifications of that ſubſtance, as it is extended; and that for inſtance, the ſouls of men are modifications of that ſubſtance, as it thinks: ſo that GOD, the neceſſary and moſt perfect Being, is the cauſe of all things that exiſt, but does not differ from them. There is but one Being, and one Nature, and that Being produces in itſelf, and by an immanent action, whatever goes by the name of creatures. He is at once both agent and patient, efficient cauſe, and ſubject; He produces nothing but what is his own modification. This is the moſt extravagant hypotheſis that can be thought of. The moſt infamous things ſung by the heathen Poets againſt Jupiter, and againſt Venus, do not come near the horrid notion Spinoza gives us of GOD. For the Poets did not aſcribe to the gods all the crimes that are committed, all the infirmities of mankind; but, according to Spinoza, there is no other agent, nor other patient but GOD, with reſpect to phyſical and moral evil. Let us obſerve ſome of the abſurdities of his ſyſtem.

THAT according to Spinoza, God and extenſion are the ſame thing.

I. It is impoſſible that the univerſe ſhould be the only ſubſtance; for whatever is extended muſt neceſſarily conſiſt of parts, and whatever conſiſts of parts muſt be compounded: and as the parts of extenſion do not ſubſiſt one in another, it neceſſarily follows that extenſion in general is not a ſubſtance, or that each part of extenſion is a particular ſubſtance, and diſtinct from all others. But, according to Spinoza, extenſion in general is the attribute of a ſubſtance. He owns, as all other Philoſophers do, that the attribute of a ſubſtance does not really differ from that ſubſtance; and therefore he muſt acknowledge that extenſion in general is a ſubſtance: from whence it ought to be concluded, that each part of extenſion is a particular ſubſtance; which overthrows the foundation of the whole ſyſtem of that author. He cannot ſay that extenſion in general is diſtinct from the ſubſtance of GOD; for ſhould he ſay ſo, it would follow that this ſubſtance is in itſelf unextended: and therefore it could never have acquired the three dimenſions but by creating them, ſince it is manifeſt that extenſion cannot proceed from an unextended ſubject, but by way of creation. But Spinoza did not believe that any thing could be made out of nothing. Again, it is manifeſt, that a ſubſtance unextended by it's nature, can never become the ſubject of the three dimenſions; for how could they be placed upon a mathematical point? They would therefore ſubſiſt without a ſubject; and therefore they would be a ſubſtance: ſo that if this author admitted a real diſtinction between the ſubſtance of GOD and extenſion in general, he would be obliged to ſay, that GOD is compoſed of two ſubſtances diſtinct one from another, viz. of his unextended being, and of that author, by blinding him to ſuch a degree, that in order to avoid ſome difficulties, which

---

(80) It is a book in 4to, of 100 pages.

(81) He owns in his preface, that not being able to expreſs himſelf in Latin, he had writ his book in Dutch and then had it tranſlated into Latin.

(82) I have been informed juſt now, that Cuper did always deny it, and that he always proteſted that he found the demonſtration among the papers of the Sieur Hartighvelt, whoſe heir he was.

(83) I have ſeen the tract he publiſhed at Amſterdam, in 1684, intituled, Certamen Philoſophicum propugnatæ veritatis divinæ ac naturaralis, adverſus J. B. principia, &c. It is in Latin and Dutch.

(84) I have ſeen ſomething of what he publiſhed in the ſame year under the name of Latinus Serbaltus Sartenſis. It is a book in Latin and Dutch.

(85) See his third Dialogue at the end, or the extract of it in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for Auguſt 1684, Art. VI, p. m. 605.

(86) Viz. Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury; Thomas Hobbes; and Benedict de Spinoza.

(87) Chriſt. Korth. de tribus Impoſtor. p. 171.

(88) Written to Mr Oldenbourg, in 1675.

(89) Qui quidem rumor, ait, à plurimis accipiebatur. Unde quidam Theologi (hujus forte rumoris auctores) occaſionem cepere de me coram Principe & magiſtratibus conquerendi. - - - Which report went among a great many people. From whence ſome Divines (who perhaps were the inventers of it) took occaſion to complain of me to the prince and the magiſtrates.

(90) See among his Poſthumous Works the piece intituled Ethica.

of extenſion. Thus he is obliged to acknowledge that extenſion and GOD are but one and the ſame thing; and beſides, as he maintains that there is but one ſubſtance in the univerſe, he muſt needs teach that extenſion is a ſimple Being, and as much compounded as Mathematical points. But is not this a moſt ridiculous aſſertion, and contrary to our moſt diſtinct ideas? Is it more evident that the number one thouſand is made up of a thouſand units, than it is evident that a body of an hundred inches is made up of a hundred parts really diſtinct one from another, each of which has the extenſion of an inch?

THAT extenſion is compoſed of parts, each of which is a particular ſubſtance.

It were in vain to raiſe any objections againſt our imagination and our ſenſes; for the moſt intellectual and the moſt immaterial notions diſcover to us, with the utmoſt evidence, that there is a moſt real diſtinction between things, one of which has a property, which the other has not. The ſchool-men have been very ſucceſsful in ſhowing the characters and infallible ſigns of diſtinction. When, ſay they, we may affirm of one thing, what cannot be affirmed of another, thoſe two things are diſtinct: things that may be ſeparated one from another, either with reſpect to time, or with reſpect to place, are diſtinct. If we apply thoſe characters to the twelve inches of the foot of extenſion, we ſhall find a true diſtinction between them. I can affirm of the fifth, that it is contiguous to the ſixth, and I can deny it of the firſt and ſecond, &c. I can remove the ſixth to the place of the twelfth; and therefore it may be ſeparated from the fifth. Note, that Spinoza cannot deny that the characters of diſtinction made uſe of by the ſchool-men are very juſt; for it is by theſe characters he acknowledges that ſtones and animals are not the ſame modification of the infinite Being. He acknowledges therefore, will they ſay, that there is ſome difference between things. He muſt needs own it, for he was not ſo extravagant as to believe that there was no difference between him and the Jew, who gave him a ſtab with a knife; or to ſay, that his bed and his chamber were, in all reſpects, the ſame being with the Emperor of China. What did he ſay then? He taught, not that two trees are two parts of extenſion, but only two modifications. You will be ſurprized that he ſpent ſo many years in forging a new ſyſtem, ſince one of the main pillars of it was to be the pretended difference between the word part and the word modification. Could he expect any advantage from this change of a word? What ſignifies it, whether he declines to uſe the word part, and ſubſtitutes the word modification in the room of it? Will the notions annexed to the word part vaniſh away? Will they not be applied to the word modification? Are the ſigns and characters of difference leſs real or evident, when matter is divided into modifications, than when it is divided into parts? Not at all. The idea of matter ſtill remains the idea of a compound being, of a ſyſtem of ſeveral ſubſtances. This will be fully proved by what I am going to ſay.

MODIFICATIONS inconſiſtent, require diſtinct ſubjects.

Modifications are beings, which cannot exiſt without the ſubſtance they modify; and therefore there ought to be a ſubſtance wherever there are modifications; nay, it muſt needs be multiplied in proportion as modifications inconſiſtent one with another are multiplied: ſo that wherever there are five or ſix ſuch modifications, there are alſo five or ſix ſubſtances. It is evident, and no Spinoziſt can deny it, that the ſquare and the circular figures cannot be in the ſame piece of wax. And therefore the ſubſtance modified by a ſquare figure is not the ſame ſubſtance with that which is modified by the circular figure. When therefore I ſee a round table, and a ſquare table, in a room, I may affirm that the extenſion, which is the ſubject of the round table, is a ſubſtance diſtinct from the extenſion, which is the ſubject of the other table; for otherwiſe the ſquare figure and the round figure would be at the ſame time in one and the ſame ſubject; which is impoſſible. Iron and water, wine and wood, are incompatible; and therefore they require diſtinct ſubjects. The lower end of a ſtake driven into a river is not the ſame modification with the other end: It is ſurrounded with earth, whilſt the other is ſurrounded with water; and therefore they have two contradictory attributes, viz. being ſurrounded with water, not being ſurrounded with water: and therefore the ſubject they modify muſt be at leaſt two ſubſtances; for one only ſubſtance cannot be at the ſame time modified by an accident ſurrounded with water, and by an accident not ſurrounded with water. This ſhows that extenſion is made up of as many diſtinct ſubſtances as there are modifications.

THE immutability of God is inconſiſtent with the nature of extenſion. That matter is actually divided into parts.

II. If it be an abſurd thing to ſay that God is extended, becauſe, it is depriving him of his ſimplicity, and aſcribing to him an infinite number of parts; what ſhall we ſay when we conſider that this opinion reduces him to the condition of matter, the vileſt of all beings, and ſuch as moſt of the antient Philoſophers have placed immediately next to nothing. Matter is the ſtage of all ſorts of changes, the field of battle of contrary cauſes, the ſubject of all corruptions, and of all generations; in a word, there is no being, whoſe nature is more inconſiſtent with the immutability of God. And yet the Spinoziſts maintain that it ſuffers no diviſion; and the reaſon they alledge for it is the moſt frivolous and moſt ſilly cavilling in the world. They pretend that if matter was divided, one of its portions ſhould be ſeparated from others by empty ſpaces; which never happens. This is certainly a very wrong definition of diviſion. We are as really ſeparated from our friends, when the ſpace that divides us is taken up by other men placed a breaſt, as if it was full of earth. And therefore when the Spinoziſts maintain, that matter reduced into aſhes and ſmoak is not actually divided, they advance a thing quite contrary to our notions and manner of ſpeaking. But what will they get, if we ſhould lay aſide the advantage we may draw from their wrong defining diviſion? There will remain ſtill many proofs of the mutability and corruptibility of the god of Spinoza. All men have a very clear idea of an immutable Being: They underſtand by that word a Being, which never acquires any thing new; which never loſes what it is once poſſeſſed of; which is always the ſame, both with reſpect to its ſubſtance, and to the manner of its Being. The clearneſs of this idea enables us to apprehend moſt diſtinctly what a mutable Being is: It is not only a Being, whoſe exiſtence may begin and have an end; but a Being, which always ſubſiſting as to its ſubſtance, may ſucceſſively acquire ſeveral modifications, and loſe the accidents or forms which it once had. All the antient Philoſophers have acknowledged, that the continual ſeries of generations and corruptions, which is obſerved in the world, neither produces nor deſtroys any portion of matter: hence it is, that they ſaid that matter is ingenerable and incorruptible as to its ſubſtance, though it be the ſubject of all generations and all corruptions. The ſame matter which is fire now, was wood before; all its eſſential attributes remain the ſame under the form of wood, and under the form of fire: and therefore it loſes and acquires nothing but accidents and modes, when wood is changed into fire, bread into fleſh, fleſh into earth, &c. And yet it is the moſt ſenſible and the moſt proper example that can be given of a mutable Being, and actually liable to all ſorts of alterations and internal changes. I call them internal; for the different forms under which it exiſts are not like the different cloaths under which actors appear upon the ſtage. The bodies of thoſe actors may ſubſiſt without any manner of change or alteration under a thouſand different dreſſes: Cloth and linnen, ſilk and gold, are not united with the man that wears them; they are ſtill foreign bodies, and outward ornaments; but the forms produced in matter are inwardly and penetratively united to it; it is their ſubject of inherence, and according to right Philoſophy, there is no other diſtinction between them and matter, than what is to be found between modes and a thing modified. From whence it follows, that the god of the Spinoziſts is a Being actually changing, that goes continually through ſeveral ſtates internally and really different one from another. It is not therefore the moſt perfect Being, with whom there is no variableneſs, neither ſhadow of turning (91).

Note, that the Proteus mentioned by the Poets, their Thetis, and their Vertumnus, who were images and examples of inconſtancy, and which occaſioned (91) Jam. i. 17.

which may perplex a Philoſopher, he run himſelf into others infinitely more inexplicable, and the proverbs whereby the oddeſt fickleneſs of men was denoted, would have been immutable gods, if the god of the Spinoziſts was immutable; for it was never pretended that there happened any alteration in their ſubſtance, but only new modifications.

Quo teneam vultus mutantem Protea nodo (92).
What charm can hold this varying Proteus faſt.
CREECH.

..... ſæpe notatus
Cum tribus annellis, modo læva Priſcus inani,
Vixit inæqualis, clavum ut mutaret in horas:
Ædibus ex magnis ſubito ſe conderet, unde
Mundior exiret vix libertinus honeſte.
Jam mœchus Romæ, jam mallet doctus Athenis
Vivere: Vertumnis, quotquot ſunt, natus iniquis. *

Fop Priſcus with himſelf doth diſagree,
Sometimes he wears no rings, and ſometimes three.
He changes every hour his cloaths and gown,
Now takes the beſt houſe, now the worſt in town,
And there he goes as naſty as a clown.
Now ſtudies hard at Athens, now he'll come,
And turn gallant, and follow whores at Rome;
The moſt unſteady, fickle man on earth
As if Vertumna's ſelf had rul'd his birth. CREECH.

See below remark [CC]. If any reader wants here ſomething to entertain him, let him read theſe Verſes of Virgil concerning Proteus.

Verum, ubi correptum manibus, vincliſque tenebis,
Tùm variæ illudent ſpecies, atque ora ferarum:
Fiet enim ſubitò ſus horridus, atraque tigris,
Squamoſuſque draco, & fulvâ cervice leæna:
Aut acrem flammæ ſonitum dabit, atque ita vinclis
Excidet: aut in aquas tenues delapſus abibit.
Sed, quantò ille magis formas ſe vertet in omnes,
Tantò, nate, magis contende tenacia vincla:
Donec talis erit mutato corpore, qualem
Videris, incepto tegeret cùm lumina ſomno (93).

Thus ſurely bound, yet be not over bold,
The ſlippery god will try to looſe his hold.
And various forms aſſume, to cheat thy ſight;
And with vain images of beaſts affright.
With foamy tuſks will ſeem a briſtly boar,
Or imitate the lion's angry roar;
Break out in crackling flames to ſhun thy ſnares,
Or hiſs a dragon, or a tyger ſtares:
Or with a wile, thy caution to betray,
In fleeting ſtreams attempt to ſlide away.
But thou, the more he varies forms, beware
To ſtrain his fetters with a ſtricter care.
Till tiring all his arts, he turns agen
To his true ſhape, in which he firſt was ſeen.
DRYDEN.

As for what concerns Thetis ſee Ovid (94): See alſo the ſame Poet concerning Vertumnus (95), and beſides conſult the fourth book of Propertius in the ſecond Elegy.

THAT God cannot be the ſubject of inherence of mens thoughts, ſince they are contrary to one another.

III. We ſhall ſee ſtill more monſtrous abſurdities, if we conſider the god of Spinoza as being the ſubject of all the modifications of thought. The combination of extenſion and thought, in one and the ſame ſubſtance, is already one great difficulty; for the queſtion is not about a mixture like that of metals, or that of wine and water, which requires only a juxta-poſition: But the combination of thought and extenſion ought to be an identity; thought and extenſion are two attributes identified with ſubſtance. They are therefore identified among themſelves, by the fundamental and eſſential rule of human Logic (96). I am ſure that if Spinoza had found the ſame intricacy in another ſect, he would have thought it unworthy of his attention; but he did not much trouble himſelf with it in his own cauſe: So true it is that the moſt diſdainful cenſurers of other mens thoughts, are very indulgent to themſelves. Doubtleſs, he derided the myſtery of the Trinity, and wondered that ſo many people ſhould ſpeak of a nature terminated by three hypoſtaſes; and yet, properly ſpeaking, he aſcribed as many perſons to the divine nature as there are men upon earth. He looked upon thoſe as fools who believed Tranſubſtantiation, and who ſay that a man may be in many places at one and the ſame time, may be alive in Paris, and dead at Rome, &c. and yet he maintains, that the extended ſubſtance, though but one and indiviſible, is all at once every where, cold in one place, hot in another, melancholy in one place, merry in another, &c. This by the by: but mind what I am going to ſay. If there is any thing certain and undeniable in human knowledge, it is this propoſition: Oppoſita ſunt quæ neque de ſe invicem, neque de eodem tertio ſecundum idem, ad idem, eodem modo atque tempore vere affirmari poſſunt (97). That is, two oppoſite terms cannot be truly affirmed of the ſame ſubject in the ſame reſpects, and at the ſame time. For inſtance, one cannot ſay without lying, Peter is well, Peter is ſick: He denies that, and he affirms it: ſuppoſing, that the terms have always the ſame relation, and are taken in the ſame ſenſe. The Spinoziſts deſtroy that idea, and falſify it in ſuch a manner, that I do not know whence they can take the character of truth; for if ſuch propoſitions were falſe, there is none that can be warranted to be true. And therefore it is vain to diſpute with them; for if they deny this, they may as well deny any other reaſon alledged againſt them. I ſhall make it appear that this axiom (98) is very falſe in their ſyſtem; and in order to it, I lay down firſt of all this undeniable maxim, that all the names that are given to a ſubject to ſignify what it does, or what it ſuffers, do properly and phyſically belong to its ſubſtance, and not to its accidents. When we ſay iron is hard, iron is heavy, it ſinks into water, it cleaves wood, we do not pretend to ſay that its hardneſs is hard, that its heavineſs is heavy, &c. This would be an impertinent way of ſpeaking: we mean that the extended ſubſtance it is made of reſiſts, is heavy, goes down into water, and cleaves wood. In like manner when we ſay that a man denies, affirms, is angry, is kind, praiſes, &c. we aſcribe all thoſe attributes to the ſubſtance of his ſoul, and not to his thoughts, as they are accidents or modifications. And therefore were it true, as Spinoza will have it, that men are modifications of GOD, we ſhould ſpeak falſly ſhould we ſay, Peter denies this, he wills that, he affirms ſuch a thing; for, according to that ſyſtem, it is properly GOD who denies, who wills, who affirms, and conſequently all the denominations, reſulting from the thoughts of all men, do properly and phyſically belong to the ſubſtance of GOD. From whence it follows that GOD hates and loves, denies and affirms, the ſame things, at the ſame time, and according to all the conditions requiſite, to make the rule I have mentioned concerning oppoſite terms falſe: for it cannot be denied, that according to all thoſe conditions ſtrictly taken, ſome men love and affirm what other men hate and deny. I go further ſtill: the contradictory terms, to will and not to will, belong at the ſame time to different men according to all thoſe conditions; and therefore according to Spinoza's ſyſtem they belong to that ſole and indiviſible ſubſtance he calls GOD. It is therefore GOD who at the ſame time forms an act of will, and does not form it with reſpect to the ſame object. And therefore two contradictory terms are true of him; which overthrows the firſt principles in Metaphyſics (99). I am not ignorant that in diſputes concerning Tranſubſtantiation, a cavil is made uſe of which might help the Spinoziſts. It is ſaid that if Peter wills a thing at Rome, which he does not will at Paris, the contradictory terms to will and not to will, are not true with reſpect to him; for ſince it is ſuppoſed he wills at Rome, it were a lie to ſay he wills not. I leave them this vain ſubtilty, and I ſhall only ſay, that as a ſquare circle is a contradiction, a ſubſtance is ſo too, when it loves and hates the ſame object at the ſame time. A ſquare circle would be and would not be (92) Horat. Epiſt. I, lib. i, ver. 90.

* Horat. Sat. VII, lib. ii, ver. 8.

(93) Virgil. Georg. lib. iv, ver. 405. See alſo Horace, Sat. III, lib. ii. They took it from Homer, Odyſſ. lib. iv.

(94) Ovid. Metam. lib. xi, Fab. vii, ver. 221, & ſeq.

(95) Id. ibid. lib. xiv, Fab. xvi, ver 647, & ſeq.

(96) Quæ ſunt idem uni tertio, ſunt idem inter ſe.

(97) See Logica, Conimb. in Caput. x, Ariſtotelis de Prædicamentis, pag. m. 275, and the Logic of Burgerdiſcius, lib. 1, cap. xxii, p. m. 127.

(98) That is, the abovementioned definition of oppoſite terms, citation (97).

(99) Duo contradictoria non poſſunt eſſe ſimul vera: de qualibet re vera eſt affirmatio vel negatio. See Ariſtotle's Metaphyſics, ch. iii, &c. of the fourth book.

and ſo obvious that any man of a right judgment muſt needs perceive them. They who complain that the authors who have undertaken to confute him, have not been ſucceſsful, confound be a circle; which is a plain contradiction: It would be a circle according to the ſuppoſition, and it would be no circle, ſince the circular figure is wholly inconſiſtent with the ſquare figure. I ſay the ſame of a ſubſtance, that loves and hates the ſame thing: it loves, and does not love it; this is a downright contradiction: it loves it, according to the ſuppoſition; it does not love it, ſince hatred does eſſentially exclude love. Thus you ſee what it is to be over-nice. Spinoza could not bear the leaſt obſcurity of Peripatetiſm, Judaiſm, or Chriſtianity; and yet he heartily embraced an hypotheſis, which reconciles two things ſo contrary to one another, as the ſquare and the circular figures, and whereby an infinite number of inconſiſtent attributes, and all the variety and antipathy of the thoughts of mankind are made true and conſiſtent at the ſame time in one and the ſame moſt ſimple and indiviſible ſubſtance. We commonly ſay, quot capita tot ſenſus, as many men ſo many minds; but according to Spinoza all the minds or thoughts of men are in one head. The bare relating of ſuch things is a ſufficient confutation of them, and clearly ſhews they are contradictory; for it is manifeſt either that nothing is impoſſible, no not that two and two ſhould make twelve, or that there are in the univerſe as many ſubſtances as ſubjects, which cannot receive at the ſame time the ſame denominations.

ANOTHER proof of what has been ſaid, taken from the wickedneſs of man's thoughts.

IV. But if it be, phyſically ſpeaking, a prodigious abſurdity, that a ſimple and only Being ſhould be modified at the ſame time by the thoughts of all men, it is an execrable abomination, if it be conſidered with regard to morality. How then? ſhall not the infinite, the neceſſary, the moſt perfect Being be ſteady, conſtant, and immutable? Why do I ſay, immutable? it will not be one moment the ſame; its thoughts will continually ſucceed one another; the ſame odd mixture of paſſions and ſentiments will never happen twice. This is hard to be digeſted; but here is ſomething worſe. This continual changeableneſs will be very uniform in this ſenſe, that for one good thought the infinite Being will have a thouſand fooliſh, extravagant, filthy, and abominable. It will produce in it ſelf all the follies, idle fancies, leud and unjuſt practices of mankind: it will be not only the efficient cauſe of them, but alſo the paſſive ſubject, the ſubjectum inhæſionis: it will be united to them by the moſt intimate union that can be conceived; for it is a penetrative union, or rather a perfect identity, ſince the modification is not really diſtinct from the modified ſubſtance. Several great Philoſophers not being able to apprehend how the moſt perfect Being can permit that man ſhould be ſo wicked and ſo unhappy, have ſuppoſed two principles, the one good, and the other bad (100); but here is a Philoſopher, who is pleaſed to make GOD himſelf the agent and patient, the cauſe and ſubject of all the crimes and miſeries of men. If men hate and aſſaſſinate one another, if they form themſelves into armies to kill one another, if the conquerors eat ſometimes the conquered; it is a thing that may be apprehended, becauſe it is ſuppoſed they are diſtinct one from another, and that meum and tuum produce contrary paſſions in them. But to affirm that men are only the modification of one and the ſame Being, that conſequently GOD only acts, and that the ſame individual GOD being modified into Turks and Hungarians, there are wars and battles, is to advance a thing more monſtrous and chimerical than all the deliriums of men ſhut up in mad-houſes. Take particular notice, as I have ſaid before, that modes do nothing, and that ſubſtances only act and ſuffer. This phraſe, the ſweetneſs of honey pleaſes the palate, is only true, as it ſignifies that the extended ſubſtance of which honey is made up pleaſes the palate. Thus according to Spinoza's ſyſtem, whoever ſays, the Germans have killed ten thouſand Turks, ſpeaks improperly and falſely, unleſs he means GOD modified into Germans has killed GOD modified into ten thouſand Turks: And therefore all the phraſes made uſe of to expreſs what men do one againſt another, have no other true ſenſe but this, GOD hates himſelf; he aſks favours of himſelf, and refuſes them to himſelf; he perſecutes himſelf, kills himſelf, eats himſelf (101), calumniates himſelf, executes himſelf, &c. This would be leſs incomprehenſible, if Spinoza had repreſented GOD as a collection of many diſtinct parts; but he reduces him to the moſt perfect ſimplicity, to an unity of ſubſtance, to indiviſibility. And therefore he aſſerts the moſt infamous and the maddeſt extravagances that can be conceived, infinitely more ridiculous than thoſe of the Poets concerning the gods of the Heathens. I wonder he either did not perceive them, or, if he did, how he perſiſted obſtinately in his principle. A man of ſenſe would rather chuſe to grub up a piece of ground with his teeth and nails, than to cultivate ſuch an offenſive and abſurd hypotheſis.

ANOTHER proof of what has been ſaid above, taken from man's miſery.

V. Here follow two other objections. Some Philoſophers have been ſo impious as to deny the being of a GOD; but they did not carry their extravagance ſo far, as to ſay, that if he did exiſt, he would not be perfectly happy. The greateſt Sceptics among the Antients ſaid, that all men have an idea of GOD, according to which he is a living, happy, and incorruptible Being, of a perfect felicity, and ſuſceptible of no evil. Κοινὴν πρόληψιν ἔχουσι πάντες ἄνθρωποι περὶ θεοῦ, καθ' ἣν μακάριον τι ἐστι ζῶον καὶ ἀφθαρτὸν, καὶ τέλειον ἐν εὐδαιμονίᾳ, καὶ παντὸς κακοῦ ἀνεπίδεκτον: Communem anticipatam homines omnes habent de Deo notionem, ex qua eſt beatum quoddam animal, ab interritu alienum, in fælicitate perfectum, in quod nullum poſſit malum cadere (102). Happineſs was the moſt inſeparable property contained in this idea: thoſe who deprived him of power and the direction of the world, acknowledged his felicity and immortal beatitude.

Omnia enim per ſe Divum natura neceſſe eſt
Immortali ævo ſumma cum pace fruatur,
Semota ab noſtris rebus ſejunctaque longe;
Nam privata dolore omni, privata periclis,
Ipſa ſuis pollens opibus, nihil indiga noſtri,
Nec bene promeritis capitur, nec tangitur ira (103).

For whatſoe'r's divine muſt live in peace,
In undiſturb'd and everlaſting eaſe:
Not care for us, from fears and dangers free,
Sufficient to it's own felicity:
Nought here below, nought in our power it needs;
Ne'er ſmiles at good, ne'er frowns at wicked deeds.
CREECH.

Thoſe who made him ſubject to death, ſaid at leaſt, that he was happy all his life-time. It was, doubtleſs, a horrid extravagance not to aſcribe immortality as well as happineſs to the Divine nature. Plutarch does very well confute this abſurdity of the Stoics: I ſhall ſet down his words ſomewhat at large, becauſe they prove a thought, which I have advanced above, and becauſe they confute the Spinoziſts; for his argument is inconſiſtent with the hypotheſis, according to which GOD is ſubject to death, as to his parts or modalities, that he is, as it were, the matter of generations and corruptions, that he deſtroys his own modalities, that he ſupports himſelf with that deſtruction, &c. Καὶ ἴσως εντύχοι τις ἂν ἔθνεσι βαρβάροις καὶ ἀγρίοις θεὸν μὴ νοοῦσι. θεὸν δὲ νοῶν, μὲ νοῶν δὲ ἄφθαρτον μηδὲ ἀΐδιον, ἄνθρωπος οὐδὲ εἷς γέγονεν. οἱ γοῦν ἄθεοι προσαγορευθέντες οὗτοι, Θεόδωροι, καὶ Διαγόραι, καὶ Ἵππωνες, οὐκ ἐτόλμησαν εἰπεῖν το θεῖον ὅτι ἄφθαρτόν ἐστιν ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐπίστευσαν ὡς ἔστι τι ἄφθαρτον· τοῦ μὲν ἀφθάρτου τὴν ὕπαρξιν μὴ ἀπολείποντες, τοῦ θεοῦ δὲ τὴν πρόληψιν φυλάττοντες. ἀλλὰ Χρύσιππος καὶ Κλεάνθης ἐμπεπληκότες (ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν) τῷ λόγῳ θεῶν τὸν οὐρανὸν, τὴν γῆν, τὸν ἀέρα, τὴν θάλατταν, οὐδένα τῶν τοσούτων ἄφθαρτον οὐδὲ ἀΐδιον ἀπολελοίπασι, πλὴν μόνου τοῦ Διός· εἰς ὃν πάντας καταναλίσκουσι τοὺς ἄλλους. ὥστε καὶ τούτῳ τὸ φθείρειν προσεῖναι τοῦ φθείρεσθαι μὴ ἐπιεικέστερον. ἀσθενείᾳ γάρ τινι καὶ τὸ μεταβάλλον εἰς ἕτερον φθείρεται, καὶ τὸ τοῖς ἄλλοις εἰς ἑαυτὸ φθειρομένοις τρεφόμενον σώζεται. Ac fieri ſanè poteſt, ut incidat aliquis in homines barbaros & feros, qui Deum eſſe nullum putent: deum eſſe qui exiſtimet: ſed eundem non ſecurum interitus, non æternum, inventus eſt ne unus quidem homo. Certè qui athei appellantur quod negarent eſſe deos, Theodorus, Diagoras, Hippo: non auſi ſunt dicere deum eſſe interitui

(100) See the articles MANICHEES, MARCIONITES, PAULICIANS.

(101) The fable of Saturn, who devoured his own children, is infinitely leſs unreaſonable than Spinoza's aſſertion.

(102) Sextus Empiricus adverſus Mathem. lib. viii, §. ii.

(103) Lucretius, lib. i, ver. 57. The Epicureans aſcribed to the gods whatever Homer aſcribes to them in theſe words ſo often repeated: Μάκαρες θεοὶ αἰὲν ἐόντες. Beati Dii ſemper exiſtentes. --- The gods always happy.

confound things: they would have the difficulties, under which he ſunk, wholly removed [O]; but they ſhould be contented to ſee his hypotheſis entirely overthrown, as teritui obnoxium, ſed non crediderunt aliquid eſſe ab interitu immune, ac talem naturam aliquam eſſe poſſe negantes, notitiam de deo reliquerunt in medio. Chryſippus verò & Cleanthes, cùm impleviſſent (ut ſic dicam) ſuis dictis cœlum, terras, aërem, mare diis: nullum horum ab interitu liberum aut ſempiternum ſtatuerunt: ſolo Jove excepto; in quem reliquos omnes conſumi putant; ut jam is perdat, quod nihilo eſt quàm perire melius. Eſt enim imbecillitas ut pereundo in alium tranſire, ita interitu aliorum in ſe tranſeuntium nutriri atque ſervari (104). - - - And, indeed, we may happen to meet with barbarous and ſavage men, who believe that there is no G O D. But there was never found any man, who believing that there was no G O D, did not at the ſame time believe him incorruptible and eternal. For thoſe who are called Atheiſts, ſuch as Theodorus, Diagoras, and Hyppo, did not dare to ſay that G O D was corruptible; they, indeed, believed that there was nothing exempt from corruption, while they denied that no Being was incorruptible, they determined nothing concerning G O D. But Chryſippus and Cleanthes, having filled (as one may ſay) the Heavens, the Earth, the Air, the Sea, with gods, affirmed that none of theſe gods was incorruptible or eternal: they excepted Jupiter only, into whom they thought that all the other gods were diſſolved, and they made him decay, which is no better than periſhing. For as it implies a weakneſs and defect in one Being to periſh and be diſſolved into another, ſo it implies a weakneſs and defect in that other Being to be nouriſhed and preſerved by the former diſſolving into it. But tho' this doctrine of the Stoics was never ſo extravagant, it did not deprive the gods of happineſs during their life. Perhaps the Spinoziſts are the only men, who have made the Deity ſubject to miſery (105). But what miſery? A miſery ſo great, that he falls into deſpair, and would annihilate himſelf if he could; he endeavours to do it; he deprives himſelf of as many things as he can; he hangs himſelf, he throws himſelf headlong down a precipice, being no longer able to bear the terrible melancholy that conſumes him. This is not declamation; it is an exact and Philoſophical language: for if man is only a modification, he does nothing: it were an impertinent, ridiculous, and burleſque, expreſſion to ſay, Joy is merry, ſadneſs is ſad: it is a phraſe no leſs impertinent in Spinoza's ſyſtem, to affirm, man thinks, man afflicts himſelf, man hangs himſelf, &c. All thoſe propoſitions ought to be affirmed of the ſubſtance, whereof man is only a mode. How could Spinoza think that an independent and ſelf-exiſtent Being, endowed with infinite perfections, is ſubject to all the miſeries incident to mankind? If ſome other Being forced it to vex itſelf, and to feel pain, it's ſtriving to make it's ſelf unhappy would be leſs ſurprizing; one might ſay, it muſt needs obey a ſtronger power; it is likely it torments itſelf with the gravel, the cholic, a fever, and madneſs, to avoid a greater evil. But it is the only Being in the univerſe, there is nothing that commands, exhorts, or intreats, it. It is it's own nature, will Spinoza ſay, that moves it under ſome circumſtances, to give itſelf a great deal of vexation, and a very violent pain. But I will aſk him whether he does not find ſomething monſtrous and unconceivable in ſuch a fatality.

The ſtrong reaſons alledged againſt thoſe, who maintained that our ſouls are a portion of GOD, are ſtill more ſolid againſt Spinoza. It is objected againſt Pythagoras, in a piece of Cicero, that three palpable falſities reſult from that doctrine: 1, That the Divine Nature would be torn in pieces. 2, That it would be miſerable whenever men are ſo. 3, That man's mind would be ignorant of nothing, ſince it would be GOD. Nam Pythagoras qui cenſuit, &c (106).

THE ſyſtem of Spinoza makes his whole conduct, and all his diſcourſes ridiculous.

VI. Were it not that I remember I do not write a book againſt that man, but only ſome ſhort obſervations by the by, I could find many other abſurdities in his ſyſtem. I ſhall conclude with this. He engaged in an hypotheſis, which makes all his labours ridiculous; and I am ſure that every page of his Ethics affords a horrid piece of nonſenſe. Firſt, I would fain know whom he has in view, when he rejects ſome doctrines, and propoſes others. Does he deſign to teach ſome truths? Would he confute ſome errors? But how can he ſay that there are any errors among men? Are not the thoughts of the common Philoſophers, thoſe of the Jews, thoſe of the Chriſtians, modes of the Infinite Being, as well as thoſe of his Ethics? Are they not realities as neceſſary to the perfection of the univerſe, as all his ſpeculations? Do they not ariſe from the neceſſary cauſe? How then can he pretend that they want to be rectified? In the ſecond place, does he not ſay that the nature, whereof they are modalities, acts neceſſarily, and always ſollows it's courſe; that it can neither turn aſide nor ſtop; and that being the only nature in the univerſe, no outward cauſe will ever ſtop or rectify it. And therefore nothing can be more needleſs than the inſtructions of this Philoſopher. Does it become him, who is but the modification of a ſubſtance, to preſcribe to the Infinite Being what it ought to do? Will that Being hear him? And if it ſhould hear him, could it be the better for what he ſays? Does it not always act according to the whole extent of it's power, without knowing either whither it goes, or what it does? Such a man as Spinoza would ſet his mind at reſt, if he reaſoned well. If it be poſſible, would he ſay, for ſuch a doctrine to take root, the neceſſity of nature will eſtabliſh it without my book: if it be not poſſible, all my writings will be inſignificant.

[O] They would have the difficulties, under which Spinoza ſunk, wholly removed.] I think it may be ſuppoſed that he run into theſe abſurdities, becauſe he could not apprehend either that matter is eternal, and different from GOD, or that it has been produced out of nothing, or that an Infinite Mind, perfectly free, and the Creator of all things, could produce ſuch a work as the world. A matter that neceſſarily exiſts, and yet is deſtitute of activity, and ſubject to the power of another principle, is a thing that does not ſuit with reaſon. We ſee no affinity between thoſe three qualities; ſuch a combination is repugnant to the idea of order. A matter created out of nothing cannot be conceived, tho' we ſtrive never ſo much to form an idea of an act of will, which changes into a real ſubſtance what was nothing before. This principle of the Antients, ex nihilo, nihil fit, - - - Nothing is made of nothing, offers itſelf continually to our imagination, and there appears with ſuch evidence, that it ſtops us ſhort, in caſe we have begun to frame any conception of creation. Laſtly, that a GOD, infinitely good, infinitely holy, infinitely free, who could make creatures always holy, and always happy, ſhould rather chuſe to make them criminal, and eternally miſerable, is a thing that ſhocks reaſon; and ſo much the more, becauſe it cannot reconcile man's free-will (107) with the quality of a Being created out of nothing. But unleſs thoſe two things be reconciled, it cannot conceive how man deſerves any puniſhment under a free, good, holy, and juſt Providence. Theſe three inconveniencies put Spinoza upon looking for a new ſyſtem, wherein GOD ſhould not be diſtinct from matter, and ſhould act neceſſarily, and according to the whole extent of his power, not out of himſelf, but in himſelf. It reſults from this ſuppoſition, that this neceſſary cauſe, whoſe power is not limited, and whoſe actions are not directed by goodneſs, juſtice, and knowledge, but only by the infinite power of it's nature, muſt needs have modified itſelf according to all poſſible realities, ſo that errors and vices, pain and grief, being modalities as real as truth, virtue, and pleaſure, all thoſe things muſt have been in the univerſe. Spinoza hoped to reſolve by that means the objections of the Manichees, againſt the one only principle. Thoſe objections have no force but on the ſuppoſition that one only principle of all things acts by choice, and can act or forbear acting, and confines it's power according to the rules of goodneſs and equity, or according to the inſtinct of malice. This being ſuppoſed, the queſtion is, if that one only principle be good, whence comes evil? If it be bad, whence comes good? 'Deteriora velle, noſtri fuerit fortaſſe defectus: 'poſſe vero contra innocentiam, quæ ſceleratus quiſ-'que conceperit, inſpectante Deo, monſtri ſimile eſt: 'unde haud injuria tuorum quidam familiarium quæ-'ſivit: Si quidem Deus, inquit, eſt, unde mala? 'bona vero unde, ſi non eſt (108)? - - - To have a 'will to do evil, is, perhaps, our defect: but for a 'villain, in the ſight of God, to do againſt an innocent 'man whatever he deviſes, is a thing monſtrous. From

'hence,

---

(104) Plutarch, adverſus Stoïcos, pag. 1075. A.

(105) Their predeceſſors, whom I have mentioned in the firſt remark, have not cleared and dived into the conſequences of their principle, as Spinoza does.

(106) You will find the ſequel of theſe words of Cicero, in the remark [O], citation (112) of the article PYTHAGORAS.

(107) That is, the liberty of indifference.

(108) Boëthius, de Conſolat. Philoſoph. lib. i, Proſa iv, pag. m. 11.

as has been done even by his weakeſt adverſaries [P]. It muſt not be forgot that this impious

‘ hence one of your friends aſked, and not without reaſon, If there is a God, whence comes evil; and if there is no God, whence comes good?’ Spinoza would anſwer, my one only principle being able to do good and evil, and doing whatever it can do, good and evil muſt neceſſarily be in the world. But if you conſider the three inconveniencies he intended to avoid, and the extravagant and abominable conſequences of his hypotheſis, you will find that his choice is neither that of a good man, nor that of a man of parts. He lays aſide ſome things, of which, the worſt that that can be ſaid is, that the weakneſs of our reaſon does not allow us clearly to perceive the poſſibility of them; and he admits others, which are evidently impoſſible. There is a great difference between not comprehending the poſſibility of a thing, and comprehending the impoſſibility of it. Now ſee the injuſtice of the readers. They require from all thoſe, who write againſt Spinoza, that they ſhould remove the difficulties which perplexed him, and ſet in a clear light the truths he could not comprehend; and becauſe they find no ſuch thing in the writings of the Anti-Spinoziſts, they declare they have not ſucceeded. Is it not ſufficient to overthrow the ſyſtem of that Atheiſt? Reaſon teaches us that cuſtom ought to be maintained againſt innovators, unleſs they bring in better laws; and if their opinions were not better than thoſe that are commonly received, they would deſerve to be rejected, tho' they were not worſe than the abuſes they intend to ſuppreſs. It ought to be ſaid to thoſe men, ſubmit to cuſtom, or give us ſomething better (109). Much more ought we to reject the ſyſtem of the Spinoziſts, ſince in freeing us from ſome difficulties, it involves us in more inextricable perplexities. If the difficulties were equal on both ſides, the common ſyſtem ſhould be preferred to the other, becauſe, beſides the privilege of poſſeſſion it hath alſo this advantage, that it promiſes us a great happineſs for the time to come, and affords us a thouſand comforts in the miſeries of this life. How great a ſatisfaction is it in our adverſity to hope that GOD will hear our prayers, and that, if he does not hear them, he will however reward our patience, and indemnify us in a glorious manner? It is a great comfort to flatter one's ſelf that other men will have ſome regard to the dictates of their conſcience, and to the fear of GOD. Wherefore the common hypotheſis is both truer and more agreeable than the atheiſtical (110). Therefore ſince the ſyſtem of Spinoza is not liable to leſſer objections than the Chriſtian hypotheſis, it were a ſufficient reaſon to reject it. So that any author, who ſhews that Spinoziſm is obſcure, and falſe in it's firſt propoſitions, and perplexed with impenetrable and contradictory abſurdities in it's conſequences, ought to paſs for having very well confuted it, tho' he does not clearly reſolve all the objections of Spinoza. The whole matter may be reduced to theſe few words. The common hypotheſis, if compared with that of the Spinoſiſts in thoſe things that are clear, has a greater evidence: and if it be compared with the other in thoſe things that are obſcure; it appears leſs oppoſite to the light of reaſon. And beſides, it promiſes us an infinite happineſs after this life, and procures us a thouſand comforts in this; whereas the other gives us no proſpect of a future happineſs, and deprives us of confidence in our prayers, and of the advantage we may expect from the remorſes of our neighbours: and therefore the common hypotheſis is to be preferred to the other.

[P] As has been done even by his weakeſt adverſaries.] I ſhall not ſet up for a maſter of the ceremonies, to place thoſe gentlemen in their higher or lower ranks, but ſhall only name thoſe who are come to my knowledge (111). Mr Velthuyſe (112) publiſhed a book againſt Spinoza in the year 1680. It is intituled, Tractatus de cultu naturali, & origine moralitatis. Four years after, the Sieur Aubert de Verſé put out a book with this title, L'Impie convaincu, ou Diſſertation contre Spinoza, dans laquelle l'on réfute les fondemens de ſon Athéiſme (113). Mr Poiret inſerted in the ſecond edition of his Cogitationes de Deo, Anima & Malo (114), a treatiſe, intituled, Fundamenta Atheiſmi everſa, ſive Specimen abſurditatis Atheiſmi Spinoziani. In the year 1690, a poſthumous book of Mr Wittichius came out, intituled, Anti-Spinoza, ſive Examen Ethices Benedicti de Spinoza, & Commentarius de Deo & ejus Attributis. To which I add a Dutch piece, quoted by Mr Saldenus (115).

I add to theſe; 1. A Dutch book, publiſhed by the ſame Francis Cuper whom I have mentioned at the beginning of the remark [M]. This Dutch book is only a tranſlation of what Henry Morus ſaid in Latin againſt Spinoza in ſome paſſages of his works. It appeared very ſolid to Cuper, tho' his Arcana Atheiſmi revelata had been uſed with the utmoſt contempt by Henry Morus (116). 2. The book publiſhed at Paris in the year 1696, by Dom Francis Lami, a Benedictine. It is intituled, Le nouvel Athéiſme renverſé, ou Refutation du Syſteme de Spinoſa, tirée pour la plupart de la connoiſſance de la nature de l'homme. You will find an extract of it in the Journal des Savans of the 28th of January 1697 (117). And you may ſee a juſt encomium upon it in the 101ſt page of the ſecond part of the Chevræana, Dutch edition. 3. The work which Mr Jaquelot (118) cauſed to be printed at the Hague in 1697. It is intituled, Diſſertations ſur l'Exiſtence de Dieu, où l'on démontre cette vérité par l'Hiſtoire Univerſelle de la prémiere Antiquité du Monde, par la Réfutation du Syſteme d' Epicure & de Spinoza, &c. You will find a good extract of it in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans (119). 4. The book publiſhed by Mr Jens at Dort, in the year 1698. The title of it runs thus: Examen Philoſophicum ſextæ definitionis Partis I Eth. Benedicti de Spinoza, ſive Prodromus Animadverſionum ſuper unico veterum & recentiorum Atheorum Argumento, nempe una ſubſtantia; ubi infirmitas & vanitas argumentorum pro ea evincetur. Accedent quædam necdum propoſita argumenta pro vera exiſtentia Dei. It is a book of ſixty-ſix pages in 4to. The author is a Phyſician at Dort, and the father of Mr Jens, rector of the college of the ſame town, and a learned humaniſt, and a good critic, as appears from his Lectiones Lucianeæ, printed at the Hague, in 8vo, in the year 1699. I muſt not forget the Dutch book, publiſhed by Mr Van Til, in the year 1696, an abſtract of which may be ſeen in the Acta Eruditorum Lipſienſium (120). I ſhall ſpeak below (121) of a Dutch piece, that is juſt come out.

You will find that the principles of Spinoza are overthrown in all thoſe books; you will there find that from the very beginning of his work, he advances falſe propoſitions; and therefore, what he concludes from them afterwards can be of no force. Let him run as much as he pleaſes: what can he do by running much, if he loſes his way from the firſt ſtep he makes? Note, that his greateſt admirers acknowledge, that if he had taught the doctrines laid to his charge, he would be an execrable man; but they pretend he has not been underſtood. ‘ Si igitur prædicti philoſophi intentio vel opinio fuit naturam cum Deo hoc modo tam fædè confundere, judico illum ab adverſariis juſtè impetitum atque condemnatum, imo & memoriam ejus in omne ævum execrandam eſſe: attamen quia de alicujus intentione ſolus poteſt judicare intimus cordium perſcrutator Deus, nobis nihil aliud reſtat niſi ut judicemus de opinione quæ continetur in ſcriptis quæ memoratus vir in lucem emiſit; & licet inter illius adverſarios habeantur etiam perſpicaciſſimi, puto tamen eos horum ſcriptorum verum ſenſum minimè aſſecutos fuiſſe, quoniam in iis nihil reperio niſi id quod abunde ſatis indicat hunc virum minimè confundere velle Deum & naturam: ſaltem ego ita judico ex ejus ſcriptis, quæ ſi alii melius intelligant, quæ dixi indicta ſunto, patrocinium illius hominis in me ſuſcipere nolo, peto duntaxat ut quod aliis licuit, id & mihi liceat, nempe ut exprimam quem puto horum ſcriptorum genuinum ſenſum eſſe (122)...... If therefore it was the intention of this Philoſopher to confound GOD and nature together, in ſo ſhameful a manner, or if his opinion comes to that, I think he was juſtly attacked and condemned by his adverſaries; nay, that his memory ought to be for ever execrable: but becauſe GOD alone, who is the ſearcher of hearts, can judge of any man's intention, it only belongs to us, to judge of the opinions contained in the writings which this man has publiſhed; and though there are ſome among his adverſaries of great penetration, yet I think they have not at all diſcovered the ‘ true impious man was not ſenſible of the unavoidable conſequences of his ſyſtem; for he laughed at the apparition of ſpirits (l), and there is no Philoſopher, who has leſs reaſon to

---

(109) Sin melius quid habes, acceſe, aut imperium fer. Horatius, Epiſtola V, lib. i, ver 6.

(110) I have already ſaid in the article SOCINUS, (FAUSTUS), remark [I], that it is the intereſt of every one, that all authors be conſcientious, and fear God.

(111) Note, that I ſpeak only of thoſe who have confuted the Poſthumous Works of Spinoza.

(112) Being exhorted to it, and helped by the deceaſed Mr PAETS (of whom I ſpoke above, citation (12), of the article SANCTESIUS) to whom he dedicated it.

(113) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for October 1684, pag. 862.

(114) At Amſterdam 1685. See the ſame Nouvelles, for April 1685, pag. 450.

(115) Above citation (78). The author's name was Blyenberg: he was a merchant at Dort, who died in 1696.

(116) Oper Philoſoph. Tom. i, pag. 600.

(117) Page 72, of the Dutch edition.

(118) He was miniſter of the church of Vaſſy in Champagne, and is now miniſter at the Hague.

(119) For September 1696, Art. iii.

(120) Page 295, & ſeq. of the year 1696.

(121) In the remark [BB].

(122) Autor anonymus Speciminis Artis ratiocinandi naturalis & artificialis, pag. 113. Note that ſince the firſt edition of this Dictionary I have ſeen that Specimen Artis ratiocinandi, &c. with the author's name and picture. It is Mr Kuffelaer. That book is aſcribed to Spinoza himſelf, in Micrælius's Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſtica, pag. 2260, Edit. 1699. Micrælius thought that Spinoza was ſtill living in the year 1684, which is not true.

'true ſenſe of his writings, becauſe I find nothing in them, but what abundantly ſhews that he was far from confounding GOD and nature together. At leaſt I judge ſo from his writings, which if others underſtand better than I do, I retract what I now ſay; I do not take it upon me to protect this man; I only aſk that the liberty which is granted others, may likewiſe be granted me, which is that I may be allowed to explain what I take to be the genuine ſenſe of theſe writings.' Theſe words taken from a book of one of his followers, printed at Utrecht in 1684 (123), clearly ſhew that Spinoza has been ſo ſucceſsfully confuted by his adverſaries, that the only way of replying to them, is like that of the Janſeniſts againſt the Jeſuits, viz. That his opinion is not ſuch as it is ſuppoſed to be. This is the reſult of what his apologiſt ſays. And therefore in order to ſhew that his adverſaries have attained a compleat victory over him, we need only conſider that he has in effect taught what is imputed to him, or that he contradicted himſelf wretchedly, and knew not what he ſaid. He is accuſed of teaching that all particular beings are modifications of GOD. This is plainly his doctrine, ſince his fourteenth propoſition runs thus: 'Præter Deum nulla dari neque concipi poteſt ſubſtantia: ----- Beſides GOD no ſubſtance can exiſt, nor be conceived: And he affirms in the fifteenth, 'Quicquid eſt, in Deo eſt, & nihil ſine Deo eſſe neque concipi poteſt:' ----- Whatever exiſts is in GOD, and nothing can exiſt nor be conceived without GOD:' which he proves by this reaſon, that every thing is a mode or a ſubſtance, and that modes can neither exiſt nor be conceived without a ſubſtance. When therefore an apologiſt ſpeaks in this manner: were it true that Spinoza teaches that all particular beings are modes of the divine ſubſtance, I would not deny that his adverſaries have obtained a compleat victory over him; I only deny the fact, I do not believe that the doctrine they have very well confuted, is contained in his book: I ſay when an apologiſt ſpeaks in ſuch a manner, he had as good own that his hero has been defeated; for certainly the doctrine in queſtion, is in Spinoza's Ethics (124).

SPINOZA knew not that the word Idem is ſometimes uſed for ſimile.

Here I muſt give an inſtance of the falſity of his former propoſitions; it will be of uſe to ſhew how eaſy it was to overthrow his ſyſtem. His fifth propoſition contains theſe words, 'In rerum natura non poſſunt dari duæ aut plures ſubſtantiæ ejuſdem naturæ ſeu attributi. ----- It is impoſſible that two or more ſubſtances of the ſame nature or attribute ſhould exiſt.' This is his Argumentum Achilleum, and the moſt ſteady foundation he builds upon; but at the ſame time, it is ſuch a wretched ſophiſm, that no ſcholar, who has read what is called parva logicalia, or the five Predicabilia Porphyrii, could be perplexed with it. All thoſe who teach ſchool-Philoſophy, begin with telling their ſcholars what Genus, Species, and Individuum are. This lecture is ſufficient to put Spinoza to a ſtand. The following diſtinction will do the buſineſs: Non poſſunt dari plures ſubſtantiæ ejuſdem numero naturæ ſive attributi, concedo; non poſſunt dari plures ſubſtantiæ ejuſdem ſpecie naturæ ſive attributi, nego. What could Spinoza ſay againſt this diſtinction? Muſt he not admit of it with reſpect to modifications? Is not man, according to his notion, a ſpecies of modification, and is not Socrates an individuum of that ſpecies? Would he have us maintain that Benedict Spinoza, and the Jew, who attempted to thruſt a knife into his body, were not two modifications, but one only? This might be proved invincibly, if his proof for the unity of ſubſtance was a good one; but ſince it proves too much, for it proves that there is but one modification in the world, he ought to be one of the firſt to reject it. He ought therefore to know that the word idem ſignifies two things, identity, and ſimilitude. We ſay, that ſuch a one was born the ſame day as his father, and died the ſame day with his mother. With reſpect to a man born the firſt of March 1630, and who died the tenth of February 1655, whoſe father was born the firſt of March 1610, and whoſe mother died the tenth of February 1655. The propoſition would be true in the two ſenſes of the word ſame. It would ſignify like in the firſt part of this propoſition, but not in the ſecond. Pythagoras and Ariſtotle, according to Spinoza's ſyſtem (125), were two like modifications: each of them had the whole nature of a modification, and yet the one differed from the other. The ſame may be ſaid of two ſubſtances: each of them has the whole nature, and all the attributes of ſubſtance, and yet they are not one only ſubſtance, but two. I ſhall ſet down what a Spaniard ſays againſt thoſe, who, through a ſophiſm like that of Spinoza, thought that the Materia prima did not differ from GOD. 'Quis non obſtupeſcat fuiſſe ullo tempore aliquos adeò deſipientes, & in clariſſima luce cæcutientes, qui Deum eſſe materiam primam & conſtanter aſſeverarent, & pugnaciter defenderent? At qua ratione tam ſtultam & impiam opinionem confirmabant? Si materia prima & Deus (inquiunt) non ſunt idem, ergò differunt inter ſe; quæcunque autem differunt, ea neceſſe eſt aliquo differre, quare compoſita eſſe oportet ex eo in quo conveniunt, & ex eo in quo differunt; cùm igitur nec in Deo nec in materia prima ulla ſit compoſitio, nulla quoque differentia inter ea eſſe poterit; quare neceſſe eſt eſſe unum & idem. Vide quàm levi argumento in tam gravem errorem ſeu potiùs amentiam inducti ſunt, non intelligentes diſcrimen quod eſt inter differens & diverſum, quod etiam traditur ab Ariſtotele 10. lib. Metaphyſ. text. 12. Differunt enim inter ſe, quæcunque in aliquo conveniunt & in aliquo diſtinguuntur; ut homo & leo conveniunt in genere, quia uterque eſt animal, & diſtinguuntur per proprias differentias, alter enim eſt rationis particeps, alter verò expers: Diverſa autem ſunt quæcunque ſeipſis diſtinguuntur, quoniam ſunt ſimpliciſſima (126). ----- Who is not ſurprized that ever there were men ſo ſtupid and ſo blind amidſt the cleareſt light, as conſtantly to affirm, and obſtinately maintain, that GOD is the firſt matter (materia prima). But by what reaſon did they ſupport ſo fooliſh and impious an opinion? If, ſay they, GOD and the firſt matter are not the ſame, therefore they differ from one another. But whatever things differ, muſt neceſſarily differ in ſome properties, and therefore they muſt be compoſed of thoſe properties wherein they agree, and of thoſe wherein they differ. But there being no compoſition either in GOD or the firſt matter, they cannot differ from one another, therefore they muſt be one and the ſame. Obſerve how ſlight an argument leads thoſe men into ſo grievous an error, or rather madneſs, who do not underſtand the diſtinction between different and diverſe, which Ariſtotle has mentioned. Thoſe things are different from one another, which agree in ſome properties and are diſtinguiſhed in others; as a man and a lion agree in their genus, both being animals; and are diſtinguiſhed by their proper differences, one being rational the other not. But thoſe things are diverſe, which are diſtinguiſhed from one another, becauſe they are moſt ſimple.' There are few notions in our mind clearer than that of identity. I grant that it is confounded, and very ill applied in the common language: Nations, rivers, &c. are accounted the ſame nations, and the ſame rivers during ſeveral ages; the body of a man is accounted the ſame body for the ſpace of ſixty years or more: but thoſe popular and improper expreſſions do not deprive us of the certain rule of identity; they do not blot out of our minds this idea: A thing of which one may deny or affirm what cannot be denied, or affirmed of another thing, is diſtinct from that other thing. When all the attributes of time, place, &c. which belong to a thing, belong alſo to another thing, they are but one Being. But notwithſtanding the clearneſs of theſe ideas, it would be difficult to ſay how many great Philoſophers have erred in that point, and reduced all ſouls and intelligences (127) to unity, though they acknowledged that ſome were united to bodies, to which others were not united. This opinion was ſo common in Italy in the XVIth century, that Pope Leo X, thought himſelf obliged to condemn it, and to threaten with ſevere penalties all thoſe that ſhould teach it (128). Here are the words of the bull, dated the nineteenth of December 1513. 'Cum diebus noſtris Zizaniæ ſeminator nonnullos pernicioſiſſimos errores in agro Domini ſeminare ſit auſus, de natura præſertim animæ rationalis, quod videlicet mortalis ſit aut unica in cunctis hominibus; & nonnulli temere Philoſophantes

'ſecundùm

(l) See his lvith and lviiith Letters.

(123) There is in the title Hamburgi, as in the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus.

(124) The Apologiſt I have quoted (viz. Mr Kuffelaer) maintains with might and main, in the 14th page, that there can be but one ſubſtance in the univerſe.

(125) Note, by the by, that by virtue of this principle, Quæ ſunt idem uni tertio, ſunt idem inter ſe, Spinoza cannot deny that Pythagoras and Ariſtotle were but one man. Erant enim idem uni tertio, nempe ſubſtantiæ Dei.

(126) Benedictus Pererius, de communibus Principiis, lib. v, cap. xii, p. m. 309.

(127) See the article CESALPINUS, remark [C], and compare what is ſaid of the Scotiſts in the article ABELARD, remark [C].

(128) Omnes hujuſmodi erroris adſtrictionibus inhærentes, veluti damnatiſſimas hæreſes ſeminantes per omnia ut deteſtabiles & abominabiles hæreticos & infideles, Catholicam fidem labefactantes, vitandos & puniendos fore decrevimus. --- We have decreed that all thoſe who adhere to the reſtrictions of this kind of error ſhould be ſhunned and puniſhed as ſowers of damnable Hereſies, as every where deteſtable and abominable Heretics, and Infidels, who deſtroy the Catholic Faith.

to deny it [Q]. Spinoza ought to acknowledge that every part of nature thinks, and that man is not the moſt knowing and moſt intelligent modification of the univerſe; and therefore he muſt admit the exiſtence of Demons. The diſpute of his followers about miracles is a meer quibble [R], and a further proof of the unexactneſs of his notions ‘ ſecundùm ſaltem Philoſophiam verum eſſe aſſeverent: Contra hoc, ſacro approbante concilio, damnamus & reprobamus omnes aſſerentes, Animam intellectivam mortalem eſſe aut unicam in cunctis hominibus; aut hoc in dubium vertentes: cum illa..... immortalis, & pro corporum quibus infunditur multitudine ſingulariter multiplicabilis & multiplicata & multiplicanda ſit. ---- Whereas in our days a ſower of tares, has dared to ſow ſome moſt pernicious errors in the field of GOD, eſpecially concerning the nature of a rational ſoul; namely, that it is mortal, and that there is but one ſoul in all men, and ſome raſhly philoſophizing, have aſſerted this to be true, at leaſt, according to Philoſophy. In oppoſition to this, with the approbation of the holy council, we condemn and pronounce to be reprobate all thoſe who aſſert that the intelligent ſoul is mortal, or that there is but one ſoul in all men; or thoſe who call this in queſtion: ſince the ſoul..... is immortal, and according to the multitude of bodies into which it is infuſed, may be particularly multiplied, is and muſt be multiplied.’ This was lopping off a conſiderable branch of Spinoziſm. I muſt obſerve, that ſome Philoſophers do ſtrangely confound the idea of identity; for they maintain (129), that the parts of matter are not diſtinct before they be actually ſeparated. Nothing can be more abſurd.

[Q] There is no Philoſopher who has leſs reaſon to deny the apparition of ſpirits.] I have ſaid it in another place (130); when it is ſuppoſed that a moſt perfect mind has created all things out of nothing, without being determined to it by his nature, but by the free choice of his own good pleaſure, the exiſtence of angels may be denied (131). If it be aſked, why ſuch a Creator has not produced other ſpirits beſides human ſouls? The anſwer will be, That ſuch was his good pleaſure, ſtat pro ratione voluntas: No reaſonable reply can be made to this anſwer, unleſs the fact be proved, I mean, that there are angels. But when it is ſuppoſed, that the Creator did not act freely, and exhauſted all his power without any choice or rule, and beſides that thinking is one of his attributes, it is a ridiculous thing to aſſert, that there are no Demons. According to this ſyſtem, it ought to be believed, that the thinking attribute of the Creator hath been modified, not only in the bodies of men, but alſo throughout the whole univerſe; and that beſides the animals which we know, there is an infinite number of others which we know not, and which exceed us in knowledge and in malice, as much as we exceed in that reſpect dogs and oxen: For it were the moſt unreaſonable thing in the world, to fancy that man's mind is the moſt perfect modification that an infinite Being, acting according to the whole extent of its power, could produce. We can conceive no natural connexion between the underſtanding and the brain; and therefore we ought to believe, that a creature without brain may as well think, as a creature organized as we are. What is it then that could move Spinoza to deny what is ſaid of ſpirits (132)? Why did he believe that there is nothing in the world, that can excite in our machines the ſight of a ſpectre, make a noiſe in a room, and produce all the magical phænomena mentioned in books? Was it becauſe he believed that no Being can produce ſuch effects unleſs it has as bulky a body as that of man; and that therefore the Demons could not ſubſiſt in the air, nor come into our houſes, nor ſteal away from our ſight? But ſuch a thought would be ridiculous: the bulk of fleſh of which we are made up, is rather an obſtacle than a help to wit and power. I mean a mediate power, or the faculty of applying the moſt proper inſtruments for the production of great effects. The moſt ſurpriſing actions of men ariſe from that faculty; as it appears from thouſands of examples. An Engineer as little as a dwarf, lean, and pale, performs more things than two thouſand ſavages, ſtronger than Milo, are able to perform. An animate machine a thouſand times ſmaller than an ant, might produce greater effects than an elephant; it might diſcover the inſenſible parts of plants and animals, and place itſelf upon the ſeat of the firſt ſprings of our brain, and open ſome valves, by which means we might ſee phantoms, hear a noiſe, &c. (133). If Phyſicians knew the firſt fibres, and the firſt combinations of the parts in vegetables, minerals, and animals, they would alſo know the inſtruments proper to put them out of order, and might apply thoſe inſtruments in ſuch a manner as to place thoſe parts in a new order, whereby good meat would be turned into poiſon, and poiſon into good meat. Such Phyſicians would be incomparably more knowing than Hippocrates; and were they little enough to get into the brain and the entrails, they might cure any body, and alſo produce whenever they pleaſed the moſt ſtrange diſeaſes that can be ſeen. The whole may be brought to this queſtion, Is it poſſible that an inviſible modification ſhould be more knowing and malicious than man? If Spinoza denies it, he knows not the conſequences of his hypotheſis, and acts raſhly and without principles. A man might make a long diſſertation upon this ſubject, wherein he might prevent all Spinoza's ſubterfuges and objections. Compare with this what I have obſerved in the articles of Lucretius (134), and in that of Hobbes (135.)

[R] The diſputes of the Spinoziſts about miracles is a meer quibble.] The common opinion of orthodox Divines is, That GOD produces miracles immediately, whether he makes uſe of creatures as agents or not. In either caſe, it undeniably appears that he is above nature; for if he produces ſomething without employing other cauſes, he does not want the help of nature; and he never employs them in a miracle, but after he has diverted them from their uſual courſe: And therefore he ſhews that they depend on his will, that he ſuſpends their power when he pleaſes, or applies it in a different manner from their ordinary determination. The Carteſians, who make him the immediate cauſe of all the effects of nature, ſuppoſe, that when he works miracles, he does not obſerve the general laws he has eſtabliſhed; he makes an exception, and applies bodies quite otherwiſe than he would do, if he followed the general laws. Whereupon they ſay, that if there were any general laws, whereby GOD had engaged to move bodies according to the deſires of angels, and if an angel had deſired that the waters of the Red-Sea ſhould be divided, the paſſage of the Iſraelites would not be a miracle properly ſo called. This conſequence, which neceſſarily ariſes from their principles, makes their definition of a miracle leſs convenient than it were to be wiſhed, and therefore it were better for them to ſay, that all the effects, contrary to the general laws we know, are miracles; and by this means the plagues of Egypt, and ſuch other extraordinary actions related in Scripture will be miracles, properly ſpeaking. Now, in order to ſhew the inſincerity, and the illuſions of the Spinoziſts upon this head, we need only ſay, that when they deny the poſſibility of miracles, they alledge this reaſon, that GOD and nature are the ſame Being; ſo that if GOD did ſomething againſt the laws of nature, he would act againſt himſelf; which is impoſſible. Speak plainly, and without any ambiguity: Say, that the laws of nature being not made by a free Legiſlator, who knew what he did, but being the action of a blind and neceſſary cauſe, nothing can happen that is contrary to thoſe laws. If ſo, you alledge your own poſition againſt miracles: which is a petitio principii; but however, you ſpeak plainly. Let us bring them off from this general reaſoning and aſk them what they think of the miracles mentioned in the Scripture. They will abſolutely deny all thoſe, which they cannot aſcribe to a cunning trick. Not to inſiſt upon their impudence in denying ſuch facts, I ſhall only argue againſt them by their own principles. Do not you ſay that the power of nature is infinite? But would it be infinite, if there was nothing in the whole univerſe that could reſtore a dead man to life? Would it be infinite, if there was but one way of forming man, viz. that of ordinary generation? Do not you ſay that the knowledge of nature is infinite? You deny that divine underſtanding, in which we believe the knowledge of all poſſible Beings to be reunited; but by diſperſing the knowledge, you do not deny

(129) Sir Kenelm Digby does alſo maintain it, if I am not miſtaken.

(130) In the article RUGGERI, remark [D].

(131) I ſuppoſe that the authority of the Holy Scripture is laid aſide, and that a man declares he only reaſons like a Philoſopher.

(132) See his letters lvi, lviii, lx.

(133) Note, by the by, that nothing can be more improper than to inquire whether angels, when they appear, aſſume a living or dead body. They have no need of it. They need only move the Optic and Acouſtic nerves, as they are moved by the light reflected from a human body, and by the air that comes out of the mouth of a man who ſpeaks.

(134) Remark [F].

(135) Remark [N].

notions. It is ſaid, he died fully perſuaded of his Atheiſm, and that he took ſome precautions to conceal his inconſtancy, if there ſhould be occaſion for it [S]. Had he reaſoned conſequentially, he would not have treated the fear of Hell as a chimerical thing [T]. His friends ſay that, out of modeſty, he deſired that no ſect ſhould go by his deny its infinity. And therefore you ought to ſay that nature knows all things, much in the ſame manner as we ſay that man underſtands all languages: one man does not underſtand them all; but ſome underſtand one, and ſome another. Can you affirm that the univerſe contains nothing, which knows the conſtruction of our bodies? If you can affirm it, you contradict yourſelves; you can ſay no longer that the knowledge of GOD is infinitely divided; the contrivance of our organs would be unknown to him. You muſt therefore acknowledge, if you argue conſequentially that ſome modification knows it; you muſt acknowledge that it is very poſſible for nature to bring a dead man to life, and that your maſter confounded his ideas, and knew not the conſequences of his principle, when he ſaid (136) that if he could believe the reſurrection of Lazarus, he would break his ſyſtem to pieces, and willingly embrace the Chriſtian Faith.

This is ſufficient to ſhew that the Spinoziſts contradict their own hypotheſis, when they deny the poſſibility of miracles; I mean, (to avoid all ambiguity) the poſſibility of the facts mentioned in the Holy Scripture.

[S] He took ſome precautions to conceal his inconſtancy, if there ſhould be occaſion for it.] I mean he took care, that in caſe the approach of death, or the ſymptoms of his illneſs, ſhould make him ſpeak againſt his ſyſtem, no ſuſpected perſon ſhould be witneſs of it. The caſe is this; or at leaſt we find the following account of it in a printed book (137). Perhaps it will be ſaid that Atheiſts ‘ are not greedy of praiſe? But what can any ‘ man do more than what was done by Spinoza, a ‘ little before he died? The thing is of a freſh date ‘ (138), and I have it from a great man, who had it ‘ from good hands. He was the greateſt Atheiſt that ‘ ever lived, and he grew ſo fond of certain philoſo‘phical principles, that the better to meditate upon ‘ them, he confined himſelf to a cloſe retirement, re‘nouncing all the pleaſures and vanities of the world, ‘ and minding nothing but thoſe abſtruſe meditations. ‘ Being upon the point of death, he ſent for his land‘lady, and deſired her not to ſuffer that any miniſter ‘ ſhould ſee him in that condition. His reaſon for it ‘ was, as his friends ſaid, that he had a mind to die ‘ without diſputing, and was afraid that the weak‘neſs of his ſenſes might make him ſay ſomething in‘conſiſtent with his principles. That is, he was afraid ‘ it would be ſaid in the world that his conſcience, ‘ awakening at the ſight of death, had damped his ‘ courage, and made him renounce his opinions. Can ‘ there be a more ridiculous and extravagant vanity, ‘ and a more fooliſh paſſion for a wrong notion of con‘ſtancy?’

A Preface, which I have quoted above (139), and which contains ſome circumſtances of the death of that Atheiſt, ſays nothing of this. I find in it that he told his landlord who was going to church, I hope you will return, GOD willing, and ſpeak with me when the ſermon is over (140). But he died quietly before his landlord returned, and no body ſaw him die but a Phyſician of Amſterdam (141). For the reſt, we are told in that preface, that he was extremely deſirous to immortalize his name, and would have willingly ſacrificed his life for it, though, in order to obtain it, he had been torn in pieces by the mob. ‘ Auro plane ‘ non inhiabat, alioqui delata ſibi Profeſſoris munera ‘ aliquoties non reſpuiſſet homo gloriæ avidior & ni‘mis ambitioſus, qui vel cum Wittiis amicis ſuis cru‘deliter dilacerari ſublatius optavit, modo vita brevi ‘ gloriæ curſus foret ſempiternus (142). - - - Surely he ‘ was not covetous, otherwiſe he would not have ſo often ‘ refuſed the Profeſſorſhip which had been offered him, ‘ being a man deſirous of glory and too ambitious, who ‘ would have wiſhed to be cruelly torn to pieces with the ‘ De Wits, his friends, provided the ſhortneſs of his life ‘ was recompenſed with immortal glory.’

[T] Had he reaſoned conſequentially, he would not have called the fear of Hell a chimerical thing.] Thoſe, who believe that the world is not the work of GOD, and is not directed by a Being ſimple, ſpiritual, and diſtinct from all bodies, muſt at leaſt confeſs that there are ſome things which are endowed with intelligence and will, and which are jealous of their power, which exerciſe authority over others, which command them to do ſome things, chaſtiſe them, uſe them harſhly, and revenge themſelves ſeverely. Is not the earth full of ſuch things? Does not every man know it by experience? It would be a thing altogether unreaſonable to fancy that all Beings of that nature are only upon earth, which is but one point if compared to the world. Muſt reaſon, wit, ambition, hatred, and cruelty, be upon earth rather than any where elſe? Why ſo? Can any reaſon good or bad be given for it? I do not think ſo. Our eyes induce us to believe that thoſe vaſt ſpaces we call Heaven, which have ſuch powerful and rapid motions, may as well form men as our earth, and deſerve no leſs than the globe we inhabit to be divided into ſeveral dominions. We do not know what paſſes there; but if we conſult only reaſon, it will appear very probable, or at leaſt poſſible, that there are thinking Beings in thoſe vaſt ſpaces, which extend their empire as well as their light to our globe. Our not ſeeing them is not a proof that we are unknown or indifferent to them: Perhaps we are part of their dominions: they make laws, which they reveal to us by the dictates of our conſcience, and are very angry with thoſe that tranſgreſs them. The poſſibility of it is ſufficient to make Atheiſts uneaſy; and nothing but denying the immortality of the ſoul can make them fearleſs. For thereby they would eſcape the vengeance of thoſe ſpirits, which otherwiſe might be more dreadful than GOD himſelf. I explain myſelf. There are ſome men, who believe a GOD, a Paradiſe, and a Hell; but they create illuſions to themſelves, and imagine that the infinite goodneſs of the moſt perfect Being does not permit him to torment his own work for ever. He is the father of all men, ſay they; and therefore he chaſtiſes like a father thoſe who diſobey him, and after he has made them ſenſible of their faults, he reſtores them to his favour in Heaven. Origen argued in that manner. Others ſuppoſe that GOD will annihilate the rebellious creatures, and will be appeaſed, and moved to compaſſion with a quem das finem Rex Magne laborum (143). What end of labours has your will decreed? They carry their illuſion ſo far, as to think that the everlaſting torments mentioned in the Scripture, are only comminatory. If ſuch men were ignorant of the Being of a GOD, and by conſidering what paſſes in our world, ſhould believe that there are Beings in other worlds, which concern themſelves with mankind, they could not be eaſy when they come to die, unleſs they believed that the ſoul is mortal; for if they believed it to be immortal, they might be afraid of falling under the power of a cruel maſter, angry with them by reaſon of their actions; it would be to no purpoſe to hope to come off after having been tormented for ſome years. A limited Being may be deſtitute of all manner of moral perfection; it may be like our Phalaris's and Neros, a ſort of men who could have left an enemy in a dungeon for ever, had they been able to get an eternal authority. Will they hope that miſchievous Beings will not laſt for ever? But how many Atheiſts pretend that the Sun had no beginning, and will have no end? This is what I meant, when I ſaid that ſome Beings might appear more dreadful than GOD himſelf? A man may flatter himſelf, when he conſiders that GOD is infinitely good, and infinitely perfect; and he may fear every-thing from an imperfect Being: he does not know whether its anger will not laſt for ever. Every body knows the choice of the prophet David (144).

To apply what has been ſaid to a Spinoziſt, let us remember that he is obliged by his principle to acknowledge the Immortality of the Soul; for he looks upon himſelf as the modification of a Being eſſentially thinking. Let us remember, that he cannot deny that ſome modifications are angry with others, put them to the torture, make their torments laſt as long as ever they can, ſend them to the gallies for life, and would make that puniſhment laſt for ever, if the death of one party or the other did not prevent it. Tiberius, (136) I have been aſſured that he ſaid ſo to his friends.

(137) Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 181, pag. 565, 566. See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, for March 1689, pag. 82.

(138) The Penſées ſur les Cometes were printed in the year 1683.

(139) In the remark [H].

(140) Ad audiendum oratorem ſacrum horis pomeridianis tendentem, finita, inquit, concione, DEO volente, ad ſermones redibis. Sebaſt. Kortholtus, Præf. Libri de tribus Impoſtoribus, pag. 6.

(141) Id. ibid.

(142) Id. ibid.

(143) Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 245.

(144) Being to chuſe either to be overcome by his enemies, or to be afflicted with a plague ſent from God, he anſwered the Prophet Gad. I am in a great ſtrait: Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, (for his mercies are great) and let me not fall into the hand of man. 2 Sam. xxiv. 14.

his name [U]. It is not true that his followers are very numerous. Few people are ſuſpected of adhering to his doctrine; and among thoſe, who are ſuſpected of it, few have ſtudied it; and among the latter, few have underſtood it, and moſt of them are diſcouraged by the difficulties and impenetrable abſtractions that attend it (m). But the thing is this: at all adventures thoſe, who have little religion, and do not much ſcruple to own it, are called Spinoziſts. Thus in France all thoſe who are thought not to believe the myſteries of the Goſpel, are called Socinians, though moſt of them never read Socinus nor his followers. For the reſt, the ſame thing happened to Spinoza, which inevitably happens to all thoſe who frame impious ſyſtems; they ſecure themſelves from ſome objections, but they lie open to others that are more perplexing. If they cannot be orthodox, if they are ſo fond of diſputing, it were better for them not to dogmatize. But of all Atheiſtical ſyſtems, none is leſs capable of deceiving than that of Spinoza; for, as I have ſaid before, it is contrary to the moſt diſtinct notions of our minds. Objections throng in upon him; and he can make no anſwers but what are more obſcure than the aſſertions he ſhould maintain (n): and therefore, his poiſon brings a remedy along with it. He would have been more formidable, had he uſed all his ſkill to clear an hypotheſis, that is very much in vogue among the Chineſe [X], and very different from that which I have mentioned in the ſecond remark of this article. I have been juſt now informed Tiberius, Caligula, and many others are examples of ſuch modifications. Let us remember that a Spinoziſt makes himſelf ridiculous, if he does not acknowledge that the univerſe is full of ambitious, moroſe, jealous, and cruel, modifications; for ſince the earth is full of them, there is no reaſon to believe that the air and the heavens are not likewiſe full of them. Laſtly, Let us remember, that the eſſence of human modifications does not conſiſt in being cloathed with a bulk of fleſh. Socrates was Socrates the day of his conception, or ſoon after (145); whatever he had at that time may remain entire, when a mortal diſeaſe has put an end to the circulation of the blood, and the motion of the heart, in the matter wherewith it was enlarged: and therefore he is after his death the ſame modification as he was during his life, if we conſider only what is eſſential to his perſon: death cannot therefore free him from the juſtice or caprice of his inviſible perſecutors. They may follow him wherever he goes, and torment him whatever viſible form he may aſſume.

Theſe conſiderations might be made uſe of to induce to the practice of virtue, even thoſe who adhere to the impious doctrine of ſuch ſects; for it ſtands to reaſon that they ſhould be chiefly afraid for having tranſgreſſed the laws revealed to their conſcience. It is more likely that thoſe inviſible Beings would concern themſelves with the puniſhment of ſuch faults.

[U] His friends ſay, that, out of modeſty, he deſired that no ſect ſhould go by his name.] I ſhall ſet down the words of the Preface of his Opera Poſthuma, without curtailing them. ‘ Nomen Auctoris in libri fronte, & alibi literis duntaxat initialibus indicatum, non aliâ de causâ, quam quia paulò ante obitum expreſſe petiit, ne Nomen ſuum Ethicæ, cujus impreſſionem mandabat, præfigeretur; cur autem prohibuerit, nulla alia, ut quidem videtur, ratio eſt, quàm quia noluit; ut Diſciplina ex ipſo haberet vocabulum. Dicit etenim in Appendice quartæ partis Ethices capite vigeſimo quinto, quòd, qui alios conſilio, aut re juvare cupiunt, ut ſimul ſummo fruantur bono, minimè ſtudebunt, ut Diſciplina ex ipſis habeat vocabulum; ſed inſuper in tertiâ Ethices parte Affectuum Definit. XLIV. ubi quid ſit ambitio explicat, eos, qui tale quid patrant, non obſcurè, ut Gloriæ cupidos, accuſat. - - - The two initial letters only of the author's name were put to the book, becauſe a little before his death he expreſsly deſired, that his name ſhould not be prefixed to his Ethics, which he had ordered to be printed. And why he did ſo, it ſeems no other reaſon can be given, but becauſe he would not have the Doctrine called by his name. For he ſays in the twenty-fifth chapter of the Appendix to the fourth part of his Ethics, that thoſe who would help others to the attainment of the ſupreme good, together with themſelves, will not deſire that their doctrine be called by their name; and where he is explaining what ambition is, he plainly taxes ſuch as do this with being ambitious of glory.’

[X] He would have been more formidable, had he uſed all his ſkill to clear an hypotheſis, that is very much in vogue among the Chineſe.] A Father of the Church owned a thing, which perhaps would not be excuſed at this day in a Philoſopher, viz. that thoſe, who deny the Deity or a Providence, alledge probable reaſons both for their cauſe, and againſt their adverſaries. ‘ Deos nonnulli eſſe abnegant: prorſus dubitare ſe alii an ſint uſpiam dicunt: alii vero exiſtere, neque humana curare: immo alii perhibent, & rebus intereſſe mortalium, & terrenas adminiſtrare rationes. Cum ergo hæc ita ſint, neque aliter fiat, quin ſit unum ex omnibus verum, pugnant tamen argumentis omnes, neque ſingulis deeſt id, quod probabiliter dicant, ſive cum ſuas res aſſerunt, ſive cum alienis opinionibus contradicunt (146). - - - - - Some deny that there are any gods: others ſay they doubt whether there are any: others that there are gods, but that they take no care of human affairs: and others affirm it, and ſay that they are concerned in human affairs, and adminiſtrate them. Since therefore theſe things are ſo, and one of all theſe opinions muſt neceſſarily be true, yet each of them contradicts the other with arguments, and does not want ſomething probable to advance in its favour, and in refutation of the contrary opinions.’ If he was in the right, perhaps it were chiefly with reſpect to thoſe, who ſuppoſe a great number of ſouls in the univerſe diſtinct one from another, each of which exiſts by itſelf, and acts by an inward and eſſential principle. They are more powerful one than another, &c. Herein conſiſts the Atheiſm ſo generally ſpread among the Chineſe. The author of the following paſſage tells us how he fancies they have by degrees obſcured the true notions. ‘ (147) GOD, that moſt pure and perfect Being, is become at moſt the material ſoul of the whole world, or of its fineſt part, which is Heaven. His providence and his power became limited, tho' of a much greater extent than the power and prudence of men. . . . . . The Chineſe doctrine hath always aſcribed ſpirits to the four parts of the world, to the ſtars, mountains, rivers, plants, towns, and their ditches, houſes, and their hearths, in a word to every thing. They do not ſay that all ſpirits are good; they acknowledge wicked ones, which they take to be the immediate cauſe of the evils and miſeries incident to human life. . . . . . (148) And therefore as the ſoul of man was, in their opinion, the cauſe of all the vital actions of man; in like manner they aſcribed a ſoul to the ſun, to be the ſpring of its qualities and motion. And becauſe, according to this principle, the ſouls, that are diſperſed every where, produced in all bodies the actions which appeared natural to thoſe bodies, this was ſufficient in their opinion to explain the whole œconomy of nature, and to ſupply the omnipotence and infinite providence, which they admitted in no ſpirit, no not in that of Heaven. It is true, that becauſe it ſeems that man, uſing natural things for his nouriſhment and conveniency, has ſome power over natural things; the antient opinion of the Chineſe, which aſcribed in proportion a like power to all ſouls, ſuppoſed that the ſoul of Heaven could act upon nature with a prudence, and a power incomparably greater than the prudence and power of men. But at the ſame time, they acknowledged in the ſoul of every thing an inward power, independent by its own nature of the power of Heaven, and

---

(m) This is the reaſon why ſome are of opinion that he ought not to be refuted. See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for June 1684, Art. vi, pag. m. 388, 389.

(n) Conſult his Letters: you will ſee that his anſwers have ſeldom any relation to the ſtate of the queſtion.

(145) Spinoza, who made microſcopes, ſhould have believed that man is organized and animated in the ſeed, and that therefore Socrates was Socrates before his mother conceived him.

(146) Arnobius adverſus Gentes, lib. ii, pag. m. 82.

(147) La Loubere, Relation de Siam, Tom. i, ch. xxiii, num. 2, pag. 503, 504. See above the citation (55) of the article MALHERBE, and the article SOMMONA-CODOM, remark [A].

(148) La Loubere, ibid. num. iii, pag 505, 506.

informed of a pretty curious particular, viz. That after he had forſaken Judaiſm, he publickly profeſſed Chriſtianity, and frequented the aſſemblies of the Mennonites, or thoſe of the Arminians of Amſterdam (o). Nay he approved a confeſſion of faith communicated to him by an intimate friend [Y].

What is ſaid of him in the continuation of the Menagiana is ſo falſe [Z], that I wonder Menage's friends did not perceive it. Mr de Vigneul Marville would have adviſed them to leave it out, had he been concerned in the edition of that work; for he has acquainted the public, that there is reaſon to doubt of the truth of that fact (p). The reaſons he alledges for his doubt are very reaſonable: he would not have been too forward, had he poſitively denied the thing. I ſhall take notice of a miſtake he has committed in the ſame page [AA]. I muſt ſay ſomething concerning the objections I have propoſed againſt the ſyſtem of Spinoza. I might add a very large ſupplement to thoſe objections, did I not perceive that they are already too long, conſidering the nature of my work: this is not a proper place to engage in a formal diſpute; it is ſufficient for my deſign to make ſome general obſervations in order to undermine the foundations of Spinoziſm, and to ſhew that it is a ſyſtem grounded upon ſuch a ſtrange ſuppoſition, that it overthrows moſt of the common notions, which are the rule of Philoſophical diſcuſſions. Whoever ſhews that this ſyſtem is contrary to the moſt evident, and the moſt univerſal axioms we have had hitherto, does certainly go the right way to confute it, though perhaps it is not ſo proper to reclaim the old Spinoziſts, as if it was proved to them that the propoſitions of Spinoza are contrary to one another. They would be more ſenſible of their prejudices, were they forced to confeſs that he does not always agree with himſelf, that his proofs are wrong, that he does not prove what wants to be proved, that his concluſions are not juſt, &c. This method of confuting him by ſhewing the abſolute defects (q) of his work, and the relative defects of its parts compared one with another, has been well managed by ſome of thoſe who wrote againſt him (r). I have been juſt now

(o) See the remark [I].

(p) Vigneul Marville Mêlanges, Tom. ii, pag. 320, Dutch Edit.

(q) I underſtand by that word the defects, which do not proceed from Spinoza's aſſerting things contrary to the maxims which other Philoſophers generally acknowledge to be true.

(r) See Wittichius's Anti-Spinoza, or the Extracts of them in the Acta Eruditor. 1690, pag. 346, & ſeq. and in the 23d volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, pag. 323, & ſeq.

‘ acting ſometimes againſt the deſigns of Heaven. ‘ Heaven governed nature as a potent king, whom ‘ the other ſouls were to obey, and they were gene- ‘ rally forced to it; but ſome of them did ſometimes ‘ exempt themſelves from it.’ I confeſs, it is an abſurd thing to ſuppoſe ſeveral eternal Beings, independent one of another, and of an unequal power; nevertheleſs, this ſuppoſition appeared true to Democritus, Epicurus, and ſeveral other great Philoſophers. They admitted an infinite quantity of ſmall bodies of different figure, uncreated, ſelf-moving, &c. This opinion is ſtill very common in the Eaſt (149). Thoſe who admit the eternity of matter, are not more reaſonable than if they admitted the eternity of an infinite number of atoms; for if there can be two Beings co-eternal and independent as to their exiſtence, there may be a hundred thouſand millions, and ſo in infinitum. Nay, they ought to ſay that the number of them is actually infinite; for matter, though never ſo ſmall, contains diſtinct parts. And it is to be obſerved that all the Antients were ignorant of the creation of matter; for they never departed from the axiom, ex nihilo nihil fit. And therefore they were not ſenſible that it is an abſurd thing, to acknowledge an infinity of ſubſtances co-eternal, and independent one of another as to exiſtence. However abſurd that Hypotheſis may be, it is not liable to the frightful inconveniencies of Spinoziſm. It would account for many phænomena, by aſſigning to every thing an active principle, a more powerful one to ſome, and a leſs powerful to others; or if their power was equal, it might be ſaid that thoſe which prevail have a greater combination. I do not know whether any Socinian did ever ſay or believe, that the ſouls of men, not being made out of nothing, exiſt, and act of themſelves. Their liberty of indifference would manifeſtly flow from thence.

[Y] He even approved a confeſſion of faith communicated to him by an intimate friend.] One Jarig Jellis, his intimate friend, being ſuſpected of heterodoxy, thought himſelf obliged to publiſh a confeſſion of his faith for his vindication. Having compoſed it, he ſent it to Spinoza, and deſired him to write to him his opinion of it. Spinoza made anſwer, that he had read it with pleaſure, and found nothing in it that wanted to be altered. Domine ac amice Clariſſime: ſcripta tua ad me miſſa cum voluptate perlegi, ac talia inveni ut nihil in illis mutare poſſim. That confeſſion of faith is in Dutch, and was printed in the year 1684 (150).

[Z] What is ſaid of him in the continuation of the Menagiana is falſe.] The ſtory runs thus: ‘ I have ‘ heard that Spinoza died for fear of being ſent to the ‘ Baſtille. He came into France at the ſollicitation of ‘ two perſons of quality, who deſired to ſee him. ‘ Mr de Pomponne was informed of it; and being a ‘ miniſter very zealous for religion, he did not think ‘ it proper to ſuffer Spinoza in France, where he ‘ might have done a great deal of miſchief; and to ‘ prevent it, he reſolved to ſend him to the Baſtille. ‘ Spinoza having notice of it, made his eſcape in the ‘ diſguiſe of a Cordelier; but I do not warrant the ‘ truth of this laſt circumſtance. What is certain is, ‘ that many perſons, who ſaw him, have told me ‘ that he was a little man, of a yellowiſh complexion, ‘ that he had ſomething diſmal in his looks, and ſome- ‘ thing ominous in his face (151).’ The laſt part of this paſſage is, I believe, very true; for, beſides that Spinoza was originally come from Portugal or Spain, as his name ſufficiently ſhews, I have heard ſome perſons, who had ſeen him, ſay the ſame thing of his complexion, as is related in the Menagiana. But the firſt part of this ſtory is a wretched falſity: from whence one may judge how many lies are told in ſuch aſſemblies as Mr Menage's Mercuriales, whereof there are many at Paris and in other cities.

[AA] I ſhall take notice of a fault Mr de Vigneul Marville has committed.] ‘ The Jew, or rather the ‘ Atheiſt, mentioned by Huetius in the preface of his ‘ Demonſtratio Evangelica, without naming him, who ‘ occaſioned his writing that learned book, is the fa- ‘ mous Benedict Spinoza, with whom he had ſome warm ‘ converſations about religion at Amſterdam (152).’ The Jew, with whom Huetius had ſome conferences at Amſterdam, is Manaſſes Ben Iſrael, whom he hath named in the Latin poem of his journey into Sweden.

Altera lux ſpectare dedis myſteria gentis
Judææ, ductor Judæus & ipſe Manaſſes.
Aſt adducta ſecans dirus præputia culter
Dum tenet attentum, & ſublati inſania ritus,
Ecce abaci; quo inferre pii cæleſtia Moſis
Scripta ſolent, ſummo extremum limbum pede tango
Inſcius; inſueto cuncti fremuere tumultu:
Diffugio veritus damnoſi vulnera cultri (153).

Next morn the Jewiſh myſteries I view,
My guide Manaſſes Ben Iſrael the Jew:
The lengthen'd prepuce now the dreadful ſteel
Cuts off, and now ſuſpends in air, while all
The Iſraelites in noiſy tumult bawl.
I gazing on, unthinking touch the cheſt,
Where holy Moſes's ſacred law is plac'd:

(149) See the anonymous book printed in the year 1690, at Amſterdam, and intituled, Philoſophia vulgaris refutata

(150) At Amſterdam. The title amounts to this, A Catholic and Chriſtian Confeſſion of Faith, in a letter to N. N. by Jarig Jellis.

(151) Sequel of the Menagiana, pag. 15, Edition of Holland.

(152) Vigneul Marville, Mêlang. Tom. ii, pag. 320, Dutch Edit.

(153) Petrus Daniel Huetius, Poëm. pag. 53, 54, Edit. Ultraj. 1700.

now informed that the author of a ſmall Dutch book, printed within theſe few days [BB], makes uſe of it with great force and ability. But to ſpeak of the ſupplement I deſign to give: it conſiſts in an explanation of the objection I have grounded on the immutability of God [CC], and in the examination of this queſtion, whether it be true, as I am told ſeveral

Behold they ſtart, and ſtare, and all around
Loud ſhouts and cries from every part reſound.
All in a maze, dreading the bloody knife
And furious Jews, I ran away for life.

That Jew is, I ſay, the Rabbin Manaſſes Ben Iſraël. The character Huetius gives of him in the preface of his Demonſtratio Evangelica, does not agree with Benedict Spinoza, who never made a figure among the Jews; for he left them being very young, and after many conteſtations, which had made him odious. ‘ Unicum ſelegi de multis argumentum, ſays Mr Huetius (154), ex Prophetiarum eventu conſlatum, quod propoſui hoc opere, & quo olim ad retundendam Judæi cujuſdam, viri acuti ſane & ſubtilis, contumaciam uſus ſum. Cum enim eſſem Amſtelodami, & Judæorum, quorum magna eſt his in locis frequentia, ritus ac myſteria penitius introſpicere vellem, ad eum deductus ſum, qui tum inter illos peritiſſimus, ac totius Judaicæ diſciplinæ conſultiſſimus habebatur. - - - - Among many arguments I ſingled out one, taken from the fulfilling of Prophecies, which I have propoſed in this work, and had long ago employed to beat down the contumacy of a certain Jew, a man of wit and ſubtilty. For when I was at Amſterdam, and was deſirous narrowly to obſerve the rites and ceremonies of the Jews, who are very numerous in thoſe parts, I was carried to him who, at that time, was accounted among them to be the moſt knowing and ſkillful in all the Jewiſh diſcipline.’ You ſee he ſpeaks of a remote time, and of the moſt famous Rabbin of Amſterdam: and it is to be obſerved, that this paſſage is to be found at the beginning of a large book in folio, which came out in the year 1678 (155), and whoſe compoſition and impreſſion took up ſome years. I think that the time Huetius denotes by the word olim, is the year 1652, in which he travelled into Sweden; but if I was miſtaken in this particular, it were ſtill true that he means Manaſſes Ben Iſrael, who died in the year 1659, and not our Spinoza, who, as I ſaid before, never kept a conſiderable rank in the ſynagogue.

[BB] The author of a ſmall Dutch book, printed within theſe few days (156)]. He only calls himſelf N. N. Philalethes: the title of his book comes to this; A demonſtration of the weakneſs of Spinoza's argument, concerning the only one abſolutely infinite ſubſtance. He lays down as a fact; 1. That the whole ſyſtem of Spinoza is grounded on this propoſition: That there is but one only ſubſtance, and that it is abſolutely infinite. 2. That from ſuch a principle Spinoza drew this conſequence, That particular Beings are only modifications of that abſolutely infinite ſubſtance. The author maintains that this principle, being conteſted by every body, ſhould have been proved with all imaginable care, and yet that Spinoza gave no proof of it. I could give ſome extracts of that piece, for I have ſeen a French tranſlation of it in manuſcript; but becauſe it is but a ſmall book, and in all probability it will be printed in French or Latin, before my Dictionary comes out, it were a needleſs thing to enlarge upon it.

[CC] An explanation of the objection which I have grounded upon GOD's immutability.] You will find that objection above in the remark [N], numb. II. I muſt confirm it, ſince ſome perſons maintain that the weakneſs of it ſufficiently appears, if it be conſidered that no alteration happens to the god of Spinoza, as being a ſubſtance infinite, neceſſary, &c. Tho' the face of the whole world ſhould change at every moment, tho' the earth ſhould be reduced to duſt, the ſun darkened, and the ſea become a luminous body, there will only be a change of modifications: the one only ſubſtance will always remain a ſubſtance infinite, extended, thinking, and ſo will all ſubſtantial or eſſential attributes. When they ſay this, they ſay nothing but what I have already confuted beforehand (157): but the better to ſhew their miſtake, I muſt obſerve here that they diſpute againſt me, as if I had maintained that, according to Spinoza, the Deity ſucceſſively annihilates and produces again. This is not what I object, when I ſay that he makes God ſubject to change, and diveſts him of his immutability. I do not confound, as they do, the notion of things, and the ſignification of words: by changing, I mean the ſame thing which all reaſoning men have ever meant by that word: I do not mean the annihilation and total deſtruction of a thing, but it's paſſing through ſeveral ſtates, the ſubject of the accidents it ceaſes to have, and of thoſe it begins to acquire, remaining the ſame. The learned, and the illiterate, the Mythologiſts and the Philoſophers, the Poets and the Naturaliſts, are agreed in this notion, and the ſignification of this word. The fabulous Metamorphoſes, ſo much ſung by Ovid, and the true generations explained by Philoſophers, equally ſuppoſed the preſervation of the ſubſtance, and kept it immutably as the ſucceſſive ſubject of the old and new form. Theſe notions have been only confounded by the unhappy diſputes of Chriſtian Divines: and yet it muſt be confeſſed that the moſt ignorant miſſionaries come into the right way again, when the queſtion is no longer about the Euchariſt If you aſk them, upon any other ſubject, what is meant by the change, converſion, tranſelementation, and tranſubſtantiation of one thing into another; they will anſwer you, the meaning of it is, for inſtance, that wood becomes fire, that bread becomes blood, and blood fleſh, and ſo on. They do not think then of the improper expreſſions conſecrated to the controverſy of the Euchariſt, that the bread is converted and tranſubſtantiated into the body of our Saviour. This way of ſpeaking does by no means agree with the doctrine deſigned to be explained by it: it is as if one ſhould ſay, that the air of a caſk is transformed, changed, converted, and tranſubſtantiated into the wine poured into the caſk. The air goes ſomewhere elſe, and the wine ſucceeds it in the ſame place: one of them is not in the leaſt metamorphoſed into the other. Neither is the myſtery of the Euchariſt, as it is explained by the Roman Catholics, any metamorphoſis: the bread is annihilated, as to it's ſubſtance; the body of CHRIST takes the place of the bread, and is not the ſubject of inherence of the accidents of that which are preſerved without their ſubſtance. But I repeat it again, this is the only caſe wherein the miſſionaries make a wrong uſe of the words change, converſion, or tranſelementation, of one Being into another: in all other things, they ſuppoſe, with the reſt of mankind, 1. That it is eſſential to a transformation, that the ſubject of the forms, that are deſtroyed, ſhould ſubſiſt under the new forms. 2. That tho' the ſubject be preſerved, as to what is eſſential in it, yet it undergoes an internal change, properly ſo called, and inconſiſtent with an immutable Being. Let the Spinoſiſts therefore no longer imagine that they will be allowed to coin a new language, contrary to the ideas of all mankind. If they have any ſincerity left, they muſt confeſs, that, according to their ſyſtem, GOD is ſubject to all the viciſſitudes, and all the revolutions, to which the materia prima of Ariſtotle is liable, in the ſyſtem of the Peripatetics. But could any thing be more abſurd than to maintain, that ſuppoſing Ariſtotle's doctrine, matter is a ſubſtance which never undergoes any change?

But in order to embarraſs the Spinoſiſts, it is but deſiring them to give a definition of change. They muſt define it in ſuch manner, that either it will not differ from the total deſtruction of a ſubject, or that it will agree with that one only ſubſtance, which they call GOD. If they define it in the firſt manner, they will make themſelves more ridiculous ſtill than the tranſubſtantiators; and if they define it in the ſecond manner, they will give up the cauſe.

I add, that the reaſon they alledge to elude my objections, proves too much; for if it was a good one, they muſt needs teach that there never was, nor will be, any change in the world, and that all manner of change is impoſſible, whether great or ſmall. Let us prove this conſequence. The reaſon, ſay they, why GOD is immutable, is, becauſe, as a ſubſtance, and an extenſion, ſeveral perſons pretend that I have not at all underſtood Spinoza's doctrine [DD]. It were a very ſtrange thing, ſince I have only undertaken to confute the propoſition, which

---

(154) Petrus Daniel Huetius, in Præfat. Demonſtrat. Evangelicæ, p. m. 3.

(155) The firſt edition of Huetius's Demonſtratio Evangelica was publiſhed in 1678, though the year 1679, is in the title page.

(156) At Amſterdam for Bernard Viſſcher 1701.

(157) See number II, of the remark [N].

extenſion, he neither is nor can be ſubject to any change. He is an extended ſubſtance under the form of fire, as well as under the form of wood, which is converted into fire, and ſo with other things. I will prove to them by this very reaſon, that the modifications themſelves are immutable. Man is according to their ſyſtem, a modification of GOD; they own that man is ſubject to change, ſince he is ſometimes merry, and ſometimes melancholy; ſometimes he wills one thing, and ſometimes he wills it not. This is no change, will I ſay; for he is as much a man when merry as when melancholy: the eſſential attributes of man remain immutably in him, whether he be willing to ſell his houſe, or to keep it. Let us ſuppoſe the moſt inconſtant man in the world, and ſuch as might fitly apply to himſelf theſe verſes of Horace:

Mea . . . . pugnat ſententia ſecum.
Quod petiit, ſpernit: repetit, quod nuper omiſit.
Æſtuat, & vitæ diſconvenit ordine toto.
Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis (158).

My mind is with itſelf at ſtriſe,
And diſagrees in all the courſe of life;
And what it hated now, it now deſires;
What now it throws away, it now admires;
Unſettled as the ſea, or fleeting air,
It razes, builds, and changes round to ſquare.
CREECH.

Or who might, more than any body elſe, be the true original of theſe verſes of Mr Boileau.

Mais l'homme ſans arrêt, dans ſa courſe inſenſée,
Voltige inceſſamment de penſée en penſée,
Son cœur toûjours flottant entre mille embarras,
Ne ſçait ni ce qu'il veut, ni ce qu'il ne veut pas
Ce qu'un jour il abhorre, en l'autre il le ſouhaite.
. . . .
. . . .
Voilà l'Homme en effet. Il va du blanc au noir
Il condamne au matin ſes ſentimens du ſoir.
Importun à tout autre, à ſoi-même incommode,
Il change à tous momens d'eſprit comme de mode;
Il tourne au moindre vent, il tombe au moindre choc.
Aujourd'hui dans un caſque, & demain dans un froc (159).

But ſillier man, in his inconſtant courſe,
Is wilder'd, and oft ſtrays from bad to worſe:
Toſs'd by a thouſand guſts of wavering doubt,
His reſtleſs mind ſtill rolls from thought to thought:
In each reſolve unſteady and unfix'd,
And what he one day loaths, deſires the next.
. . . .
. . . .
This is our image juſt: ſuch is that vain,
That fooliſh, fickle, motly creature man:
More changing than a weather cock, his head
Ne'er wakes with the ſame thoughts he went to bed.
Irkſome to all beſide, and ill at eaſe,
He neither others, nor himſelf can pleaſe:
Each minute round his whirling humours run,
Now he's a trooper, and a prieſt anon,
To day in buff, to morrow in a gown.
OLDHAM.

Let us ſuppoſe a man, who has ſincerely profeſſed all religions in leſs than two years: let us ſuppoſe that he is gone through all the conditions of human life; that he has been ſucceſſively a merchant, a ſoldier, and a monk, and then a married man; that he divorced his wife, and then turned regiſter, financier, and clergy man, &c. If the Spinoziſts tell him, you have been very inconſtant: Why? will he ſay, you are miſtaken, I have never changed, I have been as conſtantly a man ever ſince I was born, as a mountain has been a mountain. What could they reply to that argument ad hominem? Is it not moſt evident that the whole eſſence of the human ſpecies remains in the man, whether he wills the ſame things, whether he hates to day, what he loved yeſterday, and daily changes his inclinations?

But to make uſe of an example very proper for a country, the inhabitants whereof are uſed to the ſea; let us ſuppoſe that a Spinoziſt, at his retutn from Batavia, ſhould ſay that his voyage has been longer than uſually, becauſe the winds changed almoſt every day. He might be anſwered, You are miſtaken, the winds never change. Indeed it may be ſaid, that they blow ſometimes from the North, ſometimes from the South, &c. but they always retain the eſſence of wind; and therefore they do not change as they are winds, and remain as immutable as your one only ſubſtance of the world: for you ſay it is immutable, becauſe it never changes it's ſtate as to it's eſſential properties. No more does the wind change it's ſtate as it is wind, it always retains the whole nature and eſſence of it; and therefore it is as immutable as your Deity.

I go farther, and I ſay, that even when a man is burnt alive, no alteration happens to him. He was a modification of the divine nature when alive; and is he not ſo in the flames, or under the form of aſhes? Could he loſe the attributes that conſtitute a modification? Could he go through any change as he is a modification? If he changed in that reſpect, muſt it not be ſaid that flame is not a mode of extenſion? Could Spinoza affirm it without contradicting himſelf, and deſtroying his own ſyſtem? This is ſufficient to ſhew that thoſe are miſtaken, who pretend I have not proved that this ſyſtem makes GOD ſubject to change. My argument cannot be denied, without aſſerting that modifications themſelves are immutable, and that no alterations happen in man's thoughts, nor in the diſpoſition of matter; which is a moſt abſurd thing, and contrary to the doctrines which the Spinoziſts are forced to acknowledge; for they dare not deny that the modifications of the infinite ſubſtance are ſubject to corruption and generation.

Let us deſire of them to grant us, for a moment, by a dato non conceſſo, as the Logicians ſpeak, that Socrates is a ſubſtance. They muſt then acknowledge, that each particular thought of Socrates is a modality of his ſubſtance. But is it not true, that Socrates paſſing from affirming to denying, changes his thought, and that it is a real internal change and properly ſo called? And yet Socrates remains ſtill a ſubſtance, and an individuum of the human ſpecies, whether he affirms or denies, whether he wills or rejects a thing. And therefore, tho' he does not change as he is a man, he cannot be ſaid to be immutable; and it may very well be ſaid that he is mutable, and actually changes, becauſe his modifications are not always the ſame. But let us grant to the Spinoziſts in our turn, by a dato non conceſſo, that Socrates is but a modification of the divine ſubſtance; let us grant, I ſay, that his relation to that ſubſtance is, as in the common opinion, the relation of Socrates's thoughts to the ſubſtance of Socrates. Since therefore the change of thoſe thoughts is a good reaſon to maintain that Socrates is not an immutable Being, but rather an inconſtant and mutable ſubſtance which very much varies, it ought to be concluded that the ſubſtance of GOD (160) does actually undergo a change and a variation, properly ſo called, whenever Socrates, one of it's modifications changes his ſtate. It is therefore a moſt evident truth, that for a Being actually and really to paſs from one ſtate into another, it is ſufficient that it changes, as to it's modifications: and if any thing further is required, to wit, that it ſhould loſe it's eſſential attributes, annihilation, or a total deſtruction, would be groſly confounded with change or alteration. See the Margin (161).

[D D] Whether it be true, as I am told, ſeveral perſons pretend that I have not at all underſtood Spinoza's doctrine.] I have it from ſeveral hands; but no body could tell me the reaſons of thoſe who make ſuch a judgment of my diſpute. And therefore I can neither preciſely

(158) Horat. Epiſt. I, lib. i, ver. 97. See alſo the paſſage cited above citation (92).

(159) Boileau, Sat. VIII, ver. 35 & 49.

(160) Note, that Ariſtotle, de Prædicam. cap. v, reckons among the properties of a ſubſtance, to remain the ſame in number under contrary qualities. Μάλιϛα δὲ ἴδιον τῆς οὐσίας δοκεῖ εἶναι τὸ, ταὐτὸν καὶ ἓν ἀριθμῷ ὂν, τῶν ἐναντίων εἶναι δεκτικόν. Maxime verò ſubſtantiæ proprium hoc eſſe videtur, IDEM UNUMQUE NUMERO permanens contrariorum eſſe ſuſceptivum.

(161) One may ſee in the Janua Cœlorum reſerata, pag. 127, & ſeq. ſeveral remarks upon what would be ſufficient to infer the generability and corruptability of the Divine nature, if the Fathers had taught what is imputed to them.

which is the baſis of his ſyſtem, and which he has very clearly expreſſed. I have confined my ſelf to the confutation of what he diſtinctly lays down as his firſt principle, viz. That God is the only ſubſtance that is in the univerſe, and that all other Beings are preciſely confute them, nor examine if I ought to yield to their reaſons, for I know them not. All that I can do, is to juſtify myſelf in a general manner; and I think I may ſay, that if I have not underſtood the propoſition I undertook to confute, it is not my fault. I would not be ſo poſitive, if I had writ a book againſt the whole ſyſtem of Spinoza, examining it paragraph by paragraph. Doubtleſs I ſhould not have always underſtood him; and it is not likely he himſelf underſtood every part of his doctrine, and could make all the conſequences of his hypotheſis intelligible. But ſince I have confined myſelf to (162) a ſingle propoſition, expreſſed in few words, which appear clear and preciſe, and are the foundation of the whole ſtructure, I muſt have underſtood it, or it contains ſome ambiguities altogether unbecoming the founder of a ſyſtem. However I need not be uneaſy upon this account, both becauſe the ſenſe I put upon that propoſition of Spinoza is the ſame his other adverſaries have put upon it, and becauſe the beſt anſwer his followers can make, is, that he has not been underſtood (163). Notwithſtanding this charge, the laſt author who wrote againſt him (164), underſtands the propoſition in queſtion as I do; which ſhews that their accuſation is looked upon as very ill grounded.

But to be more particular, what I ſuppoſe in my objections amounts to this. I ſay, that Spinoza taught, 1. That there is but one only ſubſtance in the univerſe. 2. That this ſubſtance is God. 3. That all particular Beings, material extenſion, the ſun, the moon, plants, beaſts, and men, their motions, ideas, imaginations, and deſires, are modifications of God. Now I aſk the Spinoziſts, whether their maſter taught thoſe things or not? If he taught them, it cannot be ſaid that I have been guilty of the Ignoratio Elenchi, or of miſtaking the ſtate of the queſtion; for my objections, ſuppoſe that this is his very doctrine, and attack it upon that ſuppoſition. I am therefore ſafe, and whoever ſays that I have undertaken to confute what I did not apprehend, is miſtaken. If it be ſaid that Spinoza does not teach the three things above-mentioned, I aſk why he expreſſed himſelf juſt as thoſe would do, who ſhould be extremely deſirous to make the reader believe that they teach thoſe three things? Is it a fair and laudable thing to uſe the common ſtyle, without annexing to the words the ſame ideas other men annexed to them, and without informing the reader of the new ſenſe put upon them? But in order to diſcuſs the matter, let us enquire wherein the miſtake may lie. I cannot have been miſtaken as to the word ſubſtance; for I have not confuted Spinoza upon that head; I have admitted what he ſuppoſes, that a thing cannot be a ſubſtance, unleſs it be independent of all cauſes, or have an eternal and neceſſary ſelf-exiſtence. I do not think I was miſtaken in ſaying, that, according to Spinoza, God only has the nature of a ſubſtance; and therefore I believe that if there was any miſtake in my objections, it would be only in putting a different ſenſe upon the words modalities, modifications, modes, from that of Spinoza. But I repeat it again, If I was miſtaken in it, it would be his fault: I underſtand thoſe words as they have been always underſtood, or, at leaſt, as they are underſtood by all the new Philoſophers (165); and I had reaſon to believe he took them in that ſenſe, becauſe he gave no public notice that he uſed them in any other ſignification. It is the general doctrine of Philoſophers, that the idea of Being contains two ſpecies under it, viz. ſubſtance and accident, and that a ſubſtance ſubſiſts by itſelf, ens per ſe ſubſiſtens, and that an accident ſubſiſts in another Being, ens in alio. They add, that ſubſiſting by one's ſelf, ſignifies only not depending upon a ſubject of inheſion; and becauſe, according to their notions, this agrees with matter, angels, and human ſouls; they admit two ſorts of ſubſtance, one of which is uncreated, and the other created; and they ſubdivide the created ſubſtance into two ſpecies. One of thoſe two ſpecies is matter; the other our ſouls. As for accidents, they all believed before the wretched diſputes, which have divided Chriſtianity, that they do ſo eſſentially depend upon their ſubject of inheſion that they cannot ſubſiſt without it. This was their ſpecific character, by this they were diſtinguiſhed from ſubſtance. The doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation deſtroyed that notion, and forced the Philoſophers to ſay, that an accident may ſubſiſt without a ſubject. They could not avoid ſaying ſo, ſince they believed, on the one hand, that after the conſecration, the ſubſtance of the bread in the Euchariſt ſubſiſted no longer, and they ſaw, on the other hand, that all the accidents of the bread ſubſiſted as before. Wherefore they admitted a real diſtinction between a ſubſtance and it's accidents, and a mutual ſeparability between thoſe two ſorts of Beings, by virtue of which, each of them could ſubſiſt without the other. But ſome of them maintained ſtill that there are ſome accidents, whoſe diſtinction from their ſubject is not real, and which cannot ſubſiſt without it. They called thoſe accidents modes (166). Des Cartes, Gaſſendus, and, in general, all thoſe who have forſaken the ſcholaſtic Philoſophy, deny that an accident can be ſeparated from it's ſubject, ſo as to ſubſiſt after it's ſeparation, and they give to all accidents the nature of thoſe that were called modes, and uſe the terms of mode, modality, or modification, rather than that of accident. Now ſince Spinoza was a great Carteſian, it is reaſonable to think that he put the ſame ſenſe upon thoſe words as Des Cartes did. If it be ſo, he underſtands by the modification of a ſubſtance only a manner of Being, which has the ſame relation to the ſubſtance, as figure, motion, reſt, and ſituation have to matter; and pain, affirmation, love, &c. to the ſoul of man. For this is what the Carteſians call modes. They acknowledge no other modes; from whence it appears that they have kept the old notion of Ariſtotle, according to which, an accident is of ſuch a nature, that it makes no part of it's ſubject, and cannot exiſt without it, and the ſubject can loſe it without loſing it's exiſtence. Ἐν ὑποκειμένῳ δὲ λέγω ὃ ἔν τινι μὴ ὡς μέρος ὑπάρχον, ἀδύνατον χορὶς εἶναι τοῦ ἐν ᾧ ἐστιν. Atque id in ſubjecto eſſe dico quod in aliquo quidem eſt: & non uti pars: ut ſi autem ſeorſum ab eo in quo ineſt, fieri nequit (167). All this agrees with roundneſs, motion, and reſt, with reſpect to a ſtone, and likewiſe with pain, and affirmation with reſpect to the ſoul. If Spinoza annexed the ſame idea to what he calls modification of ſubſtance, my objections are certainly juſt; I have attacked him directly according to the true ſignification of his words, I have rightly underſtood his doctrine, and confuted it according to it's true ſenſe. In a word, there is no ground for the accuſation I examine. But if he had the ſame notion of matter or extenſion, and of human ſouls, as Des Cartes had, and yet would not give the name of ſubſtance to extenſion, or to our ſouls, becauſe he believed that a ſubſtance is a Being that depends upon no cauſe; I confeſs I have not rightly attacked him, but have aſcribed to him an opinion which was none of his. This was what remains to be examined.

Having once laid down, that a ſubſtance is what exiſts by itſelf, as independently upon any efficient cauſe, as upon any material one, or any ſubject of inheſion, he ought not to have ſaid that matter and human ſouls are ſubſtances: and becauſe, according to the common doctrine, he divided Being only into two ſpecies, viz. into ſubſtance, and modification of ſubſtance; he ſhould have ſaid that matter and human ſouls are only modifications of ſubſtance. No orthodox man will deny that, according to this definition of ſubſtance, there is but one ſubſtance in the world, and that this ſubſtance is God. Then the only thing that will remain to be known, is, whether he ſubdivides the modification of ſubſtance into two ſpecies. If he uſes ſuch a ſubdiviſion, and if he means by one of thoſe two ſpecies, what the Carteſians and other Chriſtian Philoſophers call created ſubſtance, and by the other ſpecies what they call accident or mode, there will only be a diſpute about words between him and them, and it will be a very eaſy thing to make his whole ſyſtem orthodox, and to put an end to his ſect: for a man is a Spinoziſt only becauſe he believes that Spinoza has utterly deſtroyed the ſyſtem of the Chriſtian Philoſophers, and the exiſtence of an immaterial God, who governs all things with a perfect liberty. From whence we may conclude, by the by, that the Spinoziſts and their adverſaries do perfectly agree about the ſenſe of the word modification of ſubſtance. Both the one are only modifications of that ſubſtance. If we do not underſtand what he meant by it, it is doubtleſs, becauſe he put a new ſenſe upon his words, without giving notice of it to the reader. Which is an effectual way to become unintelligible by one's own fault. If there is any term that he took in a new ſenſe, and unknown to Philoſophers, it is in

---

(162) See the remark [P].

(163) See the ſame remark.

(164) See the remark [BB].

(165) I uſe this reſtriction becauſe of the difference there is between the doctrine of the modern peripatetics, and that of the Carteſians, Gaſſendiſtes, &c. about the nature of accidents. It is a notable difference; but all comes to the ſame with reſpect to the objections againſt Spinoza.

(166) Such as union, action, duration, and ubiquity.

(167) Ariſtot. de Prædicam. cap. ii.

one and the other believed that Spinoza meant by it, a Being of the ſame nature with what the Carteſians call modes, and that he never underſtood by that word a Being, which had the properties, or the nature of what we call created ſubſtance.

